The famous third movement sprung alive in animated frivolity enhanced with crisp splashing chimes. Announced by a brass choir, the last movement was set in a minor tonality often featuring the reeds, and included a beautiful and gracious flute solo.

De Waart also received an enthusiastic standing ovation which was the fitting end to a delightful afternoon.

Weekend Full Of Substitutes At Tanglewood

By RICHARD VINCENT
Music Critic

You couldn't tell the players without a scorecard over the weekend at Tanglewood as defections and substitutions became commonplace.

William Steinberg cancelled both of his conducting appearances for Friday and Saturday, Rafael Frubeck cancelled his Sunday afternoon appearance and James King, scheduled for the tenor solos in Mahler's "Das Lied von der Erde" was replaced at the last chime by Lake George Opera's Nicholas Di Virgilio.

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN, concert master and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra filled in for Steinberg, and Edo de Waart, a young Dutch conductor who happened to be in the right place at the right time, did the directing honors on Sunday.

All the defectors were overcome by a mysterious and temporarily debilitating condition known as the "Tanglewood Vapors" and their recovery, one hopes, will be speedy.

All the substitutes were, at the very least, professional and competent, and one of them, DeWaart, showed an uncommon ability in the face of his precipitous ascension to the podium.

He was called upon to conduct two quite disparate works, the Bartok Piano Concerto No. 2 and the Brahms Symphony No. 4 in E Minor, and he succeeded in both.

Christoph Eschenbach was the soloist in the Bartok, and as neither he nor De Waart showed the slightest sign of crisis, the results were outstanding.

THE PIECE written in 1931, is now quite firmly in the repertory of any self-respecting musical organization and for good reason. It is vintage Bartok, extremely imaginative, and very pianistic. The composer was himself a virtuoso pianist and he had a sound concept of what the piano could do for effect and this work is a prime example of that.

Eschenback played with considerable dash and panache and De Waart, thinly prepared though he might have been, was quite able to give proper aid and succor in what was a full and exciting partnership.

It is a fact, however, that the Tanglewood Shed is not the most felicitous arena for piano works. Whatever the reason may be, the piano sound is often muffled, and during the passages where both piano and orchestra are in full cry, the orchestra sound tends to overwhelm the piano. This, of course could be a dereliction of the conductor, after all a full orchestra of the caliber of the BSO can certainly make hash of any soloist if they put their backs into it, but my impression is that the fault lies in both the characteristics of the Shed and my location on the far left in Section 7.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
JUL 30 1973 New England Newsclip

Silverstein conducts Friday, Saturday concerts

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

THE HALF-WAY mark of the Tanglewood season this past weekend presented several unexpected problems which were all happily resolved. When the indisposition of William Steinberg, who had been scheduled to conduct the first two programs, forced the Boston Symphony management to look quickly for a replacement, it discovered Joseph Silverstein available and more than competent to step up from his chair as the Boston Symphony concertmaster to the orchestra's podium.

Silverstein from his years of experience and immersion in the orchestral literature disclosed an intimate familiarity with the assignments of both Friday and Saturday evenings, and his task Saturday could not have made more contrasted demands on his arsenal. The Schubert "Unfinished" symphony came through in its pristine transparency; the Mahler "Das Lied von der Erde" was as antipodal a kettle of fish as could have been conceived.

* * * *

Schubert here is youthful and lithe; Mahler is pessimistic in spirit and despairing in mood. The audience did not quite appreciate the Mahler for it is more a symphony than a song cycle. They applauded the alternate movements sung by tenor Nicholas Di Virgilio and soprano Lili Chookasian, as worthy as they were, but did not perceive that the poetic enunciations here were more instruments of the ensemble than vocal solos.

As opposed to the pellucidity of Schubert who requires a comparatively small orchestra, Mahler uses a huge instrumentation and at the very outset discloses what he proposes to do with the voice. Di Virgilio's first declaration, "Schon wirkt der Wein," gleams with golden enticement but is against strings playing. With Mahler's distinct directions, double forte, and as powerful as the tenor's utterances were, they receded into the over-all background of sound. Mahler was kinder to the contralto and Miss Chookasian was allowed, by the composer as well as by the conductor, to convey her fastidiously shaped tones without overexertion.

"The Song of the Earth" is a series of poems translated into German from thousand-year old Chinese verses. "A perfume of melancholy" pervades the hour-long recital culminating in "the Farewell," as long as the preceding five stanzas, but in an inettably poignant plea expressed by the vocal line and a purely orchestral interlude in Mahler's most searching supplication.

* * *

Peter Lagger had given evidence in his declamation "To Joy" in the Beethoven Ninth Symphony the previous week of the character of his deep and resonant bass voice. In the Prelude program Friday, he had the good fortune to have a pianist of the exceptional caliber of Malcom Frager as his assisting artist and the too short program, all of Beethoven, was an impressive gem.

The choices Lagger made tended to lean to the lugubrious, but they were richly rewarding for the nature of his voice. Beethoven chose poems which were perfect vehicles for the controlled timbre of the remarkable-fictile bass. If there could be any distinction, probably his "On Death" and "Nature's Praise of God" were outstanding renditions.

Lagger ended his evening with the short cycle "An die ferne Geliebte" (To the distant Beloved). This happens to be Opus 98 and takes its place in a moment of Beethoven's highest inspiration. Opus 95 had been the salient F Minor String Quartet, Opus 96, the crowning G Major Violin and Piano Sonata and Opus 97, the Archduke Trio.

* * * *

The art-song had not yet developed in Beethoven's youth but this one, particularly as Lagger sang and Frager played, retained a simple sentiment with a personal emotional content. The six songs were performed without pause and constitute a song-cycle of exceptional unity. Lagger lent them a tenderness and warmth of feeling which confirmed the impression which exists at times that they were more than a little autobiographical.

* * *

Friday night Silverstein had the scintillating assistance of young Miriam Fried in the violin concerto and completed the evening with the same composer's first symphony.

It would require more than a little temerity to argue at this point with the long-departed composer, but there has always been an unanswered query in my mind as to whether Brahms translated his ideas into words as precisely as he did to notes. The main theme of the last movement cries out for breadth and grandeur, but he advised performers to play it "con brio" and obedience thereto diminished its gallant chivalry, and the Allegretto is rarely sufficiently calm and reposed as it strikes us in the essence its spirit imposes. Silverstein was thoroughly conversant with every detail of the symphony's traditions, but he made relentless demands in which the orchestra's responses tended to unvaried dynamics.

* * *

In her comprehension of the violin concerto, Miss Fried proved my contention about the symphony; To wit, that Brahms is revealed in his utmost glory without haste. Once past the introductory gymnastics, she settled into a superbly gratifying performance from every aspect. Her masterful bow, always superabundantly prepared, made figures and decorations of beauty of passages which are too often considered adequate when merely correctly articulated. She imbued every note, fleet or sustained, with an intensely virile tone (if she will pardon the expression), but made every phrase sound both spontaneous and thoughtful.

Miss Fried is a tall, slender, handsome girl and stands erect and majestic. She was completely poised in her posture and in her interpretation of the concerto. Her intonation was a deeply satisfying revelation and the total performance will remain as a heroic monument for this listener.

FOURTH WEEKEND

Weekend Prelude
PETER LAGGER
WILLIAM STEINBERG
BRAHMS PROGRAM
Violin Concerto
Miriam Fried
Symphony No. 1

Open Rehearsal
WILLIAM STEINBERG
Schubert: Symphony No. 8 "Unfinished"
Mahler: Das Lied von der Erde soprano to be announced
James King

RAFAEL FRUHBECK DE BURGOS
Turina: Oracion de Torero for Strings
Bartok: Piano Concerto No. 2
Christoph Eschenbach
Brahms: Symphony No. 4

Cancellations Hit Tanglewood

By ELLEN FLETCHER

• Concert Review

Review: Tanglewood Visited

By John Mess

ON SUNDA its famed After strolli seated glanced Fruhbeck conducting energetic
the Rotterdam

The afternoo carnaval
percussive
Russian number.

Following
2. The Christoph
Tanglewood

The first delineation
a mass of times mysterious
at the keyboard

The second between the ellusive melod
cordal orchestra

The final intensity combination concluded Bartok

AUDIENCE extraordinary standing ovation

The final
Symphony was the lyrical strings in which were portrayed.
second movement
playing to a pizzicato

The famous third movement sprung alive in animated frivolity enhanced with crisp splashing chimes. Announced by a brass choir, the last movement was set in a minor tonality often featuring the reeds, and included a beautiful and gracious flute solo.

De Waart also received an enthusiastic standing ovation which was the fitting end to a delightful afternoon.

Weekend Full Of Substitutes At Tanglewood

By RICHARD VINCENT
Music Critic

You couldn't tell the players without a scorecard over the weekend at Tanglewood as defections and substitutions became commonplace.

William Steinberg cancelled both of his conducting appearances for Friday and Saturday. Rafael Frühbeck cancelled his Sunday afternoon appearance and James King, scheduled for the tenor solos in Mahler's Das Lied von der Erde, was replaced at the last chance by Lake George Opera's Nicholas Di Virgilio.

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN, concert master and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra filled in for Steinberg, and Edo de Waart, a young Dutch conductor who happened to be in the right place at the right time, did the conducting honors on Sunday.

Affected defectors were overcome by a mysterious and temporarily debilitating condition known as the "Tanglewood Vapors" and their recovery, one hopes, will be speedy.

All the substitutes were, at the very least, professional and competent, and one of them, DeWaart, showed an uncommon ability in the face of his precipitous ascension to the podium.

He was called upon to conduct two quite disparate works, the Bartok Piano Concerto No. 2 and the Brahms Symphony No. 4 in E Minor, and he succeeded in both.

Christoph Eschenbach was the soloist in the Bartok, and as neither he nor De Waart showed the slightest sign of errors, the results were outstanding.

THE PIECE written in 1931, is now quite firmly in the repertory of any self-respecting musical organization and for good reason. It is vintage Bartok, extremely imaginative, and very pianistic. The composer was himself a virtuoso pianist and he had a sound concept of what the piano could do for effect and this work is a prime example of that.

Eschenbach played with considerable dash and panache and De Waart, thinly prepared though he might have been, was quite able to give support and and succor in what was a full and exciting partnership.

It is a fact, however, that the Tanglewood Shed is not the most felicitous arena for piano works. Whatever the reason may be, the piano sound is often muffled and during the passages where both piano and orchestra are in full cry, the orchestra sound seems to overwhelm the piano. This, of course could be a dereliction of the conductor, after all a full orchestra of the caliber of the BSO can certainly make hash of any soloist if they put their backs into it, but my impression is that the hall lies in wait for the characteristics of the Shed and my location on the far left in Section 7

Silverstein conducts Friday, Saturday concerts

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

THE HALL WAY mark of the [illegible] this past [illegible] presented several [illegible] problems which [illegible] When [illegible] of William [illegible] had been scheduled to conduct the first two [illegible] the Boston [illegible] expect to look [illegible] to proceed, it [illegible] Joseph Silverstein [illegible] and more than com[illegible] from his chair [illegible] Boston Symphony com[illegible] to the orchestra's [illegible]

[illegible] from his years of [illegible] and immersion in [illegible] orchestral literature he [illegible] regularity [illegible] the assignments of both [illegible] and Saturday evenings. [illegible] his task Saturday could not [illegible] made more contrasted de[illegible] as his second The Schu[illegible] Unfinished symphony [illegible] through in its pristine [illegible] purity. Gustav Mahler's Das Lied von der Erde was as unattainable a settle of fish as could [illegible] conceived.

Schubert here is youthful and [illegible] Mahler is pessimistic in [illegible] not despairing in mood [illegible] did not quite ap[illegible] The Mahler for it is [illegible] symphony than a song [illegible] They applauded the alter[illegible] movements sung by tenor [illegible] Di Virgilio and sopr[illegible] Lin Chaikovsky as worthy [illegible] were but did not for [illegible] the poetic emotions [illegible]

[illegible] were more in [illegible] statements of the ensemble than vocal solos.

As opposed to the pellucidity of Schubert who requires a comparatively small orchestra Mahler uses a huge instrumentation and at the very outset discloses what he proposes to do with the voice. Di Virgilio's first declaration, "Schon wurzt der Wein" gleams with golden enticement but is against strings playing with Mahler's distinct directions double forte and as powerful as the tenor's utterances were, they receded into the overall background of sound. Mahler was kinder to the contralto and Miss Chaikovsky was allowed to the end point as well as his conductor, to convey her fastidiously shaded tones without overexertion.

"The Song of the Earth" is a series of poems translated into German from thousand year old Chinese verses. A portrait of melancholy pervades the hour-long recital culminating in the Farewell, as long as the preceding five stanzas, but in an inestimably potent plea expressed by the vocal line and a purely orchestral interlude in Mahler's most searching supplication.

Peter Lagger had given evidence in his declamation "To Joy" in the Beethoven Ninth Symphony the previous week of the character of his deep and resonant bass voice. In the Prelude program Friday he had the good fortune to have a part of the exceptional [illegible] with Malcolm Frager as [illegible] and the [illegible] all of Beethoven was impressive [illegible]

The choices Lagger made [illegible] to learn to the [illegible] but they were [illegible] the nature of [illegible] Beethoven chose poetry which were perfect vehicles for his controlled tenor and the [illegible] bass. It [illegible] could be any distraction, possibly [illegible] "On Death" and "Nature's Praise of God" were [illegible] standing renditions.

Lagger ended his evening with the short cycle [illegible] "Adelaide" (To the Beloved). This begins [illegible] Opus 96 and takes it [illegible] moment in Beethoven's [illegible] inspiration. Opus 96 [illegible] the sublime F Major String [illegible] Opus 96, the [illegible] Major Violin and Piano Sonata and Opus 97, the Archduke Trio.

The art-song had not [illegible] developed in Beethoven's [illegible] but this one, particularly [illegible] Lagger sang and Frager played retained a simple [illegible] with a personal emotional [illegible] The six songs were performed without pause and [illegible] suddenly [illegible] some [illegible] of [illegible] exceptional unity. Lagger [illegible] there is a coldness and [illegible] of feeling which confirmed [illegible] impression which exists [illegible] times that they were merely a little autobiographical.

Friday night Silverstein [illegible] the [illegible] Mozart Frager [illegible] in a concerto and [illegible] evening with the [illegible] Brahms's first symphony.

It would require [illegible]

Tanglewood: Changes and Brilliance

At the Concert

By EDWARD FRENCH

This was a weekend of last minute substitutions at Tanglewood. Because of illness, William Steinberg had to cancel his Friday and Saturday evening appearances and Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos, scheduled for Sunday afternoon, had to bow out for the same reason.

Joseph Silverstein, associate conductor and concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, took over the Steinberg concerts and a talented young Dutch conductor, Edo de Waart, replaced De Burgos. One other change was the substitution of Nicolas di Virgilio for James King to do the tenor solos in Mahler's "Song of the Earth" Saturday night. The contralto for this work was Lili Chookasian.

FRIDAY ..evening's program included the Violin Concerto in D Major and the Symphony No. 1 in C minor by Brahms.

Miriam Fried was soloist in the concerto and displayed a surprisingly large warm tone, a first class virtuoso technique as well as impeccable musicianship. It was playing that fully substantiated her position as one of the top flight fiddlers. Joseph Silverstein gave her the kind of accompaniment he would like if he were soloist, very good indeed.

Silverstein's Brahms Symphony was a careful foursquare reading that followed traditional lines.

Edo de Waart, on the podium Sunday afternoon is the musical director of the Rotterdam Philharmonic and the 1964 first prize winner of the Dimitri Mitropoulous Competition and worked as assistant to Leonard Bernstein with the New York Philharmonic during the 1965-66 season.

Like Bernstein, he is a rather athletic conductor and likes to whip up stirring climaxes. His reading of the Berlioz "Roman Carnival" Overture had an almost incandescent brilliance. The orchestra was in top form here.

YOUNG DE Waart's ability to handle the larger forms was clearly shown in a splendidly proportioned version of the monumental Brahms Symphony No. 4 in E Minor.

Christoph Eschenbach was soloist in the Bartok Piano Concerto No. 2, a far cry from the Mozart and Beethoven Concerti we had heard him do so well previously.

His playing of the rhythmic and percussive Bartok opus had a fiery brilliance and excitement that won him a well deserved ovation.

Another fine concert on this busy weekend was given by the Tokyo String Quartet. This was the first of the South Mountain Association's 56th annual series of chamber music events.

THE HIGH POINT of this concert, was a superb performance of Bartok's Quartet No. 6. Here was ensemble playing that combined eloquence, rhythmic verve, perfect tonal balance and just the right amount of give and take. This was as fine a performance of this difficult work as we have heard.

Smetana's "From my Life" Quartet with its Czech flavor was equally successful and for much the same reasons. It is almost mystifying to find these four products of an Asian culture being so understanding of a central European ethos.

However, the foursome seemed less comfortable in the formal classic contours in Haydn's F Sharp Minor Quartet. The playing was accurate enough, but seemed cool and impersonal and not as integrated as in the other works.

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 86,638
JUL 30 1973

UNION (M)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 86,090
JUL 28 1973
New England Newsclip

BSO Earns Its Fame

By R.C HAMMERICH

LENOX — One of the reasons why a group like the Boston Symphony Orchestra is listed among the world's great orchestras was demonstrated Friday night.

The concert was conducted by the concertmaster.

Last Tuesday night the scheduled guest conductor, William Steinberg, reported that he was too sick to finish the week of rehearsals leading to concerts Friday and tonight.

So Joseph Silverstein moved up from the front seat in the violin section to the podium and led rehearsals Wednesday, Thursday and Friday for both programs for a total of about four and half hours.

The orchestra member take this sort of thing in stride. "We know the music," said one of them with a little shrug before the concert.

It was a Brahms program Friday and it sounded fine neither inspired nor bland but well balanced and well paced.

Soloist for the first piece the Violin Concerto in D, Opus 77, was Miriam Fried, a young, slender, attractive, brunette (let's say closer to 25 than 30) who played with a full, warm, strong tone and a manner of vigorous confidence.

Silverstein's baton technique is a bit awkward, which is understandable inasmuch as it is not his profession, but it was obvious that he knew the music thoroughly and knew what he wanted to hear from the orchestra.

After intermission the Symphony No. 1, one of the popular staples of the symphonic repertory, came across with a good bit more fire and spirit than it put into the concerto, partly because the score has more of it and partly because the orchestra is obliged to be somewhat subdued when it is accompanying a soloist.

Peter Lagger, a bass from Switzerland with wide experience in opera, sang the 7 p. m. prelude program with a voice that has the quality of a clean, vibrant baritone with the depth and substance of a basso.

He sang seven songs and a song cycle, all by Beethoven, and nearly all with a similar emotional message . . . serious, tense, laden with portent.

Lagger's voice has a very satisfying tone — strong, secure, full of vitality. He controlled it well Friday night, although, in truth, the 35 minute program offered him little need to display wide ranges of agility or pitch.

The only aspect that was disappointing was his tendency to slur diction although the beginnings and ends of phrases were crisp enough.

The two songs which broke the pattern of seriousness were "Ich liebe dich," which was friendly and "Der Kusse," which was funny. The others were "In questa tomba oscura," "Bitten," "Vom Tode," "Die Ehre Gottes aus der Natur" and "Wonne der Wehmut."

The song cycle (six songs) was "An die ferne Geliebie."

Tonight Silverstein will conduct again. The program will be Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and Mahler's "Song of the Earth" for tenor, contralto and orchestra.

TIMES (E)
HARTFORD, CONN.
D. 135,000
JUL 31 1973
New England Newsclip

A Substitute Conductor

By DOROTHY STOWE
Times Movie Critic

LENOX, Mass. — Due to the illness of William Steinberg, Saturday night's Tanglewood concert was under the direction of Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of Boston Symphony and for two years assistant conductor of the orchestra.

One must be grateful to Silverstein, an excellent musician and violinist, for stepping and making the best of the situation. He conducted an agreeable reading of the Schubert Symphony No. 8 (The Unfinished), which was smoothly and carefully done, as befitted gentleman and scholars. But it lacked temperamental drive; one felt that competence had been served, but not inspiraion.

Mahler's great twilight evocation, "Das Lied von der Erde," a setting of six poems by medieval Chinese poets, is like a panoramic tapestry through which the world-weary singer wanders, continually happening upon scenes which recall his youth, or summarizing his philosophy.

There is subtle chinoiserie in the delicate blending of harmonies and modalities, and an ineffable weltschmerz hangs over this music which is more background than foreground, in the sense of looking backward at pleasures from afar. Even the drinking songs have the ring of melancholy desparation.

Saturday night "Das Lied" received a good, but not a great performance. Perhaps due to insufficient preparation time, the strands of the oriental tapestry did not blend into suffused autumnal colors, but too often shrieked with garish explicitness.

This music should be gently squeezed and kneaded, almost imperceptibly manipulated into lustrous, wistful folds. Instead, it abounded in overly-bright touches, mainly due to orchestral zealousness.

Commentaries assumed the proportions of declamations, as incidental oboes, flutes, and strings pushed themselves to the fore, as did the unbelievably loud harps. Also, the orchestra often threatened to engulf the singers, particularly the tenor.

Contralto Lili Chookasian, a singer of great gifts both vocally and spiritually, lent the performance its most fragile delicacy.

The shimmering watery imagery of "Von Der Schoenheit" did not escape her, nor its quickening pace.

And her final "Abschied" was gloriously sung, planned with a great design possible only to the fully cognizant artist. The final "ewigs" sank into infinity with stirring pathos.

James King projected some thrilling vocalism in the vigorous music assigned to him, which calls for the Wagnerian technique of which he is master.

However, tone was somewhat rough-grained as he seemed more preoccupied with getting above the ebullient orchestra than with refinements of interpretation.

NEWS
WILLIAMSTOWN, MASS.
D. 1,500
AUG 2 1973
New England Newsclip

Mostly Music

By Douglas Moore

Friday night's concert at Tanglewood was the first of the weekend in which a substitute for the listed performer was called into service. Due to the illness of William Steinberg, assistant conductor and concertmaster Joseph Silverstein conducted the full Boston Symphony concert with violinist Miriam Fried, soloist. The Prelude concert was performed as listed with bass Peter Lagger and pianist Malcolm Frager.

Singing a selection of Beethoven songs, Lagger exhibited a large voice, strong and even in all registers. The first few songs were quite somber in atmosphere and Lagger effected an appropriately grave tone. Before an exquisite performance of the great song cycle "An die ferne Geliebte" he inserted a coquettish song called "The Kiss" and showed as well the very soft and charming quality in his voice. Pianist Frager, who soloed with the Berkshire Symphony last October and will appear with the Boston Symphony Aug. 5, was a perfect partner. The Prelude audience equated itself with the boorish opera audience who applauds before the orchestra finishes a coda to an aria by cutting short Frager's beautifully sensitive closing chords to several songs.

Israeli violinist Miriam Fried has studied at two major American music schools: Indiana University and Julliard. She made her Carnegie Hall debut in 1964 and has since won the Queen Elizabeth of Belgium International Competition and the Paganini Competition and appeared as soloist with most of the major orchestras both in this country and in Europe and Israel. Most rising young violinists choose to ride the impressive technical but minimal musical difficulties of such concerti as those by Mendelssohn, Paganini, Lalo, etc. Miss Fried chose instead the Brahms Concerto in D Major, a work of the highest technical and musical difficulty. Any deficiencies in the performance must be laid to Silverstein whose conducting was inadequate as an accompanist, particularly in the second and thi d movements where he and the orchestra were often left far behind. Miss Fried is a violinist par excellence. Her tone was silvery and powerful, her intonation perfect and her interpretation of this most romantic concerto was not an exaggerated one as is often heard. Rather she stressed the classical element; clean figuration and passage work, not too much rubato and a constant rhythmic motion.

The oboe solo in the slow movement was beautiful as was most of the wind playing all evening; the strings were sufficiently soft so that the soloist was audible even during the quietest of passages. The audience again indulged in a particularly unsophisticated practice by applauding after the first movement; they did, however, redeem themselves by giving Miss Fried a much-deserved standing ovation at the conclusion of the concerto.

In the First Symphony of Brahms, the orchestra, despite the conductor, performed as a cohesive ensemble. Playing such a familiar work, a fine orchestra such as the Boston barely needs a man on the podium. Special credit should be given to assistant concertmaster Jerome Rosen for his solo in the second movement.

TIMES (E)
HARTFORD, CONN.
D. 135,000
JUL 30 1973
New England Newsclip

Impressive Lenox Debut

By DOROTHY STOWE
Times Music Critic

LENOX, Mass — One would imagine that the past week has not been a soothing one for Tanglewood brass, confronted as they were with the necessity of providing a whole new roster of conductors for the weekend's concerts.

However, in one case it led to a remarkable Boston Symphony debut by a relatively unknown young newcomer who took the shed audience by storm yesterday afternoon.

Edo de Waart, music director of the Rotterdam Philharmonic, substituted for ailing Manual Frubeck de Burgos. And the monent the slight, intent Flying Dutchman lifted his arms to begin one felt the force of a great conductorial personality.

De Waart, who trained under Bernstein in New York and has led the Chicago and Los Angeles Orchestras, immediately impressed the audience with the Roman Carnival Overture by Berlioz, a dazzling pyrotechnic tour de force which yet lacked for nothing in accuracy.

He next joined forces with the brilliant young German pianist, Christoph Eschenbach, to perform Bartok's Piano Concerto No. 2, and their combined enthusiastic drive proved thrilling compatible.

Eschenbach (who was to have been heard in Hartford last winter) dove into the first movement with a restless commanding energy which swept all before it, and with the wholehearted cooperation of all delivered an Allegro which flapped with a fine careless frenzy, streaming in the wind like a banner.

The Adagio, with its extended dialogues between piano and drums throbbed with intensity; and the whole wound up with a bravura which went far towards convincing the audience that Bartok is really not so incomprehensible after all.

But it was in the Brahms Fourth Symphony that de Waart really removed every possible reservation. The good-humored young man, his shock of blond hair waving, scooped up great handfuls of Brahms and sowed it over the audience with all the prodigality of youth. And Boston's finest really blew their cool in an impassioned performance of the old faithful standby which made it young again.

There were so many fine things in this Brahms. First of all, it was technically impeccable, exceptionally clear. There was marvelous melodic sweep, with a seamless transfer of themes from voice to voice; and the compelling rhythms pressed forward like human pulses.

De Waart's innate touch of Rembrandt was really showing in the rich-hued, visceral tone which he regularly elicited from the cellos; in the ripe fulfillment of the violins's fervid involvement; and in the golden fullness of the brass sound.

Tanglewood: Changes and Brilliance

At the Concert

By EDWARD FRENCH

This was a weekend of last minute substitutions at Tanglewood. Because of illness, William Steinberg had to cancel his Friday and Saturday evening appearances and Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos, scheduled for Sunday afternoon, had to bow out for the same reason.

Joseph Silverstein, associate conductor and concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, took over the Steinberg concerts and a talented young Dutch conductor, Edo de Waart, replaced De Burgos. One other change was the substitution of Nicolas di Virgilio for James King to do the tenor solos in Mahler's "Song of the Earth" Saturday night. The contralto for this work was Lili Chookasian.

FRIDAY ..evening's program included the Violin Concerto in D Major and the Symphony No. 1 in C minor by Brahms.

Miriam Fried was soloist in the concerto and displayed a surprisingly large warm tone, a first class virtuoso technique as well as impeccable musicianship. It was playing that fully substantiated her position as one of the top flight fiddlers. Joseph Silverstein gave her the kind of accompaniment he would like if he were soloist, very good indeed.

Silverstein's Brahms Symphony was a careful foursquare reading that followed traditional lines.

Edo de Waart, on the podium Sunday afternoon is the musical director of the Rotterdam Philharmonic and the 1964 first prize winner of the Dimitri Mitropoulous Competition and worked as assistant to Leonard Bernstein with the New York Philharmonic during the 1965-66 season.

Like Bernstein, he is a rather athletic conductor and likes to whip up stirring climaxes. His reading of the Berlioz "Roman Carnival" Overture had an almost incandescent brilliance. The orchestra was in top form here.

YOUNG DE Waart's ability to handle the larger forms was clearly shown in a splendidly proportioned version of the monumental Brahms Symphony No. 4 in E Minor.

Christoph Eschenbach was soloist in the Bartok Piano Concerto No. 2, a far cry from the Mozart and Beethoven Concerti we had heard him do so well previously.

His playing of the rhythmic and percussive Bartok opus had a fiery brilliance and excitement that won him a well deserved ovation.

Another fine concert on this busy weekend was given by the Tokyo String Quartet. This was the first of the South Mountain Association's 56th annual series of chamber music events.

THE HIGH POINT of this concert was a superb performance of Bartok's Quartet No. 6. Here was ensemble playing that combined eloquence, rhythmic verve, perfect tonal balance and just the right amount of give and take. This was as fine a performance of this difficult work as we have heard.

Smetana's "From my Life" Quartet with its Czech flavor was equally successful and for much the same reasons. It is almost mystifying to find these four products of an Asian culture being so understanding of a central European ethos.

However, the foursome seemed less comfortable in the formal classic contours in Haydn's F Sharp Minor Quartet. The playing was accurate enough, but seemed cool and impersonal and not as integrated as in the other works.

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N.Y.
D. 58,230
JUL 30 1973

UNION (M)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
JUL 2 1973
New England Newspap

BSO Earns Its Fame

By R.C HAMMERICH

LENOX — One of the reasons why a group like the Boston Symphony Orchestra is listed among the world's great orchestras was demonstrated Friday night.

The concert was conducted by the concertmaster.

Last Tuesday night the scheduled guest conductor, William Steinberg, reported that he was too sick to finish the week of rehearsals leading to concerts Friday and tonight.

So Joseph Silverstein moved up from the front sea in the violin section to th podium and led rehearsal Wednesday, Thursday an Friday for both programs fo a total of about four and half hours.

The orchestra member take this sort of thing i stride. "We know th music," said one of ther with a little shrug before th concert.

It was a Brahms progran Friday and it sounded fine neither inspired nor bland but well balanced and wel paced.

Soloist for the first piece the Violin Concerto in D, Opus 77, was Miriam Fried, a young, slender, attractive brunette (let's say closer to 25 than 30) who played with a full, warm, strong tone and a manner of vigorous confidence.

Silverstein's baton technique is a bit awkward, which is understandable inasmuch as it is not his profession, but it was obvious that he knew the music thoroughly and knew what he wanted to hear from the orchestra.

After intermission the Symphony No. 1, one of the popular staples of the symphonic repertory, came across with a good bit more fire and spirit than it put into the concerto, partly because the score has more of it and partly because the orchestra is obliged to be somewhat subdued when it is accompanying a soloist.

Peter Lagger, a bass from Switzerland with wide experience in opera, sang the 7 p. m. prelude program with a voice that has the quality of a clean, vibrant baritone with the depth and substance of a basso.

He sang seven songs and a song cycle, all by Beethoven, and nearly all with a similar emotional message . . . serious, tense, laden with portent.

Lagger's voice has a very satisfying tone — strong, secure, full of vitality. He controlled it well Friday night, although, in truth, the 35 minute program offerec him little need to display wide ranges of agility o pitch.

The only aspect that wa disappointing was his ter dency to slur diction although the beginnings anl ends of phrases were crisp enough.

The two songs which broke the pattern of seriousness were "Ich liebe dich," which was friendly and "Der Kusse," which was funny The others were "In questa tomba oscura," "Bitten," "Vom Tode," "Die Ehre Gottes aus der Natur" anc "Wonne der Wehmut."

The song cycle (six songs) was "An die ferne Geliebie."

Tonight Silverstein will conduct again. The program will be Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and Mahler's "Song of the Earth" for tenor, contralto and orchestra.

A Substitute Conductor

By DOROTHY STOWE
Times Movie Critic

LENOX, Mass — Due to the illness of William Steinberg, Saturday night's Tanglewood concert was under the direction of Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of Boston Symphony and for two years assistant conductor of the orchestra.

One must be grateful to Silverstein, an excellent musician and violinist, for stepping and making the best of the situation. He conducted an agreeable reading of the Schubert Symphony No. 8 (The Unfinished), which was smoothly and carefully done, as befitted gentleman and scholars. But it lacked temperamental drive; one felt that competence had been served, but not inspiraion.

Mahler's great twilight evocation, "Das Lied von der Erde," a setting of six poems by medieval Chinese poets, is like a panoramic tapestry through which the world-weary singer wanders, continually happening upon scenes which recall his youth, or summarizing his philosophy.

There is subtle chinoiserie in the delicate blending of harmonies and modalities, and an ineffable weltschmerz hangs over this music which is more background than foreground, in the sense of looking backward at pleasures from afar. Even the drinking songs have the ring of melancholy desparation.

Saturday night "Das Lied" received a good, but not a great performance. Perhaps due to insufficient preparation time, the strands of the oriental tapestry did not blend into suffused autumnal colors, but too often shrieked with garish explicitness.

This music should be gently squeezed and kneaded, almost imperceptibly manipulated into lustrous, wistful folds. Instead, it abounded in overly-bright touches, mainly due to orchestral zealousness.

Commentaries assumed the proportions of declamations, as incidental oboes, flutes, and strings pushed themselves to the fore, as did the unbelievably loud harps. Also, the orchestra often threatened to engulf the singers, particularly the tenor.

Contralto Lili Chookasian, a singer of great gifts both vocally and spiritually, lent the performance its most fragile delicacy.

The shimmering watery imagery of "Von Der Schoenheit" did not escape her, nor its quickening pace.

And her final "Abschied" was gloriously sung, planned with a great design possible only to the fully cognizant artist. The final "ewigs" sank into infinity with stirring pathos.

James King projected some thrilling vocalism in the vigorous music assigned to him, which calls for the Wagnerian technique of which he is master.

However, tone was somewhat rough-grained as he seemed more preoccupied with getting above the ebullient orchestra than with refinements of interpretation.

NEWS
JUL 1973

NEWS
AUG 2 1973

Impressive Lenox Debut

By DOROTHY STOWE
Times Music Critic

LENOX, Mass — One would imagine that the past week has not been a soothing one for Tanglewood brass, confronted as they were with the necessity of providing a whole new roster of conductors for the weekend's concerts.

However, in one case it led to a remarkable Boston Symphony debut by a relatively unknown young newcomer who took the shed audience by storm yesterday afternoon.

Edo de Waart, music director of the Rotterdam Philharmonic, substituted for ailing Manual Frubeck de Burgos. And the monent the slight, intent Flying Dutchman lifted his arms to begin one felt the force of a great conductorial personality.

De Waart, who trained under Bernstein in New York and has led the Chicago and Los Angeles Orchestras, immediately impressed the audience with the Roman Carnival Overture by Berlioz, a dazzling pyrotechnic tour de force which yet lacked for nothing in accuracy.

He next joined forces with the brilliant young German pianist, Christoph Eschenbach, to perform Bartok's Piano Concerto No. 2, and their combined enthusiastic drive proved thrilling compatible.

Eschenbach (who was to have been heard in Hartford last winter) dove into the first movement with a restless commanding energy which swept all before it, and with the wholehearted cooperation of all delivered an Allegro which flapped with a fine careless frenzy, streaming in the wind like a banner.

The Adagio, with its extended dialogues between piano and drums throbbed with intensity; and the whole wound up with a bravura which went far towards convincing the audience that Bartok is really not so incomprehensible after all.

But it was in the Brahms Fourth Symphony that de Waart really removed every possible reservation. The good-humored young man, his shock of blond hair waving, scooped up great handfuls of Brahms and sowed it over the audience with all the prodigality of youth. And Boston's finest really blew their cool in an impassioned performance of the old faithful standby which made it young again.

There were so many fine things in this Brahms. First of all, it was technically impeccable, exceptionally clear. There was marvelous melodic sweep, with a seamless transfer of themes from voice to voice; and the compelling rhythms pressed forward like human pulses.

De Waart's innate touch of Rembrandt was really showing in the rich-hued, visceral tone which he regularly elicited from the cellos; in the ripe fulfillgment of the violins's fervid involvement; and in the golden fullness of the brass sound.

Mostly Music

By Douglas Moore

Friday night's concert at Tanglewood was the first of the weekend in which a substitute for the listed performer was called into service. Due to the illness of William Steinberg, assistant conductor and concertmaster Joseph Silverstein conducted the full Boston Symphony concert with violinist Miriam Fried, soloist. The Prelude concert was performed as listed with bass Peter Lagger and pianist Malcolm Frager.

Singing a selection of Beethoven songs, Lagger exhibited a large voice, strong and even in all registers. The first few songs were quite somber in atmosphere and Lagger effected an appropriately grave tone. Before an exquisite performance of the great song cycle "An die ferne Geliebte" he inserted a coquettish song called "The Kiss" and showed as well the very soft and charming quality in his voice. Pianist Frager, who soloed with the Berkshire Symphony last October and will appear with the Boston Symphony Aug. 5, was a perfect partner. The Prelude audience equated itself with the boorish opera audience who applauds before the orchestra finishes a coda to an aria by cutting short Frager's beautifully sensitive closing chords to several songs.

Israeli violinist Miriam Fried has studied at two major American music schools: Indiana University and Julliard. She made her Carnegie Hall debut in 1964 and has since won the Queen Elizabeth of Belgium International Competition and the Paganini Competition and appeared as soloist with most of the major orchestras both in this country and in Europe and Israel. Most rising young violinists choose to ride the impressive technical but minimal musical difficulties of such concerti as those by Mendelssohn, Paganini, Lalo, etc. Miss Fried chose instead the Brahms Concerto in D Major, a work of the highest technical and musical difficulty. Any deficiencies in the performance must be laid to Silverstein whose conducting was inadequate as an accompanist, particularly in the second and thi d movements where he and the orchestra were often left far behind. Miss Fried is a violinist par excellence. Her tone was silvery and powerful, her intonation perfect and her interpretation of this most romantic concerto was not an exaggerated one as is often heard. Rather she stressed the classical element; clean figuration and passage work, not too much rubato and a constant rhythmic motion.

The oboe solo in the slow movement was beautiful as was most of the wind playing all evening; the strings were sufficiently soft so that the so loist was audible even during the quietest of passages. The audience again indulged in a particularly unsophisticated practice by applauding after the first movement; they did, however, redeem themselves by giving Miss Fried a much-deserved standing ovation at the conclusion of the concerto.

In the First Symphony of Brahms, the orchestra, despite the conductor, performed as a cohesive ensemble. Playing such a familiar work, a fine orchestra such as the Boston barely needs a man on the podium. Special credit should be given to assistant concertmaster Jerome Rosen for his solo in the second movement.

NEWS (E)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528

JUL 28 1973 New England Newsclip

Uneven Tanglewood Night Rescued by Miss Fried

By RICHARD CONWAY

Miriam Fried's beautiful playing of the Brahm's "Violin Concerto in D, Op. 77," and a strong, if undistinguished, performance of the same composer's First Symphony, highlighted an evening at Tanglewood that can only be described as uneven and uncomfortable.

Due to the illness of William Steinberg, who was to be the guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, who is also assistant conductor of the orchestra, stepped in to direct the two works.

Silverstein is an excellent violinist. His talents as a conductor are less certain. As noted above, the performance of the First was strong and solid. His conducting, although awkward, brought good results from the orchestra. He seemed certain of what he wanted, and his cues were clear and meaningful.

Less Successful

Strangely, he was less successful with the violin concerto. It is, of course, difficult to accompany a soloist. And Silverstein seemed so pre-occupied with the soloist that the orchestra was frquently left to its own devices. As a result there was a lack of smoothness, of ensemble.

But nothing could dim the lustre of Miss Fried's rich interpretation of this masterpiece of the violin literature. She drew warm, lyrical tones from her instrument, and with the exception of some uncertain intonations in the upper positions in the cadenza of the first movement, played with great clarity and sensitivity.

As does Silverstein himself in his own solo work, she achieves a beautiful tone without the scraping and digging into the string that so many violinists before the public seem to feel necessary. The first two movements of the concerto were especially rewarding in this regard.

Swiss - born basso Peter Lagger offered a program of Beethoven songs as the Weekend Prelude chamber concert. His excellent accompanist was pianist Malcolm Frager.

Lagger's voice is thick and heavy; there is always a sense of weight to his singing. Although the man sings with a good deal of sensitivity to the music, the voice is not really suited to the art song literature. At least, not to the program he chose Friday night. His program was [illegible] his work is primarily in the operative field.

The songs "In questa tomba oscura," "Vom Tode," and "Die Ehre Gottes aus der Natur" were well suited to the dark, dramatic quality of his voice; but "Der Kuss" and the wonderful song cycle "An die ferne Geliebte" were decidedly not.

Lagger is evidently not able to achieve the nimbleness, the agility, or the spinning lyricism that is necessary. The song cycle was written for high voice, and while Lagger's musical handling of the work is not questioned, the thick quality of the voice made the work uncomfortable to hear.

UNION (M)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 84,000

JUL 30 1973 New England Newsclip

Concert Review

Resplendent Young Conductor Excellent Tanglewood Stand-In

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE (E)
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
D. 15,835

JUL 31 1973 New England Newsclip

BY MARTHA deB. BEAVER

It was a weekend of substitutions and surprises at Tanglewood in Lenox, with the sudden indisposition of William Steinberg; music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony, scheduled to conduct all the programs.

What might have been a lost weekend, was redeemed Sunday afternoon in a burst of resplendent conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra has not encountered since the haylcon days of Serge Koussevitsky, and, one adds, with some reservations, Charles Munch, Leonard Bernstein and Seiji Ozawa.

Edo deWaart, 32, recently appointed music director of the Rotterdam Philharmonic, electrified musicians and audience alike, from the moment he assumed the podium, and literally took command, his slight figure firmly planted and supercharged with an energy applied unceasingly throughout the program, to illuminate the music without personal elaboration.

We had encountered deWaart at Saturday morning's rehearsal, one of only two, a slim-hipped youth in flaring slacks, his blonde curly hair and homely features evoking a Rembrandt portrait. His respectful, gently firm manner with the orchestra members dispelled any fleeting thought that he would be unable to handle music or musicians. Our original intent to forego Sunday's concert, was put aside, after hearing his interrupted interpretation of Bartok's second piano concerto with Christoph Eschenbach, a sensitive and unusually gifted pianist.

It made us wonder what he would do with the Brahms' fourth symphony, also scheduled.

We weren't disappointed. In fact, the whole program was on such an exalted level that to reduce its effect to mere words seems picayune.

Berlioz' Roman Carnival Overture, opening the program, was more brilliant and alive than we have every experienced it, the orchestra unusually alert in responding with a vigor and virtuosity seemingly greater than that produced for Ormandy or Skrowaczewski on previous weekends. It was an auspicious introduction to the talents of the young conductor.

A splendid virtuosic vehicle for Eschenbach, full of intervallic, chordal and octave progressions, with an Adagio that also allowed his lyric qualities full rein, Bartok's concerto was not too wide a departure from the young pianist's usual adherence to the romantic and classic composers.

As an absorbing work it leaves much to be desired. Harmonic combinations produce dissonances that are bland fare for the contemporary scene and taste, with tonalities that also leave the ear unchallenged. An overall spiritual quality, apparent even in the Allegro barbaro, where the piano is accompanied only by strong winds, pervades the concerto reflecting the gentleness of Bartok's character, and interpreted thus by de Waart.

The Brahms was all-absorbing, de Waart compelling instead of cajoling the players into an interpretation that was drawn with perfect logic and inspired musicianship. Themes and counter-themes were carried through the instrumental sections without a break in the joining, so clarified even a child could follow the structuraldesign. There were no startling departures in tempo or dynamics; coloring and nuances were achieved in a spectrum of sculptural evocation. Brahms and the Boston Symphony lived again in supreme splendor.

Replacing Steinberg Friday and Saturday evenings, concertmaster Joseph Silverstein accomplished an extremely difficult task with all the ability at his command, and after perhaps the fewest rehearsals even a full-time conductor has ever been allowed.

Featured performer on Friday's all-Brahms program was Miriam Fried, Roumanian-born, brought up in Israel, one of whose teachers here was Josef Gingold, with whom Silverstein also studied, playing the violin concerto in D, Op. 77.

It was a straightforward performance, slightly pedantic, lacking much of the lyric poetry of Brahms. The orchestra seemed to reflect Silverstein's at times inadequate and indecisive command of the music at hand, holding back instead of pulling forward on their own.

Miss Fried has strong projection, and a technique equal to the wide leaps and melodic variants required for this concerto. Her bowing seemed flawless and beautifully controlled. Coordination between Silverstein and Miss Fried was expectedly empathic.

Brahms' first symphony, after a pretty uncoordinated first movement, though dramatically opened by the low strings, proceeded with careful conception by Silverstein. Jerome Rosen, in the concertmaster's chair, displayed excellent musicianship in the second movement's solo work.

The audience of 5777 was demonstrably appreciative, and again on Saturday evening, when 8,000 assembled for Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, made gently expressive, without romantic elaboration by Silverstein or the musicians.

But most had come to hear Mahler's "Das Lied van der Erde" (The song of the earth), although it is not a work to lift the spirits. Seemingly more at ease, Silverstein and the orchestra provided a rich background for the voices of tenor Nicolas di Virgilio, filling in at the last moment for James King, and contralto Lili Chookasian.

Without doubt, the evening belonged to Miss Chookasian, whose carefully nurtured voice never ceases to fill one with wonder. Whether she was singing of "The lonely one in autumn," through the halting tones of the oboe, "Of Beauty" or "The Farewell", (wherein honors were shared with flutist Doriot Dwyer and harpist Bernard Zighera), her exquisite tones, so securely placed, and artistically conceived, thrilled one to the marrow.

Virgilio's song "Of Youth" fared better than his others, which sounded constrained, although his musicianship, even with one rehearsal, proved soundly encompassing.

The text of these six pieces for tenor and contralto in alternation, is taken from six Chinese poems translated by Hans Bethge, and are philosophical retrospections of youth, beauty, and human existence, summed up in the finale "The Farewell" evoking both deep grief and celestial glory.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
W. 2,065

AUG 2 1973 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood

Sunday, July 29

Young Dutch conductor Edo De Waart made a surprise appearance with the Boston Symphony Sunday due to the illness of scheduled guest conductor Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos. The last minute change resulted in the substitution of Berlioz' Roman Carnival Overture for the Turina work originally on the program, all else remaining the same.

Mr. de Waart displayed his considerable ability in the tuneful, sometimes explosive, continually interesting Berlioz. His direction was clear, emphasizing the emotional content of the work without excess. The BSO at full strength is always exciting, especially in a well-orchestrated piece like the Berlioz.

The afternoon's highlight was the Bartok piano concerto no. 2. The demands which this piece makes on the soloist, including a broad range of expression in a compact time span, a complex thematic structure, technical facility, and sheer power, are extraordinary. Pianist Christoph Eschenbach made it clear that this kind of challenge is his meat. He and Mr. de Waart were not fazed by the pitfalls which the work presents.

The brilliant allegro with its breathless cadenza and the stunning rondo, in which syncopation and cross-rhythms are stretched to the limit were memorable, but the adagio stood out. This is one of the most beautiful and haunting slow movements in modern literature. Listening to the scherzo which goes with it is a disorienting experience, analogous to watching water rushing uphill.

Brahms' 4th Symphony, which ended the program, was satisfactory, but a little ragged and probably under-rehearsed. The opening movement was taken more slowly than is usual and Mr. de Waart seemed uncertain what he wanted in it. The symphony never really jelled, although there were many fine moments.

John Hinners

Tanglewood Takes Crises in Stride

By R.C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — It was a difficult week for the management at Tanglewood, but if the music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, suffered, it was not always serious.

First a substitute had to be found for Rafael De Burgos, who was to conduct Sunday afternoon, then a substitute for James King, who was to sing Saturday night and finally a substitute for William Steinberg, who was to conduct Friday and Saturday nights.

Edo De Waart, an energetic, young (32) Dutchman who is music director of the Rotterdam Philhamronic, agreed to conduct Sunday with only a minor change in program.

Nicholas Di Virgilio agreed to sing the tenor part for Mahler's "Das Lied von der Erde" Saturday and Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, filled in on the podium Friday and Saturday with creditable aplomb.

None of the missing musicians was reported to be ill seriously.

Sunday the program began with a wildly exciting performance of Berlioz' "Roman Carnaval" overture that brought the audience to its feet cheering.

Christoph Eschenbach was soloist for the Bartok piano concero no. 2 which followed, and its seething turmoil, eccentric offbeats and thumping, crackling energy kept the Berlioz' pot boiling merrily . . . except, of course, during the beginning of the second movement when the strings floated along with a smoky, formless sleepless sound. De Waart's youthful vitality came to good use during the Braham's Symphony No. 4 which ended Sunday's program. That work can be, and often is, played with a deadening seriousness.

Brahams can stand a touch of exaggeration, not like Tchaikowsky, and De Waart's exuberance filled it with welcome high spirits without damaging the serene second movement.

Saturday night Mahler's hour-long setting of translations of ancient Chinese poems drew a somewhat mixed reaction.

The piece is, in a large sense, a collection of six austere art songs embedded in a grand and colorful orchestra rather than spun out deside a simple, cool piano, as art songs usually are.

Art songs tend to appeal to an acquired and esoteric taste, and the audience of 8000 lost perhaps a hundred of its members who got up and left a few at a time after each song.

Whether they were simply bored because of lack of acquaintance with the depth of despair Mahler wrote into the songs, or whether they were supreme experts of the style and were disenchanted by the conductor and soloists is a moot point.

Certainly "das Lied Von Der Erde" is subject to a variety of interpretations.

Two or three observations may be offered: Di Virgilio, especially in the first song, could hardly be heard even though obviously straining for volume; Lili Chookasian, contralto, sang with great beauty of tone but with a warmth of expression perhaps not tragic enough for the sense of the poems; the orchestration is the best of the score, and the orchestra, especially the woodwinds, played it with first-class finesse and articulation.

The other work on the program, Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," is beautiful music and it is always pleasant to hear when played in an unpretentious manner by a good orchestra.

Attendance; Friday, 5772; Saturday morning, 3165; Saturday night, 8000; Sunday afternoon 7396; Weekend, 24,333; Festival Half Way, 121,026.

GLOBE (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042
AUG 2 1973
New England Newsclip

THE ARTS

Edo de Waart takes his place

LENOX — Ozawa, Abbado, Zinman, Thomas, Levine — some awfully impressive young men have stood as new conductors before the Boston Symphony in the last decade. Edo de Waart, who took over Sunday afternoon for the indisposed Rafael Fruehbeck de Burgos, is as good as the best of them. Dutch, born 1941, he was a Mitropoulos Competition winner in 1964, and I remember a slightly diffident performance with the New York Philharmonic soon after that of the Ives 3rd one evening when Bernstein was unwell and saving himself for the Mahler 9th. My next encounter with de Waart was not until 1971 when he was a superb conductor and enchanting host for one of the Netherlands Wind Ensemble midnight concerts in the Carre Theater in Amsterdam, dealing with equal assurance with the joyous severity of Stravinsky's Symphonies of Winds and the grim frivolity of Weill's "Threepenny Music." Since then there has been a whole series of Philips recordings, but Sunday provided the first chance at hearing him in a full scale symphony concert: Berlioz's "Roman Carnival," Bartok's Piano Concerto No. 2 with Christoph Eschenbach, and the Brahms Fourth.

And, as I have already suggested, he is superb. "Roman Carnival" was slower than most, less sensationally brilliant than some (say Ozawa's — de Waart is generally what I would call a soft conductor), but with tremendous energy born of exemplary rhythmic clarity and with wonderful plasticity to the phrasing, that of the accompaniments included. Lovely and fine all through, and a particular pleasure to hear one of the brilliant Berlioz pieces delivered without a trace of hysteria.

The Brahms was plain, grand, clear, beautifully played, with phrasing that was full of tension, but with nothing overdone, nothing coarse, nothing grossly leaned into. Very unbeaty it was, too, with a splendid sense of big paragraphs: seldom have I heard a conductor who measured out that piece, or indeed any of the Brahms symphonies, in such large, sovereign strides.

MICHAEL STEINBERG

Bartok's terribly difficult concerto went not quite so well. Eschenbach, just a year older than de Waart and not so long ago a new figure on the American concert scene, has arrived, and to the point where unfortunately he permits himself touring schedules that find him preparing Bartok No. 2 with just one orchestral rehearsal. He is, of course, first-rate, as are de Waart and the Boston Symphony, so that some points came across quite clearly, namely that this is an enormously exciting piece, and that he plays it brilliantly and with earthquake energy, but also with more lyricism, grace, and humor, more sense of bend than most pianists manage to find in Bartok. Still, lots of detail got lost in the uproar of the exciting promise of a fantastic performance.

It was a weekend full of substitutions: Nicholas di Virgilio replaced James King in Saturday's "Lied von der Erde," which, as well as Friday's Brahms program, was conducted by Joseph Silverstein instead of William Steinberg. Silverstein's soloist Friday was the violinist Miriam Fried, born 1946 in Romania, brought up in Israel, taught in this country by Gingold and Galamian, and a winner in 1966 of the Queen Elisabeth of Belgium competition.

She is a highly competent violinist, intense, vigorous, and even so rather faceless. At first I thought she and Silverstein were at odds about tempi because she seemed to keep contradicting him, but it became gradually clear that she contradicted herself no less often. Much good detail, though — on a moment-to-moment basis her playing has character and projection — and I want to hear her again, perhaps in solo recital, or perhaps with a conductor who carries her rather more firmly.

Two Young Musicians Electrify Tanglewood

By RICHARD CONWAY

Two superb young musicians electrified the audience at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon with a highly exciting, super-charged performance of the powerful Bartok "Piano Concerto No. 2."

Christoph Eschenbach was the pianist and his playing of the demanding work was an achievement of enormous technical facility (to be expected of performers today) and immense intelligent insight into Bartok's percussively oriented score. Although much of the score calls for tremendous strength to play the constant fortissimo hammer-blows, there are also passages of surprising lyric flow, requiring delicate touch. Eschenbach was equal to both, and brought many in the audience to their feet as he played the final notes.

If Eschenbach's performance stands as one of the peaks of the Tanglewood season, the conducting of Edo de Waart, I think, perfectly matched it. The young Dutch-born conductor substituted on short notice for Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos, who was to be the guest conductor for the concert. (It has been a difficult week for guest conductors at Tanglewood. William Steinberg was too ill to do the Friday and Saturday concerts, and the de Burgos on Sunday.)

De Waart is a very exciting conductor who obviously has the respect of the musicians. They responded beautifully to his impeccable direction. The man obviously knows what he wants and how to get it from his orchestra. His conducting is absolutely clear and meaningful, done with a minimum of theatrics that yet allows his magnetism and that of the music to come through.

Although the Brahms' "Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98" was given a fine, incisive reading, with many moments of lyric intensity and also fire and passion, it was the Bartok that was the supreme achievement of the day.

Composed in 1931, it is a remarkable work to begin with, highly unusual. And of a most remarkable work, the second movement Adagio is stunning. There is a marvelous mysterioso string passage that opens it, the strings having been silent throughout the first movement, scored only for winds, percussion, and the piano. After the breathless string passage comes a powerful section for just the piano and tympani. The strings enter again, to be followed once more by the remarkable duet. In the midst of the adagio movement, there is a surprising scherzo.

The concept of the performance of this movement on the part of both de Waart and Eschenbach was brilliant. As noted above, I think that this will be one of the outstanding moments of the Berkshire Music Festival.

In a slightly revised program, de Waart chose to open with the Berlioz "Roman Carnival Overture." From the opening downbeat, it was clear that the Dutch conductor was a musician to be reckoned with. His range of dynamics, his careful delineation of structures and gestures were performed with taste and clarity. There was that special communication.

But that Bartok was incredible!

NEWS (E)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,502
JUL 30 1973
New England Newsclip

TELEGRAM (M)
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 60,213
JUL 30 1973
New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 31,000
JUL 30 1973
New England Newsclip

Music review

Pinch-hit conductor belts grand slam

By Elsbet Wayne

IN THE MIDSEASON weekend, plagued—or distinguished — by last-minute replacements and substitutions, the Sunday concert was no exception. Since Rafael Fruhbeck de Brugos, who was forced by illness to withdraw, had not previously been heard at Tanglewood, it may be said without rancor that the young Dutchman, Edo de Waart, was indeed a most fortunate stand-in. For, to put it succinctly, he is electrifying.

A onetime assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra under Leonard Bernstein, de Waart displayed some of his former mentor's mannerisms. De Waart is now a permanent conducter of the Rotterdam Symphony Orchestra in Holland.

* * *

Sunday's program, an auspicious combination of the old and the new, featured Bartok's Second Piano Concerto in a first performance at the Berkshire Festival. This fact in itself would have lifted the Sunday presentation out of the ordinary. However, with soloist Christoph Eschenbach, the concerto unfolded into an unforgettable event. Eschenbach's impeccable technique is guided by vibrant fervor and knowledgeable interpretation. He captured both the forceful and the contemplative nature of the concerto with the passion and gentility of youth. He integrated the frequent and conspicuous solo passages into the entire composition with innate modesty and respect for the orchestra. This concerto contains some interesting compositional features: wind instruments only accompany the piano in the opening movement; dialogue between solo and drums and polyphonic manipulation of themes in the middle movement; and, for keen ears, reminiscence of earlier themes in the finale. The concerto was enthusiastically received by a most attentive audience.

* * *

De Waart opened Sunday's concert with a substitution of his choice, Berlioz' Roman Carnival Overture, which he imbued with colorful splendor and frenzy.

The Fourth Symphony, in E Minor, Opus 98, by Brahms, the concluding work, could have been tedious in its familiarity. In contrast, it evolved into magnificence and great beauty. With utmost sincerity of expression, de Waart captured the essence of each line. With unfailing timing he shaped the highlight of each phrase. His feel for dynamics, particularly crescendi, and tempo changes lend fresh luster and new insight into well-worn concert favorites. This was especially apparent in the passacaglia, finale of the Brahms symphony, which is an eight-measure theme followed by some 30 variations. Under de Waart's baton these variations emerged as so many lovely and different vignettes of individual character.

* * *

Sunday afternoon also found Joseph Silverstein back at his post as concertmaster after two performances as the orchestra's conductor.

One is led to wonder whether it was the conductor, the soloist, the marvelous sonority of the orchestra, the weather or a combination of all these factors that contributed to the mutually inspired and inspiring rapport in yesterday's performance. The members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra expressed their feelings about their "pinch-hit" conductor with enthusiastic applause. To these eyes and ears it was the most stimulating spirited and satisfying concert of the Berkshire Festival so far this summer.

Whitestone

Pianist Christoph Eschenbach and conductor Edo de Waart exchange congratulations at Sunday's Tanglewood concert.

Tanglewood Has Problems

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — The Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth Berkshire Music Festival weekend at Tanglewood brought an unprecedented number of problems to the management.

Marvel of it was that audiences of 24,333 judged what they heard on its own merit and gave substitute conductors, soloist and music their own due.

William Steinberg didn't conduct Friday and Saturday nights because of illness.

Both concerts were taken over by Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concert master and assistant conductor. Acting concert master was Jerome Rosen, assistant to Silverstein. Rosen occupied the same chair with the Detroit Symphony at Worcester Festivals until last year. Rafael Frubeck de Burgos was to conduct yesterday's concert but cancelled a week ago because of illness. He was replaced by Eno de Waart, conductor of the Rotterdam Philharmonic.

"Roman Carnival"

Friday and Saturday programs remained as scheduled. Yesterday, de Waart substituted Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" Overture for Turina "The Bullfighter's Prayer," selected originally by Frubeck.

Another absence...the orchestra's second flutist, James Pappoutsakis, is hospitalized.

James King was to be tenor soloist Saturday night in Mahler's "Song of the Earth," but cancelled because of illness in his family.

His role was taken on very short notice by Nicholas di Virgilio of the Met.

Silverstein could have faced few challenges of such magnitude as the Mahler. No amount of concert mastering at previous performances could fulfill the requirements of perception, control of complex scoring and adjustments to two vocal soloists.

Abundant Richness

Fortunately, his contralto was Lili Chookasian whose voice has abundant richness, powerful low range, and dramatic conviction. All of which was especially evident in the "Autumn" and "Beauty" sequences.

Virgilio was temperamentally sympathetic to his opening recital of earth's sorrows and the "Youth" stanzas. But his lyrical tenor couldn't penetrate the heavy orchestration, particularly the brasses.

Although Silverstein is more at home with his violin bow than a baton, he brought logic and unity to Mahler's ranting philosophy and oratorical pronouncements.

Silverstein's greater achievement was Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony to which the orchestra gave him its best. Tempos were on the conservative side, placing greater attention on coloration, dynamics, details.

The second movement received an unusually meditative quality, enhanced by well-played reed solos.

De Waart and piano soloist Christoph Eschenbach shared much credit and applause at yesterday's concert. The conductor was, perhaps, more deserving since he inherited most of the program Frubeck had chosen.

His conducting had enthusiasm, obvious respect of the orchestra and lucid style without the shenanigans of some of his age group contemporaries.

Bartok's Second Piano Concerto came off well in spite of its ridiculous flights into pseudo bravura.

Eschenbach was left with no other choice than to flex every muscle and make with the pyrotechnics, keyboard pummelling and other calisthenics.

All of which he did superbly and amended Bartok's razzle-dazzle with a beautifully toned, downright sentimental adagio, giving a better view of the pianist's important talent.

It was the first performance of Bartok's Second at Tanglewood. Nothing will be lost if it isn't revived there for another generation or two.

Exciting Music

De Waart made exciting music of Berlioz' "Roman Carnival," which says a lot because it usually gives the superficial effect of a natural fount of glitter, pomp and sentiment.

Laurence Thorstenberg's English horn solo led the way to a suave, alive performance — a bright start to de Waart's debut with the Boston Symphony. Applause was plentiful.

There was nothing particularly distinguished or commonplace about de Waart's concept of Brahms' Fourth Symphony. He gave it a solid foundation and added to the structure with the skill of a good craftsman.

No one was left in doubt of the conductor's thoughts and goals. It was excellent Brahms but will endure in memory no longer than most such performances.

PROGRAMS

Saturday Night
Joseph Silverstein, conductor
Symphony No. 8 in B minor, "Unfinished" — Schubert
The Song of the Earth — Mahler
Lili Chookasian, contralto
Nicholas di Virgilio, tenor

Sunday Afternoon
Eno de Waart, conductor
Roman Carnival Overture, Opus 9 — Berlioz
Piano Concerto No. 2 — Bartok
Christoph Eschenbach, pianist
Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Opus 98 — Brahms

Paul Rocheleau

Intermission

Two couples find a quiet spot for a picnic under the graceful birches at Tanglewood.

Eagle Sat. Aug 18

Joel Librizzi

Pastorale

Berkshire Music Center student cellist Eugene Bondi, of Houston, Tex., uses Tanglewood grounds as practice hall.

Tanglewood: A Place for...

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
S. 150,000
JUL 8 1973

Picnics . . . Relaxation . . . Games . . . . . and Music

There Are More Ways Than One for Listening

Telegram Photos by Richard F. Owens

Showcase for a Concert Experience

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — Tanglewood is the mecca of summer festivals.

Summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tanglewood is a 210-acre emerald spectacle of lawn, trees, wooded lake front, formal and hemlock gardens.

It is a total musical environment.

Focal point is a massive fan-shaped shed, seating 6,000.

Across "campus" from the great shed are a Theater-Concert Hall of mellow, natural wood, seating 1,500, and its miniature Chamber Music Hall with about 200 seats.

These are showcases for the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's academy for advanced study — about 400 young students from all continents.

A quarter of a million people from every state and many foreign countries enter the Tanglewood gates every summer for what generally proves to be a memorable musical experience.

Green Carpets

The Boston Symphony plays 24 regular concerts in eight weeks — this summer from July 6 through August 26. Conducting is by Seiji Ozawa and 10 guests.

Tanglewood visitors are greeted with a spectacular sight as they enter the main gate.

Gravel roads wind through immense carpets of lawn. To the left of the gate, the shed. To the right, a glassed display room of paintings, music store, cafeteria, concert halls, rehearsal stage without auditorium.

Circling back toward the shed, a reproduction of Nathaniel Hawthorne's cottage exactly where it stood in the 1850s, modern sculpture, refreshment tent for Friends of the Berkshire Music Center.

Dominating all is the Main House — original manor of the estate — given to the Boston Symphony in 1936 when the orchestra was conducted by the late Serge Koussevitzky.

Formal and Informal

The Main House is now Berkshire Center headquarters. Probably more world-famed composers have taught in that building than any one location in the world.

Stanislaw Skowac

The degrees of dress vary.

When we first reviewed concerts at Tanglewood in 1941, the place was enveloped in formality — dress, decorum, hushed voices within the hallowed grounds.

That held one rainy Sunday when we saw Queen Juliana of The Netherlands trudging across the soggy grounds in high heels.

Rapt interest in music remains. But dress is now informal, sometimes a little too scanty for admission. Others wear their best and attract casual attention.

Thousands hear the music outside on blankets and their own deck chairs.

The only sounds to compete with music come from the breeze and growing grass. Acoustics are incredible. Even a light flute tone can be heard from distant grounds.

Some bring picnic lunches and find the shade of trees. The pickup crew has surprisingly little to do.

Music is the thing at Tanglewood.

Here are the Boston Symphony's largest audiences — anywhere from 5,000 to 15,000 for each concert. The orchestra plays accordingly.

Among the most earnest and demanding listeners are the young who are coming to Tanglewood in increasingly large numbers.

Unlike some of their elder sightseers, they're there to consume music and couldn't care less who sees them or whom they see.

Getting There

The young are conspicuous at Weekend Preludes — Fridays at 7 p.m. — recital and concert bonuses available without extra charge to evening concert (9 p.m.) ticket holders.

Tickets in the shed range from $4 to $8.50. Admission to the grounds for all concerts and Saturday morning open rehearsals is $3. Saturday concerts, 8:30 p.m.; Sundays, 2:30 p.m.

To reach Tanglewood from Worcester, you leave the Massachusetts Turnpike at Lee, Exit 2, follow Route 7 for about five miles and take any of several left turns to the center of Lenox. Tanglewood is about 1½ miles from Lenox Center.

A trip to Tanglewood leaves an indelible memory of verdant splendor.

But the magnet that brings people back, time and again, is great music superbly performed in a marvelous setting, under ideal conditions.

HERALD-AMERICAN (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 424,654

AUG 1 1973 New England Newsclip

Arriving at Tanglewood the Berkshires to attend the "Talks and Walks," one of the special events open to Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are (from left) Mrs. Jack S. Parker of Wellesley, Mrs. Harris Fahnestock of Boston, Mrs. Howard E. Hansen of Wellesley, Mrs. Frank G. Allen of Boston and Marblehead, and Mrs. Donald B. Sinclair of Concord.

(Whitestone Photo)

TANGLEWOOD, the famous summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a 210 acre estate in the Berkshire Hills. Cite of the Berkshire Musical Festival, the country's oldest major festival of music, the Tanglewood grounds were once the home of Nathaniel Hawthorne who wrote that he could hardly work in the presence of such scenic beauty. The eight week summer concert series runs from the first weekend in July to the last weekend in August.

NEWS (E)
MALDEN, MASS.
D. 12,420

JUL 16 1973 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 36,800

JUL 30 1973 New England Newsclip

Pittsfield, Massachusetts, Tuesday, Aug. 21, 1973

Whitestone

ARTISTIC SWINGER is Seiji Ozawa, artistic director of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, whose golf swing leaves something to be desired. He played in the fourth annual BSO invitational yesterday.

BSO invitational draws 40 swingers, of sorts

The fourth annual Boston Symphony Orchestra invitational golf tournament drew 40 participants at the Stockbridge Golf Club.

It was won by the team of Leo Panasevich, first violinist of the BSO; William DePasquele, former BSO violinist and now a member of the Philadelphia Orchestra, and two BSO guests, Russell French and Leonard Spector. The winning foursome received $150 in prizes.

The 10 teams of four players each were made up of former and present BSO members, friends, Philadelphia Orchestra members and management, and members of the Stockbridge Golf Club. Players came as far away as Cape Cod and parts of New York.

Second-place teams, who shared $150, were headed by artistic director Seiji Ozawa, Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster and principal violinist of the BSO, and Robert Karol, BSO violinist. According to Karol, the Boston players outplayed the Philadelphia golfers.

About 60 people attended a dinner at the golf club last night following the tournament. Judge John J. Dwyer of Pittsfield and Ozawa, among others, gave speeches.

THREE GENERATIONS — The men who have managed The Boston Symphony Orchestra for more than a half-century get together at Tanglewood for a chat. L. r: Thomas D. Perry Jr., Executive Director and former Manager; George Judd, former Manager; Thomas W. Morris, present manager.

GLOBE (M)
BOSTON, MASS.

AUG 22 1973 New England Newsclip

Whitestone

99TH ANNIVERSARY of the birth of the late Serge Koussevitzky, venerated conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was memorialized Sunday at the Church-on-the-Hill in Lenox. Members of the Berkshire Music Center chorus are shown singing Randall Thompson's "Alleluia" before Koussevitzky's grave as Madame Koussevitzky, far left, looks on. A birthday cake was then presented to Mrs. Koussevitzky and shared by all present.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,000
AUG 18 1973
New England Newsclip

Art review

Sculpture at Tanglewood

By Winifred B. Bell

WITH ALL of the "musts" I've been citing for the Berkshires in summer I'm reminded of Temple Fielding calling the city of Florence "cultural indigestion." However, there is no doubt that Tanglewood is our prime attraction and most of us make several trips to that Mecca each summer.

* * *

In recent years the music center's sylvan beauty has been enhanced with sculptural adornment and the setting is the perfect natural foil for man's creations. This season we can witness the largest show, so far, with contributions by 14 artists who live or work in this area and whose reputations vary from international to modest.

Surprisingly, there is a common ground, other than the Berkshires, which unites the 19 pieces on display. Not a single one is representational; all qualify as contemporary and a fairly conservative contemporary at that.

Of the 19 works in the group, I found several particularly satisfying. John Stokes "January 1973" impressed me for its clean vertical lines when I first saw it at Stockbridge School. The passage of time has not changed my mind. It holds up well.

* * *

Will Horwitt's work is the closest to avant-garde of any in the group. His small sculpture in the Glass House combines a formal right angle in black metal with an irregular form. The unexpected balance between the two creates interest and holds it.

George L. K. Morris "Configuration 1936" appears to have been executed about 20 years earlier than the date in its title. Once revolutionary, it now serves as nostalgic, classic Cubism along with the works of Jacques Lipshitz and Jacob Epstein to which it bears a strong relationship.

Homer Gunn's "To Music" is a knockout in a prime place on the lawn facing the large shed and backed by thick foliage. The conglomeration of white cylinders works beautifully in this spot.

Antoni Milkowski's "Fives" is merely five large rectangular prisms of polished steel set on their diagonals in a touching row. Delightful and indestructible, they would function well any place, from a formal setting to a children's playground.

Alex Markhoff is represented by three vertical black metal prisms arranged so that their surfaces oppose each other. The handsome composition stands in a bed of stones and is perhaps four-feet high. Its location is somewhat secluded (between the greenhouse and the garden) but it's well worth looking for.

* * *

Talking of seeking things out, you'll have to investigate the garden thoroughly to find Richard Stankiewicz's "1969-Two." His rusted configuration, which looks like a work from his earlier '60s style, stands in a small oval pool. Its roughness contrasts well with the setting's formality. I would have liked to see it displayed more conspicuously, but I can appreciate the problems and logistics of displaying sculpture in places that are apt to be overrun by thousands of people. This jagged, abstract composition assembled from old machine parts could be potentially dangerous to a rambunctious group of youngsters.

Stephen Day's "Rectangles in a Square" is a nice surprise appearing out of the ground in the vicinity of the tent.

I hope that this is just the beginning of what will become an even larger tradition. The grounds could easily accommodate many more pieces.

Whitestone

"ASCENT" by Otello Guarducci, at right, is one of several pieces displayed on the Tanglewood grounds this summer. At left is Guarducci's son, David.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,000
JUL 25 1973
New England Newsclip

STEPPING OFF THE BUS AT TANGLEWOOD are (left to right): Mrs. Jack S. Parker of wellesley, Mrs. Harris Fahnestock of Boston, Mrs. Howard E. Hansen of Wellesley, Mrs. Frank G. Allen of Boston and Marblehead and Mrs. Donald B. Sinclair of Concord. They joined more than 125 Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as guests of the Friends of Music at Tanglewood to attend the "Talks and Walks," one of the special events open to Friends of the Orchestra. Armando Ghitalla, first chair trumpet, spoke and performed, followed by a tour of the grounds at Tanglewood.

(Whitestone Photo)

TOWNSMAN
WELLESLEY, MASS.
W. 8,300
AUG 2 1973
New England Newsclip

MERCURY (E)
NEDFORD, MASS.
JUL 26 1973
New England Newsclip

TANGLEWOOD, the famous summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a 210 acre estate in the Berkshire Hills. Cite of the Berkshire Musical Festival, the country's oldest major festival of music, the Tanglewood grounds were once the home of Nathaniel Hawthorne who wrote that he could hardly work in the presence of such scenic beauty. The eight week summer concert series runs from the first weekend in July to the last weekend in August.

Whitestone

MANAGERIAL CONVENTION was held at Tanglewood recently when retired Boston Symphony manager George Judd, second from right, visited former manager Todd Perry, left, who is now executive director, and Tom Morris, right, newly appointed manager. Bridging the gaps is Mr. Judd's grandson, George Jr., a Tanglewood guide.

JUL 25 1973
New England Newsclip

FRIENDS EVENTS

69

ENTERPRISE-SUN (E)
MARLBORO, MASS.
D. 10,150
JUN 18 1973 New England Newsclip

Bus Trip to Tanglewood Planned

MARLBORO — Making plans for the trip to Lenox for the Tanglewood concert are (from left) Martha Yacyshyn, music chairman; Ray Johnson, president; Toni Paternoster, Tanglewood Chairman; and Diana Scott, publicity chairman. The trip is being sponsored by the Friends of the Marlboro Public Library.

MARLBORO — The Friends of the Marlboro Public Library will sponsor their third annual summer bus trip to Tanglewood in Lenox on Aug. 5.

The program for the Sunday concert will be "German Dance" by Mozart; "Suite for Toy Piano" by Cage; "Till Eulenspiegel" by Strauss; and "Piano Concerto No. 2" by Brahms, with Malcolm Frager, pianist. Michael Tilson Thomas will be conductor.

Reservations or information can be obtained by calling Mrs. Renzo Paternoster at 481-1390. Checks should be made payable to Friends of the Marlboro Public Library and sent to Mrs. Paternoster, 253 Boston Post Road, Marlboro.

Price includes seats inside the shed and round-trip bus fare. In order to insure their inclusion on the trip, interested persons are advised to reserve tickets at their earliest convenience.

Departure will be by bus from the library parking lot at 10 a.m. Lunches can be brought along and are also available at Tanglewood for a picnic on the lawn before the concert. The return trip to Marlboro is expected by the late afternoon.

Committee members for this last program of the season are Mrs. Paternoster, Mrs. Bohdan Yacyshyn and Mrs. Dominic Fiorentino.

PRESS (E)
MIDDLETOWN, CONN.
AUG 1 1973 New England Newsclip

Old Saybrook

Trip to Tanglewood Planned by Rec Dept.

OLD SAYBROOK The Cultural Commission and the Park and Recreation Dept. will co-sponsor a bus trip to the Berkshire Muesic Festival, Tanglewood, Mass. on Aug. 19.

Seiji Ozawa will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its summer home.

Guest artist is the young American pianist Andre Watts.

The bus wil leave the Old Saybrook high school parking lot at 10:30 a.m. and arrive at Tanglewood at 12:30 p.m. This will leave enough time for picnicking and strolling through the beautiful grounds, before the concert begins at 2:30 p.m.

The Cultural Commission encourages all to bring their families and experience a lovely day.

Tickets will be sold on a first come - first served basis. For further information call 388-3557.

The Old Saybrook Parks and Recreation Department will offer on Aug. 15 a bus chartered trip to 40 youngsters and seven adult supervisors to Yankee Stadium to see the New York Yankees play the California Angels in an afternoon game. There is a $3.50 charge for tickets and transportation. The bus will depart at 10 a.m. and return at approximately 7:30 p.m.

If space permits, adults wishing to go to the game and not be supervisors may do so. The cost for bus transportation will be $3.50 and their tickets will be purchased at the gate. Registration for this trip is taking place now at the Parks and Recreation office. Register as soon as possible as space is limited.

Bring binoculars and come moon-gazing on Monday, or Tuesday or Wednesday if Monday is cloudy. Nine p.m. is the time, and the place is the rear of the Goodwin School where there is more "dark" than behind the Library.

The Friends of the Acton Public Library have sponsored two of these astronomy evenings, and are continuing them because so many people enjoy them.

Peter Frederickson and Charles Gidley are in charge. They will bring telescopes. Call 388-0313 for more information.

The Planning Commission will meet at the Town Hall at 8 p.m.

The Lions Club will meet at the Inn at 6:15 p.m.

RECORDER (E)
GREENFIELD, MASS.
D. 14,723
JUN 14 1973

Bus To Be Provided For Tanglewood Visit

A bus will be leaving from the Hope St. parking lot July 13 at 4 p.m. for all interested in taking it to the concert at Tanglewood arranged by Mount Holyoke Clubs of Western Mass.

Reservations may be made by sending the necessary fee to Marion Hays (Mrs. William Hayes), 26 Grinnell St., or to Ruth Bohrer, (Mrs. Laurence Bohrer) Box 267, Deerfield.

This event was so successful last year that a tradition was launched. The program, which will benefit the Alumnae Scholar Plan at Mount Holyoke College, will begin at 6 p.m. with individual picnics on the lawn.

There will be a prelude concert at 7. At 8 Mt. Holyoke Pres. and Mrs. David B. Truman will be hosts at a champagne party for benefit guests. At 9 the Mozart concert will begin with Seija Ozawa conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Horn Concerto No. 3 in D major, Clarinet Concerto and the Sinfonia Concertante in E flat K. 364.

Tickets may be ordered from Mrs. Wynn Sayman, State and Rossiter Rd., Richmond, and the ticket price includes a tax deductible contribution to the Mount Holyoke Alumnae Scholar Plan. Reservations close on June 29.

Tickets purchased at the gate will not benefit Mount Holyoke.

BLACKSTONE VALLEY TRIBUNE ADVERTISER
WHITINSVILLE, MASS.
W. 10,000
JUL 25 1973 New England Newsclip

ADULT TRIPS

We have two very interesting Adult trips coming up in August and September. On August 4th, we will be going to the Berkshires for the day to visit Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestre. Cost for the trip is $8 for Center members, and $9 for non-members. On the weekend of Sept. 28th, 29th, and 30th, we are going to Montreal, Canada. Although EXPO will be closed, we will be busy during the weekend sightseeing and visiting the many points of interest in the Canadien city. We will be staying at the beautiful Sheraton Laurentien Hotel, right in the heart of modern Montreal. A mailing list of interested people has been started. If you are interested in this trip, call the Center and leave your name, address, & phone number.

TELEGRAM (M)
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 60,219
AUG 2 1973 New England Newsclip

46 WILL TAKE MARLBORO CONCERT TRIP

MARLBORO — A bus with 46 people will leave the library parking lot at 10 a.m. Sunday bound for an afternoon of music at Tanglewood in Lenox.

It will be the third annual trip sponsored by the Friends of the Marlboro Public Library. The bus will arrive at the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in time for a picnic lunch on the grounds before a concert begins.

The concert will include works by Mozart, Strauss and Brahms, with Malcolm Frager as solo pianist for Brahms' Concerto No. 2. Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct.

RECORDER (E)
GREENFIELD, MASS.
D. 14,723
JUN 23 1973 New England Newsclip

Hostess Named For Concert At Tanglewood

Mrs. Charles Watters will be a hostess for the Mount Holyoke group at Tanglewood program, July 13. Mrs. Watters is also vice-president of the Mount Holyoke Club of Franklin County.

A bus will leave the Hope St. parking lot at 4 p.m., for the concert. Reservations for the bus may be made by sending the necessary fee to Mrs. William Hayes, 26 Grinnell St. or Mrs. Laurence Bohrer. Box 267, Deerfield.

There will be a prelude concert at 7 p.m. At 8, Mount Holyoke Pres. and Mrs. David Truman will be hosts at a champagne party for the benefit guests.

At 9, the Mozart concert will begin with Seija Ozawa conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Horn Concerto No. 3 D major, Clarinet Concerto and the Sinfonia Concertante in E Flat K364.

Tickets may be ordered from Mrs. Wynn Sayman, Richmond. The ticket price includes a tax deductible contribution to the Mount Holyoke Alumnae Scholar Plan. Reservations close June 29.

Tickets purchased at the gate will not benefit Mount Holyoke.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE (E)
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
AUG 10 1973 New England Newsclip

Women's Group To Hear Concert

The Drama and Literature Department of the Northampton Woman's Club will visit Tanglewood Aug. 25 to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Arthur Fiedler, conductor.

The group will visit Tanglewood grounds, and the music center.

Arrangements have been made by Helen S. Wesloski, chairman of the department, and Kathleen LaFleur, program chairman.

Members wishing to attend with guests will be contacted by telephone. Transportation will be available at 8:30 a.m.

GAZETTE (D)
WORCESTER, MASS.
JUN 30 1973 New England Newsclip

Library Friends Plan Trip Aug. 5 to Tanglewood

MARLBORO — The third annual summer bus trip to Tanglewood, Lenox, sponsored by the Friends of the Marlboro Public Library, will be Aug. 5.

Reservations can be made at the library or by sending a check for $12 payable to the Friends of the Marlboro Public Library to Mrs. Renzo Paternoster, 253 Boston Post Road. Include name, address and telephone number with the reservation. The price includes seats inside the shed and round-trip bus fare. Reservations should be made early.

A bus will leave the library parking lot at 10 a.m. Lunches can be packed or bought at Tanglewood.

Committee members for the program are Mrs. Paternoster, Mrs. Bohdan Yacyshyn and Mrs. Dominic Fiorentino.

CITIZEN
GLASTONBURY, CONN.
W. 4,798
JUL 26 1973 New England Newsclip

Glastonbury Goes To Tanglewood

Glastonbury goes to Tanglewood. Mr. and Mrs. John W. Walton of 113 Marilyn Drive (left) join President David B. Truman of Mount Holyoke College (center) and Mr. and Mrs. Walter L. Erley of 236 Tall Timbers Road at the annual benefit sponsored by the five Mount Holyoke Clubs of Western Massachusetts to support the alumnae Association's Alumnae Scholar Plan. Mrs. Erley has just completed a three year term of office as president of the 20,000 member Alumnae Association of Mount Holyoke.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
W. 1,805
JUN 14 1973
New England Newsclip

Friends Of Tanglewood Plan June 24 Meeting

Anyone who is interested in Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's music center in the Berkshire Hills, and who is interested in becoming a Friend of Tanglewood, is invited to a meeting on Sunday afternoon, June 24. The time will be 4 o'clock and the place will be the home of Mrs. Duncan Ellsworth, Main Street, Salisbury.

Talcott Banks, a trustee of the Symphony, will be there with several other guests and will talk about this summer's program at Tanglewood.

One of the primary activities at Tanglewood which benefits from the support of friends of the orchestra, is the Berkshire Music Center for advanced study. There, for eight weeks each summer, gifted young musicians from all over the world come to work intensively in their particular fields: playing, conducting or composing.

These students have always been chosen on the basis of merit, and the Boston Symphony has always totally subsidized the Music Center since its inception in 1940. Nearly 10 per cent of all the players in major orchestras in this country have studied at the Music Center; of that number, 30 per cent are concertmasters and principals in their orchestras.

HERALD
BELMONT, MASS.
W. 7,200
NOV 22 1973
New England Newsclip

UNION (M)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 84,000
JUN 27 1973
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Friends Office Opens Thursday

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox — The Office of the Friends of Music at Tanglewood will open for the 1973 season tomorrow at 9.00 a.m. The Office will remain open throughout the 1973 Berkshire Festival season during regular business hours, as well as from 9.30 — 2.30 on Saturdays.

Membership in the Friends of Music at Tanglewood is available for individuals for $15.00 ($5.00 for students with proper school identification) and $25.00 for family memberships.

Members' privileges include admission to more than 40 student concerts by members of the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's summer academy for the advanced study of music, admission to the popular series of Talks and Walks, a free subscription to the Symphony-Tanglewood Newsletter, and advance Berkshire Festival program information and ticket ordering forms.

NEWS & TRIBUNE
TIMES
MANSFIELD, MASS.
W. 9,200
JUL 12 1973
New England Newsclip

Come to TangleWood

A trip to Tanglewood Music Festival in Lenox, Mass. is being planned by the Attleboro Area Association of Retired Persons for Sunday, August 5.

The bus will leave from the Immanuel Lutheran Church on North Main street, Attleboro at 9:00 a.m. A noontime stop for a chicken barbecue is also planned.

Persons wishing to attend are urged to make reservations with Mrs. Charlotte Cauger, Summer street, North Attleboro by July 25.

AMERICAN SUN (E)
HAMPTON, MASS.
AUG 5 1973
New England Newsclip

Library friends attend concert

MARLBORO — A number of guests of the Friends of the Marlboro Public Library journeyed to Tanglewood at Lenox, Mass., on Sunday for a day of music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third annual summer bus trip arrived at the summer home of the Boston orchestra in time for a picnic before settling down to the music of Mozart, Cage, Strauss, and Brahms. The orchestra was conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas, and featured a piano solo for the Brahms Concerto No. 2 by Malcolm Frager.

The bus left the Marlboro Public Library parking lot at 10 a.m. Sunday for the trip to the scenic Tanglewood grounds in western Massachusetts. It was the highlight of several weeks of preparation and work by the Friends of the Library group.

It was the third year in a row that the Friends of the Library have sponsored the popular trip, and those who have attended the concerts hope that next summer will be the fourth.

Friends Of BSO Seek Members

Invitations to become a Friend of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have recently been sent to Belmont residents who attend the Symphony concerts. The Friends provide much needed support for the Orchestra and, in return, receive the many privileges afforded the group, including tours of Symphony Hall, Pops rehearsal, pre concert suppers, luncheons and lectures. Belmont members of the Council of Friends, who met recently at Symphony Hall to address invitations, were Mrs. August R. Meyer, Area Chairman; Mrs. Koran Chobanian, Mrs. Gardner Cushman, Mrs. John H. Funk, Mrs. James C. Heigham, Mrs. Robinson Murray, Mrs. Daniel Needham, Jr., Mrs. John Ogilby, Mrs. David Pokross, Mrs. George Simonds, Mrs. Samuel Stevens, and Mrs. Alfred W. Willmann.

They were welcomed by Mrs. George Lee Sargent, chairman of the Council, Mrs. Howard Ansen, Area Chairman and Mrs. Thomas Gardiner, Musical Marathon Chairman. They were then taken on a tour of the Hall, the Auditorium and backstage. The tour conducted by tour guides Mrs. Sherman Thayer, Mrs. Walter Watson II and Mrs. Henry Lyman Jr., provided fascinating insights into the history of the Orchestra and of Symphony Hall which is considered to be one of only three acoustically perfect concert halls in the world.

GAZETTE (E)
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 92,743
AUG 2 1973
New England Newsclip

Concert Trip Scheduled

MARLBORO — A bus with 46 people will leave the library parking lot at 10 a.m. Sunday bound for an afternoon of music at Tanglewood in Lenox.

It will be the third annual trip so sponsored by the Friends of the Marlboro Public Library. The bus will arrive at the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in time for a picnic lunch on the grounds before a concert begins.

The concert will include works by Mozart, Strauss and Brahms, with Malcolm Frager as solo pianist for Brahms' Concerto No. 2. Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct.

NEW OFFICERS — Martha Yacyshyn, music chairman (left), and Toni Paternoster, chairman of the Tanglewood bus trip, go through the record rack at the Marlboro Library. The two are new officers of the Friends of the Marlboro Public Library.

(News Photo by Gene Mazel)

PRESS (E)
MIDDLETOWN, CONN.
JUL 29 1973
New England Newsclip

Plan Day Trip To Tanglewood

OLD SAYBROOK — A day trip to the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood in Massachusetts is planned for Sunday, August 19th by the Old Saybrook Parks and Recreation Department and the Saybrook Cultural Commission. Seiji Ozawa will be conducting and Andre Watts will be featured at the piano in Franck's Symphonic Variations and Liszt's Tatentanz.

The bus will leave the high school parking lot at 10:30 a.m. and return by 7 p.m. A picnic lunch or use of the Tanglewood facilities is recommended. Interested persons should register at the Park and Recreation Office between 8:30 a.m. and 5 p.m. daily. Tickets are $14.50 including transportation and are on a first come, first served basis.

CITY POST
MARLBORO, MASS.
W. 8,000
AUG 2 1973
New England Newsclip

Trip To Tanglewood August 5

MARLBORO — Leaving at 10 a.m., Sunday, August 5 from the Library parking lot will be a busload of people bound for an afternoon of music at Tanglewood, in Lenox, Mass.

Sponsored by the Friends of the Marlborough Public Library, the third annual summer bus trip to Tanglewood is expected to arrive at this summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in time for a picnic lunch on its scenic grounds before the start of the concert.

Works by Mozart, Cage, Strauss and Brahms will be performed and will be conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas, with Malcolm Frager as piano soloist for the Brahms Concerto No. 2.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE (E)
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
AUG 29 1973
New England Newsclip

Local Ladies Attend Berkshire Concert

The Drama and Literature Department in the Northampton Woman's Club recently visited the Berkshire Music Center. Appearing in concert was the Boston Symphony, Seiji Ozawa conducting Verdi's Manzoni Requiem. The Tanglewood Choir and Festival Chorus were also participants.

Members and their guests joined at lunch at the Red Lion Inn, Stockbridge, in honor of Miss Laura Nichols of Williamsburg.

Arrangements for the event were made by Miss Helen S. Wesloski, chairman of the department; Mrs. Kathleen LaFleur, program chairman; and Miss Inez M. Eyre.

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
AUG 5 1973
New England Newsclip

Old Saybrook Sponsors Bus To Tanglewood

OLD SAYBROOK — A trip to the Berkshire Music Festival, Tanglewood, Mass., sponsored by the Parks and Recreation Department and the Cultural Commission, will take place Monday.

The program will feture Seiji Ozawa, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and pianist Andre Watts performing selections from Franck's "Symphonic Variations" and Liszt's "Totentanz."

A bus will leave the high school at 10:30 a.m. and arrive at Tanglewood at 12:30 p.m. The concert begins at 2:30 p.m.

Interested persons should register at the Parks and Recreation office weekdays between the hours of 8:30 a.m. nd 5 p.m. Tickets will be sold on a first come—first serve basis.

NEW ERA
DEEP RIVER, CONN.
W. 12,000
AUG 9 1973
New England Newsclip

Old Saybrook

Trip To Berkshire Music Festival Is Planned Aug. 19

The Cultural Commission and the Department of Parks and Recreation here will co-sponsor a trip to the Berkshire Music Festival on Sunday, — Aug. 19, when Seiji Ozawa will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a varied concert, with Andre Watts at the piano.

A bus will leave from the high school parking lot at 10:30 and arrive at Tanglewood at 12:30. A picnic lunch, or use of one of the Tanglewood facilities, is suggested for those attending.

Tickets are available at the Park and Recreation Department office (388-3557) at $14.50 per person.

UNION (M)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 84,000
JUL 12 1973 New England Newsclip

Conductor to Speak

THURS. AM Theater Page .

TANGLEWOOD — John Oliver, conductor of the Tanglewood Festival Chorus and head of the vocal music department of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, will be the speaker at the first in the series of four Tanglewood Talks and Walks today at 12.15 p. m. in the Tanglewood Tent.

Oliver, who is a member of the music faculty at M. I. T., has been the conductor of the Tanglewood Festival Chorus since its founding in 1970. The chorus has sung with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under conductors Leonard Bernstein, Seiji Ozawa, Colin Davis, Michael Tilson Thomas and Arthur Fiedler both in Boston during the winter symphony season and at Tanglewood.

Oliver will present several of his students in a brief vocal demonstration as well as relate anecdotes he has experienced with the chorus, conductors and soloists.

The Talks and Walks are open to members of the Council of Friends of Music at Tanglewood and non-Friends at $1.50 per guest.

Following Oliver's talk, a guided tour of Tanglewood will be given by members of the staff. Telephone Tanglewood for reservations.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
JUN 26 1973 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Friends to sponsor 'Talks and Walks' series again

The Tanglewood Friends of Music will hold the second series of "Tanglewood Talks and Walks" which will be at 2:15 on alternating Thursdays in the Tanglewood Tent.

Picnic lunch

Guests should bring a picnic lunch for 12:15, followed by the talk at 1 p.m. After the talk, a member of the Tanglewood staff will lead a guided tour of the grounds.

Speakers this year, who will talk about various aspects of Tanglewood, include: John Oliver, conductor of the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, on July 12; Armando Ghitalla, principal trumpet of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on July 26; Thomas D. Perry, executive director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Aug. 9; Gunther Schuller, artistic director of the Berkshire Music Center, on Aug. 23.

Other membership priviliges include admission to more than 40 student concerts by members of the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's summer academy for the advanced study of music; a free subscription to the Symphony/Tanglewood Newsletter and advance Berkshire Festival program information and ticket ordering forms.

The Tanglewood Friends' office will open for the season on Thursday at 9 a.m. and will remain open throughout the summer at the regular business hours, as well as from 9:30 to 2:30 on Saturdays.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
JUL 13 1973 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood talk, walk attracts 80

LENOX — The Friends of Music at Tanglewood held the first in a series of four "talks and walks" on the Berkshire Music Festival grounds yesterday. About 80 people attended the afternoon lecture and guided tour.

John Oliver, director of vocal activities at Tanglewood and conductor of the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, gave a brief history of vocal music at Tanglewood since 1940. He also demonstrated vocal technique.

Started last year

The talks and walks were initiated last year by the Friends of Music at Tanglewood. They feature short lectures throughout the season by various people involved in the summer music festival, followed by a guided walk.

The remaining talks and walks will feature: on July 26, Armando Ghitalla, principal trumpeter with the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Aug. 9, Thomas D. Perry, executive director of the BSO; and Aug. 23, Gunther Schuller, artistic director of the Berkshire Music Center.

The series is free to members of the Friends and open to the public at a charge of $1.50. Reservations for the talks, which begin at 1, must be made with the Friends office at Tanglewood.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE (E)
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
D. 15,895
JUL 31 1973 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Walks, Talks Program Slated Thursday

LENOX — Armando Ghitalla, the principal trumpet of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the featured speaker at the second Tanglewood Talks and Walks program of the summer Thursday at 12:30 p.m. in the Tanglewood Tent.

Sponsored by the Council of Tanglewood Friends, the series of four Talks and Walks presents members of the Boston Symphony and Tanglewood staff in an informal talk about their particular activities at Tanglewood.

Weather permitting, the talk will be followed by a special guided tour of the Tanglewood grounds given by members of the Orchestra's staff. Reservations can be made by contacting the Tanglewood Friends Office. Guests are invited to take a picnic lunch and enjoy the refreshments provided by the Council of Tanglewood Friends.

Attending the Talk and Walk program Thursday will be over 100 Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from Boston on a day trip to Tanglewood. The Friends trip has been arranged by Mrs. Harris Fahnestock of Boston, a member of the Orchestra's Board of Trustees.

Armando Ghitalla has been a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1951. Born in Alpha, Ill., he began to play the trumpet as a boy of eight. His formal education was at Knoxville High School, Illinois, Wesleyan University, and New York University. Before coming to Boston, he was first trumpet of the New York City Center Opera and Ballet Orchestra, the Houston Symphony and the RCA recording orchestra, and was soloist with the City Service Band of America.

He has given many recitals, and has been soloist with many orchestras, including the Houston Symphony, the Philomusica of London, the Miami Beach Symphony and the Boston Pops. Mr. Ghitalla is a member of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players with whom he has toured, and made two solo albums for Cambridge Records.

He is on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Boston University and the New England Conservatory of Music.

UNION (M)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 84,000
AUG 9 1973 New England News

Symphony Exec Talks Speaker At Tanglewood

LENOX — Thomas D. Perry Jr., executive director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the speaker at the third Tanglewood Talks and Walks program Thursday at 12.30 p.m. in the Tanglewood Tent.

The series, sponsored by the Friends of Music at Tanglewood, is open to the public for a $1.50 contribution at the Tent entrance. Reservations are necessary and can be made through the Friends Office (637-1600.) Guests may bring a picnic lunch and enjoy refreshments provided by the Friends.

MILLERTON, N. Y.
NEWS
W. 1,500
AUG 9 1973

Thomas D. Perry, Jr., executive Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the featured speaker at the third Tanglewood Talks and Walks program today, Thursday, Aug. 9, 1973 at 12:30 p.m. in the Tanglewood Tent.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
JUL 26 1973 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE COURIER
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
W. 3,750
AUG 9 1973 New England Newsclip

Symphony Director To Speak

LENOX — Thomas D. Perry, Jr., Executive Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be the featured speaker at the third Tanglewood Talks and Walks program today at 12:30 p.m. in the Tanglewood Tent. The series is sponsored by the Friends of Music at Tanglewood.

Born in Grand Rapids, Michigan, Perry is a graduate of Yale University where he majored in English. Following experience in teaching and advertising, he then became associated with auditorium and concert management, first in Philadelphia, and later in Boston.

He joined the staff of the Boston Symphony upon completion of his service in the Navy in 1946 and became Manager of the Orchestra in 1954. He was appointed Executive Director of the orchestra in the spring of 1973.

BERKSHIRE COURIER
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
W. 3,750
JUL 26 1973 New England Newsclip

Ghitalla To Speak At Talks And Walks

LENOX — Armando Ghitalla, the Principal Trumpet of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the featured speaker at the second Tanglewood Talks and Walks program of the summer today at 12:30 p.m. in the Tanglewood Tent. Sponsored by the Council of Tanglewood Friends, the series of four Talks and Walks presents members of the Boston Symphony and Tanglewood staff in an informal talk about their particular activities at Tanglewood.

The Talks and Walks series is open to Friends of Music at Tanglewood with no admission charge, and $1.50 per person for non-Tanglewood Friends. Weather permitting, the talk will be followed by a special guided tour of the Tanglewood grounds given by members of the Orchestra's staff.

Attending the Talk and Walk program will be over 100 Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from Boston on a day trip to Tanglewood. The Friends trip has been arranged by Mrs. Harris Fahnestock ob Boston, a member of the Orchestra's Board of Trustees.

Talks and Walks will feature Thomas Perry

Thomas D. Perry, Jr., executive director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the featured speaker at the third Tanglewood Talks and Walks program on Thursday at 12:30 in the Tanglewood tent.

Sponsored by the Friends of Music at Tanglewood, the series is open to the public at a small charge. Reservations are necessary and can be made through the Friends office. Guests should bring a picnic lunch.

Perry is a graduate of Yale University. He worked as a teacher and in advertising until he became associated with auditorium and concert management in Philadelphia and Boston.

He joined the staff of the BSO in 1946 and became manager in 1954. He was appointed executive director this year.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
JUL 10 1973 New England News

Oliver to speak at Tanglewood Talks and Walks

John Oliver, conductor of the Tanglewood Festival Chorus and head of the vocal music department of the Berkshire Music Center, will be the featured speaker in the first in the series of four Tanglewood Talks and Walks on Thursday at 12:15 p.m. in the Tanglewood Tent.

College professor

He has been conductor of the Festival Chorus since its founding in 1970 and is also a member of the music faculty at MIT.

Oliver will present several of his students in a brief vocal demonstration and will relate some of his experiences at Tanglewood.

The Talks and Walks are open to all Friends of Music at Tanglewood upon presentation of their membership cards, as well as to nonmembers at a small charge. The Friends will provide refreshments, and guests are invited to bring a picnic lunch.

Following Oliver's talk, a guided tour of the grounds will be given by members of the staff. Reservations may be made by calling the Tanglewood Friends office.

Gunther Schuller will give talk at Tanglewood

Gunther Schuller, artistic director of the Berkshire Music Center, will be the featured speaker at the final program of the Tanglewood Talks and Walks series Thursday at 12:30 in the Tanglewood Tent.

The series, sponsored by the Council of Tanglewood Friends, is open free of charge to Friends and for a small fee to nonmembers. Reservations may be made through the Friends office at Tanglewood.

Wrote jazz book

Schuller was president of the New England Conservatory of Music in 1967. He has conducted every major orchestra in the United States and Europe and has received commissions from the New York Philharmonic, the Chicago Symphony and the Hamburg State Opera. He has had a long association with John Lewis and the Modern Jazz Quartet and has written a book entitled "Early Jazz: Its Roots and Musical Development."

In 1964, he became head of the composition department at the BMC. In 1969 he was appointed artistic director of the Center along with Seiji Ozawa.

BERKSHIRE COURIER
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
W. 3,750
AUG 23 1973 New England Newsclip

Talks And Walks Series Ends Today

LENOX — Gunther Schuller, Artistic Director of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, will be the featured speaker at the final program of the Tanglewood Talks and Walks series today at 12:30 p.m. in the Tanglewood Tent. The series, sponsored by the Council of Tanglewood Friends, is open free of charge to Tanglewood Friends and $1.50 for guests.

Gunther Schuller became the 9th President of the New England Conservatory of Music in 1967. His musical studies began at an early age; his first symphony was completed at 14, and he was playing french horn at age 16 in the Ballet Theater Orchestra. Mr. Schuller has conducted every major orchestra in the United States and in Europe, and has received commissions from the New York Philharmonic, the Chicago Symphony and the Hamburg State Opera.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
JUL 26 1973 New England Newsclip

Armando Ghitalla will give talk at Tanglewood

Armando Ghitalla, the principal trumpet of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will speak at the second Tanglewood Talks and Walks program on Thursday at 12:30 in the Tanglewood tent.

Informal talk

Sponsored by the Council of Tanglewood Friends, the series of four talks and walks presents members of the BSO and Tanglewood staff in an informal talk about their activities at Tanglewood.

If weather permits, the talk will be followed by a guided tour of the Tanglewood grounds by members of the BSO staff. Guests are invited to bring a picnic lunch. Refreshments will also be provided by the Friends.

Also at Thursday's program will be more than 100 Friends of the BSO from Boston on a day trip to Tanglewood.

An Illinois native, Ghitalla has been a member of the BSO since 1951. Before that, he was first trumpet of the New York City Center Opera and Ballet Orchestra, the Houston Symphony and the RCA recording orchestra, and was soloist with the City Service Band of America.

He is a member of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players and on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Boston University and the New England Conservatory of Music. He has made two solo albums for Cambridge Records.

Music for travelers

ALISON ARNOLD

A Weekend at Tanglewood and a Holiday in Newport are pleasant prospects for Friends of the New England Conservatory in July. The Tanglewood Weekend, July 6-8, with lodging at the Red Lion Inn at Stockbridge, begins with an all-Bach concert conducted by the Boston Symphony's new director, Seiji Izawa. This will be preceded by a box supper in the Tanglewood tent.

There'll be swimming in the Inn's heated pool and golf and tennis can be arranged at the Stockbridge Golf Club. A visit to historic Williamstown will include lunch in the garden at the Williams Inn and a visit to a fascinating museum. A Nightcap Party with conductors and soloists, and cocktails with the Conservatory's president and Mrs. Gunther Schuller are also on the program. Mrs. Frederick Stare of Wellesley is chairman.

Mrs. E. Garvin Fischer, the former Angela Brown, has planned the Newport Holiday, July 29-31. The Friends have reserved the entire Castle Hill Hotel on the cliffs. This 19th Century mansion was the summer home of the Agassiz family of Boston.

This weekend will include chamber music, opera and ballet in the great houses, films narrated by Alistair Cook, a walking tour of old Newport, and cocktails at "Harbor Court," the home of the John Nicholas Browns, There'll also be cocktails and dinner at the Fischers' "Halidon House," a mid-19th Century Victorian house overlooking Newport Harbor, where Edith Wharton lived as a girl.

★

"She can sing a lot better than I could," said Mrs. M. Edgar Mills of "Mortgage Hall Farm," Middleburg, Va., of her debutante daughter, Eva Randolph. Mrs. Mills is the former Sally Sears, daughter of Mrs. Francis P. Sears of "Old Bay Farm," Hamilton.

During World War II when she made her debut, Sally sang for the soldiers and sailors at the Esplanade Service Club in Boston. Their favorites were "Accentuate the Positive" and "Rum and Coke". In July, 1945, she had a singing engagement with Ruby Newman's orchestra at the Casino in Magnolia, where she was billed as an "unsurpassed blues singer."

Eva, whose father is R.H. Dulany Randolph of Baltimore, was named for her great-aunt, the late Miss Evelyn Sears of Mt. Vernon Street, Beacon Hill. Like most of today's delutantes, she does more than sing. She's interested in teaching mentally retarded children and will go to Lesley College in Cambridge.

★

Another debutante who is following in her mother's footsteps is Mary Brayton Chambers, a fox-hunting enthusiast. Her mother, Mrs. John H. Chambers of Stowe, Vt., is the former Darby Almy of Dedham, Darby. a former .F.H. at the Dedham Country and Polo Club and president of tne Stowe, Vt., Riding and Driving Club, was a familiar figure at Dedham Horse Shows.

Mary B., as she's called, is a member of the Green Mountain Hounds. A graduate of Garrison Forest School, she'll enter Norwich University, Northfield, Vt., in September. On July 15, her mother will give a clambake for her at their home, "Hoodoo House," in Stowe, followed by a small dance.

★

Romance and roses will be combined at the Romantic Evening for members and friends of the North Shore Charity League, Friday, at the Salem Country Club in Peabody. Cocktails and hors d'oevres will be served on the terrace at 6:30, followed by dinner at 8 and dancing under tl
try Clu
Prides
tarte, Sa

GLOBE (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042
JUN 19 1973
New England Newsclip

TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
JUN 1973
New England Newsclip

Mount Holyoke Clubs plan annual benefit

Mozart and Mount Holyoke will mingle on Friday evening, July 13, at Tanglewood for the second annual benefit run by the Mount Holyoke Clubs of Western Massachusetts.

The event last summer was so successful that a tradition was launched. The program, which benefits the Alumnae Scholar Plan at Mount Holyoke, will begin at 6 p.m. with individual picnics on the lawn outside the tent.

At 7 p.m., a prelude concert will be offered, and at 8 p.m., President and Mrs. David B. Truman of Mount Holyoke will be hosts at a champagne party for benefit guests.

At 9 p.m. the Mozart concert begins; Seija Ozawa will conduct the Boston Symphony in the Horn Concerto in D Major, the Clarinet Concerto and the Sinfonia Concertante in E Flat K 364, all by Mozart.

The committee, actively at work on the event already (brochures were mailed this week) includes a representative of each of the five Mount Holyoke alumnae clubs in Western Massachusetts: Ruth Schwarz Bohrer (Mrs. Lawrence) of Deerfield, Mass., representing the Franklin County Club; Carol Willett Rodman (Mrs. David) of Pittsfield, representing the Berkshire County Club; Janice Kubik Lachowetz (Mrs. Andrew, Jr.) of Easthampton, representing the Hampshire County Club; Carolyn Czaja Topor (Mrs. Joseph) of Springfield, representing the Springfield Club; and Margaret Farman Woods (Mrs. Edmund, Jr.) representing the Mount Holyoke Club of Greater Holyoke. Dr. Elizabeth Ford Sayman (Mrs. Wynn) of Richmond, Mass., is a member of the Berkshire County Club. President and Mrs. David B. Truman are serving as honorary chairmen of the Tanglewood benefit.

Tickets may be ordered from Mrs. Wynn Sayman, State and Rossiter Road, Richmond, Mass. 02154. They are available at $25.00, $18.00, $13.00, $10.50, and $6.00 (lawn ticket). The ticket price includes a tax deductible contribution to the Mount Holyoke Alumnae Scholar Plan. Reservations close on June 29, and tickets purchased at the gate will not benefit Mount Holyoke.

BOSTON HERALD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 424,654
APR 19 1973
New England Newsclip

Annual Fund Drive On for Tanglewood

STOCKBRIDGE (AP)—The Council of Tanglewood Friends kickoff their annual fund drive in Stockbridge to support the summer concert series.

The drive continues through July 1. Fund raising spokesmen say their goal this year is $35,000. Tanglewood will open its eight-week season July 6.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169
JUN 18 1973

Holyoke Plans

An all-Mozart concert program and champagne reception will highlight "Mount Holyoke at Tanglewood" event, set for July 13 at Lenox, Mass, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Alumnae, friends and others interested may obtain further information and reservations by contacting Mrs. Kenneth Orvis, Rensselaer, by June 29.

RECORDER GAZETTE
GREENFIELD, MASS
D. 14,295
New England Newsclip

BSO manager, wife to be guests of Tanglewood Friends

The new manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Thomas W. Morris, and his wife will be guests at a meeting of the Council of Tanglewood Friends at 5:30 p.m. Friday in the Glass House near the Tanglewood main gate, Lenox.

After the meeting, there is to be a reception at Serenak, the summer residence in Lenox of Mrs. Olga Koussevitzky.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,100
New England Newsclip

Mt. Holyoke to sponsor concert at Tanglewood

The Mount Holyoke Clubs of Western Massachusetts will sponsor a Mozart concert for the second annual alumnae scholarship benefit July 13 at Tanglewood.

The evening will begin at 6 with picnics on the lawn. A prelude concert featuring music by Mozart, Haydn and pianist Malcolm Frager will follow at 7, and President and Mrs. David B. Truman of Mount Holyoke will be hosts at a champagne party for benefit guests at 8.

The Mozart program will begin at 9, with Seiji Ozawa conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the Horn Concerto No. 3 in D Major, the Clarinet Concerto and the Sinfonia Concertante in E Flat, K. 364.

The organizing committee for the concert includes Mrs. David Rodman of 32 Deborah Ave. and Dr. Elizabeth Ford Sayman of Rossiter Road, Richmond, members of the Berkshire County Club of Mount Holyoke Alumnae.

Tickets may be ordered from Mrs. Sayman. The price includes a tax-deductible contribution to the Mount Holyoke Alumnae Scholar Plan.

Reservations close June 29, and tickets purchased at the gate will not benefit Mount Holyoke.

Tanglewood Memorabilia Requested

Anyone who has booklets, programs, photographs, or other memorabilia relating to Tanglewood from its inception up to the present is invited to assist Walker Scott, a Stockbridge, Mass. photographer, in a project he is undertaking.

As a member of the Council of Tanglewood Friends, Mr. Scott is volunteering his services to prepare an exhibit entitled "Tanglewood Through the Years." With the assistance of the Lenox Public Library, he has already assembled a display relating to the earliest years of Tanglewood.

The exhibit has been on display at Tanglewood and at the Berkshire County Historical Society in Pittsfield.

Besides publications and photos, Mr. Scott requests the loan of objects such as musical instruments that have a Tanglewood association. He said that all materials will be returned after they are photographed.

The completed exhibit will be loaned, free of charge, to organizations throughout the Berkshires.

Mr. Scott may be contacted in his studio on Main Street in Stockbridge, Mass.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
W. 4,405
MAR 22 1973
New England Newsclip

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
JUN 14 1973
New England Newsclip

Friends' Dance To Benefit Tanglewood

The fourth annual dinner dance sponsored by the Council of Tanglewood Friends will be held on Saturday, June 30, at 7 p.m. in the shed on the Tanglewood grounds.

The dance, the first in a series of special events and fund-raising efforts planned for the season by the Friends of Music at Tanglewood, will benefit the Berkshire Music Center's fellowship programs and will help defray the cost deficit a center.

NEWS
WILLIAMSTOWN, MASS.
W. 1,289
APR 19 1973
New England Newsclip

Friends of Tanglewood set $35,000 goal

Some 45 members of the business committee, Council of Tanglewood Friends, were guests of Mr. and Mrs. John Fitzpatrick yesterday (Wednesday) at their home in Stockbridge, at a get-acquainted meeting to launch the annual drive for support of Tanglewood from local businesses.

Mrs. Fitzpatrick and Robert Guerin of Lenox, report that they hope to raise $35,000, or $8,000 more than last year during the drive that runs from April 18 through July 1.

"During the drive," says Mrs. Fitzpatrick, "a point that we'll emphasize is that Tanglewood means a great deal to the area economy. For example, each season more than 200,000 visitors to Tanglewood spend about $9 million locally. Since this money passes through the hands of countless local suppliers of goods and services, Tanglewood is actually a very big business that helps keep the Berkshires' economy strong."

Tanglewood Prepares For Benefit Day

Members of Mount Holyoke College alumnae will participate in the second annual benefit concert at Tanglewood July 13, sponsored by the Mount Holyoke Clubs of Western Massachusetts.

The local committee is Mrs. Laurence Bohrer of Deerfield and Mrs. William Hayes. Either may be called for transporation by bus which will leave late in the afternoon from Greenfield.

The program, which benefits the Alumnae Scholar Plan, will begin at 6 p.m with individual picnics on the lawn outside the tent. At 7 there will be a prelude concert and at 8, Pres. and Mrs. David B. Truman of Mount Holyoke will be hosts at a champagne party for benefit guests.

At 9 p.m. the Mozart concert will begin with Seija Ozawa conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the "Horn Concerto No. 3 in D major, the Clarinet Concerto and the Sinfonia Concertante in E flat, K.364, all by Mozart.

Ticket prices include a tax deductible contribution to the Alumnae Scholar Plan. Reservations will close on June 29. Tickets bought at the gate will not benefit Mount Holyoke.

Franklin, Hampshire, Hampden and Berkshire Counties will be represented.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,100
JUN 7 1973
New England Newsclip

Berkshire Music Center sets annual benefit dinner-dance

Mrs. Richard A. Marcure and Mrs. James A. Kapteyn will be in charge of the fourth annual dinner-dance to benefit the Berkshire Music Center, according to William A. Selke and Mrs. Peter van S. Rice, chairmen of the Council of Tanglewood Friends. The dance will be held June 30 at 7 p.m. at the Tanglewood Shed. This will be the first in a series of special events planned for the season.

Incorporated six years ago, the Friends of Music at Tanglewood has an ambitious goal of $300,000 this year, most of which will be used to subsidize fellowships at the music center. Proceeds from the dance will go toward this, with the aim of helping to defray the Boston Symphony Orchestra's projected $1 million over-all annual deficit, nearly 40 per cent of which can be attributed to the operation at Tanglewood.

Schiffer

Mrs. Richard A. Marcure

Mrs. Graham B. Blaine Jr. of Stockbridge is assisting with decorations. Mrs. Curtis R. Buttenheim, Mrs. Andrew L. Clarke, Mrs. George Ripley and Mrs. Selke are in charge of invitations.

Inquiries about the dance may be made by calling either Mrs. Marcure of Pittsfield or Mrs. Kapteyn of Great Barrington.

Music for travelers

ALISON ARNOLD

A Weekend at Tanglewood and a Holiday in Newport are pleasant prospects for Friends of the New England Conservatory in July. The Tanglewood Weekend, July 6-8, with lodging at the Red Lion Inn at Stockbridge, begins with an all-Bach concert conducted by the Boston Symphony's new director, Seiji Izawa. This will be preceded by a box supper in the Tanglewood tent.

There'll be swimming in the Inn's heated pool and golf and tennis can be arranged at the Stockbridge Golf Club. A visit to historic Williamstown will include lunch in the garden at the Williams Inn and a visit to a fascinating museum. A Nightcap Party with conductors and soloists, and cocktails with the Conservatory's president and Mrs. Gunther Schuller are also on the program. Mrs. Frederick Stare of Wellesley is chairman.

Mrs. E. Garvin Fischer, the former Angela Brown, has planned the Newport Holiday, July 29-31. The Friends have reserved the entire Castle Hill Hotel on the cliffs. This 19th Century mansion was the summer home of the Agassiz family of Boston.

This weekend will include chamber music, opera and ballet in the great houses, films narrated by Alistair Cook, a walking tour of old Newport, and cocktails at "Harbor Court," the home of the John Nicholas Browns, There'll also be cocktails and dinner at the Fischers' "Halidon House," a mid-19th Century Victorian house overlooking Newport Harbor, where Edith Wharton lived as a girl.

★

"She can sing a lot better than I could," said Mrs. M. Edgar Mills of "Mortgage Hall Farm," Middleburg, Va., of her debutante daughter, Eva Randolph. Mrs. Mills is the former Sally Sears, daughter of Mrs. Francis P. Sears of "Old Bay Farm," Hamilton.

During World War II when she made her debut, Sally sang for the soldiers and sailors at the Esplanade Service Club in Boston. Their favorites were "Accentuate the Positive" and "Rum and Coke". In July, 1945, she had a singing engagement with Ruby Newman's orchestra at the Casino in Magnolia, where she was billed as an "unsurpassed blues singer."

Eva, whose father is R.H. Dulany Randolph of Baltimore, was named for her great-aunt, the late Miss Evelyn Sears of Mt. Vernon Street, Beacon Hill. Like most of today's delutantes, she does more than sing. She's interested in teaching mentally retarded children and will go to Lesley College in Cambridge.

★

Another debutante who is following in her mother's footsteps is Mary Brayton Chambers, a fox-hunting enthusiast. Her mother, Mrs. John H. Chambers of Stowe, Vt., is the former Darby Almy of Dedham, Darby, a former .F.H. at the Dedham Country and Polo Club and president of the Stowe, Vt., Riding and Driving Club, was a familiar figure at Dedham Horse Shows.

Mary B., as she's called, is a member of the Green Mountain Hounds. A graduate of Garrison Forest School, she'll enter Norwich University, Northfield, Vt., in September. On July 15, her mother will give a clambake for her at their home, "Hoodoo House," in Stowe, followed by a small dance.

★

Romance and roses will be combined at the Romantic Evening for members and friends of the North Shore Charity League, Friday, at the Salem Country Club in Peabody. Cocktails and hors d'oevres will be served on the terrace at 6:30, followed by dinner at 8 and dancing under tl
try Clu
Prides
tarte, Sa

GLOBE - (M)
BOSTON, MASS.

Mount Holyoke Clubs plan annual benefit

Mozart and Mount Holyoke will mingle on Friday evening, July 13, at Tanglewood for the second annual benefit run by the Mount Holyoke Clubs of Western Massachusetts.

The event last summer was so successful that a tradition was launched. The program, which benefits the Alumnae Scholar Plan at Mount Holyoke, will begin at 6 p.m. with individual picnics on the lawn outside the tent.

At 7 p.m., a prelude concert will be offered, and at 8 p.m., President and Mrs. David B. Truman of Mount Holyoke will be hosts at a champagne party for benefit guests.

At 9 p.m. the Mozart concert begins; Seija Ozawa will conduct the Boston Symphony in the Horn Concerto in D Major, the Clarinet Concerto and the Sinfonia Concertante in E Flat K 364, all by Mozart.

The committee, actively at work on the event already (brochures were mailed this week) includes a representative of each of the five Mount Holyoke alumnae clubs in Western Massachusetts: Ruth Schwarz Bohrer (Mrs. Lawrence) of Deerfield, Mass., representing the Franklin County Club; Carol Willett Rodman (Mrs. David) of Pittsfield, representing the Berkshire County Club; Janice Kubik Lachowetz (Mrs. Andrew, Jr.) of Easthampton, representing the Hampshire County Club; Carolyn Czaja Topor (Mrs. Joseph) of Springfield, representing the Springfield Club; and Margaret Farman Woods (Mrs. Edmund, Jr.) representing the Mount Holyoke Club of Greater Holyoke. Dr. Elizabeth Ford Sayman (Mrs. Wynn) of Richmond, Mass., is a member of the Berkshire County Club. President and Mrs. David B. Truman are serving as honorary chairmen of the Tanglewood benefit.

Tickets may be ordered from Mrs. Wynn Sayman, State and Rossiter Road, Richmond, Mass. 02154. They are available at $25.00, $18.00, $13.00, $10.50, and $6.00 (lawn ticket). The ticket price includes a tax deductible contribution to the Mount Holyoke Alumnae Scholar Plan. Reservations close on June 29, and tickets purchased at the gate will not benefit Mount Holyoke.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169

JUN 18 1973

Holyoke Plans

An all-Mozart concert program and champagne reception will highlight "Mount Holyoke at Tanglewood" event, set for July 13 at Lenox, Mass, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Alumnae, friends and others interested may obtain further information and reservations by contacting Mrs. Kenneth Orvis, Rensselaer, by June 29.

BOSTON HERALD AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 424,654

APR 19 1973

New England Newscip

Annual Fund Drive On for Tanglewood

STOCKBRIDGE (AP) — The Council of Tanglewood Friends kickoff their annual fund drive in Stockbridge to support the summer concert series.

The drive continues through July 1. Fund raising spokesmen say their goal this year is $55,000. Tanglewood will open its eight-week season July 6.

Mt. Holyoke to sponsor concert at Tanglewood

The Mount Holyoke Clubs of Western Massachusetts will sponsor a Mozart concert for the second annual alumnae scholarship benefit July 13 at Tanglewood.

The evening will begin at 6 with picnics on the lawn. A prelude concert featuring music by Mozart, Haydn and pianist Malcolm Frager will follow at 7, and President and Mrs. David B. Truman of Mount Holyoke will be hosts at a champagne party for benefit guests at 8.

The Mozart program will begin at 9, with Seiji Ozawa conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the Horn Concerto No. 3 in D Major, the Clarinet Concerto and the Sinfonia Concertante in E Flat, K. 364.

The organizing committee for the concert includes Mrs. David Rodman of 32 Deborah Ave. and Dr. Elizabeth Ford Sayman of Rossiter Road, Richmond, members of the Berkshire County Club of Mount Holyoke Alumnae.

Tickets may be ordered from Mrs. Sayman. The price includes a tax-deductible contribution to the Mount Holyoke Alumnae Scholar Plan.

Reservations close June 29, and tickets purchased at the gate will not benefit Mount Holyoke.

BSO manager, wife to be guests of Tanglewood Friends

The new manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Thomas W. Morris, and his wife will be guests at a meeting of the Council of Tanglewood Friends at 5:30 p.m. Friday in the Glass House near the Tanglewood main gate, Lenox.

After the meeting, there is to be a reception at Serenak, the summer residence in Lenox of Mrs. Olga Koussevitzky.

Tanglewood Memorabilia Requested

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN
W. 4,495

MAR 22 1973

Anyone who has booklets, programs, photographs, or other memorabilia relating to Tanglewood from its inception up to the present is invited to assist Walter Scott, a Stockbridge, Mass. photographer, in a project he is undertaking.

As a member of the Council of Tanglewood Friends, Mr. Scott is volunteering his services to prepare an exhibit entitled "Tanglewood Through the Years." With the assistance of the Lenox Public Library, he has already assembled a display relating to the earliest years of Tanglewood.

The exhibit has been on display at Tanglewood and at the Berkshire County Historical Society in Pittsfield.

Besides publications and photos, Mr. Scott requests the loan of objects such as musical instruments that have a Tanglewood association. He said that all materials will be returned after they are photographed.

The completed exhibit will be loaned, free of charge, to organizations throughout the Berkshires.

Mr. Scott may be contacted in his studio on Main Street in Stockbridge, Mass.

JUN 14 1973

Friends' Dance To Benefit Tanglewood

The fourth annual dinner dance sponsored by the Council of Tanglewood Friends will be held on Saturday, June 30, at 7 p.m. in the shed on the Tanglewood grounds.

The dance, the first in a series of special events and fund-raising efforts planned for the season by the Friends of Music at Tanglewood, will benefit the Berkshire Music Center's fellowship programs and will help defray the cost deficit of the center.

Friends of Tanglewood set $35,000 goal

Some 45 members of the business committee, Council of Tanglewood Friends, were guests of Mr. and Mrs. John Fitzpatrick yesterday (Wednesday) at their home in Stockbridge, at a get-acquainted meeting to launch the annual drive for support of Tanglewood from local businesses.

Mrs. Fitzpatrick and Robert Guerin of Lenox, report that they hope to raise $35,000, or $8,000 more than last year during the drive that runs from April 18 through July 1.

"During the drive," says Mrs. Fitzpatrick, "a point that we'll emphasize is that Tanglewood means a great deal to the area economy. For example, each season more than 200,000 visitors to Tanglewood spend about $9 million locally. Since this money passes through the hands of countless local suppliers of goods and services, Tanglewood is actually a very big business that helps keep the Berkshires' economy strong."

Tanglewood Prepares For Benefit Day

Members of Mount Holyoke College alumnae will participate in the second annual benefit concert at Tanglewood July 13, sponsored by the Mount Holyoke Clubs of Western Massachusetts.

The local committee is Mrs. Laurence Bohrer of Deerfield and Mrs. William Hayes. Either may be called for transporation by bus which will leave late in the afternoon from Greenfield.

The program, which benefits the Alumnae Scholar Plan, will begin at 6 p.m with individual picnics on the lawn outside the tent. At 7 there will be a prelude concert and at 8, Pres. and Mrs. David B. Truman of Mount Holyoke will be hosts at a champagne party for benefit guests.

At 9 p.m. the Mozart concert will begin with Seija Ozawa conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the "Horn Concerto" No. 3 in D major, the Clarinet Concerto and the Sinfonia Concertante in E flat, K.364, all by Mozart.

Ticket prices include a tax deductible contribution to the Alumnae Scholar Plan. Reservations will close on June 29. Tickets bought at the gate will not benefit Mount Holyoke.

Franklin, Hampshire, Hampden and Berkshire Counties will be represented.

Berkshire Music Center sets annual benefit dinner-dance

Mrs. Richard A. Marcure and Mrs. James A. Kapteyn will be in charge of the fourth annual dinner-dance to benefit the Berkshire Music Center, according to William A. Selke and Mrs. Peter van S. Rice, chairmen of the Council of Tanglewood Friends. The dance will be held June 30 at 7 p.m. at the Tanglewood Shed. This will be the first in a series of special events planned for the season.

Incorporated six years ago, the Friends of Music at Tanglewood has an ambitious goal of $300,000 this year, most of which will be used to subsidize fellowships at the music center. Proceeds from the dance will go toward this, with the aim of helping to defray the Boston Symphony Orchestra's projected $1 million over-all annual deficit, nearly 40 per cent of which can be attributed to the operation at Tanglewood.

Schiffer

Mrs. Richard A. Marcure

Mrs. Graham B. Blaine Jr. of Stockbridge is assisting with decorations. Mrs. Curtis R. Buttenheim, Mrs. Andrew L. Clarke, Mrs. George Ripley and Mrs. Selke are in charge of invitations.

Inquiries about the dance may be made by calling either Mrs. Marcure of Pittsfield or Mrs. Kapteyn of Great Barrington.

More Aid Vowed to Arts

Gov. Francis W. Sargent, left, and Thomas D. Perry Jr., executive director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, display a Tanglewood poster during the governor's visit Tuesday to the orchestra's summer home.

By CHRISTOPHER BROOKS
Union Staff

LENOX — Gov. Francis W. Sargent pledged Tuesday to increase state aid to the arts and humanities as part of the state's role in preserving and enhancing its citizens' "quality of life."

Sargent's comments came during a visit to Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Tanglewood tour came after a luncheon meeting with Central Berkshire business leaders in Pittsfield.

"It should be the role of government to provide assistance much more than we have in the past," Sargent told a group of 100 in the Tanglewood Tent.

"It's so important that the quality of life not be forgotten."

The chief executive noted that he has doubled the annual budget for the state Council on Arts and Humanities in recent years to the $600,000 level recommended for fiscal 1974. But he admitted that amount is still a drop in the bucket.

He said he is awaiting the complete recommendations of a special study he commissioned to determine what the state's role should be in supporting the arts before acting further.

After listening to Sargent's brief address, Thomas D. Perry, manager of the BSO, said the orchestra would welcome substantial state aid. Tax dollars may be the only way to insure the future of the Boston Symphony and similar organizations, he said.

Currently, the BSO gets no direct state aid, but it does receive public monies indirectly, through grants to some of its subsidiary activities.

Before speaking in the tent, Sargent was given a guided tour of the Tanglewood grounds by Berkshire Music Center administrator Daniel Gustin. The governor visited several rehearsal sheds, meeting young students enrolled in the center's eight-week summer program.

At one point, he was engaged in conversation by musician Livingston Taylor who performed in the Tanglewood shed Tuesday night as part of the Popular Artists Series.

During a discussion of Watergate with Taylor, Sargent said he disagreed with those calling for impeachment or a presidential resignation.

The governor admittedly spoke in general terms in his visit with area businessmen at the Colonial Hilton Inn luncheon. The session was the latest in a series of meetings around the state designed to improve his image with business leaders.

Sargent dwelled on the need for what he called a renewed optimism in Massachusetts as a place to do business. He said "bad-mouthing" of the state's business climate by some has hurt chances that outside investment will be attracted here.

"Let's stop talking a lack of confidence in the future. Let's talk about what we have to offer. There are industries that are expanding. There are industries that are deciding not to move away," Sargent told the 125-member audience.

The governor cited a number of measures passed since 1970, including a business property tax rollback, tax credits for hiring disadvantaged workers, municipal bonding authorizations allowing less expensive financing for business expansion. He added, however, that further assistance is needed to make the state's business climate improve.

An anticipated flood of loaded questions from businessmen in the audience never materialized during a 12-minute question-and-answer period. Only five in the audience posed questions, several of them dealing only indirectly with business.

In response to a question from Mayor Butler, Sargent said he hopes the Pittsfield Growth Center program will receive some second-year funding in fiscal 1974. Sargent said the New England Regional Commission, of which he is chairman, has been reexamining its programs and redirecting its priorities.

"I hope we can have more funding" for the Pittsfield program, Sargent said. In fiscal 1973, the city received $400,000 in Growth Center funds through the New England Regional Commission.

On another subject, Sargent described the controversial Route 7 Pittsfield bypass proposal as "of great importance," but he went on to warn that any final decision on the highway must be made locally with full knowledge of the road's environmental consequences.

A plan to create uniform regions around the state for use by various state and federal agencies is necessary in decentralized decision-making, the governor said in response to a question from Urban Coalition Director Albert A. Bogdan.

But Sargent indicated some sympathy toward Bogdan's complaint that the Berkshires, a distinct geographical and economic region in itself, is being lumped with three other western cointies in the plan.

Pledges State Aid

LENOX (AP) — Gov. Francis W. Sargent has pledged to increase state aid to the arts and humanities.

During a visit to Tanglewood, Sargent said, "It should be the role of government to provide assistance much more than we have in the past.

"It's so important that the quality of life not be forgotten," he added.

TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM (E)
NEWBURYPORT, MASS.
JUL 1973 New England Newsclip

Sargent Pledges State Support Of The Arts

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — Gov. Francis W. Sargent pledged Tuesday to increase state aid to the arts and humanities.

During a visit to Tanglewood, Sargent said, "It should be the role of government to provide assistance much more than we have in the past.

"It's so important that the quality of life not be forgotten," he added.

UNION (M)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 84,000
JUL 25 1973 New England Newsclip

Whitestone

DURING TANGLEWOOD VISIT, Gov. Sargent, left, scans poster for the music festival in company with Thomas O. Perry, Boston Symphony Orchestra executive director, second from left, and the two chairmen of the Friends of Music at Tanglewood, William A. Selke of Stockbridge and Mrs. Peter van S. Rice of Pittsfield.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,000
JUL 25 1973 New England Newsclip

Sargent at ABC luncheon meets little overt criticism

By A. A. Michelson

If the business community is unhappy with the Sargent administration, it wasn't apparent here yesterday when Gov. Sargent invited some 125 at an Association of Business and Commerce luncheon to ask him questions.

In a short speech, the governor defended his administration, denied that it is not "business-minded" and scolded business people for "bad-mouthing" Massachusetts.

Only five queries

To give businessmen an opportunity to air their complaints, the governor subjected himself to questions. But there were only five queries, and only two of them came from businessmen.

The governor said afterward that the Berkshire businessmen's response was not much different from what he has received in other sections of the state as he tries to reach out to a supposedly "dissident" business community.

"Some of them," he said, "like to collar you in private to voice criticism, but they don't want to stand up in public to do so. This is unfortunate, because the whole idea of these trips I am making is to show that I am concerned about the business climate in this state and to effect a dialogue with the business people."

Investment credit

One of the business questions came from John Reinke of the Arnold Print Works in North Adams, who asked if the governor was in favor of extending a 2-year-old law which gives industries a 1 per cent investment credit for locating in disadvantaged areas and hiring disadvantaged persons. The governor said he is for it and has filed a bill continuing the law.

The other businessman query came from Edgar M. Buttenheim, president of the Buttenheim Publishing Co., who wanted to know the governor's position on a graduated income tax.

This gave the governor an opportunity to reiterate his espousal of the graduated income tax approach. This stand has brought complaints from executives of banks and insurance companies and other top business people, who helped defeat a proposed change in the state constitution that would have permitted the state to levy graduated income taxes.

Sargent said the states this year which have surpluses in the treasury are those that have a graduated income tax.

After the talk Buttenheim told the governor that he, too, is an advocate of the graduated income tax.

Albert A. Bogdan, executive director of the local Urban Coalition, complained that in the proposed regionalization of services, as provided in the governor's reorganization plans, the fact that Berkshire County is an environmental, geographic, economic and cultural entity is not recognized.

The governor agreed that it should be, and said that regionalization plans have not yet been completed.

During a six-hour stay in the Berkshire, the governor was taken on a tour of Tanglewood.

He said he would like to increase state aid for the arts and humanities but the competition for tax dollars from agencies that deal in "direly needed" services is intense.

In the fiscal 1974 budget, which went into effect July 1, the state Council for the Arts and Humanities was allotted $600,000, which is twice the appropriation for fiscal 1973.

"This is still a drop in the bucket in terms of what we ought to do to improve the quality of life," the governor said. "But when welfare, mental health, crime in the streets, air and water pollution, and other such services are competing for the tax dollar, the answers are not so simple."

BANNER (E)
BENNINGTON, VT.
D. 6,500
JUL 1973 New England Newsclip

Down in the Berkshires

Sargent pledges aid to arts

LENOX — Gov. Sargent pledged Tuesday afternoon to increase state aid to the arts and humanities as part of the state's role in preserving and enhancing the quality of lifes of the citizenry.

Sargent's comments were made during an appearance at Tanglewood, and after a luncheon with Central Berkshire business leaders. He noted that he had doubled the annual budget for the state Council on Arts and Humanities in recent years to the $600,000 level recommended for the fiscal 1974.

Sargent admitted that the amount was only a drop in the bucket, but said he is awaiting the complete recommendations of a special study he commissioned to determine what the state's role should be in supporting the arts before acting further.

TRANSCRIPT (E)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
D. 33,700
JUL 27 1973 New England Newsclip

Sargent pledges more aid to arts

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — Gov. Francis W. Sargent pledged Tuesday to increase state aid to the arts and humanities.

During a visit to Tanglewood, Sargent said, "It should be the role of government to provide assistance much more than we have in the past.

"It's so important that the quality of life not be forgotten," he added.

Sargent said he has doubled the annual appropriation to the state council on arts and humanities in recent years to a $600,000 recommendation for fiscal 1974. He said he felt that still wasn't enough, but was awaiting recommendations of a study he has ordered to determine the role of the state in supporting the arts before making further recommendations.

GLOBE (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,012
JUL 27 1973 New England Newsclip

Governor to boost arts aid

Associated Press

LENOX—Gov. Francis W. Sargent pledged this During a visit to Tanglewood, Sargent said, "It should be the role of government to provide assistance much more than we have in the past.

"It's so important that the quality of life not be forgotten," he added.

Sargent said he has doubled the annual appropriation to the state council on arts and humanities in recent years to a $600,000 recommendation for fiscal 1974. He said he felt that still wasn't enough, but was awaiting recommendations of a study he has ordered to determine the role of the state in supporting the arts before making further recommendations.

Tanglewood concert Aug. 14

LENOX — Tuesday, Aug. 14 at 8:30 p.m. the combined Boston Symphony Orchestra and Berkshire Music Center Orchestra will present the annual Tanglewood-on-Parade gala concert.

The grounds open at 2 p.m. and beginning at 2:30 mini concerts will be presented throughout the afternoon by members of the Berkshire Music Center.

The annual Tanglewood-on-Parade celebration is an opportunity for listeners to understand better just what goes on during the eight weeks of the Berkshire Music Center, this country's oldest summer music school for advanced students and preprofessionals.

Concerts at 8:30 p.m. in the shed at Tanglewood this year presents a mexed bag of material.

The concert opens with Aaron Copland's Lincoln Portrait conducted by Gunther Schuller, artistic director, played by the Boston Symphony and narrated by Granrud artist-in-residence Andre Watts.

UNION (M)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 84,000

JUL 25 1973

New England Newsclip

PEEKSKILL, N.Y.
STAR
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
D. 13,000

AUG 10 1973

Annual Tanglewood-on-parade gala concert set for Tuesday

On Tuesday, at 8:30 p.m. at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras will present the annual Tanglewood-on-Parade Gala concert. The grounds open at 2:00 in the afternoon and, beginning at 2:30, mini-concerts will be presented throughout the afternoon by members of the Berkshire Music Center. The annual Tanglewood-on-Parade celebration is an opportunity for listeners to understand better just what goes on during the eight weeks of the Berkshire Music Center, this country's oldest summer school for advanced students and preprofessionals.

Concerts at 8:30 p.m. in the shed at Tanglewood this year presents a mixed bag of material.

The concert opens with Aaron Copland's Lincoln Portrait, conducted by Artistic Director Gunther Schuller, played by the Boston Symphony and narrated by Granrud Artist-in-Residence Andre Watts. The Liszt Piano concerto No. 1 in E flat follows, with Seiji Ozawa, Artistic Director of the Berkshire Festival and Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducting that Orchestra with Andre Watts as soloist. Then the concert takes a new turn — Gunther Schuller conducts members of the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra under the direction of Seiji Ozawa follows with Strauss' Also sprach Zarathustra and the concert closes with Tchaikovsky's Italien capriccio performed by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras under the direction of Gunther Schuller.

SOUTH MIDDLESEX
NEWS (E)
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.

AUG 2 1973

New England Newsclip

TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM (E)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
D. 30,000

JUL 27 1973

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood-On-Parade to take place Aug. 14

On Tuesday, Aug. 14 at 8:30 p.m., the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras present the annual Tanglewood-on-Parade Gala concert. The grounds open at 2 p.m. and, beginning at 2:30, mini-concerts will be presented throughout the afternoon by the members of the Berkshire Music Center. The annual Tanglewood on Parade celebration is a fine opportunity for listeners to understand better just what goes on during the eight weeks of the Berkshire Music Center, this country's oldest summer school for advanced students and preprofessionals.

The GALA concerts, at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed at Tanglewood, this year presents a mixed bag of material. The concert opens with Aaron Copland's Lincoln Portrait, conducted by Artistic Director Gunther Schuller, played by the Boston Symphony and narrated by Granrud Artist-in-Residence Andre Watts. The Liszt Piano concerto No. 1 in E flat follows, with Seiji Ozawa, Artistic Director of the Berkshire Festival and Music Director of the Boston Symphony orchestra conducting that Orchestra with Andre Watts as soloist. Then the concert takes a new turn — Gunther Schuller conducts members of the Berkshire Music Center in works by Scott Joplin, Jelly Roll Morton and Duke Ellington. The Berkshire Music Center Orchestra under the direction of Seiji Ozawa follows with Strauss' Also sprach Zarathustra and the concert closes with Tchaikovsky's Italien capriccio performed by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras under the direction of Gunther Schuller.

This year's concert promises to be more varied and exciting than ever before, so be sure to come to the 1973 Tanglewood-on-Parade. Prices range from $6 to $3 and tickets are available at the Tangiewood Box Office.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

JUL 28 1973

New England News

Tanglewood on Parade to be Aug. 14

The annual Tanglewood - on - Parade gala concert presented by the Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center orchestras will be held Tuesday, Aug. 14, at 8:30 in the Shed. The grounds open at 2 and mini-concerts will be given throughout the afternoon, beginning at 2:30 by members of the Berkshire Music Center.

Copland work

The evening concert will open with Aaron Copland's "Lincoln Portrait," conducted by BMC artistic director Gunther Schuller. It will be played by the Boston Symphony and narrated by Granrud artist - in - residence

PRESS (E)
BRISTOL, CONN.
D. 18,000

AUG 1 1973

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Special Scheduled Aug. 14

LENOX — On Tuesday, Aug. 14 at 8:30 p.m. the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras present the annual Tanglewood-on Parade gala concert.

The grounds open at 2.00 in the afternoon and, beginning at 2.30, mini-concerts will be presented throughout the afternoon by members of the Berkshire Music Center. The annual Tanglewood - on - Parade celebration is an opportunity for listeners to understand better just what goes on during the eight weeks of the Berkshire Music Center, this country's oldest summer music school for advanced students and preprofessionals.

The concerts at 8.30 p.m. in the Shed at Tanglewood this year will present a mixed bag of material

The concert opens with Aaron Copland's "Lincoln Portrait," conducted by Artistic Director Gunther Schuller, played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and narrated by Granrud Artist-in-Residence Andre Watts.

The Liszt Piano Concerto No. 1 in E flat follows, with Seiji Ozawa Artistic Director of the Berkshire Festival and Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducting that orchestra with Andre Watts as soloist.

Then the concert takes a turn — Gunther Schuller conducts members of the Berkshire Music Center In works by Scott Joplin, Jelly Roll Morton and Duke Ellington.

The Berkshire Music Center Orchestra under the direction of Seiji Ozawa follows with Strauss' "Also sprach Zarathustra" and the concert closes with Tchaikovsky's "Italien capriccio" performed by the combined Boston Symphony Orchestra and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras under the direction of Gunther Schuller.

HERALD-AMERICAN (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 424,654

AUG 3 1973

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood-on-Parade Gala Concert will take place Tuesday evening, August 14, 8:30 o'clock in the Shed at Tanglewood. This year it is presenting a mixed bag of material by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras.

Grounds open at 2:30. Mini-concerts will be presented throughout the afternoon by members of the Berkshire Music Center.

Tanglewood-on-Parade Program Announced

n Tuesday, August 14 at p.m., the combined ston Symphony and rkshire Music Center hestras present the an- l Tanglewood - on - ade Gala concert.

he Lenox grounds open at m. and, beginning at 2:30, ni-concerts will be sented throughout the rnoon by members of the kshire Music Ce

he annual Tanglewood - Parade celebration is a opportunity for listeners understand better just t goes on during the eight ks of the Berkshire Music er, this country's oldest mer music school for anced students and rofessionals.

e gala concerts, at 8:30 in the Shed at glewood, this year nts a mixed bag of rial. The concert opens with Aaron Copland's Lincoln Portrait, conducted by Artistic Director Gunther Schuller, played by the Boston Symphony and narrated by Granrud Artist - in - Residence Andre Watts.

The Liszt Piano concerto No. 1 in E flat follows, with Seiji Ozawa, artistic director of the Berkshire Festival and Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducting that Orchestra with Andrew Watts as soloist.

Then the concert takes a new turn — Schuller conducts members of the Berkshire Music Center in works by Scott Joplin, Jelly Roll Morton and Duke Ellington.

The Berkshire Music center Orchestra under the direction of Ozawa follows with Strauss' Also sprach Zarathustra and the concert closes with Tchaikovsky's Italien capriccio performed by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras under the direction of Schuller.

This year's concert promises to be more varied and exciting than ever before, so be sure to come to the 1973 Tanglewood - on - Parade. Tickets are available at the Tanglewood Box Office.

Tanglewood-on-Parade Coming Up Soon

Eight hours of continuous music will be performed Tuesday, Aug. 14, at the Berkshire Music Center's annual gala called Tanglewood-on-Parade.

Several programs will be in progress simultaneously or dovetailed between 2:30 p.m. and about 7:30.

These are demonstrations of the quality work being accomplished by advanced students and preprofessionals enrolled at the Center.

Repertory is instrumental and vocal music, standard and contemporary. In the past, these programs have been given by talented musicians who soon achieved national and international fame.

One such program consists of original works by young composers who are studying at the Center under fellowships hear all of e program times. Au- ose proxim- e to hear programs. beehive of p.m. con-

featuring the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras of 175 players.

Shared Podium

The podium will be shared by Seiji Ozawa, music director of the Boston Symphony, and Gunther Schuller, artistic director of the Center.

Andre Watts will perform the roles of piano soloist and

He will narrate Aaron Copland's "Lincoln Portrait" with Schuller conducting the Boston Symphony. Ozawa will conduct for Watts' performance of Piano Concerto No. 1 in E flat by Liszt.

Ozawa will also conduct the Berkshire Center Orchestra in Richard Strauss' "Also Spake Zarathustra."

The combined orchestras will be conducted by Schuller for Tchaikovsky's "Italian Caprice."

To guarantee the mixed bag, Schuller will conduct members of the Berkshire Center in works by Scott Joplin, Jelly Roll Morton and Duke Ellington.

Prices range from $6 to $3 and tickets are available at the Tanglewood box office.

MUSIC CRITICS ASSOCIATION has instituted its new journalistic experiment by underwriting the cost of exchanging music critics from the North American newspapers for a four-week period.

Carl Cunningham, music critic for the Houston (Tex.) Post, and William Littler of the Toronto (Ont.) Star are swapping jobs under the Music Critics project, with the cooperation of the American Symphony Orchestra League.

Also participating in the cost are the National Endowment for the Arts and the Canada Council.

Expressed purpose in the music critic exchange is "to offer the musical public in participating cities exposure to fresh points of view and to overcome in part the lack of mobility among music critics as compared to critics of the other arts."

WALTER TERRY, currently acting director of the Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival, has been engaged as director for coming seasons on an open-ended arrangement.

He has already began plans

Kappa Psi fraternity and Tau Beta Sigma sorority will continue through Aug. 11. It marks the first time in 40 years that the two groups are meeting on an eastern campus. Delegates from 249 chapters are expected.

Among the highlights will be the organization and performance of a concert by the National Intercollegiate Band. The 120-piece ensemble will play in Jorgensen Auditorium in a free concert Thrusday, Aug. 9 at 8:15 p.m.

WEATHER PERMITTING, De Cordova Museum at Lincoln, Mass., will present Rocky Birigwa and the "Boka Dey" in drumming, dancing and folk music today at 3:30 p.m. in the Museum's 800-seat door amphitheater.

succeeding Sunday programs, all at 3:30 p.m., are mbridge Brass Quintet, g. 12; folk-singer Michael oney, Aug. 19; Apple Hill amber Players, Aug. 26; d Canterbury Country nce Orchestra, Sept. 2.

RAYMOND MORIN

MILLERTON, N. Y.
NEWS
W. 1,500

AUG 9 1973

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 187,897

AUG 13 1973

New England News

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.

AUG 6 1973

New England Newsclip

NEWS (E)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

JUL 27 1973

New England Newsclip

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE (E)
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.

AUG 1 1973

New England

. . . Tuesday's Feature: Tanglewood-On-Parade

LENOX--On Tuesday at 8:30 p.m., the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras present the annual Tanglewood-on-Parade Gala concert. The grounds open at 2 in the afternoon and, beginning at 2:30, mini-concerts will be presented throughout the afternoon by members of the Berkshire Music Center. The annual Tanglewood-on-Parade celebration is designed to be an opportunity for listeners to understand better just what goes on during the eight weeks of the Berkshire Music Center, this country's oldest summer music school for advanced students and preprofessionals.

The GALA concerts, at 8:30 p.m. in the shed at Tanglewood, this year presents a mixed bag of material. The concert opens with Aaron Copland's Lincoln Portrait, conducted by Artistic Director Gunther Schuller, played by the Boston Symphony and narrated by Granrud Artist in-Residence Andre Watts.

The Liszt Piano concerto no. 1 in E flat follows, with Seiji Ozawa Artistic Director of the Berkshire Festival and Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducting that Orchestra with Andre Watts as soloist.

Then the concert takes a new turn -- Gunther Schuller conducts members of the Berkshire Music Center in works by Scott Joplin, Jelly Roll Morton and Duke Ellington. The Berkshire Music Center Orchestra under the direction of Seiji Ozawa follows with Strauss' Also sprach Zarathustra and the concert closes with Tchaikovsky's Italien capriccio performed by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras under the direction of Gunther Schuller.

Tickets are available at the Tanglewood Box Office.

Tanglewood

Tanglewood-On -Parade Set For Aug. 14

The combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras present the annual Tanglewood-on-Parde Gala concert Tuesday, Aug. 14 at 8:30 p.m.

The grounds open at 2 p.m. in the afternoon and, beginning at 2:30, mini-concerts will be presented throughout the afternoon by members of the Berkshire Music Center. The annual Tanglewood-on-Parade celebration is a fine opportunity for listeners to understand better just what goes on during the eight weeks of the Berkshire Music Center, this country's oldest summer music school for advanced students and preprofessionals.

The Gala concerts, at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed at Tanglewood, this year presents a mixed bag of material. The concert opens with Aaron Copland's "Lincoln Portrait," conducted by Artistic Director Gunther Schuller, played by the Boston Symphony and narrated by Granrud Artist-in-Residence Andre Watts.

The Liszt Piano concerto no. 1 in E flat follows, with Seiji Ozawa, Artistic Director of the Berkshire Festival and Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducting that Orchestra with Andre Watts as soloist.

Then the concert takes a new turn: Gunther Schuller conducts members of the Berkshire Music Center in works by Scott Joplin, Jelly Roll Morton and Duke Ellington.

The Berkshire Music Center Orchestra under the direction of Seiji Ozawa follows with Strauss's "Also sprach Zarathustra" and the concert closes with Tchaikovsky's Italien capriccio, performed by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras under the direction of Gunther Schuller.

Gala Concert Slated At Tanglewood

On Tuesday, August 14 at 8:30 p.m., the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras present the annual Tanglewood-on-Parade Gala concert. The grounds open at 2:00 in the afternoon and, beginning at 2:30, mini-concerts will be presented throughout the afternoon by members of the Berkshire Music Center. The annual Tanglewood-on-Parade celebration is a fine opportunity for listeners to understand better just what goes on during the eight weeks of the Berkshire Music Center, this country's oldest summer music school for advanced students and preprofessionals.

The GALA concerts, at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed at Tanglewood, this year presents a mixed bag of material. The concert opens with Aaron Copland's Lincoln Portrait, conducted by Artistic Director Gunther Schuller, played by the Boston Symphony and narrated by Granrud Artist-in-Residence Andre Watts. The Liszt Piano Concerto no.1 in E flat follows, with Seiji Ozawa, Artistic Director of the Berkshire Festival and Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducting that Orchestra with Andre Watts as soloist. Then the concert takes a new turn—Gunther Schuller conducts members of the Berkshire Music Center in works by Scott Joplin, Jelly Roll Morton and Duke Ellington. The Berkshire Music Center Orchestra under the direction of Seiji Ozawa follows with Strauss' Also sprach Zarathustra and the concert closes with Tchaikovsky's Italien capriccio performed by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras under the direction of Gunther Schuller.

This year's concert promises to be more varied and exciting than ever before, so be sure to come to the 1973 Tanglewood-on-Parade.

All-day musicfest

Tanglewood-on-Parade, annual all-day gala at Lenox, Mass., takes place tomorrow, Aug. 14. Grounds open at 2 p.m. and from 2:30, mini-concerts will be presented all afternoon by members of the Berkshire Music Center. At 8:30 p.m., both the Boston Symphony and the BMC orchestra will paly, with Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller conducting, and pianist Andre Watts as soloist in the Liszt Concerto No. 1, and as narrator in Copland's "Lincoln Portrait."

Tanglewood concert Aug. 14

LENOX — Tuesday, Aug. 14 at 8:30 p.m. the combined Boston Symphony Orchestra and Berkshire Music Center Orchestra will present the annual Tanglewood-on-Parade gala concert.

The grounds open at 2 p.m. and beginning at 2:30 mini concerts will be presented throughout the afternoon by members of the Berkshire Music Center.

The annual Tanglewood-on-Parade celebration is an opportunity for listeners to understand better just what goes on during the eight weeks of the Berkshire Music Center, this country's oldest summer music school for advanced students and preprofessionals.

Concerts at 8:30 p.m. in the shed at Tanglewood this year presents a mexed bag of material.

The concert opens with Aaron Copland's Lincoln Portrait conducted by Gunther Schuller, artistic director, played by the Boston Symphony and narrated by Granrud artist-in-residence Andre Watts.

UNION (M)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
JUL 25 1973
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Special Scheduled Aug. 14

LENOX — On Tuesday, Aug. 14 at 8:30 p.m. the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras present the annual Tanglewood-on Parade gala concert.

The grounds open at 2.00 in the afternoon and, beginning at 2.30, mini-concerts will be presented throughout the afternoon by members of the Berkshire Music Center. The annual Tanglewood - on - Parade celebration is an opportunity for listeners to understand better just what goes on during the eight weeks of the Berkshire Music Center, this country's oldest summer music school for advanced students and preprofessionals.

The concerts at 8.30 p.m. in the Shed at Tanglewood this year will present a mixed bag of material

The concert opens with Aaron Copland's "Lincoln Portrait," conducted by Artistic Director Gunther Schuller, played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and narrated by Granrud Artist-in-Residence Andre Watts.

The Liszt Piano Concerto No. 1 in E flat follows, with Seiji Ozawa Artistic Director of the Berkshire Festival and Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducting that orchestra with Andre Watts as soloist.

Then the concert takes a turn — Gunther Schuller conducts members of the Berkshire Music Center in works by Scott Joplin, Jelly Roll Morton and Duke Ellington.

The Berkshire Music Center Orchestra under the direction of Seiji Ozawa follows with Strauss' "Also sprach Zarathustra" and the concert closes with Tchaikovsky's "Italien capriccio" performed by the combined Boston Symphony Orchestra and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras under the direction of Gunther Schuller.

HERALD AMERICAN (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
AUG 3 1973
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood-on-Parade Gala Concert will take place Tuesday evening, August 14, 8:30 o'clock in the Shed at Tanglewood. This year it is presenting a mixed bag of material by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras.

Grounds open at 2:30. Mini-concerts will be presented throughout the afternoon by members of the Berkshire Music Center.

Tanglewood-on-Parade Program Announced

n Tuesday, August 14 at) p.m., the combined ston Symphony and rkshire Music Center hestras present the an- l Tanglewood - on - ade Gala concert.

he Lenox grounds open at m. and, beginning at 2:30, ni-concerts will be sented throughout the rnoon by members of the kshire Music Ce

he annual Tanglewood - Parade celebration is a opportunity for listeners understand better just t goes on during the eight ks of the Berkshire Music er, this country's oldest mer music school for anced students and rofessionals.

e gala concerts, at 8:30 in the Shed at glewood, this year nts a mixed bag of rial. The concert opens with Aaron Copland's Lincoln Portrait, conducted by Artistic Director Gunther Schuller, played by the Boston Symphony and narrated by Granrud Artist - in - Residence Andre Watts.

The Liszt Piano concerto No. 1 in E flat follows, with Seiji Ozawa, artistic director of the Berkshire Festival and Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducting that Orchestra with Andrew Watts as soloist.

Then the concert takes a new turn — Schuller conducts members of the Berkshire Music Center in works by Scott Joplin, Jelly Roll Morton and Duke Ellington.

The Berkshire Music center Orchestra under the direction of Ozawa follows with Strauss' Also sprach Zarathustra and the concert closes with Tchaikovsky's Italien capriccio performed by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras under the direction of Schuller.

This year's concert promises to be more varied and exciting than ever before, so be sure to come to the 1973 Tanglewood - on - Parade. Tickets are available at the Tanglewood Box Office.

PEEKSKILL, N.Y.
STAR
NEW YORK CITY MARKET
AUG 10 1973

Annual Tanglewood-on-parade gala concert set for Tuesday

On Tuesday, at 8:30 p.m. at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras will present the annual Tanglewood-on-Parade Gala concert. The grounds open at 2:00 in the afternoon and, beginning at 2:30, mini-concerts will be presented throughout the afternoon by members of the Berkshire Music Center. The annual Tanglewood-on-Parade celebration is a fine opportunity for listeners to understand better just what goes on during the eight weeks of the Berkshire Music Center, this country's oldest summer school for advanced students and preprofessionals.

The GALA concerts, at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed at Tanglewood, this year presents a mixed bag of material. The concert opens with Aaron Copland's Lincoln Portrait, conducted by Artistic Director Gunther Schuller, played by the Boston Symphony and narrated by Granrud Artist-in-Residence Andre Watts. The Liszt Piano concerto No. 1 in E flat follows, with Seiji Ozawa, Artistic Director of the Berkshire Festival and Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducting that Orchestra with Andre Watts as soloist. Then the concert takes a new turn — Gunther Schuller conducts members of the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra under the direction of Seiji Ozawa follows with Strauss' Also sprach Zarathustra and the concert closes with Tchaikovsky's Italien capriccio performed by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras under the direction of Gunther Schuller.

Tanglewood-On-Parade to take place Aug. 14

On Tuesday, Aug. 14 at 8:30 p.m., the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras present the annual Tanglewood-on-Parade Gala concert. The grounds open at 2 p.m. and, beginning at 2:30, mini-concerts will be presented throughout the afternoon by the members of the Berkshire Music Center. The annual Tanglewood on Parade celebration is a fine opportunity for listeners to understand better just what goes on during the eight weeks of the Berkshire Music Center, this country's oldest summer school for advanced students and preprofessionals.

The GALA concerts, at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed at Tanglewood, this year presents a mixed bag of material. The concert opens with Aaron Copland's Lincoln Portrait, conducted by Artistic Director Gunther Schuller, played by the Boston Symphony and narrated by Granrud Artist-in-Residence Andre Watts. The Liszt Piano concerto No. 1 in E flat follows, with Seiji Ozawa, Artistic Director of the Berkshire Festival and Music Director of the Boston Symphony orchestra conducting that Orchestra with Andre Watts as soloist. Then the concert takes a new turn — Gunther Schuller conducts members of the Berkshire Music Center in works by Scott Joplin, Jelly Roll Morton and Duke Ellington. The Berkshire Music Center Orchestra under the direction of Seiji Ozawa follows with Strauss' Also sprach Zarathustra and the concert closes with Tchaikovsky's Italien capriccio performed by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras under the direction of Gunther Schuller.

This year's concert promises to be more varied and exciting than ever before, so be sure to come to the 1973 Tanglewood-on-Parade. Prices range from $6 to $3 and tickets are available at the Tangiewood Box Office.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
JUL 28 1973
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood on Parade to be Aug. 14

The annual Tanglewood - on - Parade gala concert presented by the Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center orchestras will be held Tuesday, Aug. 14, at 8:30 in the Shed. The grounds open at 2 and mini-concerts will be given throughout the afternoon, beginning at 2:30 by members of the Berkshire Music Center.

Copland work

The evening concert will open with Aaron Copland's "Lincoln Portrait," conducted by BMC artistic director Gunther Schuller. It will be played by the Boston Symphony and narrated by Granrud artist - in - residence

PRESS (E)
HARTFORD, CONN.
AUG 1 1973
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood-on-Parade Coming Up Soon

Eight hours of continuous music will be performed Tuesday, Aug. 14, at the Berkshire Music Center's annual gala called Tanglewood-on-Parade.

Several programs will be in progress simultaneously or dovetailed between 2:30 p.m. and about 7:30.

These are demonstrations of the quality work being accomplished by advanced students and preprofessionals enrolled at the Center.

Repertory is instrumental and vocal music, standard and contemporary. In the past, these programs have been given by talented musicians who soon achieved national and international fame.

One such program consists of original works by young composers who are studying at the Center under fellowships

Music

Raymond Morin

hear all of e program times. Au- ose proxim- e to hear programs. beehive of p.m. con-

featuring the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras of 175 players.

Shared Podium

The podium will be shared by Seiji Ozawa, music director of the Boston Symphony, and Gunther Schuller, artistic director of the Center.

Andre Watts will perform the roles of piano soloist and

He will narrate Aaron Copland's "Lincoln Portrait" with Schuller conducting the Boston Symphony. Ozawa will conduct for Watts' performance of Piano Concerto No. 1 in E flat by Liszt.

Ozawa will also conduct the Berkshire Center Orchestra in Richard Strauss' "Also Spake Zarathustra."

The combined orchestras will be conducted by Schuller for Tchaikovsky's "Italian Caprice."

To guarantee the mixed bag, Schuller will conduct members of the Berkshire Center in works by Scott Joplin, Jelly Roll Morton and Duke Ellington.

Prices range from $6 to $3 and tickets are available at the Tanglewood box office.

MUSIC CRITICS ASSOCIATION has instituted its new journalistic experiment by underwriting the cost of exchanging music critics from the North American newspapers for a four-week period.

Carl Cunningham, music critic for the Houston (Tex.) Post, and William Littler of the Toronto (Ont.) Star are swapping jobs under the Music Critics project, with the cooperation of the American Symphony Orchestra League.

Also participating in the cost are the National Endowment for the Arts and the Canada Council.

Expressed purpose in the music critic exchange is "to offer the musical public in participating cities exposure to fresh points of view and to overcome in part the lack of mobility among music critics as compared to critics of the other arts."

WALTER TERRY, currently acting director of the Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival, has been engaged as director for coming seasons on an open-ended arrangement.

He has already began plans

Kappa Psi fraternity and Tau Beta Sigma sorority will continue through Aug. 11. It marks the first time in 40 years that the two groups are meeting on an eastern campus. Delegates from 249 chapters are expected.

Among the highlights will be the organization and performance of a concert by the National Intercollegiate Band. The 120-piece ensemble will play in Jorgensen Auditorium in a free concert Thrusday, Aug. 9 at 8:15 p.m.

WEATHER PERMITTING, De Cordova Museum at Lincoln, Mass., will present Rocky Birigwa and the "Boka Dey" in drumming, dancing and folk music today at 3:30 p.m. in the Museum's 800-seat door amphitheater.

succeeding Sunday pro ams, all at 3:30 p.m., are mbridge Brass Quintet g. 12; folk-singer Michael oney, Aug. 19; Apple Hill amber Players, Aug. 26 d Canterbury Country nce Orchestra, Sept. 2.

RAYMOND MORIN

MILLERTON, N. Y.
NEWS
W. 1,500
AUG 9 1973

Gala Concert Slated At Tanglewood

On Tuesday, August 14 at 8:30 p.m., the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras present the annual Tanglewood-on-Parade Gala concert. The grounds open at 2:00 in the afternoon and, beginning at 2:30, mini-concerts will be presented throughout the afternoon by members of the Berkshire Music Center. The annual Tanglewood-on-Parade celebration is a fine opportunity for listeners to understand better just what goes on during the eight weeks of the Berkshire Music Center, this country's oldest summer music school for advanced students and preprofessionals.

The GALA concerts, at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed at Tanglewood, this year presents a mixed bag of material. The concert opens with Aaron Copland's Lincoln Portrait, conducted by Artistic Director Gunther Schuller, played by the Boston Symphony and narrated by Granrud Artist-in-Residence Andre Watts. The Liszt Piano Concerto no 1 in E flat follows, with Seiji Ozawa, Artistic Director of the Berkshire Festival and Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducting that Orchestra with Andre Watts as soloist. Then the concert takes a new turn—Gunther Schuller conducts members of the Berkshire Music Center in works by Scott Joplin, Jelly Roll Morton and Duke Ellington. The Berkshire Music Center Orchestra under the direction of Seiji Ozawa follows with Strauss' Also sprach Zarathustra and the concert closes with Tchaikovsky's Italien capriccio performed by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras under the direction of Gunther Schuller.

This year's concert promises to be more varied and exciting than ever before, so be sure to come to the 1973 Tanglewood-on-Parade.

All-day musicfest

Tanolewood-on-Parade, annual all-day gala at Lenox, Mass., takes place tomorrow, Aug. 14. Grounds open at 2 p.m. and from 2:30, mini-concerts will be presented all afternoon by members of the Berkshire Music Center. At 8:30 p.m., both the Boston Symphony and the BMC orchestra will paly, with Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller conducting, and pianist Andre Watts as soloist in the Liszt Concerto No. 1, and as narrator in Copland's "Lincoln Portrait."

Tanglewood-on-Parade Program Announced

n Tuesday, August 14 at) p.m., the combined ston Symphony and rkshire Music Center hestras present the an- l Tanglewood - on - ade Gala concert.

he Lenox grounds open at m. and, beginning at 2:30, ni-concerts will be sented throughout the rnoon by members of the kshire Music Ce

he annual Tanglewood - Parade celebration is a opportunity for listeners understand better just t goes on during the eight ks of the Berkshire Music er, this country's oldest mer music school for anced students and rofessionals.

e gala concerts, at 8:30 in the Shed at glewood, this year nts a mixed bag of rial. The concert opens with Aaron Copland's Lincoln Portrait, conducted by Artistic Director Gunther Schuller, played by the Boston Symphony and narrated by Granrud Artist - in - Residence Andre Watts.

The Liszt Piano Concerto No. 1 in E flat follows, with Seiji Ozawa, artistic director of the Berkshire Festival and Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducting that Orchestra with Andrew Watts as soloist.

Then the concert takes a new turn — Schuller conducts members of the Berkshire Music Center in works by Scott Joplin, Jelly Roll Morton and Duke Ellington.

The Berkshire Music center Orchestra under the direction of Ozawa follows with Strauss' Also sprach Zarathustra and the concert closes with Tchaikovsky's Italien capriccio performed by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras under the direction of Schuller.

This year's concert promises to be more varied and exciting than ever before, so be sure to come to the 1973 Tanglewood - on - Parade. Tickets are available at the Tanglewood Box Office.

JUL 29 1973
New England Newsclip

. . . Tuesday's feature: Tanglewood-On-Parade

LENOX--On Tuesday at 8:30 p.m., the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras present the annual Tanglewood-on-Parade Gala concert. The grounds open at 2 in the afternoon and, beginning at 2:30 mini-concerts will be presented throughout the afternoon by members of the Berkshire Music Center. The annual Tanglewood-on-Parade celebration is designed to be an opportunity for listeners to understand better just what goes on during the eight weeks of the Berkshire Music Center, this country's oldest summer music school for advanced students and preprofessionals.

The GALA concerts, at 8:30 p.m. in the shed at Tanglewood, this year presents a mixed bag of material. The concert opens with Aaron Copland's Lincoln Portrait, conducted by Artistic Director Gunther Schuller, played by the Boston Symphony and narrated by Granrud Artist-in-Residence Andre Watts.

The Liszt Piano concerto no. 1 in E flat follows, with Seiji Ozawa Artistic Director of the Berkshire Festival and Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducting that Orchestra with Andre Watts as soloist.

Then the concert takes a new turn -- Gunther Schuller conducts members of the Berkshire Music Center in works by Scott Joplin, Jelly Roll Morton and Duke Ellington. The Berkshire Music Center Orchestra under the direction of Seiji Ozawa follows with Strauss' Also sprach Zarathustra and the concert closes with Tchaikovsky's Italien capriccio performed by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras under the direction of Gunther Schuller.

Tickets are available at the Tanglewood Box Office.

AUG 9 1973

Tanglewood

Tanglewood-On -Parade Set For Aug. 14

The combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras present the annual Tanglewood-on-Parde Gala concert Tuesday, Aug. 14 at 8:30 p.m.

The grounds open at 2 p.m. in the afternoon and, beginning at 2:30, mini-concerts will be presented throughout the afternoon by members of the Berkshire Music Center. The annual Tanglewood-on-Parade celebration is a fine opportunity for listeners to understand better just what goes on during the eight weeks of the Berkshire Music Center, this country's oldest summer music school for advanced students and preprofessionals.

The Gala concerts, at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed at Tanglewood, this year presents a mixed bag of material. The concert opens with Aaron Copland's "Lincoln Portrait," conducted by Artistic Director Gunther Schuller, played by the Boston Symphony and narrated by Granrud Artist-in-Residence Andre Watts.

The Liszt Piano concerto no. 1 in E flat follows, with Seiji Ozawa, Artistic Director of the Berkshire Festival and Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducting that Orchestra with Andre Watts as soloist.

Then the concert takes a new turn: Gunther Schuller conducts members of the Berkshire Music Center in works by Scott Joplin, Jelly Roll Morton and Duke Ellington.

The Berkshire Music Center Orchestra under the direction of Seiji Ozawa follows with Strauss's "Also sprach Zarathustra" and the concert closes with Tchaikovsky's Italien capriccio performed by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras under the direction of Gunther Schuller.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Tanglewood concert Aug. 14

LENOX — Tuesday, Aug. 14 at 8:30 p.m. the combined Boston Symphony Orchestra and Berkshire Music Center Orchestra will present the annual Tanglewood-on-Parade gala concert.

The grounds open at 2 p.m. and beginning at 2:30 mini concerts will be presented throughout the afternoon by members of the Berkshire Music Center.

The annual Tanglewood-on-Parade celebration is an opportunity for listeners to understand better just what goes on during the eight weeks of the Berkshire Music Center, this country's oldest summer music school for advanced students and preprofessionals.

Concerts at 8:30 p.m. in the shed at Tanglewood this year presents a mexed bag of material.

The concert opens with Aaron Copland's Lincoln Portrait conducted by Gunther Schuller, artistic director, played by the Boston Symphony and narrated by Granrud artist-in-residence Andre Watts.

UNION (M)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 84,000

JUL 25 1973

New England Newsclip

PEEKSKILL, N.Y.
STAR
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
D. 13,000

AUG 10 1973

SOUTH MIDDLESEX NEWS (E)
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.

AUG 2 1973

New England Newsclip

TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM (E)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
D. 30,000

JUL 27 1973

New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

JUL 28 1973

New Engl. News

Annual Tanglewood-on-parade gala concert set for Tuesday

On Tuesday, at 8:30 p.m. at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras will present the annual Tanglewood-on-Parade Gala concert. The grounds open at 2:00 in the afternoon and, beginning at 2:30, mini-concerts will be presented throughout the afternoon by members of the Berkshire Music Center. The annual Tanglewood-on-Parade celebration is a fine opportunity for listeners to understand better just what goes on during the eight weeks of the Berkshire Music Center, this country's oldest summer school for advanced students and preprofessionals.

The GALA concerts, at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed at Tanglewood, this year presents a mixed bag of material. The concert opens with Aaron Copland's Lincoln Portrait, conducted by Artistic Director Gunther Schuller, played by the Boston Symphony and narrated by Granrud Artist-in-Residence Andre Watts. The Liszt Piano concerto No. 1 in E flat follows, with Seiji Ozawa, Artistic Director of the Berkshire Festival and Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducting that Orchestra with Andre Watts as soloist. Then the concert takes a new turn — Gunther Schuller conducts members of the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra under the direction of Seiji Ozawa follows with Strauss' Also sprach Zarathustra and the concert closes with Tchaikovsky's Italien capriccio performed by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras under the direction of Gunther Schuller.

Tanglewood-On-Parade to take place Aug. 14

On Tuesday, Aug. 14 at 8:30 p.m., the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras present the annual Tanglewood-on-Parade Gala concert. The grounds open at 2 p.m. and, beginning at 2:30, mini-concerts will be presented throughout the afternoon by the members of the Berkshire Music Center. The annual Tanglewood on Parade celebration is a fine opportunity for listeners to understand better just what goes on during the eight weeks of the Berkshire Music Center, this country's oldest summer school for advanced students and preprofessionals.

The GALA concerts, at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed at Tanglewood, this year presents a mixed bag of material. The concert opens with Aaron Copland's Lincoln Portrait, conducted by Artistic Director Gunther Schuller, played by the Boston Symphony and narrated by Granrud Artist-in-Residence Andre Watts. The Liszt Piano concerto No. 1 in E flat follows, with Seiji Ozawa, Artistic Director of the Berkshire Festival and Music Director of the Boston Symphony orchestra conducting that Orchestra with Andre Watts as soloist. Then the concert takes a new turn — Gunther Schuller conducts members of the Berkshire Music Center in works by Scott Joplin, Jelly Roll Morton and Duke Ellington. The Berkshire Music Center Orchestra under the direction of Seiji Ozawa follows with Strauss' Also sprach Zarathustra and the concert closes with Tchaikovsky's Italien capriccio performed by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras under the direction of Gunther Schuller.

This year's concert promises to be more varied and exciting than ever before, so be sure to come to the 1973 Tanglewood-on-Parade. Prices range from $6 to $3 and tickets are available at the Tanglewood Box Office.

Tanglewood on Parade to be Aug. 14

The annual Tanglewood - on - Parade gala concert presented by the Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center orchestras will be held Tuesday, Aug. 14, at 8:30 in the Shed. The grounds open at 2 and mini-concerts will be given throughout the afternoon, beginning at 2:30 by members of the Berkshire Music Center.

Copland work

The evening concert will open with Aaron Copland's "Lincoln Portrait," conducted by BMC artistic director Gunther Schuller. It will be played by the Boston Symphony and narrated by Granrud artist - in - residence

PRESS (E)
BRISTOL, CONN.
D. 18,000

AUG 1 1973

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Special Scheduled Aug. 14

LENOX — On Tuesday, Aug. 14 at 8:30 p.m. the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras present the annual Tanglewood - on - Parade gala concert.

The grounds open at 2.00 in the afternoon and, beginning at 2.30, mini-concerts will be presented throughout the afternoon by members of the Berkshire Music Center. The annual Tanglewood - on - Parade celebration is an opportunity for listeners to understand better just what goes on during the eight weeks of the Berkshire Music Center, this country's oldest summer music school for advanced students and preprofessionals.

The concerts at 8.30 p.m. in the Shed at Tanglewood this year will present a mixed bag of material

The concert opens with Aaron Copland's "Lincoln Portrait," conducted by Artistic Director Gunther Schuller, played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and narrated by Granrud Artist-in-Residence Andre Watts.

The Liszt Piano Concerto No. 1 in E flat follows, with Seiji Ozawa Artistic Director of the Berkshire Festival and Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducting that orchestra with Andre Watts as soloist.

Then the concert takes a turn — Gunther Schuller conducts members of the Berkshire Music Center In works by Scott Joplin, Jelly Roll Morton and Duke Ellington.

The Berkshire Music Center Orchestra under the direction of Seiji Ozawa follows with Strauss' "Also sprach Zarathustra" and the concert closes with Tchaikovsky's "Italien capriccio" performed by the combined Boston Symphony Orchestra and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras under the direction of Gunther Schuller.

HERALD-AMERICAN (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 424,654

AUG 3 1973

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood-on-Parade Gala Concert will take place Tuesday evening, August 14, 8:30 o'clock in the Shed at Tanglewood. This year it is presenting a mixed bag of material by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras.

Grounds open at 2:30. Mini-concerts will be presented throughout the afternoon by members of the Berkshire Music Center.

Tanglewood-on-Parade Coming Up Soon

Eight hours of continuous music will be performed Tuesday, Aug. 14, at the Berkshire Music Center's annual gala called Tanglewood-on-Parade.

Several programs will be in progress simultaneously or dovetailed between 2:30 p.m. and about 7:30.

These are demonstrations of the quality work being accomplished by advanced students and preprofessionals enrolled at the Center.

Repertory is instrumental and vocal music, standard and contemporary. In the past, these programs have been given by talented musicians who soon achieved national and international fame.

One such program consists of original works by young composers who are studying at the Center under fellowships.

It's impossible to hear all of [illegible] complete program [illegible]s and times. Au[illegible]se proxim[illegible]e to hear programs. [illegible] beehive of [illegible] p.m. con-featuring the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras of 175 players.

Shared Podium

The podium will be shared by Seiji Ozawa, music director of the Boston Symphony, and Gunther Schuller, artistic director of the Center.

Andre Watts will perform the roles of piano soloist and

He will narrate Aaron Copland's "Lincoln Portrait" with Schuller conducting the Boston Symphony. Ozawa will conduct for Watts' performance of Piano Concerto No. 1 in E flat by Liszt.

Ozawa will also conduct the Berkshire Center Orchestra in Richard Strauss' "Also Spake Zarathustra."

The combined orchestras will be conducted by Schuller for Tchaikovsky's "Italian Caprice."

To guarantee the mixed bag, Schuller will conduct members of the Berkshire Center in works by Scott Joplin, Jelly Roll Morton and Duke Ellington.

Prices range from $6 to $3 and tickets are available at the Tanglewood box office.

MUSIC CRITICS ASSOCIATION has instituted its new journalistic experiment by underwriting the cost of exchanging music critics from the North American newspapers for a four-week period.

Carl Cunningham, music critic for the Houston (Tex.) Post, and William Littler of the Toronto (Ont.) Star are swapping jobs under the Music Critics project, with the cooperation of the American Symphony Orchestra League.

Also participating in the cost are the National Endowment for the Arts and the Canada Council.

Expressed purpose in the music critic exchange is "to offer the musical public in participating cities exposure to fresh points of view and to overcome in part the lack of mobility among music critics as compared to critics of the other arts."

WALTER TERRY, currently acting director of the Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival, has been engaged as director for coming seasons on an open-ended arrangement.

He has already began plans

Kappa Psi fraternity and Tau Beta Sigma sorority will continue through Aug. 11. It marks the first time in 40 years that the two groups are meeting on an eastern campus. Delegates from 249 chapters are expected.

Among the highlights will be the organization and performance of a concert by the National Intercollegiate Band. The 120-piece ensemble will play in Jorgensen Auditorium in a free concert Thrusday, Aug. 9 at 8:15 p.m.

WEATHER PERMITTING, De Cordova Museum at Lincoln, Mass., will present Rocky Birigwa and the "Boka Dey" in drumming, dancing and folk music today at 3:30 p.m. in the Museum's 800-seat [illegible]door amphitheater.

[illegible]ucceeding Sunday pro[illegible]ams, all at 3:30 p.m., are [illegible]mbridge Brass Quintet, [illegible]g. 12; folk-singer Michael [illegible]oney, Aug. 19; Apple Hill [illegible]amber Players, Aug. 26; [illegible]d Canterbury Country [illegible]ance Orchestra, Sept. 2.

RAYMOND MORIN

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
S. 169,036

AUG 5 1973

New England Newsclip

MILLERTON, N. Y.
NEWS
W. 1,500

AUG 9 1973

Tanglewood-On-Parade Program Announced

[illegible]n Tuesday, August 14 at [illegible] p.m., the combined [illegible]ston Symphony and [illegible]rkshire Music Center [illegible]hestras present the an[illegible]l Tanglewood - on - [illegible]ade Gala concert.

[illegible]he Lenox grounds open at [illegible]m. and, beginning at 2:30, [illegible]ni-concerts will be [illegible]sented throughout the [illegible]rnoon by members of the [illegible]kshire Music Ce[illegible]

[illegible]he annual Tanglewood - [illegible] Parade celebration is a [illegible] opportunity for listeners [illegible] understand better just [illegible]t goes on during the eight [illegible]ks of the Berkshire Music [illegible]er, this country's oldest [illegible]mer music school for [illegible]anced students and [illegible]rofessionals.

[illegible]e gala concerts, at 8:30 [illegible] in the Shed at [illegible]glewood, this year [illegible]nts a mixed bag of [illegible]rial. The concert opens with Aaron Copland's Lincoln Portrait, conducted by Artistic Director Gunther Schuller, played by the Boston Symphony and narrated by Granrud Artist - in - Residence Andre Watts.

The Liszt Piano concerto No. 1 in E flat follows, with Seiji Ozawa, artistic director of the Berkshire Festival and Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducting that Orchestra with Andrew Watts as soloist.

Then the concert takes a new turn — Schuller conducts members of the Berkshire Music Center in works by Scott Joplin, Jelly Roll Morton and Duke Ellington.

The Berkshire Music center Orchestra under the direction of Ozawa follows with Strauss' Also sprach Zarathustra and the concert closes with Tchaikovsky's Italien capriccio performed by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras under the direction of Schuller.

This year's concert promises to be more varied and exciting than ever before, so be sure to come to the 1973 Tanglewood - on - Parade. Tickets are available at the Tanglewood Box Office.

NEWS (E)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 90,568

JUL 27 1973

New England Newsclip

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE (E)
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.

AUG 11 1973

. . . Tuesday's feature: Tanglewood-On-Parade

LENOX--On Tuesday at 8:30 p.m., the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras present the annual Tanglewood-on-Parade Gala concert. The grounds open at 2 in the afternoon and, beginning at 2:30, mini-concerts will be presented throughout the afternoon by members of the Berkshire Music Center. The annual Tanglewood-on-Parade celebration is designed to be an opportunity for listeners to understand better just what goes on during the eight weeks of the Berkshire Music Center, this country's oldest summer music school for advanced students and preprofessionals.

The GALA concerts, at 8:30 p.m. in the shed at Tanglewood, this year presents a mixed bag of material. The concert opens with Aaron Copland's Lincoln Portrait, conducted by Artistic Director Gunther Schuller, played by the Boston Symphony and narrated by Granrud Artist in-Residence Andre Watts.

The Liszt Piano concerto no. 1 in E flat follows, with Seiji Ozawa Artistic Director of the Berkshire Festival and Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducting that Orchestra with Andre Watts as soloist.

Then the concert takes a new turn -- Gunther Schuller conducts members of the Berkshire Music Center in works by Scott Joplin, Jelly Roll Morton and Duke Ellington. The Berkshire Music Center Orchestra under the direction of Seiji Ozawa follows with Strauss' Also sprach Zarathustra and the concert closes with Tchaikovsky's Italien capriccio performed by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras under the direction of Gunther Schuller.

Tickets are available at the Tanglewood Box Office.

Tanglewood

Tanglewood-On -Parade Set For Aug. 14

The combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras present the annual Tanglewood-on-Parde Gala concert Tuesday, Aug. 14 at 8:30 p.m.

The grounds open at 2 p.m. in the afternoon and, beginning at 2:30, mini-concerts will be presented throughout the afternoon by members of the Berkshire Music Center. The annual Tanglewood-on-Parade celebration is a fine opportunity for listeners to understand better just what goes on during the eight weeks of the Berkshire Music Center, this country's oldest summer music school for advanced students and preprofessionals.

The Gala concerts, at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed at Tanglewood, this year presents a mixed bag of material. The concert opens with Aaron Copland's "Lincoln Portrait," conducted by Artistic Director Gunther Schuller, played by the Boston Symphony and narrated by Granrud Artist-in-Residence Andre Watts.

The Liszt Piano concerto no. 1 in E flat follows, with Seiji Ozawa, Artistic Director of the Berkshire Festival and Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducting that Orchestra with Andre Watts as soloist.

Then the concert takes a new turn: Gunther Schuller conducts members of the Berkshire Music Center in works by Scott Joplin, Jelly Roll Morton and Duke Ellington.

The Berkshire Music Center Orchestra under the direction of Seiji Ozawa follows with Strauss's "Also sprach Zarathustra" and the concert closes with Tchaikovsky's Italien capriccio, performed by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras under the direction of Gunther Schuller.

Gala Concert Slated At Tanglewood

On Tuesday, August 14 at 8:30 p.m., the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras present the annual Tanglewood-on-Parade Gala concert. The grounds open at 2:00 in the afternoon and, beginning at 2:30, mini-concerts will be presented throughout the afternoon by members of the Berkshire Music Center. The annual Tanglewood-on-Parade celebration is a fine opportunity for listeners to understand better just what goes on during the eight weeks of the Berkshire Music Center, this country's oldest summer music school for advanced students and preprofessionals.

The GALA concerts, at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed at Tanglewood, this year presents a mixed bag of material. The concert opens with Aaron Copland's Lincoln Portrait, conducted by Artistic Director Gunther Schuller, played by the Boston Symphony and narrated by Granrud Artist-in-Residence Andre Watts. The Liszt Piano Concerto no.1 in E flat follows, with Seiji Ozawa, Artistic Director of the Berkshire Festival and Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducting that Orchestra with Andre Watts as soloist. Then the concert takes a new turn—Gunther Schuller conducts members of the Berkshire Music Center in works by Scott Joplin, Jelly Roll Morton and Duke Ellington. The Berkshire Music Center Orchestra under the direction of Seiji Ozawa follows with Strauss' Also sprach Zarathustra and the concert closes with Tchaikovsky's Italien capriccio performed by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras under the direction of Gunther Schuller.

This year's concert promises to be more varied and exciting than ever before, so be sure to come to the 1973 Tanglewood-on-Parade.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 187,897

AUG 13 1973

New England Newscl

All-day musicfest

Tanglewood-on-Parade, annual all-day gala at Lenox, Mass., takes place tomorrow, Aug. 14. Grounds open at 2 p.m. and from 2:30, mini-concerts will be presented all afternoon by members of the Berkshire Music Center. At 8:30 p.m., both the Boston Symphony and the BMC orchestra will paly, with Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller conducting, and pianist Andre Watts as soloist in the Liszt Concerto No. 1, and as narrator in Copland's "Lincoln Portrait."

'Midsummer Night' Gala

At 'House Across the Way'

Concert Review

Nearly 7,000 Enjoy Highlights Of Tanglewood-On-Parade

BY MARTHA deB. BEAVER

Threatening rain and cloudy skies didn't dampen 6992 enthusiasts of all ages who took advantage of the greatest bargain in almost continuous music-making presented Tuesday afternoon and evening during the annual Tanglewood-on-Parade in Lenox.

The event, as the name implies, is a parade of informal concerts given by advanced music students and professionals, the culmination of their studies at the Berkshire Music Center, the country's oldest summer music school of this kind.

Formerly, many of the programs were presented simultaneously in the various structures but in the past few years scheduling has been continuous and contained, allowing ticket and grounds admission holders to hear every concert if so desired. The duration of the programs do overlap occasionally, but there is no obligation to remain throughout. You can be as selective as you wish.

It is a simple and inexpensive way to introduce your children to a variety of music, played and sung in the most beautiful surroundings they will ever experience.

This was obvious in the number of youngsters and toddlers who romped (quietly), napped, wakened to nibble and drink. With music accompanying their every move, they stopped occasionally in rapt attention to sounds that appealed for the moment. Older youths listened seriously, we observed, to each program, afterwards discussing music and performers.

We arrived in time to hear some of the vocal concert given in the Chamber Music Hall at 4:30. Strauss' "Gesange des Orients" was allowed as much dramatic impact as possible by Soprano Mary Lee Cirella and her excellent accompanist Dennis Helmrich. Miss Cirella's studious voice varied in quality and her facial expression distracted from the music, but placement was always secure.

On the other hand, mezzo-soprano, Susan Palmatier, well-poised and minus facial expression with Philip Morehead, faculty member, as accompanist, made Schumann's were passed among the picnickers, other listeners foreboding "Maria Stuart Lieder" splendidly evocative, although some of her head tones were unpleasantly, but not too obviously, nasal.

Oddly appealing in musical content, simple and yet sophisticated, was Messaien's "La Mort du Nombre", a dialogue between souls, soprano Nancy Dickison, whose high notes both repelled and thrilled, and Michael Philip Davis, whose dramatic tenor voice showed warmth and richness, was outlined in its vivid emotional contrasts by expert violinist Ralph Matson and pianist Dennis Helmrich.

At 5:30 in the Theatre-Concert Hall, the Young Artists Orchestra of the Boston University Tanglewood Institute, (in early and late teens) gave very impressive performances of Brahms' Academic Festival Overture, most of Kodaly's Suite from "Harry Janos", the Viennese Musical Clock Song (with fine viola solo and brass work), and "Entrance of the Emperor and His Court" very well-coordinated; and Piston's Suite from the ballet "The Incredible Flutist."

Conductor Walter Eisenberg showed excellent perception and understanding of the music and his musicians' capabilities keeping them in tight rein, continually demanding the utmost in dynamics, exacting technique and tempo.

The orchestra personnel, it was noted, is not listed according to rank. The string section alternates positions at each concert, while woodwinds, brass and percussion players alternate chairs for each composition, thus affording the young people wider repertorial experience.

Because we love a good fanfare and had missed the 2:20 opening burst near the gate, we left the orchestra during the Piston, and selected a picnic spot near the main house porch, where horns, trumpets trombones and percussion had gathered to delight a small group with Tomasi's Fanfares Liturgiques. It was magnificently played by members of the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, conducted by The Boston Symphony Orchestra's (BSO) first trumpet Armand Ghitalla.

As glasses clinked and plates strolled onto the porch grounds, to the inviting strains of Mozart's delightful "Serenade No. 12 in C minor." The ensuing Stravinsky "Octet for Wind Instruments" was sensitively and vigorously conducted by Louis Speyer, also included BMC Orchestra members.

At 8:20 Copland's bright and brassy "Fanfare for the Common Man," directed by Roger Voisin, BSO Trumpeter, called the listeners to the Gala Concert in the Shed.

The always moving "Lincoln Portrait" of Aaron Copland opened the program by the BSO, conducted with telling empathy by Gunther Schuller, and narrated with simplicity and increasingly evocative effect by Andre Watts, pianist and artist in residence at Tanglewood this summer.

Seiji Ozawa then took the stand for Liszt's "First Piano Concerto in E flat," for a magnificently coordinated performance with Andre Watts at the piano. But what a difference from the last time we heard him this summer! It was as we remember his beautiful playing of the Beethoven several summers ago.

Strength and gentleness permeated his interpretation, from the commanding opening exposition and lyricism of the Quasi Adagio to skittish Scherzo and the martial finale.

Schuller returned to the podium, appropriately clad for two extreme departures from the previous works, and directing with a loose, easy manner the pure and simple piano rags of Scott Joplin explaining their evolution before each.

A friend of Joplin's, he noted, orchestrated the piano rags, using "this quaint collection of 12 classical instruments". They included Maple Leaf Rag, Ragtime Dance, and The Entertainer, "one of his happiest." Jelly Roll Morton's jazz number "Granpa's Spells", with audience clapping some of the rhythms, completed the light and lively offerings.

With great professional aplomb, the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, responded to Ozawa's directions, which seemed to concentrate on the first and second violins, brass and percussion, for Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra", a superb vehicle for the young people's impassioned playing, albeit a bit overstated.

Again more formally attired, Schuller then led the combined BSO and BMC orchestra in a spirited and amazingly coordinated reading of Tschaikowsky's "Capriccio Italien".

From the enthusiastic applause and cries of "Bravo" there was no doubt that the audience thoroughly enjoyed this summer's "Tanglewood-on-Parade." It's a happy tradition to be built and recalled with great pleasure by the entire family.

DAILY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
D. 2,129,901 SUN. 2,940,786
AUG 16 1973

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE (D)
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
AUG 17 1973
New England Newspr

TELEGRAM — (M)
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 60,219
AUG 18 1973
New England

A Tangled-Up Tanglewood

By RON EYER

Lenox, Mass. (Special) Aug. 15—The Boston Symphony and the Berkshire Music Center put their best feet forward, and tripped over a couple of them, at the annual marathon "Tanglewood on Parade" here yesterday.

It began with fanfares by three brass choirs early in the warm and humid afternoon on the lawn of the sylvan Tanglewood festival grounds, continued with four mini recitals and concerts at various times and locations involving 45 different student soloists and ensemble players at the center and ended with a gala concert by the Boston Symphony in the main music shed at night.

The best part of the showcase, by all odds, was the wide variety of performances by the young people. The offerings ranged through all species of chamber music—string quartets, quintets in various combinations and music for brass and percussion—to a recital by six young singers and a short concert by the 90-member Young Artists Orchestra.

A Mishmass

There were too many participants to singlee out any of them for particular praise, but their general level of accomplishment was awsom. Drawen from the cream of the crop notion-wide, most of these youngsters are on the threshhold of professional carers. Certain immaturities were to be expected, but at the technical level they can pitch and hit with soms of the best of their elders. Future household names undoubtedly exist among these budding artists.

After these exhibitions, the evening concert by the august Bostonians was an anti-climax. Their program, too long by half, was shapeless and ultimately boring. Too many cooks, and too many ingredients, spoiled the broth.

Both Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller were on hand to share the conducting chores. Andre Watts was there not only to play Liszt's First Piano Concerto but to recite the text of Copland's "Lincoln Portrait." Members of the center orchestra came on to play settings of Scott Joplin's "Maple Leaf Rag," "Ragtime Dance" and "The Entertainer" and Jelly Roll Morton's "Grandpa's Spells," directed by Schuller. This was all before intermission.

After intermission the center orchestra took the stage to play Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra," under Ozawa (one of the dullest and seemingly longest pieces in the repertory) and at long last th efull Boston Symphony returned to join the students in Tchaikovsky's "Capriccio Italienno."

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
AUG 15 1973
New England Newspr

'Extravaganza' at Tanglewood

Bos Symphony

Music Review

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — The summer's real news at Tanglewood was made Tuesday by 300 students of the Berkshire Music Center who put on their annual extravaganza called Tanglewood-on-Parade.

For more than eight hours, beginning at 2:20 p.m., nine different concerts were given in five locations. Climax was the evening program featuring the combined Boston Symphoyny and Berkshire Festival Orchestra, totaling 175 players.

An audience of about 200 for the opening brass fanfare at the main gate grew 6,992 for the main event in the evening.

The full day's one standing ovation was for Andre Watts' performance of the Liszt E flat major Piano Concerto with the Boston Symphony conducted by Seiji Ozawa.

It was an overflow of enthusiasm for Watts who had just narrated Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait," with Gunther Schuller conducting the Boston Symphony.

During the first six hours of uninterrupted music, the students presented eight different programs of extraordinary merit.

Twenty-one major works (not including the evening program) introduced many of the instrumental, vocal and orchestral headliners of the near future.

Repertory ranged from a Haydn Quartet for Strings to art songs for baritone by Schoenberg, and Ligeti's Pieces for Woodwind Quintet.

In addition to the main gate, settings were the Theater, Chamber Music Hall, Music Shed and main house porch. Some programs overlapped, but enough could be heard to reassure the most pessimistic skeptic that music of the future is looking up.

Perhaps the most thrilling single performance was the 100-piece Berkshire Center Orchestra's playing of Strauss' taxing symphonic poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," conducted by Ozawa.

Unfortunately, the audience mistook a pause in the music for the end and started applauding. Ozawa held a dramatic pose until it subsided. It was slightly downhill thereafter.

Up to then, the students gave a marvelous display of sweeping phrases, impeccable note-playing, and brasses that cut through with brilliance rather than blare.

The important thing is that Ozawa made the same demands of his young players that he would have exacted from the Boston Symphony, and they did not let him down.

Combined with the Boston Symphony, the Center Orchestra was virtually an equal in discipline. Tchaikovsky's "Italian Caprice" has probably never had such a heyday of vibrancy and volume, although Schuller is no Ozawa on podium.

Schuller was more in his element conducting a dozen members of the Center in a potpourri of ragtimes by Scott Joplin and a jazz hybrid by Jelly Roll Morton.

His classroom commentary, sports jacket and bouncy entrance and exit were in keeping with the vintage musical imagery.

Schuller did give a splendid account of "Lincoln Portrait." The orchestral introduction was mood-setting and free-styled.

Watts narrated the script with a modulated, clear-spoken voice.

Music review

Tanglewood-on-Parade

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

TANGLEWOOD-ON-PARADE has become a traditional event at which, on one day toward the end of each summer season, the Berkshire Music Center submits an exhibit of its concentrated accomplishments and activities. It starts in the early afternoon and culminates in a gala concert in the Shed in the evening in which the Center orchestra is joined by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

* * *

Last night the two orchestras alternated on a continuously exhilarating program and, at the end of the evening, joined in rousing performance of Tchaikovsky's "Italian capriccio." A crowd of 6,992 attended the day-long program.

Gunther Schuller, director of the Center, and Seiji Ozawa, musical director of the Boston Symphony, shared the podium's responsibilities. No concessions needed to be made to the youthful aggregation. One might have thought that caution and prudence might have influenced the choice of repertory, but the opus in which they were solely engaged was no less a charge than the Strauss "Also sprach Zarathustra," and they came through like veterans.

Tanglewood's various theatres and halls haven't known such a wealth of talent and excitement for a very long time. The evening opened with a solemnly impressive narration of Copland's "Lincoln Portrait" by Andre Watts, with Schuller conducting the Boston Symphony. Watts, in turn, proceeded to the piano to resume his much more familiar role as soloist in the Liszt Concerto No. 1 in E Flat. His performance, with Ozawa conducting this time, was brilliant and, where proper, deeply poignant.

* * *

The stage was then vacated, and a dozen members of the Center orchestra came on for a delightfully infectious rendition of too few, short and wonderful old-time ragtime pieces. Schuller, an authority in this part of the evolution of America's music, at this point had divested himself of the formal white tuxedo and black trousers he had worn for the more sedate part of his evening's assignments, and reappeared in a pink jacket and maroon trousers, colors totally in keeping with the music then played:

Scott Joplin's 74-year-old "Maple Leaf Rag," "Ragtime Dance" and "The Entertainer," followed by Jelly Roll Morton's "Grandpa's Spells," which showed the development of ragtime into what became known as jazz by about 1923, were spine-tingling and guaranteed euphoric.

The catholocity of the program was significant, for it dispelled an attitude which may have prevailed in some quarters: that ragtime or jazz are consigned to some indefinite low-brow level by self-appointed elite of serious (?) music. No part of the evening surpassed the enjoyment afforded by the expert performance of a style of music which sprang from America's soil.

* * *

The afternoon had offered a bewildering gallery of every type of music, vocal and instrumental, solo, chamber music, ensemble and choral of an all-inclusive nature. The caliber of the talent represented on the Berkshire Music Center roster, this year the largest ever registered, is both astounding and confidence-inspiring. There are Cassandras in every area and not least in music, but anyone who attended the day's program of Tanglewood-on-Parade must have come away reassured, and at the same time both invigorated and exhausted.

Heinz Schlangs of Munich, Germany, with daughter and son-in-law Kenneth Gerlachs of Pittsfield.

Pictures by Paul Rocheleau

Jonathan Garside and Peter Mali brought sleeping bags.

Tanglewood on Parade gala draws close to 7,000 people

Close to 7,000 persons swarmed Tanglewood yesterday, starting at 2 p.m. They were there for the annual Tanglewood on Parade gala concert at 8:30 p.m. and the picnics and people-watching that preceded it.

The event benefits the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer school, in its 31st year. Proceeds were not announced but as much as $22,000 has been realized in past years.

The attendance of 6,992 was down about 800 from 1972. This year only reserved seats were sold inside the Shed. In the past, some seats in the rear section were available on a first-come, first-served basis.

Rain holds off

Overcast skies and the threat of rain may have affected the box office. Ominous thunder, however, brought only a few sprinkles just before concert time, and those who toted umbrellas had little need for them.

Festivities began with fanfare in front of the Shed at 2:30. Mini-concerts continued throughout the afternoon on the lawn, in the theatre and the chamber music hall and on the porch of the main house. They were performed by Berkshire Music Center students, who number almost 400.

Picnickers were everywhere. Large groups and small blanketed the area, literally as well as figuratively. People brought chairs, hampers, coolers and coats they never got a chance to wear.

Sleeping bags

Two children summering in Norwich, Conn., Jonathan Garside, 8, of Washington, D.C., and his cousin, Pater Mali, 5, of New York, brought sleeping bags that were great for play, too.

Children were in a minority, although several camp groups were there. Blue-jeaned girls from nearby Camp Wahconah on their "senior trip" for those 14 to 16 were sprawled on a steel cube sculpture outside the main house.

Another large circle of children were members of the days and arts program sponsored by Tanglewood to expose children to the arts in the Berkshires. More than 30 children come each week from Boston and are housed at Windsor Mountain School.

The Gauger twins

BSO percussionist Thomas Gauger brought his wife and five children. The Gaugers, who live in Brookline, have two sets of twins, Steven and Linda, 12, and Susanne and Karen, 9, as well as Diana, 14.

The crowd, for the most part, was decked out in attractive spectator sports clothes. Women had summer dresses or neat pantsuits, not dressy but nice. Most of the men were conservative, although a few with white pants and checked jackets were spotted.

Picnic fare ranged from packaged sandwiches from the Tanglewood cafeteria to elegant repasts. Candlelight and wine was much in evidence, and a good many showed up with champagne. The beer drinkers seem to have stayed at home.

Shirers and Swings

The Kelley family from Cheshire, Conn., had a buffet cloth set with silver, stemmed cocktail glasses and silver candlesticks and laden with shrimp, a fruit basket and a variety of delicacies.

On the lawn overlooking the lake were Mr. and Mrs. William L. Shirer of Lenox. With them were Mr. and Mrs. Peter Gram Swing and sons, Timothy and Bradford, of Swarthmore, Pa. Mr. Swing is a music professor at Swarthmore College and is giving seminars on listening and analysis this summer at Tanglewood. His father, Raymond Gram Swing, and Mr. Shirer were colleagues at one time.

Well-patronized was the Tanglewood Tent with its attractive yellow and white striped awning, yellow tablecloths, hanging flower baskets and well-stocked long mahogany bar.

Not all of those attending were picnicking. Some were strolling the grounds, browsing in the record shop or chatting with friends. Others played cards or chess or took a brief pre-concert nap.

At Tanglewood for the first time were Mr. and Mrs. Heinz Schlang of Munich, Germany. The Schlangs were with their son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Kenneth W. Gerlach of 36 Kensington Ave., with whom they are spending a month.

Missed this year is Percy Potier, a gate attendant on the staff for some 20 years. He retired from First Agricultural National Bank recently. He and Mrs. Potier moved last month from 46 Lowden St. to Largo, Fla.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,000
AUG 18 1973 New England Newsclip

Pittsfield group picnicked in front of main shed. Its members are Mr. and Mrs. Donald B. Kuntz, Dr. and Mrs. Robert S. Keller, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Jenks, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Sessions, Mr. and Mrs. Prentice Bradley and Mrs. Anthony J. Gizzi.

Whitestone

Music Center benefit nets $2,000

Lee Elman and sister, Nina Korda, a former singer, at the Berkshire Music Center fourth annual benefit dinner-dance Saturday. The event, sponsored by the Council of Tanglewood Friends, raised close to $2,000, according to chairman, Mrs. Richard A. Marcure. Attendance was 140. Music for dancing was by Paul Maynard of Hartford, Conn.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,000
JUL 5 1973 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
AUG 18 1973 New England Newsclip

Composers Forum changed to Monday

The Composers Forum with work by Berkshire Music Center students, originally scheduled for tonight, has been changed to next Monday at 8:30 in the Tanglewood Theatre-Concert Hall. Chamber music by Mendelssohn, Poulenc and Brahms also will be performed.

On Saturday at 4:30, BMC students will give a vocal music recital in the Theatre-Concert Hall.

Both programs are open to the Friends of Music at Tanglewood and to the public at a small charge.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
W. 4,405
JUN 21 1973 New England Newsclip

MUSIC CENTER DANCE

Mrs. Richard W. Marcure of Pittsfield and Mrs. James A. Kapteyn of Great Barrington are Co-chairmen of the fourth annual dinner dance to benefit the Berkshire Music Center, it was announced this week by the Tanglewood Friends.

The dance will be in the shed on the Tanglewood grounds on Saturday, June 30 at 7 p.m.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
W. 4,405
JUN 21 1973 New England Newsclip

Fringe Benefits For Tanglewood Friends Group

Past, present and future Friends of Tanglewood will meet at Mrs. Duncan S. Ellsworth's house on Main Street, Salisbury at 4 p.m. on Sunday. Talcott Banks, a trustee of the Boston Symphony, and several other guests will talk about this summer's program. Membership forms will be available for those attending.

Being a Friend of Tanglewood entitles a member to certain fringe benefits. A $15 individual membership offers 30 free midweek concerts of the Berkshire Music Center, performed by professionals and pre-professionals. A $25 family membership would entitle an entire family to attend the midweek concerts. Families with young children often find this an enjoyable way to combine a picnic lunch with a concert in an attractive setting.

TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM (E)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
D. 30,000
JUL 26 1973 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood's West Barn Slate Listed

The director of the Music Theatre Project at Tanglewood, Ian Strasfogel, has announced the schedule of work to be performed this season in the West Barn.

The performances will be held at 8:30 p.m. Aug. 2, 5, and 6 and reservations are necessary.

They include Mozart's "Wolfgangerl" Bo Lawergren's "Triptych" and the American premiere of Bruno Maderna's "Satyricon."

The Mozart portrait will be performed with "Triptych" on Aug. 2; "Triptych" and "Satyricon" together on Aug. 5 and "Wolfgangerl" and "Satyricon" together on Aug. 6.

(Noon) Dow-Jones (Shearson, Hammill & Co.)

30 Industrials	854.08	—3.76
20 Transp.	152.00	— .86
15 Utilities	95.00	— .03
Sales 5,100,000

The Berkshire Eagle

7 a.m. to 7 a.m.

High	78
Low	54
Range year ago	81-52
Precipitation	0

Second Section — Pittsfield, Massachusetts, Wednesday, Aug. 22, 1973 — Pag

Whitestone

POPS conductor waits for late arrivals to be seated before resuming last night's concert at Tanglewood. Turnout was 14,040 people, compared to 13,325 last year. The record is 17,862 set in 1967.

Mark Mitchell

ANTIQUE MORTAR was one of several pieces of artillery from Eastover resort fired during Boston Pops performance of "1812 Overture" at Tanglewood last night. George Bisacca, proprietor of Eastover, ducks as he pulls lanyard. Story on Page 14.

Music review

Fiedler pops 14,040 out of their seats

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

SOME 14,040 people were transported to an advanced state of euphoria at Tanglewood last night, when Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra played a wisely chosen program. We know what music is supposed to do to the savage beast; what it can do to 14,000 people who gave every indication of being intelligent human beings is a revelation one can only experience at "the Pops with Fiedler."

* * *

Fiedler poses no problems. His audiences sit in complete relaxation and realize all the beneficial effects of hypnotism, psychiatry, transcendental meditation, acupuncture and possibly a few other agencies which improve the human state. He has an uncanny sense of the public pulse and supplies what is the required relevancy, doing it, of course, with infectious competency.

His program began with Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance," proceeded to Offenbach's overture to "Orpheus in Hades," in which Pops concertmaster Jerome Rubin played the volin solo with high-wrought brilliance, then to Debussy's "Clair de Lune," and ended the first half with Tchaikovsky's "Overture Solonnelle, 1812."

Whitestone

Arthur Fiedler

This is no program catering to the masses but as high-brow as one need seek. Of course, the cannon and fireworks used in "1812" are a sort of lagniappe, but I wouldn't dispense with them for all the trading stamps in the world. You gotta hear it and feel it to know what ebullient release can do for you.

There is sometimes a diaphanous curtain between Pops programs and the music played at regular symphony concerts, separating the literature of music into a sort of caste system, but the jazz that Gunther Schuller played last week at Tanglewood - on - Parade and the "Twelfth Street Rag" of Bowman that Fiedler played last night need ask for no favor nor pardon from anyone. It does something to the anatomy that takes years off a person's disposition and loads off his mind, sends blood through his veins with any or all obstructions removed and makes life worth living.

* * *

The forest at a Fiedler concert sometimes can hide the trees, but very little examination will show how expertly the performances are executed. It may be superfluous to mention how well things are done when one is concerned only with the benefits of the evening, but the graphic conveyance of all the happy moods and flamboyant drama doesn't just happen.

* * *

Gershwin belongs on a Pops program like a kiss with a squeeze, and Leo Litwin played the piano solo in the "Rhapsody in Blue" with all the communicable joy the score allows. The validity of the music of the selection from MacDermot's "Hair" is not convincing to these ears, but the encores which are assured at Fiedler's concerts included "Everything Beautiful," "Play Me" and the inevitable "Stars and Stripes Forever," with three piccolos standing and then the entire brass section alert and off their derrieres to blast more power into their embouchures than is needed to get a rocket off to the moon. Life is incomplete for anyone who has never heard it.

W

W
Sha

UNION (M)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 54,500
AUG 16 1973 New England Newsclip

Fiedler, Pops Orchestra At Tanglewood Aug. 21

LENOX — On Tuesday evening, Aug. 21 at 8.30 p.m., Arthur Fiedler returns to Tanglewood with the Boston Pops Orchestra for its annual appearance to benefit the pension fund.

Fiedler and the "Pops" bring an international reputation with them to Tanglewood, having become one of the favorite orchestras in most of the world.

Fiedler performs a traditional Pops concert at Tanglewood on Aug. 21. The concert opens with Elgar's Pomp and Circumstance, followed by the Offenbach Overture to "Orpheus in Hades." Debussy's Clair de lune follows, and then the Pops performs the 1812 Overture by Tchaikovsky, of course, with cannons on the lawn.

After intermission Leo Litwin performs Gershwin's Rhapsody in Blue for Piano and Orchestra and then Fiedler and the orchestra move on to selections from "Hair." The concert closes with the Twelfth Street Rag. Closes officially, that is. When it's Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops you can never tell about encores.

PHOENIX-TIMES
BRISTOL, R. I.
W. 4,356
1973 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood: Boston Pops

B Sym.

Tanglewood is an estate of 210 acres in the Berkshire Hills, Mass that was given to the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the 1930s and is now world famous as the summer home of the Boston Symphony and its Berkshire Festival. This year Seiji Ozawa is artistic director and Leonard Bernstein is advisor. From the East Bay area, Tanglewood can be reached by car by taking the Mass turnpike west and taking exits one or two to Lenox.

Concerts are given on weekends and will be given at 9 pm each Friday preceded by short informal recitals at 7 pm. Saturday mornings at 10:30 open rehearsals benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund. These informal views of the symphony are performed in the Shed. At 8:30 the evening's performance is given. Sunday afternoon concerts are presented at 2:30 and include special appearances by Seiji Ozawa and Colin Davis. The concerts will be given through Sun, Aug 26.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
JUL 28 1973 New England Newsclip

Pops tickets available for elderly

LEE — Tickets for the Aug. 21 Boston Pops concert at Tanglewood are available for elderly persons at the Council on Aging's office in the Town Hall.

Helen Mougin, executive director, said she expects the council's tickets to be sold out, but more might be obtained if enough response is generated.

She said a trip for elderly persons two weeks ago to see "My Fair Lady" at the Eastern States Exposition fairgrounds, West Springfield, was also a sellout, with 41 persons buying tickets.

Mrs. Mougin said she is attempting to make the Boston Pops concert a "grandparent-grandchild" event and is encouraging the elderly to purchase tickets for their grandchildren as well as for themselves. The price per ticket is $5.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
S. 130,000
JUL 22 1973 New England Newsclip

Music Center's Police Join To Prevent Traffic Chaos

LENOX — What perhaps is the largest influx of tourists and music lovers in this town of 6000 residents has caused some major traffic tieups — and some tardy concertgoers.

But because of several measures implemented by Tanglewood, the Music Inn and town officials in Lenox and Stockbridge, the problems were considerably less than they might have been.

The large number of visitors was generated by the traditionally popular all-Beethoven weekend of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood and the Saturday evening Mahavishnu Orchestra performance at the Music Inn.

After a Van Morrison concert at the Music Inn combined with Tanglewood to cause an impossible traffic mess last weekend with cars parked in and along Hawthorne Street virtually blocking all through traffic, officials of the two ventures got together with the town to avoid a repeat.

50 Deputy Sheriffs

The result was a force of some 50 deputy sheriffs, all radio-equipped and some riding motorcycles, assigned to funnel traffic to its destination with a minimum of delay. Along with some rerouting of concertgoers around the town's center, the plan apparently worked pretty well.

At 6 p.m., the same time the Music Inn concert was beginning, traffic on Walker Street was backed up more than a mile from downtown to Routes 7 and 20. But it was moving steadily though slowly. That situation was not uncommon.

David Rothstein, Music Inn manager, said that well over 4000 patrons showed up for the Mahavashnu concert Saturday night, most of them on time. Reports earlier in the week that the Inn's Twilight Series on the Lawn were to be limited to 4000 patrons as a result of the Van Morrison debacle were untrue, Rothstein said.

Local newspaper and radio outlets had reported the limit was imposed by Stockbridge Selectmen at a meeting last Monday night. But Rothstein said Saturday no limit was set. Instead, he said, the emphasis was on better traffic control.

And that better traffic coordination proved itself Saturday night, he said. The Music Inn concert ended promptly at 8.30, exactly the time the Tanglewood concert was to begin.

Rothstein said there were provisions to hold his audience a short time after the 8.30 time to avoid interference with the last-minute Tanglewood crowd.

A two-car accident shortly after 4 p.m. on Routes 7 & 20 near the Rolling Hills condominium north of the town's Center also delayed motorists on the county's main north-south route. Several persons were treated and released at the Berkshire Meeical Center in Pittsfield. Another mishap was apparently triggered by the stalled traffic from the first crash, further complicating the jam.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
JUN 28 1973 New England Newsclip

Lenox zoning board approves 700-car parking lot for BSO

LENOX — The Zoning Board of Appeals last night approved a request from the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) for permission to increase its parking facilities at Tanglewood.

The unanimous four-vote decision for the placement of a 700-car lot on 10 acres on the north side of West Street between O'Brian Florists, Inc., and Under Mountain Road came two weeks after the petition was filed. Though there is no specific rule forbidding additional parking facilities in the area, the BSO sought clear-cut authorization for its plans.

According to the approved petition, the parking lot must have 20 feet of frontage with at least 10 feet of plantings on the frontage. Plantings and fencing must be accorded to abutters on the east and west side if desired.

The board held a hearing to consider a petition from Frankex Realty to allow a branch of the Lenox National Bank to be placed at the shopping center nearing completion on the Pittsfield Road. The original plans for the shopping center were approved almost a year ago.

Several representatives of the bank appeared at last night's hearing to present plans for its first branch.

According to James S. Hatch, cashier, a free-standing, prefabricated building would be placed on the southeast corner of the shopping center. It would be set back 85 feet from the road, according to the plan.

James DeMayo, coproprietor of the William Henry Inn, which abuts the center's southeast corner, asked that the bank be placed more than 100 feet from the road and that drainage facilities in the area be increased.

The board deferred decision on the petition until July 3.

Playground at Lenox Community Center opens Monday for school-age children. Hours will be 9 to 12 and 1 to 3, Monday through Friday.

TIMES (E)
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
D. 11,000
SEP 1 1973 New England Newsclip

Seiji Ozawa conducts the young musicians of the Berkshire Center Orchestra. Photograph by James Holland in his new book "Tanglewood" (Barre, paper, $4.95).

LIBRARY JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SEMI-MONTHLY 46,000
OCT 1 1973

HOLLAND, James R. Tanglewood. photogs. by the author. fwd. by Michael Tilson Thomas. 96p. Barre. 1973. pap. $4.95. ISBN 0-8271-7253-2. LC 72-92470. PHOTOG/MUSIC

The Berkshire Music Festival, better known as Tanglewood (the name of the Massachusetts estate where it takes place), has been in existence for nearly 40 years, offering a relaxed outdoor atmosphere for concerts. Holland captures the atmosphere very effectively in this series of black-and-white photographs, which show the various activities on the lawn and behind the scenes. (He avoids the auditorium in the shed, because it is more like Boston's Symphony Hall.) The brief introduction draws heavily upon sources such as W. A. DeWolfe Howe's The Tale of Tanglewood (Vanguard, 1946). A valuable addition to any good browsing collection.—Kenneth Groeppe, Watertown Public Library, Mass.

NEWS-TRIBUNE (E)
WALTHAM, MASS.
D. 17,000
AUG 11 1973 New England Newsclip

Book brevities: Fact and fiction

TANGLEWOOD, by James R. Holland (Barre, paper, $4.95).

A handsome pictorial on the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, named Tanglewood by Nathaniel Hawthorne, who once lived and worked there. Foreword by Michael Tilson Thomas.

SUE THE B*ST*RDS, The Victim's Handbook, by Douglas Matthews (Arbor House, paper, $2.95).

A guide to the fine (and hopefully rewarding) art of recovering damages for poor goods and services in Small Claims Court by a recent Harvard Law School graduate who is co-author of the highly regarded "Almanac of American Politics." Includes information on the procedural niceties of all fifty states.

I WAS A DRUG ADDICT, by Leroy Street (Arlington House, $7.95).

Reissue of a book published first in 1953 by a man who suffered 15 years of drug addiction in his youth and who tells his story and the agonies of his cure in the hope of helping others. Since his time, he is convinced, the problem has only worsened, not changed.

OPERATION NUKE, by Martin Caidin (Arbor House, $6.95).

The "Bionics Man" of "Cyborg" is back. This time he is opposed to a nuclear weapons ring. Caidin is making TV this fall.

THE THREE OF US, by Joyce Elbert (Arbor House, $7.95).

The author of "The Crazy Ladies" continues her exploration of the doings of sexy females.

HAZARD, by Gerald H. Browne (Arbor House, $7.95).

The author of "11 Harrowhouse" concocts a fresh brew composed of Arab-Israel rivalry in the Middle East, ESP and brain-wave analysis, and a quest for personal revenge. The settings include New York, the Riviera, a London gambling club, and the Great Pyramid at Ghiza! What else would you like?

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
JUN 6 1973 New England Newsclip

Joe Swayze

CLEARED LAND off West Street in Lenox is future site of new automobile parking area for Tanglewood. Though work on 10-acre site has begun, project still requires a special permit from Zoning Board of Appeals. Hearing is set June 12.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
JUN 18 1973 New England Newsclip

Budget tickets offered again at Tanglewood

The Tanglewood box office will again offer two budget ticket plans, the "grass pass" and the "Berkshire buck," which allow admission at reduced rates.

The grass pass costs $24 and is good for admittance to the lawn for all 24 Berkshire Music Festival concerts.

Not for Tuesdays

The passes may not be converted to reserved tickets, nor used for the Tuesday night Contemporary Trends programs, the Berkshire Music Center concerts nor Saturday morning rehearsals.

The Berkshire buck is worth a $1 discount on Friday evening concerts. The coupon will be printed in the Thursday issues of The Berkshire Eagle during the eight-week Tanglewood season.

Only one coupon may be used toward the purchase of a ticket, and they may not be used in conjunction with other coupons. They are not refundable.

The box office opens June 18.

Booklet And Poster Of BSO On Sale

"Know Your Orchestra," a booklet of short biographies and photographs of the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and a colorful Tanglewood poster are both now on sale at the Tanglewood Music Store for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The "Know Your Orchestra" booklet is being sold through the courtesy of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston. In addition to containing biographies and photographs of each member of the Orchestra, the booklet also contains a schematic diagram of the orchestra on-stage showing the seating location of each player.

The Tanglewood poster was designed by Susan Pear Meisel, a leading New York artist. The colorful scene depicts the Lawn at Tanglewood on a Sunday afternoon

MILLERTON, N. Y.
NEWS
W. 1,500
AUG 9 1973

BERKSHIRE COURIER
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
W. 3,750
JUL 26 1973 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Booklet On Sale

LENOX — "Know Your Orchestra," a booklet of short biographies and photographs of the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and a colorful Tanglewood poster are both now on sale at the Tanglewood Music Store for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The "Know Your Orchestra" booklet is being sold through the courtesy of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston. In addition to containing biographies and photographs of each member of the Orchestra, the booklet also contains a schematic diagram of the orchestra on-stage showing the seating location of each player. The book is for sale for $1.00 each.

The Tanglewood poster was designed by Susan Pear Meisel, a leading New York artist. The colorful scene depicts the Lawn at Tanglewood on a Sunday afternoon with the audience listening to the Boston Symphony Orchestra playing in the Shed. The poster, on sale for 4$3 each, comes in a protective tube, and is available at the Tanglewood Music Store, the Red Lion Inn in Stockbridge, and the Tanglewood Friends office.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
JUL 25 1973 New England Newsclip

BSO poster, book selling at Tanglewood

"Know Your Orchestra," a booklet of short biographies and photographs of the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and a Tanglewood poster are on sale at the Tanglewood Music Store. Sales will benefit the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood and the BSO.

The booklet, sold through the Friends of the BSO, also contains a schematic design of the orchestra on stage, showing the seating location of each player.

The poster, designed by Susan Pear Meisel, a New York artist, depicts an audience on the grounds listening to the orchestra playing in the Shed. It is also on sale at the Red Lion Inn, Stockbridge, and the Tanglewood Friends office.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
S. 130,000
JUL 22 1973 New England Newsclip

Music Center's Police Join To Prevent Traffic Chaos

LENOX — What perhaps is the largest influx of tourists and music lovers in this town of 6000 residents has caused some major traffic tieups — and some tardy concertgoers.

But because of several measures implemented by Tanglewood, the Music Inn and town officials in Lenox and Stockbridge, the problems were considerably less than they might have been.

The large number of visitors was generated by the traditionally popular all-Beethoven weekend of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood and the Saturday evening Mahavishnu Orchestra performance at the Music Inn.

After a Van Morrison concert at the Music Inn combined with Tanglewood to cause an impossible traffic mess last weekend with cars parked in and along Hawthorne Street virtually blocking all through traffic, officials of the two ventures got together with the town to avoid a repeat.

50 Deputy Sheriffs

The result was a force of some 50 deputy sheriffs, all radio-equipped and some riding motorcycles, assigned to funnel traffic to its destination with a minimum of delay. Along with some rerouting of concertgoers around the town's center, the plan apparently worked pretty well.

At 6 p.m., the same time the Music Inn concert was beginning, traffic on Walker Street was backed up more than a mile from downtown to Routes 7 and 20. But it was moving steadily though slowly. That situation was not uncommon.

David Rothstein, Music Inn manager, said that well over 4000 patrons showed up for the Mahavashnu concert Saturday night, most of them on time. Reports earlier in the week that the Inn's Twilight Series on the Lawn were to be limited to 4000 patrons as a result of the Van Morrison debacle were untrue, Rothstein said.

Local newspaper and radio outlets had reported the limit was imposed by Stockbridge Selectmen at a meeting last Monday night. But Rothstein said Saturday no limit was set. Instead, he said, the emphasis was on better traffic control.

And that better traffic coordination proved itself Saturday night, he said. The Music Inn concert ended promptly at 8.30, exactly the time the Tanglewood concert was to begin.

Rothstein said there were provisions to hold his audience a short time after the 8.30 time to avoid interference with the last-minute Tanglewood crowd.

A two-car accident shortly after 4 p.m. on Routes 7 & 20 near the Rolling Hills condominium north of the town's Center also delayed motorists on the county's main north-south route. Several persons were treated and released at the Berkshire Meeical Center in Pittsfield. Another mishap was apparently triggered by the stalled traffic from the first crash, further complicating the jam.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
JUN 6 1973 New England Newsclip

Joe Swayze

CLEARED LAND off West Street in Lenox is future site of new automobile parking area for Tanglewood. Though work on 10-acre site has begun, project still requires a special permit from Zoning Board of Appeals. Hearing is set June 12.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
JUN 28 1973 New England Newsclip

Lenox zoning board approves 700-car parking lot for BSO

LENOX — The Zoning Board of Appeals last night approved a request from the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) for permission to increase its parking facilities at Tanglewood.

The unanimous four-vote decision for the placement of a 700-car lot on 10 acres on the north side of West Street between O'Brian Florists, Inc., and Under Mountain Road came two weeks after the petition was filed. Though there is no specific rule forbidding additional parking facilities in the area, the BSO sought clear-cut authorization for its plans.

According to the approved petition, the parking lot must have 20 feet of frontage with at least 10 feet of plantings on the frontage. Plantings and fencing must be accorded to abutters on the east and west side if desired.

The board held a hearing to consider a petition from Frankex Realty to allow a branch of the Lenox National Bank to be placed at the shopping center nearing completion on the Pittsfield Road. The original plans for the shopping center were approved almost a year ago.

Several representatives of the bank appeared at last night's hearing to present plans for its first branch.

According to James S. Hatch, cashier, a free-standing, prefabricated building would be placed on the southeast corner of the shopping center. It would be set back 85 feet from the road, according to the plan.

James DeMayo, coproprietor of the William Henry Inn, which abuts the center's southeast corner, asked that the bank be placed more than 100 feet from the road and that drainage facilities in the area be increased.

The board deferred decision on the petition until July 3.

Playground at Lenox Community Center opens Monday for school-age children. Hours will be 9 to 12 and 1 to 3, Monday through Friday.

AUG 19 1973

Book brevities: Fact and fiction

TANGLEWOOD, by James R. Holland (Barre, paper, $4.95).

A handsome pictorial on the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, named Tanglewood by Nathaniel Hawthorne, who once lived and worked there. Foreword by Michael Tilson Thomas.

SUE THE B*ST*RDS, The Victim's Handbook, by Douglas Matthews (Arbor House, paper, $2.95).

A guide to the fine (and hopefully rewarding) art of recovering damages for poor goods and services in Small Claims Court by a recent Harvard Law School graduate who is co-author of the highly regarded "Almanac of American Politics." Includes information on the procedural niceties of all fifty states.

I WAS A DRUG ADDICT, by Leroy Street (Arlington House, $7.95).

Reissue of a book published first in 1953 by a man who suffered 15 years of drug addiction in his youth and who tells his story and the agonies of his cure in the hope of helping others. Since his time, he is convinced, the problem has only worsened, not changed.

OPERATION NUKE, by Martin Caidin (Arbor House, $6.95).

The "Bionics Man" of "Cyborg" is back. This time he is opposed to a nuclear weapons ring. Caidin is making TV this fall.

THE THREE OF US, by Joyce Elbert (Arbor House, $7.95).

The author of "The Crazy Ladies" continues her exploration of the doings of sexy females.

HAZARD, by Gerald H. Browne (Arbor House, $7.95).

The author of "11 Harrowhouse" concocts a fresh brew composed of Arab-Israel rivalry in the Middle East, ESP and brain-wave analysis, and a quest for personal revenge. The settings include New York, the Riviera, a London gambling club, and the Great Pyramid at Ghiza! What else would you like?

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
JUN 16 1973 New England Newsclip

Budget tickets offered again at Tanglewood

The Tanglewood box office will again offer two budget ticket plans, the "grass pass" and the "Berkshire buck," which allow admission at reduced rates.

The grass pass costs $24 and is good for admittance to the lawn for all 24 Berkshire Music Festival concerts.

Not for Tuesdays

The passes may not be converted to reserved tickets, nor used for the Tuesday night Contemporary Trends programs, the Berkshire Music Center concerts nor Saturday morning rehearsals.

The Berkshire buck is worth a $1 discount on Friday evening concerts. The coupon will be printed in the Thursday issues of The Berkshire Eagle during the eight-week Tanglewood season.

Only one coupon may be used toward the purchase of a ticket, and they may not be used in conjunction with other coupons. They are not refundable.

The box office opens June 18.

TIMES (E)
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
D. 31,000
SEP 1 1973 New England Newsclip

Seiji Ozawa conducts the young musicians of the Berkshire Center Orchestra. Photograph by James Holland in his new book "Tanglewood" (Barre, paper, $4.95).

LIBRARY JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SEMI-MONTHLY 46,000
OCT 1 1973

HOLLAND, James R. Tanglewood. photogs. by the author. fwd. by Michael Tilson Thomas. 96p. Barre. 1973. pap. $4.95. ISBN 0-8271-7253-2. LC 72-92470. PHOTOG/MUSIC

The Berkshire Music Festival, better known as Tanglewood (the name of the Massachusetts estate where it takes place), has been in existence for nearly 40 years, offering a relaxed outdoor atmosphere for concerts. Holland captures the atmosphere very effectively in this series of black-and-white photographs, which show the various activities on the lawn and behind the scenes. (He avoids the auditorium in the shed, because it is more like Boston's Symphony Hall.) The brief introduction draws heavily upon sources such as W. A. DeWolfe Howe's The Tale of Tanglewood (Vanguard, 1946). A valuable addition to any good browsing collection.—Kenneth Groeppe, Watertown Public Library, Mass.

Booklet And Poster Of BSO On Sale

"Know Your Orchestra," a booklet of short biographies and photographs of the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and a colorful Tanglewood poster are both now on sale at the Tanglewood Music Store for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The "Know Your Orchestra" booklet is being sold through the courtesy of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston. In addition to containing biographies and photographs of each member of the Orchestra, the booklet also contains a schematic diagram of the orchestra on-stage showing the seating location of each player.

The Tanglewood poster was designed by Susan Pear Meisel, a leading New York artist. The colorful scene depicts the Lawn at Tanglewood on a Sunday afternoon

MILLERTON, N. Y.
NEWS
W. 1,500
AUG 9 1973

BERKSHIRE COURIER
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
W. 3,750
JUL 26 1973 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Booklet On Sale

LENOX — "Know Your Orchestra," a booklet of short biographies and photographs of the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and a colorful Tanglewood poster are both now on sale at the Tanglewood Music Store for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The "Know Your Orchestra" booklet is being sold through the courtesy of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston. In addition to containing biographies and photographs of each member of the Orchestra, the booklet also contains a schematic diagram of the orchestra on-stage showing the seating location of each player. The book is for sale for $1.00 each.

The Tanglewood poster was designed by Susan Pear Meisel, a leading New York artist. The colorful scene depicts the Lawn at Tanglewood on a Sunday afternoon with the audience listening to the Boston Symphony Orchestra playing in the Shed. The poster, on sale for 4$3 each, comes in a protective tube, and is available at the Tanglewood Music Store, the Red Lion Inn in Stockbridge, and the Tanglewood Friends office.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
1973 New England Newsclip

BSO poster, book selling at Tanglewood

"Know Your Orchestra," a booklet of short biographies and photographs of the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and a Tanglewood poster are on sale at the Tanglewood Music Store. Sales will benefit the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood and the BSO.

The booklet, sold through the Friends of the BSO, also contains a schematic design of the orchestra on stage, showing the seating location of each player.

The poster, designed by Susan Pear Meisel, a New York artist, depicts an audience on the grounds listening to the orchestra playing in the Shed. It is also on sale at the Red Lion Inn, Stockbridge, and the Tanglewood Friends office.

Tanglewood sets concerts

LENOX, Mass. — The fifth weekend at Tanglewood begins at 7 p.m. Friday with the Weekend Prelude concert featuring the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor.

Oliver opens the program with Schutz' "Cantate Domino canticum novum for four voices; follows with Gabrieli's "Cantate Domino canticum novum" in six parts; next J. S. Bach's "Komm, Jesu, komm" motet; then Wolf's "Sechs geistliche Lieder nach Gedichten von Joseph von Eichendorff"; and closes the program with Brahms' "Funf Lieder".

At 9 p.m. principal guest conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the orchestra in Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A and Copland's Symphony No. 3.

Saturday evening at 8:30, Tilson Thomas conducts the orchestra in an all-Stravinsky program beginning with "Suite from 'L'oiseau de feu'" from 'L'oiseau de ad honorem' Sancti Marci nominus" with Kenneth Riegel, tenor; David Evitts, bass, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, with Oliver conducting.

The concert continues with J.S. Bach's "Choral-variationen uber das Weinachtslied 'Vom Himmel hoch da komn 'ich her'" arranged by Stravinsky. It will be its first performance at the Berkshire Festival. Thomas closes the concert with Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms" with the festival chours.

Sunday at 2:30 p.m. Tilson Thomas conducts the orchestra in Mozart's "German Dances" and follows it with Cage's "Suite" for toy piano, orchestrated by Lou Harrison. This is the first performance of this work by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Thomas continues the program with Strauss' "Till Eulenspeigel" and closes the concert with Brahms' Piano concerto No. 2 in B Flat with Malcolm Frager soloist.

KENNETH RIEGEL

SYRACUSE
Herald Journal
D. 129,658

JUL 30 1973

PEEKSKILL, N.Y.
STAR
NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA
D. 13,000

AUG 3 1973

Tanglewood to feature Beethoven, Copland works

The fifth weekend at Tanglewood begins at 7 p.m. tonight with the Weekend Prelude concert featuring the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor. Mr. Oliver opens the program with Schutz' "Cantate Domino canticum novum" for four voices; follows with G. Gabrielli's "Cantate Domino canticum novum" in six parts; next J. S. Bach's "Komm, Jesu, komm" motet; then Wolf's "Sechs geistliche Lieder nach Gedichten von Joseph von Eichendorff"; and closes the program with Brahms' "Funf Lieder".

At 9 pm Principal Guest Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in Beethoven's Symphony no. 7 in A and Aaron Copland's Symphony no. 3.

Open Rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday is scheduled for 10:30 a.m. tomorrow.

At 8:30 p.m. tomorrow, Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in an all-Stravinsky program beginning with Suite from 'L'oiseau de feu' and "Canticum sacrum ad honorem Sancti Marci nominus" with Kenneth Riegel tenor, David Evitts bass and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor. The concert continues with J. S. Bach's "Choral-variationen uber das Weinachtslied 'Von Himmel hoch da komm 'ich her'" "arranged by Igor Stravinsky (its first performance at the Berkshire Festival).

Mr. Thomas closes the concert with Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oilver conductor.

On Sunday at 2:30 p.m., Mr. Thomas conducts the Orchestra in Mozart's German Dances and follows it with Cage's Suite for toy piano, orchestrated by Lou Harrison. This is the first performance of this work by the Botson Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Thomas continues the program with Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel and colses the concert with Brahms' Piano concerto no. 2 in B flat with Malcolm Frager soloist.

NEWS
WEST HARTFORD, CONN.

AUG 2 1973

New England Newscip

MUSIC AND DANCE

APPLE COUNTRY STRING BAND, 8:30 p.m. Saturday at the Ezio Pinza Theater, Stamford Museum, 39 Scofieldtown Rd., Stamford.

BERKSHIRE QUARTET, Music Mountain, Falls Village, 3 p.m. Saturday with guest artist, Mario Miranda, piano. Music of Haydn, Strauss and Faure.

CHAMBER MUSIC FESTIVAL, Hartt College of Music, 8 p.m. Sunday in Millard Auditorium, flutist Brooks de Wetter-Smith of Southeastern Louisiana University, works by Handel, Bach and Messiaen.

CONNECTICUT COLLEGE AMERICAN DANCE FESTIVAL, New London, 8 p.m. tonight, dance-demonstration, 8 p.m. Friday and Saturday, Songs of the Disinherited, Sojourn, Rainbow 'Round My Shoulder, Premiere Work, Inner City Repertory Dance Company.

LONESOME LUKE (Country and Western), 7:30 to 9:30 tonight, Wolcott Park, concert sponsored by town Parks and Recreation Department.

NATIONAL INTERCOLLEGIATE BAND, 8:15 p.m. Thursday, Aug. 9, Jorgensen Auditorium, University of Connecticut, Storrs, free public concert conducted by Col. Arnold Gabriel of the U.S. Air Force Band. Guest trumpet soloist, Raymond Crisara of the Dick Cavett Show.

NORFOLK '73: 8:30 p.m. Friday, chamber music, Violin Duos by Spohr and Bartok, Between Wings of Earth (premiere) by Joan Panetti, Gesualdo and J. S. Bach, Vocal and Instrumental Ensembles, 3:30 p.m. Sunday, Oratorio, The Litchfield County Choral Union, Fenno Heath, Conductor; Honegger, King David and Heath, In the Beginning.

PLUMB MEMORIAL CARILLON CONCERT, 7:15 p.m. Wednesday, Trinity College Campus, guest carillonneur Robert B. Grogan. The National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception, Washington, D.C., Music by Bach featured.

SEALS & CROFTS, ANNE MURRAY, JONATHAN EDWARDS, New Haven Pops Concert, 8 p.m. Saturday at the Yale Bowl.

SUMMER CONCERTS, HARTFORD CITY PARKS, 6 p.m. tonight, Batchelder, Volunteers. 6 p.m. Friday, Hyland Park, Volunteers. 4 p.m. Sunday, Keney Woodland, Gospel Choir. 7:30 p.m. Sunday, Elizabeth Park, Paul Mandel, Summer Pop & Jazz. 6 p.m. Tuesday, Westbrook, Volunteers. 12 noon Wednesday, Bushnell Park, Volunteers.

SUMMER TEEN POPS & JAZZ CONCERT, 7:30 to 9:30 p.m. Tuesday, Kennedy Park, concert sponsored by town Parks and Recreation Department.

TANGLEWOOD Berkshire Festival, Lenox, Mass. Friday, 9 p.m., Thomas: Beethoven Symphony No. 7, Copland, Symphony No. 3. Saturday, 8:30 p.m., Thomas: Stravinsky Program, Tanglewood Festival Chorus. Sunday, 2:30 p.m., Thomas: Mozart, German Dances, Cage, Suite for Toy Piano, Strauss, Till Eulenspiegel, Brahms, Piano Concerto No. 2, Malcolm Frager.

REVIEW
DARIEN, CONN.

AUG 2 1973

New England Newscip

Tanglewood Sets Fifth Week End

The fifth weekend at Tanglewood begins 7 p.m. on Friday August 3, with the weekend Prelude concert featuring the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor. Mr. Oliver opens the program with Schutz' "Cantate Domino Canticum novum" for four voices; follows with g. Gabrielli's "Cantate Domino Canticum novum" in six parts; next J.S. Bach's "Komm, Jesu, Komm" motet.; then Wolf's "sechs geistliche Leider nach Gedichten von Joseph von Eichendorff"; and closes the program with Brahms' "Funf Lieder".

At 9 p.m., Principal Guest Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in Beethoven's Symphony no. 7 in A and Copland's Symphony no. 3. On Saturday, August 4, at 10:30 a.m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an open rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday.

On Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m. Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in an all-Stravinsky program beginning with Suite from 'L'oiseau de feu' and "Canticum sacrum ad honorem Sancti Marci nominus" with Kenneth Riegel tenor, David Evitts bass and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver Conductor. The concert continues with J.S. Bach's "Choral-variationen uber das Weinachtslied 'Von Himmel hoch da komm 'ich her' arranged by Igor Stravinsky (its first performance at the Berkshire Festival). Mr. Thomas closes the concert with Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor.

On Sunday, August 5, at 2:30 p.m. Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in Mozart's German Dances and follows it with Cage's Suite for toy piano, orchestrated by Lou Harrison. This is the first performance of this work by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Thomas continues with Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel and closes the concert with Brahms' Piano concerto no. 2 in B flat with Malcolm Frager soloist:

Tilson Thomas to Conduct at Fifth Tanglewood Weekend

Jewish ADVOCATE Aug 3

The fifth weekend at Tanglewood begins 7 p.m. on Friday, Aug. 3, with the Weekend Prelude concert featuring the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor. Mr. Oliver opens the program with Schutz' "Cantate Domino canticum novum" for four voices; follows with G. Gabrielli's "Cantate Domino canticum novum" in six parts; next J. S. Bach's "Komm, Jesu, komm" motet; then Wolf's "Sechs geistliche Lieder nach Gedichten von Joseph von Eichendorff"; and closes the program with Brahms' "Funf Lieder".

On Saturday, Aug. 4, at 10:30 a.m. as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday.

On Saturday at 8:30 p.m. Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the orchestra in an all-Stravinsky program beginning with Suite from 'L'oiseau de feu' and "Canticum sacrum ad honorem Sancti Marci nominus" with Kenneth Riegel tenor, David Evitts bass and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor. The concert continues with J. S. Bach 's "Choral-variationen uber das Weinachtslied 'Vom Himmel hoch da komm 'ich her' "arranged by Igor Stravinsky (its first performance at the Berkshire Festival). Mr. Thomas closes the concert with Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor.

On Sunday, Aug. 5, at 2:30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in Mozart's German Dances and follows it with Cage's Suite for toy piano, orchestrated by Lou Harrison. This is the first performance of this work by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Thomas continues the program with Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel and closes the concert with Brahms' Piano concerto no. 2 in B flat with Malcolm Frager soloist.

Tanglewood Features Thomas As Conductor

LENOX, Mass. — The fifth weekend of concerts at Tanglewood will feature Michael Tilson Thomas conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three performances.

Tonight at 9 o'clock, Thomas will conduct Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A and Copland's Symphony No. 3. The concert will be preceeded by an evening prelude at 7 p.m. featuring the Tanglewood Festival Chorus under the direction of John Oliver.

On Saturday at 8:30 p.m. Thomas will conduct the Boston players in an all-Stravinsky program. Included will e "Suite From 'L'oiseau de feu" and "Canticum sacrum ad honorem Sancti Marci nominus," with tenor Kenneth Riegel, bass David Evitts and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

On the same program will be J. S. Bach's "Choral-variationen uber das Weinachtslied 'von Himmel hoch da komm ich her" arranged by Stravinsky, and the Symphony of Psalms by Stravinsky.

On Sunday at 2:30 p.m., Thomas will conclude Tanglewood's fifth weekend with performances of Mozart's German Dances, Cage's Suite for Toy Piano, the tone poem "Till Eulenspiegel" by Strauss, and Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 2 with Malcolm Frager the soloist.

THE TIMES RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 42,181

AUG 3 1973

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 88,883

AUG 3 1973

Tanglewood features Michael Thomas

LENOX, Mass. — The fifth weekend at Tanglewood begins 7 p.m. Friday, Aug. 3 with the Weekend Prelude concert featuring the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor. Oliver opens the program with Schutz' Cantate Domino canticum novum for 4 voices; follows with G. Gabrielli's Cantate Domino canticum novum in 6 parts; next J. S. Bach's Komm, Jesu, komm motet; then Wolf's Sechs geistliche Lieder nach Gedichten von Joseph von Eichendorff; and closes the program with Brahms Funf Lieder.

At 9 p.m. principal guest conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the orchestra in Beethoven's Symphony no. 7 in A and Copland's Symphony no. 3.

Saturday, Aug. 4 at 10:30 a.m., as every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an open rehearsal of works to be performed Sunday.

Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m., Thomas conducts the orchestra in an all-Stravinsky program

On Sunday, August 5 at 2:30 p.m, Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in Mozart's German Dances .

BANNER (E)
BENNINGTON, VT.
D. 6,500

AUG 2 1973

New England Newscip

New York Post
D. 623,245 SAT. 354,797

AUG 3 1973

Out-of-Town

Melissa Hayden and Peter Martins under the direction of Walter Terry appear in a pas de deux program tonight and tomorrow night at 7:30 at The Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival (Lee, Mass). Carmen De Lavallade and The Dance Theater of Harlem perform Tuesday through next Saturday . . . Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra featuring Beethoven and Copland tonight at 9 at Tanglewood-Berkshire Festival (Lenox, Mass.). Tomorrow night at 8:30 Thomas conducts the orchestra in an all-Stravinsky program. Sunday at 2:30 p.m., Mozart, Cage, Strauss and Brahms are featured . . . Janos Starker, cellist, will play the works of Bach, Beethoven, Mozart and Brahms at 5:30 p.m. at the Caramoor Festival (Katonah, N. Y.) . . . "No, No, Nanette" is on stage at the Garden State Arts Center (Holmdel, N. J.) tonight and tomorrow night starring Don Ameche and Evelyn Keyes . . . Conductor Eugene Ormandy and Isaac Stern, violinist, appear with the Philadelphia Orchestra tonight at 8 at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center Saratoga Springs, N. Y.). Tomorrow night Andre Kostelanetz conducts.

* * *

Tomorrow at 9:30 p.m. The Newport Music Festival (Newport, R. I.) presents Concert of Curiosa featur ingale, triang Sunda toric I will be Presby "Rigol tomorr George (Glens the aft ca." . . pears Lenox ox, Ma tival c Rando Danny ville I p.m. t Villag (Stan New Festi offers "Sum night at 8. Tomorrow night at 8, Arthur Kopits "Oh Dad, Poor Dad," and pan Zee Playhouse (Nyack, N. Y.) presents "6 Rms Riv Vu" starring Jerry Orbach and Marcia Rodd . . . Celeste Holm stars in "The Irregular Verb to Love" bowing Monday at Pocono Playhouse (Mountainhome, Pa.) . . . The Connecticut College American Dance Festival (New London, Conn.) presents the Inner City Repertory Dance Company tonight and tomorrow night at 8 in Connecticut College's Palmer Auditorium . . . "A Summer Evening Concert to Remember" will be offered by the Buffalo Philharmonic tomorrow night at 7:30 p.m. at Sonnenberg Gardens (Canandaigua, N. Y.) . . . Vic Damone and Allan Drake are on stage at the Playboy Club-Hotel (Great Gorge, McAfee, N. J.) tonight and tomorrow night . . . Hope Diamond brings her "Burlesque Is My Thing" to the Capital Theater (Passaic, N. J.) on Monday .

Music

THE PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA under the direction of Eugene Ormandy will perform works of Beethoven, Brahms and Shostakovich at 8 p.m. today at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center, Saratoga Springs. At 8 p.m. Saturday, the Orchestra will perform works by Gershwin, under the direction of Andre Kostelanetz. On Wednesday, August 8 they will perform works by Haydn under the direction of Fruhbeck de Burgos; on Thursday, August 9, they will perform works by Weber, Beethoven and Strauss under the direction of Eugene Ormandy; and on Friday, August 10, they will perform works by Berlioz, Beethoven and Sibelius under the direction of Alexander Gibson.

SHA NA NA WILL perform in concert at 8:30 p.m. Sunday, Aug. 5 at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center, Saratoga Springs.

THE "BARBER OF SEVILLE," will be presented by the Lake George Opera Festival, Aviation Road, Glens Falls, at 8:15 p.m. today.

THE MUSIC BARN, Lenox, Mass will present Richie Havens in concert at 6 p.m. Saturday.

LORIN HOLLANDER, pianist and Erick Friedman, violinist will present a concert at 8:30 p.m. Wednesday, Aug. 8 at the Center for Music, Drama and Art, Saranac Avenue, Lake Placid.

THE SCOTIA-GLENVILLE Chorale will give a Sneak Preview Concert at 8 p.m. Sunday, Aug. 5 in the auditorium, Scotia Glenville High School.

THE BETHLEHEM SUMMER BAND will present an Evening on the Green Tuesday at 7:30 at the Bethlehem Public Library, 451 Delaware Avenue, Delmar.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY Orchestra will perform works by Beethoven and Copland at 9 p.m. today under the Direction of Michael Tilson Thomas at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Michale Tilson Thomas will also direct the orchestra in works by Stravinsky at 8:30 p.m. Saturday and works by Mozart, Cage, Strauss and Brahms at 2:30 p.m. Sunday.

BUDDY RICH and his orchestra will perform at 8:30 p.m. Monday, Aug. 13 at the Colonie Coliseum Summer Theater, Latham.

THE CHAMBER MUSIC Concert will present Eunice Alberts, contralto, at 8 p.m. Monday, Aug. 6, at the Canfield Casino, Congress Park, Saratoga Springs.

THE SARATOGA PERFORMING Arts Center, Saratoga Springs will present "Liberace," at 3 and 8 p.m. Sunday, Aug. 12.

THE LAKE GEORGE Opera Festival will present "Rigoletto," at 8:15 p.m., Aug. 10 in the auditorium, Aviation Road, Glens Falls.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Tanglewood sets concerts

LENOX, Mass. — The fifth weekend at Tanglewood begins at 7 p.m. Friday with the Weekend Prelude concert featuring the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor.

Oliver opens the program with Schutz' "Cantate Domino canticum novum for four voices; follows with Gabrieli's "Cantate Domino canticum novum" in six parts; next J. S. Bach's "Komm, Jesu, komm" motet; then Wolf's "Sechs geistliche Lieder nach Gedichten von Joseph von Eichendorff"; and closes the program with Brahms' "Funf Lieder".

At 9 p.m. principal guest conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the orchestra in Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A and Copland's Symphony No. 3.

Saturday evening at 8:30, Tilson Thomas conducts the orchestra in an all-Stravinsky program beginning with "Suite from 'L'oiseau de feu'" from 'L'oiseau de ad honorem Sancti Marci nominus" with Kenneth Riegel, tenor; David Evitts, bass, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, with Oliver conducting.

The concert continues with J.S. Bach's "Choral-variationen uber das Weinachtslied 'Vom Himmel hoch da komn 'ich her'" arranged by Stravinsky. It will be its first performance at the Berkshire Festival. Thomas closes the concert with Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms" with the festival chours.

Sunday at 2:30 p.m. Tilson Thomas conducts the orchestra in Mozart's "German Dances" and follows it with Cage's "Suite" for toy piano, orchestrated by Lou Harrison. This is the first performance of this work by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Thomas continues the program with Strauss' "Till Eulenspeigel" and closes the concert with Brahms' Piano concerto No. 2 in B Flat with Malcolm Frager soloist.

KENNETH RIEGEL

SYRACUSE
Herald Journal
D. 129,658

JUL 30 1973

PEEKSKILL, N.Y.
STAR
NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA
D. 13,000

AUG 3 1973

Tanglewood to feature Beethoven, Copland works

The fifth weekend at Tanglewood begins at 7 p.m. tonight with the Weekend Prelude concert featuring the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor. Mr. Oliver opens the program with Schutz' "Cantate Domino canticum novum" for four voices; follows with G. Gabrielli's "Cantate Domino canticum novum" in six parts; next J. S. Bach's "Komm, Jesu, komm" motet; then Wolf's "Sechs geistliche Lieder nach Gedichten von Joseph von Eichendorff"; and closes the program with Brahms' "Funf Lieder".

At 9 pm Principal Guest Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in Beethoven's Symphony no. 7 in A and Aaron Copland's Symphony no. 3.

Open Rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday is scheduled for 10:30 a.m. tomorrow.

At 8:30 p.m. tomorrow, Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in an all-Stravinsky program beginning with Suite from 'L'oiseau de feu' and "Canticum sacrum ad honorem Sancti Marci nominus" with Kenneth Riegel tenor, David Evitts bass and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor. The concert continues with J. S. Bach's "Choral-variationen uber das Weinachtslied 'Von Himmel hoch da komm 'ich her" "arranged by Igor Stravinsky (its first performance at the Berkshire Festival).

Mr. Thomas closes the concert with Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oilver conductor.

On Sunday at 2:30 p.m., Mr. Thomas conducts the Orchestra in Mozart's German Dances and follows it with Cage's Suite for toy piano, orchestrated by Lou Harrison. This is the first performance of this work by the Botson Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Thomas continues the program with Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel and colses the concert with Brahms' Piano concerto no. 2 in B flat with Malcolm Frager soloist.

Tanglewood Features Thomas As Conductor

LENOX, Mass. — The fifth weekend of concerts at Tanglewood will feature Michael Tilson Thomas conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three performances.

Tonight at 9 o'clock, Thomas will conduct Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A and Copland's Symphony No. 3. The concert will be preceeded by an evening prelude at 7 p.m. featuring the Tanglewood Festival Chorus under the direction of John Oliver.

On Saturday at 8:30 p.m. Thomas will conduct the Boston players in an all-Stravinsky program. Included will e "Suite From 'L'oiseau de feu" and "Canticum sacrum ad honorem Sancti Marci nominus," with tenor Kenneth Riegel, bass David Evitts and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

On the same program will be J. S. Bach's "Choral-variationen uber das Weinachtslied 'von Himmel hoch da komm ich her" arranged by Stravinsky, and the Symphony of Psalms by Stravinsky.

On Sunday at 2:30 p.m., Thomas will conclude Tanglewood's fifth weekend with performances of Mozart's German Dances, Cage's Suite for Toy Piano, the tone poem "Till Eulenspiegel" by Strauss, and Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 2 with Malcolm Frager the soloist.

THE TIMES RECORD
TROY, N.Y.
D. 42,181

AUG 3 1973

Tilson Thomas to Conduct at Fifth Tanglewood Weekend

Jewish ADVOCATE 9.4.2

The fifth weekend at Tanglewood begins 7 p.m. on Friday, Aug. 3, with the Weekend Prelude concert featuring the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor. Mr. Oliver opens the program with Schutz' "Cantate Domino canticum novum" for four voices; follows with G. Gabrielli's "Cantate Domino canticum novum" in six parts; next J. S. Bach's "Komm, Jesu, komm" motet; then Wolf's "Sechs geistliche Lieder nach Gedichten von Joseph von Eichendorff"; and closes the program with Brahms' "Funf Lieder".

On Saturday, Aug. 4, at 10:30 a.m. as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday.

On Saturday at 8:30 p.m. Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the orchestra in an all-Stravinsky program beginning with Suite from 'L'oiseau de feu' and "Canticum sacrum ad honorem Sancti Marci nominus" with Kenneth Riegel tenor, David Evitts bass and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor. The concert continues with J. S. Bach 's "Choral-variationen uber das Weinachtslied 'Vom Himmel hoch da komm 'ich her' "arranged by Igor Stravinsky (its first performance at the Berkshire Festival). Mr. Thomas closes the concert with Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor.

On Sunday, Aug. 5, at 2:30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in Mozart's German Dances and follows it with Cage's Suite for toy piano, orchestrated by Lou Harrison. This is the first performance of this work by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Thomas continues the program with Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel and closes the concert with Brahms' Piano concerto no. 2 in B flat with Malcolm Frager soloist.

NEWS
WEST HARTFORD, CONN.

AUG 2 1973

New England Newsclip

MUSIC AND DANCE

APPLE COUNTRY STRING BAND, 8:30 p.m. Saturday at the Ezio Pinza Theater, Stamford Museum, 39 Scofieldtown Rd., Stamford.

BERKSHIRE QUARTET, Music Mountain, Falls Village, 3 p.m. Saturday with guest artist, Mario Miranda, piano. Music of Haydn, Strauss and Faure.

CHAMBER MUSIC FESTIVAL, Hartt College of Music, 8 p.m. Sunday in Millard Auditorium, flutist Brooks de Wetter-Smith of Southeastern Louisiana University, works by Handel, Bach and Messiaen.

CONNECTICUT COLLEGE AMERICAN DANCE FESTIVAL, New London, 8 p.m. tonight, dance-demonstration, 8 p.m. Friday and Saturday, Songs of the Disinherited, Sojourn, Rainbow 'Round My Shoulder, Premiere Work, Inner City Repertory Dance Company.

LONESOME LUKE (Country and Western), 7:30 to 9:30 tonight, Wolcott Park, concert sponsored by town Parks and Recreation Department.

NATIONAL INTERCOLLEGIATE BAND, 8:15 p.m. Thursday, Aug. 9, Jorgensen Auditorium, University of Connecticut, Storrs, free public concert conducted by Col. Arnold Gabriel of the U.S. Air Force Band. Guest trumpet soloist, Raymond Crisara of the Dick Cavett Show.

NORFOLK '73: 8:30 p.m. Friday, chamber music, Violin Duos by Spohr and Bartok, Between Wings of Earth (premiere) by Joan Panetti, Gesualdo and J. S. Bach, Vocal and Instrumental Ensembles. 3:30 p.m. Sunday, Oratorio, The Litchfield County Choral Union, Fenno Heath, Conductor: Honegger, King David and Heath, In the Beginning.

PLUMB MEMORIAL CARILLON CONCERT, 7:15 p.m. Wednesday, Trinity College Campus, guest carillonneur Robert B. Grogan, The National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception, Washington, D.C., Music by Bach featured.

SEALS & CROFTS, ANNE MURRAY, JONATHAN EDWARDS, New Haven Pops Concert, 8 p.m. Saturday at the Yale Bowl.

SUMMER CONCERTS, HARTFORD CITY PARKS. 6 p.m. tonight, Batchelder, Volunteers. 6 p.m. Friday, Hyland Park, Volunteers. 4 p.m. Sunday, Keney Woodland, Gospel Choir. 7:30 p.m. Sunday, Elizabeth Park, Paul Mandel, Summer Pop & Jazz. 6 p.m. Tuesday, Westbrook, Volunteers. 12 noon Wednesday, Bushnell Park, Volunteers.

SUMMER TEEN POPS & JAZZ CONCERT, 7:30 to 9:30 p.m. Tuesday, Kennedy Park, concert sponsored by town Parks and Recreation Department.

TANGLEWOOD Berkshire Festival, Lenox, Mass. Friday, 9 p.m., Thomas: Beethoven Symphony No. 7, Copland, Symphony No. 3. Saturday, 8:30 p.m., Thomas: Stravinsky Program, Tanglewood Festival Chorus. Sunday, 2:30 p.m., Thomas: Mozart, German Dances, Cage, Suite for Toy Piano, Strauss, Till Eulenspiegel, Brahms, Piano Concerto No. 2, Malcolm Frager.

REVIEW
DARIEN, CONN.

AUG 2 1973

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Sets Fifth Week End

The fifth weekend at Tanglewood begins 7 p.m. on Friday August 3, with the weekend Prelude concert featuring the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor. Mr. Oliver opens the program with Schutz' "Cantate Domino Canticum novum" for four voices; follows with g. Gabrielli's "Cantate Domino Canticum novum" in six parts; next J.S. Bach's "Komm, Jesu, Komm" motet.; then Wolf's "sechs geistliche Leider nach Gedichten von Joseph von Eichendorff"; and closes the program with Brahms' "Funf Lieder".

At 9 p.m., Principal Guest Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in Beethoven's Symphony no. 7 in A and Copland's Symphony no. 3. On Saturday, August 4, at 10:30 a.m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an open rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday.

On Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m. Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in an all-Stravinsky program beginning with Suite from 'L'oiseau de feu' and "Canticum sacrum ad honorem Sancti Marci nominus" with Kenneth Riegel tenor, David Evitts bass and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver Conductor. The concert continues with J.S. Bach's "Choral-variationen uber das Weinachtslied 'Von Himmel hoch da komm 'ich her' arranged by Igor Stravinsky (its first performance at the Berkshire Festival). Mr. Thomas closes the concert with Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms with the [illegible] as Ruth and Melissa Ho[illegible] Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor.

On Sunday, August 5, at 2:30 p.m. Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in Mozart's German Dances and follows it with Cage's Suite for toy piano, orchestrated by Lou Harrison. This is the first performance of this work by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Thomas continues with Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel and closes the concert with Brahms' Piano concerto no. 2 in B flat with Malcolm Frager soloist:

Tanglewood features Michael Thomas

LENOX, Mass. — The fifth weekend at Tanglewood begins 7 p.m. Friday, Aug. 3 with the Weekend Prelude concert featuring the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor. Oliver opens the program with Schutz' Cantate Domino canticum novum for 4 voices; follows with G. Gabrielli's Cantate Domino canticum novum in 6 parts; next J. S. Bach's Komm, Jesu, komm motet; then Wolf's Sechs geistliche Lieder nach Gedichten von Joseph von Eichendorff; and closes the program with Brahms Funf Lieder.

At 9 p.m. principal guest conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the orchestra in Beethoven's Symphony no. 7 in A and Copland's Symphony no. 3.

Saturday, Aug. 4 at 10:30 a.m., as every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an open rehearsal of works to be performed Sunday.

Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m., Thomas conducts the orchestra in an all-Stravinsky program

On Sunday, August 5 at 2:30 p.m, Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in Mozart's German Dances .

BANNER (E)
BENNINGTON, VT.
D. 6,500

AUG 2 1973

New England Newsclip

New York Post
D. 623,245 SAT. 354,797

AUG 3 1973

Out-of-Town

Melissa Hayden and Peter Martins under the direction of Walter Terry appear in a pas de deux program tonight and tomorrow night at 7:30 at The Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival (Lee, Mass). Carmen De Lavallade and The Dance Theater of Harlem perform Tuesday through next Saturday . . . Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra featuring Beethoven and Copland tonight at 9 at Tanglewood-Berkshire Festival (Lenox, Mass.). Tomorrow night at 8:30 [illegible] conducts the orchestra in an all-Stravinsky program. Sunday at 2:30 p.m., Mozart, Cage, Strauss and Brahms are featured . . . Janos Starker, cellist, will play the works of Bach, Beethoven, Mozart and Brahms at 5:30 p.m. at the Caramoor Festival (Katonah, N. Y.) . . . "No, No, Nanette" is on stage at the Garden State Arts Center (Holmdel, N. J.) tonight and tomorrow night starring Don Ameche and Evelyn Keyes . . . Conductor Eugene Ormandy and Isaac Stern, violinist, appear with the Philadelphia Orchestra tonight at 8 at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center Saratoga Springs, N. Y.). Tomorrow night Andre Kostelanetz conducts.

* * *

Tomorrow at 9:30 p.m. The Newport Music Festival (Newport, R. I.) presents Concert of Curiosa featur[illegible] ingale, triang[illegible] Sunda[illegible] toric [illegible] will be [illegible] Presby[illegible] "Rigolet[illegible] tomorrow [illegible] George [illegible] (Glens Fall[illegible] the afternoo[illegible] ca." . . . Rich[illegible] pears tomorr[illegible] Lenox Arts Fe[illegible] ox, Mass.) . . . M[illegible] tival of Music w[illegible] Randolph, Floyd [illegible] Danny Davis and Th[illegible] ville Brass perform[illegible] p.m. tomorrow at Wa[illegible] Village Music Fe[illegible] (Stanhope, N. J.) [illegible] New Jersey Shakespeare Festival (Madison, N. J.) offers Tennessee Williams' "Summer & Smoke" tonight at 8. Tomorrow night at 8, Arthur Kopits "Oh Dad, Poor Dad," and starring Jerry Orbach and Marcia Rodd . . . Celeste Holm stars in "The Irregular Verb to Love" bowing Monday at Pocono Playhouse (Mountainhome, Pa.) . . . The Connecticut College American Dance Festival (New London, Conn.) presents the Inner City Repertory Dance Company tonight and tomorrow night at 8 in Connecticut College's Palmer Auditorium . . . "A Summer Evening Concert to Remember" will be offered by the Buffalo Philharmonic tomorrow night at 7:30 p.m. at Sonnenberg Gardens (Canandaigua, N. Y.) . . . Vic Damone and Allan Drake are on stage at the Playboy Club-Hotel (Great Gorge, McAfee, N. J.) tonight and tomorrow night . . . Hope Diamond brings her "Burlesque Is My Thing" to the Capital Theater (Passaic, N. J.) on Monday .

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N.Y.
D. 56,033

AUG 3 1973

Music

THE PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA under the direction of Eugene Ormandy will perform works of Beethoven, Brahms and Shostakovich at 8 p.m. today at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center, Saratoga Springs. At 8 p.m. Saturday, the Orchestra will perform works by Gershwin, under the direction of Andre Kostelanetz. On Wednesday, August 8 they will perform works by Haydn under the direction of Fruhbeck de Burgos; on Thursday, August 9, they will perform works by Weber, Beethoven and Strauss under the direction of Eugene Ormandy; and on Friday, August 10, they will perform works by Berlioz, Beethoven and Sibelius under the direction of Alexander Gibson.

SHA NA NA WILL perform in concert at 8:30 p.m. Sunday, Aug. 5 at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center, Saratoga Springs.

THE "BARBER OF SEVILLE," will be presented by the Lake George Opera Festival, Aviation Road, Glens Falls, at 8:15 p.m. [illegible]day.

[illegible]E MUSIC BARN, Lenox, Mass will present Richie Havens in [illegible]t 6 p.m. Saturday.

[illegible]OLLANDER, pianist and Erick Friedman, violinist will [illegible]cert at 8:30 p.m. Wednesday, Aug. 8 at the Center for [illegible]nd Art, Saranac Avenue, Lake Placid.

[illegible]ENVILLE Chorale will give a Sneak Preview [illegible]nday, Aug. 5 in the auditorium, Scotia Glen-[illegible]

[illegible]MMER BAND will present an Evening on [illegible]t the Bethlehem Public Library, 451 [illegible]

[illegible]ch[illegible] will perform works by [illegible]der the Direction of Mi[illegible] Lenox, Mass. Michale Tilson [illegible]tra in works by Stravinsky at [illegible] by Mozart, Cage, Strauss and [illegible]

MEN'S LONG SLEE[illegible]

Pianist Peter Nero appears at Lakeside Theater (East Meadow, L.I.) tonight at 8:30 . . . The Tappan Zee Playhouse (Nyack, N. Y.) presents "6 Rms Riv Vu" starting Monday

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
W. 6,043
AUG 1 1973 New England Newsclip

TIMES (E)
BEVERLY, MASS.
D. 9,514
AUG 1 1973 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood to feature an all-Stravinsky program

TANGLEWOOD—The fifth weekend at Tanglewood begins 7:00 p.m. on Friday, August 3 with the Weekend Prelude concert featuring the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor. Oliver opens the program with Schutz' "Cantate Domino canticum novum" for four voices; follows with G. Gabrielli's "Cantate Domino canticum novum" in six parts; next J. S. Bach's "Komm, Jesu, Komm" motet; then Wolf's "Sechs geistliche Lieder nach Gedichten von Joseph von Eichendorff"; and closes the program with Brahms' "Funf Lieder".

At 9:00 p.m. Principal Guest Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in Beethoven's Symphony no. 7 in A and Copland's Symphony no. 3.

On Saturday, August 4 at 10:30 a.m. as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday.

On Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m. Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the orchestra in an all-Stravinsky program beginning with Suite from 'L'oiseau de feau' and "Canticum sacrum ad honorem Sancti Marci nominus" with Kenneth Riegeo tenor, David Evitts bass and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, conductor.

The concert continues with J. S. Bach's "Choral-variationen uber das Weinachtslied 'Von Himmel hoch da komm 'ich her'" arranged by Igor Stravinsky (its first performance at the Berkshire Festival). Mr. Thomas Closes the concert with Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor.

On Sunday, August 5 at 2:30 p.m. Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the orchestra in Mozart's German Dances and follows it with Cage's Suite for toy piano, orchestrated by Lou Harrison. This is the first performance of this work by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Thomas continues the program with Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel and closes the concert with Brahms' Piano concerto no. 2 in B flat with Malcolm Frager soloist.

On Tuesday, August 14 at 8:30 p.m. the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras present the annual Tanglewood-on-Parade Gala concert.

The grounds open at 2:00 in the afternoon and, beginning at 2:30, mini-concerts will be presented throughout the afternoon by members of the Berkshire Music Center.

The annual Tanglewood-on-Parade celebration is a fine opportunity for listeners to understand better just what goes on during the eight weeks of the Berkshire Music Center, this country's oldest summer music school for advanced students and preprofessionals.

The Gala Concerts, at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed at Tanglewood, this year presents a mixed bag of material. The concert opens with Aaron Copland's Lincoln Portrait, conducted by Artistic Director Gunther Schuller, played by the Boston Symphony and narrated by Granrud Artist-in-Residence Andre Watts.

The Liszt Piano concerto no. 1 in E flat follows, with Seiji Ozawa, artistic director of the Berkshire festival and music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducting that orchestra with Andre Watts as soloist.

Then the concert takes a new turn--Gunther Schuller conducts members of the Berkshire Music Center in works by Scott Joplin, Jelly Roll Morton and Duke Ellington.

The Berkshire Music Center Orchestra under the direction of Seiji Ozawa follows with Strauss' Also sprach Zarathustra and the concert closes with Tchaikovsky's Italien capriccio performed by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras under the direction of Bunther Schuller.

This year's concert promises to be more varied and exciting than ever before, so be sure to come to the 1973 Tanglewood-on-Parade. Prices range from $6 to $3 and tickets are available at the Tanglewood Box Office.

CITIZEN (E)
WINSTED, CONN.
D. 4,600
AUG 1 1973 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Preparing For Weekend

Bos Sym

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, Mass. — The fifth weekend at Tanglewood begins at 7 p.m. on Friday, with the Weekend Prelude concert featuring the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver opens the program with Schutz' "Cantate Domino canticum novum" for four voices; follows with G. Gabrielli's "Cantate Domino canticum novum" in six parts; next J. S. Bach's "Komm, Jesu, komm" motet; then Wolf's "Sechs geistliche Lieder nach Gedichten von Joseph von Eichendorff"; and closes the program with Brahms' "Funf Lieder".

At 9 p.m., Principal Guest Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in Beethoven's Symphony no. 7 in A and Copland's Symphony no 3.

On Saturday, at 10:30 a.m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an open rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday.

On Saturday at 8:30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in an all-Stravinsky program beginning with Suite from 'L'oiseau de feu' and "Canticum sacrum ad honorem Sancti Marci nominus" with Kenneth Riegel tenor, David Evitts bass and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor. The concert continues with J. S. Bach's "Choral-variationen uber das Weinachtslied 'Vom Himmel hoch da komm 'ich her'" arranged by Igor Stravinsky (its first performance at Berkshire Festival). Mr. Thomas closes the concert with Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor.

Stravinsky Program Marks Fifth Weekend At Tanglewood

Michael Tilson Thomas, Music Director of the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra and Principal Guest Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will return to Tanglewood to conduct three concerts this weekend. Highlighting the weekend will be an all Stravinsky program on Saturday night.

During the past two years Michael Tilson Thomas has conducted many of the major orchestras in this country including the New York Philharmonic with which he began his first season as Music Director of the nationally televised "Young People's Concerts." He also continued to direct the Boston Symphony's innovative Spectrum concerts, which he created.

LENOX — The fifth weekend at Tanglewood begins at 7:00 p.m. tomorrow with the Weekend Prelude concert featuring the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, conductor. Oliver opens the program with Schutz' "Cantate Domino canticum novum" for four voices; follows with G. Gabrielli's "Cantate Domino canticum novum" in six parts; next J.S. Bach's "Komm, Jesu, Komm" motet; then Wolf's "Sechs geisliche Lieder nach Gedichten von Joseph Von Eichendorff;" and closes the program with Brahms "Funf Lieder".

At 9:00 p.m. Principal Guest Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A and Copland's Symphony no. 3.

On Saturday at 10 : 30 a.m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday.

Saturday evening at 8:30 Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in an all-Stravinsky program beginning with Suite from 'L' oiseau de feu' and "Canticum sacrum ad honorem Sancti Marci nominus" with Kenneth Riegel tenor, David Evitts bass and the Tanglewood Festival chorus, John Oliver conductor. The concert continues with J.S. Bach's "Choral-variation uber das Weinachtslied 'Vom Himmel hoch da komm 'ich her' " arranged by Igor Stravinsky (its first performance at the Berkshire Festival). Thomas closes the concert with Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor.

On Sunday, at 2:30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in Mozart's German Dances and follows it with Cage's Suite for toy piano, orchestrated by Lou Harrison. This is the first performance of this work by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Thomas continues the program with Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel and closes the concert with Brahms' Piano concerto no. 2 in B flat with Malcolm Frager soloist.

BERKSHIRE COURIER
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS
W. 3,750
AUG 2 1973 New England Newsclip

HERALD (E)
MANCHESTER, CONN.
D. 15,000
AUG 3 1973 New England Newsclip

June B. Tompkins

B. Sym

Tanglewood

The fifth weekend at Tanglewood in the Berkshires begins tonight at 7 with the Weekend Prelude Concert featuring the Tanglewood Festival Chorus. John Oliver conducts the chorus with works by Schutz, Gabrieli, Bach, Wolf, and Brahms.

At 9 p.m., guest conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the orchestra in Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A and Copland's Symphony No. 3.

On Saturday, at 10:30 a.m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an open rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday.

On Saturday evening at 8:30, Thomas conducts the orchestra in an all-Stravinsky program featuring the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, Kenneth Riegel, tenor, and David Evitts, bass.

On Sunday at 2:30 p.m., the orchestra, again conducted by Thomas, will feature Strauss' Til Eulenspiegel and Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 2 in B flat with Malcolm Frager, soloist.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
W. 4,405
AUG 2 1973 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood

Stravinsky's Music Highlights Weekend

Bos Sym

The fifth weekend at Tanglewood begins 7 p.m. on Friday, Aug. 3 with the Weekend Prelude concert featuring the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor. Mr. Oliver opens the program with Schutz' "Cantate Domino canticum novum" for four voices; follows with G. Gabrieli's "Cantate Domino canticum novum" in six parts; next J.S. Bach's "Komm, Jesu, komm" motet; then Wolf's "Sechs geistliche Lieder nach Gedichten von Joseph von Eichendorff;" and closes the program with Brahms' "Funf Lieder."

At 9 p.m. Principal Guest Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the orchestra in Beethoven's Symphony no. 7 in A and Copland's Symphony no. 3.

On Saturday, Aug. 4 at 10:30 a.m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday.

On Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the orchestra in an all-Stravinsky program beginning with Suite from "L'oiseau de feu" and "Canticum sacrum ad honorem Sancti Marci nominus" with Kenneth Riegel tenor, David Evitts bass and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor.

The concert continues with J.S. Bach's "Choral-variationen uber das Weinachtslied 'Von Himmel hoch da komm 'ich her' " arranged by Igor Stravinsky (its first performance at the Berkshire Festival).

Mr. Thomas closes the concert with Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor.

Kenneth Riegel, tenor, appears with the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a soloist in Stravinsky's "Canticum Sacrum" on Saturday evening, Aug. 4. — Photo contributed

On Sunday, Aug. 5 at 2:30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the orchestra in Mozart's German Dances and follows it with Cage's Suite for toy piano, orchestrated by Lou Harrison. This is the first performance of this work by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Thomas continues the program with Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" and closes the concert with Brahms' Piano concerto no. 2 in B flat, with Malcolm Frager soloist.

BEE
NEWTOWN, CONN.
W. 14,768
AUG 3 1973 New England Newsclip

Concerts at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. info at 413-637-1600:

Fri: Weekend Prelude at 7 pm with Tanglewood Festival Chorus, Michael Tilson Thomas conducting at 9 pm; Sat: Boston Symphony Orchestra open rehearsal at 10:30 am, Michael Tilson Thomas conducting at 8:30 pm; Sun: Mr Thomas conducting at 2:30 pm: Aug 3-5.

Weekend Prelude Fri at 7 pm, Colin Davis conducting Boston Symphony at 9 pm; open rehearsal of Boston Symphony Orchestra Sat at 10:30 am, Mr Davis conducting at 8:30 pm; Mr Davis conducting at 2:30 pm Sun; Aug 10-12.

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
W. 6,013
AUG 1 1973
New England Newsclip

TIMES (E)
BEVERLY, MASS.
D. 9,514
AUG 1 1973
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood to feature an all-Stravinsky program

TANGLEWOOD—The fifth weekend at Tanglewood begins 7:00 p.m. on Friday, August 3 with the Weekend Prelude concert featuring the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor. Oliver opens the program with Schutz' "Cantate Domino canticum novum" for four voices; follows with G. Gabrielli's "Cantate Domino canticum novum" in six parts; next J. S. Bach's "Komm, Jesu, Komm" motet; then Wolf's "Sechs geistliche Lieder nach Gedichten von Joseph von Eichendorff"; and closes the program with Brahms' "Funf Lieder".

At 9:00 p.m. Principal Guest Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in Beethoven's Symphony no. 7 in A and Copland's Symphony no. 3.

On Saturday, August 4 at 10:30 a.m. as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday.

On Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m. Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the orchestra in an all-Stravinsky program beginning with Suite from 'L'oiseau de feau' and "Canticum sacrum ad honorem Sancti Marci nominus" with Kenneth Riegeo tenor, David Evitts bass and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, conductor.

The concert continues with J. S. Bach's "Choral-variationen uber das Weinachtslied 'Von Himmel hoch da komm 'ich her'" arranged by Igor Stravinsky (its first performance at the Berkshire Festival). Mr. Thomas Closes the concert with Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor.

On Sunday, August 5 at 2:30 p.m. Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the orchestra in Mozart's German Dances and follows it with Cage's Suite for toy piano, orchestrated by Lou Harrison. This is the first performance of this work by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Thomas continues the program with Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel and closes the concert with Brahms' Piano concerto no. 2 in B flat with Malcolm Frager soloist.

On Tuesday, August 14 at 8:30 p.m. the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras present the annual Tanglewood-on-Parade Gala concert.

The grounds open at 2.00 in the afternoon and, beginning at 2:30, mini-concerts will be presented throughout the afternoon by members of the Berkshire Music Center.

The annual Tanglewood-on-Parade celebration is a fine opportunity for listeners to understand better just what goes on during the eight weeks of the Berkshire Music Center, this country's oldest summer music school for advanced students and preprofessionals.

The Gala Concerts, at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed at Tanglewood, this year presents a mixed bag of material. The concert opens with Aaron Copland's Lincoln Portrait, conducted by Artistic Director Gunther Schuller, played by the Boston Symphony and narrated by Granrud Artist-in-Residence Andre Watts.

The Liszt Piano concerto no. 1 in E flat follows, with Seiji Ozawa, artistic director of the Berkshire festival and music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducting that orchestra with Andre Watts as soloist.

Then the concert takes a new turn--Gunther Schuller conducts members of the Berkshire Music Center in works by Scott Joplin, Jelly Roll Morton and Duke Ellington.

The Berkshire Music Center Orchestra under the direction of Seiji Ozawa follows with Strauss' Also sprach Zarathustra and the concert closes with Tchaikovsky's Italien capriccio performed by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras under the direction of Bunther Schuller.

This year's concert promises to be more varied and exciting than ever before, so be sure to come to the 1973 Tanglewood-on-Parade. Prices range from $6 to $3 and tickets are available at the Tanglewood Box Office.

CITIZEN (E)
WINSTED, CONN.
D. 4,000
AUG 1 1973
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Preparing For Weekend

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, Mass. — The fifth weekend at Tanglewood begins at 7 p.m. on Friday, with the Weekend Prelude concert featuring the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver opens the program with Schutz' "Cantate Domino canticum novum" for four voices; follows with G. Gabrielli's "Cantate Domino canticum novum" in six parts; next J. S. Bach's "Komm, Jesu, komm" motet; then Wolf's "Sechs geistliche Lieder nach Gedichten von Joseph von Eichendorff"; and closes the program with Brahms' "Funf Lieder".

At 9 p.m., Principal Guest Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in Beethoven's Symphony no. 7 in A and Copland's Symphony no 3.

On Saturday, at 10:30 a.m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an open rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday.

On Saturday, at 8:30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in an all-Stravinsky program beginning with Suite from 'L'oiseau de feu' and "Canticum sacrum ad honorem Sancti Marci nominus" with Kenneth Riegel tenor, David Evitts bass and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor. The concert continues with J. S. Bach's "Choral-variationen uber das Weinachtslied 'Vom Himmel hoch da komm 'ich her'" arranged by Igor Stravinsky (its first performance at Berkshire Festival). Mr. Thomas closes the concert with Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor.

Stravinsky Program Marks Fifth Weekend At Tanglewood

Michael Tilson Thomas, Music Director of the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra and Principal Guest Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will return to Tanglewood to conduct three concerts this weekend. Highlighting the weekend will be an all Stravinsky program on Saturday night.

During the past two years Michael Tilson Thomas has conducted many of the major orchestras in this country including the New York Philharmonic with which he began his first season as Music Director of the nationally televised "Young People's Concerts." He also continued to direct the Boston Symphony's innovative Spectrum concerts, which he created.

LENOX — The fifth weekend at Tanglewood begins at 7:00 p.m. tomorrow with the Weekend Prelude concert featuring the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, conductor. Oliver opens the program with Schutz' "Cantate Domino canticum novum" for four voices; follows with G. Gabrieli's "Cantate Domino canticum novum" in six parts; next J.S. Bach's "Komm, Jesu, Komm" motet; then Wolf's "Sechs geisliche Lieder nach Gedichten von Joseph Von Eichendorff;" and closes the program with Brahms "Funf Lieder".

At 9:00 p.m. Principal Guest Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A and Copland's Symphony no. 3.

On Saturday at 10 : 30 a.m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday.

Saturday evening at 8:30 Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in an all-Stravinsky program beginning with Suite from 'L' oiseau de feu' and "Canticum sacrum ad honorem Sancti Marci nominus" with Kenneth Riegel tenor, David Evitts bass and the Tanglewood Festival chorus, John Oliver conductor. The concert continues with J.S. Bach's "Choral-variation uber das Weinachtslied 'Vom Himmel hoch da komm 'ich her' " arranged by Igor Stravinsky (its first performance at the Berkshire Festival). Thomas closes the concert with Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor.

On Sunday, at 2:30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in Mozart's German Dances and follows it with Cage's Suite for toy piano, orchestrated by Lou Harrison. This is the first performance of this work by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Thomas continues the program with Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel and closes the concert with Brahms' Piano concerto no. 2 in B flat with Malcolm Frager soloist.

BERKSHIRE COURIER
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
AUG 2 1973
New England Newsclip

HERALD (E)
MANCHESTER, CONN.
D. 45,000
AUG 3 1973
New Engla Newsc

June B. Tompkins

Tanglewood

The fifth weekend at Tanglewood in the Berkshires begins tonight at 7 with the Weekend Prelude Concert featuring the Tanglewood Festival Chorus. John Oliver conducts the chorus with works by Schutz, Gabrieli, Bach, Wolf, and Brahms.

At 9 p.m., guest conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the orchestra in Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A and Copland's Symphony No. 3.

On Saturday, at 10:30 a.m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an open rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday.

On Saturday evening at 8:30, Thomas conducts the orchestra in an all-Stravinsky program featuring the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, Kenneth Riegel, tenor, and David Evitts, bass.

On Sunday at 2:30 p.m., the orchestra, again conducted by Thomas, will feature Strauss' Til Eulenspiegel and Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 2 in B flat with Malcolm Frager, soloist.

JOURNAL
COVINGTON, CONN.
AUG 2 1973
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood

Stravinsky's Music Highlights Weekend

The fifth weekend at Tanglewood begins 7 p.m. on Friday, Aug. 3 with the Weekend Prelude concert featuring the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor. Mr. Oliver opens the program with Schutz' "Cantate Domino canticum novum" for four voices; follows with G. Gabrieli's "Cantate Domino canticum novum" in six parts; next J.S. Bach's "Komm, Jesu, komm" motet; then Wolf's "Sechs geistliche Lieder nach Gedichten von Joseph von Eichendorff;" and closes the program with Brahms' "Funf Lieder."

At 9 p.m. Principal Guest Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the orchestra in Beethoven's Symphony no. 7 in A and Copland's Symphony no. 3.

On Saturday, Aug. 4 at 10:30 a.m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday.

On Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the orchestra in an all-Stravinsky program beginning with Suite from "L'oiseau de feu" and "Canticum sacrum ad honorem Sancti Marci nominus" with Kenneth Riegel tenor, David Evitts bass and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor.

The concert continues with J.S. Bach's "Choral-variationen uber das Weinachtslied 'Von Himmel hoch da komm 'ich her' " arranged by Igor Stravinsky (its first performance at the Berkshire Festival).

Mr. Thomas closes the concert with Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor.

Kenneth Riegel, tenor, appears with the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a soloist in Stravinsky's "Canticum Sacrum" on Saturday evening, Aug. 4. — Photo contributed

On Sunday, Aug. 5 at 2:30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the orchestra in Mozart's German Dances and follows it with Cage's Suite for toy piano, orchestrated by Lou Harrison. This is the first performance of this work by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Thomas continues the program with Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" and closes the concert with Brahms' Piano concerto no. 2 in B flat, with Malcolm Frager soloist.

BEE
NEWTOWN, CONN.
W. 14,768
AUG 3 1973
New England Newsclip

Concerts at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. info at 413-637-1600:

Fri: Weekend Prelude at 7 pm with Tanglewood Festival Chorus, Michael Tilson Thomas conducting at 9 pm; Sat: Boston Symphony Orchestra open rehearsal at 10:30 am, Michael Tilson Thomas conducting at 8:30 pm; Sun: Mr Thomas conducting at 2:30 pm; Aug 3-5.

Weekend Prelude Fri at 7 pm, Colin Davis conducting Boston Symphony at 9 pm; open rehearsal of Boston Symphony Orchestra Sat at 10:30 am, Mr Davis conducting at 8:30 pm; Mr Davis conducting at 2:30 pm Sun; Aug 10-12.

AT TANGLEWOOD

It's Chorus Time

LENOX — The fifth weekend at Tanglewood begins 7 p.m. on Friday with the Weekend Prelude concert featuring the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor. Mr. Oliver opens the program with Schutz' "Cantate Domino canticum novum" for four voices; follows with G. Gabrieli's "Cantate Domino canticum novum" in six parts; next J. S. Bach's "Komm, Jesu, komm" motet; then Wolf's "Sechs geistliche Lieder nach Gedichten von Joseph von Eichendorff"; and closes the program with Brahms' "Funf Lieder."

At 9 p.m. principal guest conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the orchestra in Beethoven's Symphony no. 7 in A and Copland's Symphony no. 3.

On Saturday at 10.30 a.m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday.

On Saturday evening at 8.30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the orchestra in an all-Stravinsky program beginning with Suite from 'L'oiseau de feu' and "Canticum sacrum ad honorem Sancti Marci nominus'' with Kenneth Riegel tenor, David Evitts bass and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor. The concert continues with J. S. Bach's "Choral - variationen uber das Weinachtslied 'Vom Himmel hoch da komm 'ich her' " arranged by Igor Stravinsky (its first performance at the Berkshire Festival). Mr. Thomas closes the concert with Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor.

On Sunday at 2.30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the orchestra in Mozart's German Dances and follows it with Cage's Suite for toy piano, orchestrated by Lou Harrison. This is the first performance of this work by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Thomas continues the program with Strauss' Til Eulenspiegel and closes the concert with Brahms' Piano concerto no. 2 in B flat with Malcolm Frager soloist.

KENNETH RIEGEL

MICHAEL T. THOMAS

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 24,500
AUG 2 1973
New England Newsclip

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
S. 130,000
JUL 29 1973
New England Newsclip

NEWS (E)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528
AUG 2 1973
New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
AUG 1 1973
New England Newsclip

Tilson Thomas to Conduct at Fifth Tanglewood Weekend

The fifth weekend at Tanglewood begins 7 p.m. on Friday, Aug. 3, with the Weekend Prelude concert featuring the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor. Mr. Oliver opens the program with Schutz' "Cantate Domino canticum novum" for four voices; follows with G. Gabrielli's "Cantate Domino canticum novum" in six parts; next J. S. Bach's "Komm, Jesu, komm" motet; then Wolf's "Sechs geistliche Lieder nach Gedichten von Joseph von Eichendorff"; and closes the program with Brahms' "Funf Lieder".

On Saturday, Aug. 4, at 10:30 a.m. as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday.

On Saturday at 8:30 p.m. Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the orchestra in an all-Stravinsky program beginning with Suite from 'L'oiseau de feu' and "Canticum sacrum ad honorem Sancti Marci nominus" with Kenneth Riegel tenor, David Evitts bass and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor. The concert continues with J. S. Bach 's "Choral-variationen uber das Weinachtslied 'Vom Himmel hoch da komm 'ich her' " arranged by Igor Stravinsky (its first performance at the Berkshire Festival). Mr. Thomas closes the concert with Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor.

On Sunday, Aug. 5, at 2:30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in Mozart's German Dances and follows it with Cage's Suite for toy piano, orchestrated by Lou Harrison. This is the first performance of this work by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Thomas continues the program with Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel and closes the concert with Brahms' Piano concerto no. 2 in B flat with Malcolm Frager soloist.

SUN (E)
HUDSON, MASS.
D. 3,050
AUG 2 1973
New England Newsclip

TANGLEWOOD

Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday night at 9 and Saturday evening at 8:30 in selections by Beethoven, Copeland and Stravinsky. The Tanglewood Festival Chorus of Lenox, Mass. will perform on Friday at 7 p.h. and on Saturday the Boston Symphony Orchestra will hold an open rehearsal at 10:30 a.m.

Michael Tilson Thomas is guest conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood next weekend.

TRANSCRIPT (E)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
D. 13,700
JUL 27 1973
New England Newsclip

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
S. 126,158
JUL 29 1973
New England Newsclip

Michael Tilson Thomas Tanglewood Conductor

The fifth weekend at Tanglewood begins 7 p.m. on Friday with the Weekend Prelude concert featuring the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor.

Oliver opens the program with Schutz' "Cantate Domino canticum novum" for four voices; follows with G. Gabrielli's "Cantate Domino canticum novum" in six parts; next J.S. Bach's "Komm, Jesu, komm" motet; then Wolf's "Sechs geistliche Lieder nach Gedichten von Joseph von Eichendorff"; and closes the program with Brahms' "Funf Lieder".

At 9 p.m. principal guest Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the orchestra in Beethoven's Symphony no. 7 in A and Copland's Symphony no. 3.

On Saturday, at 10:30 a.m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an open rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday.

On Saturday at 8:30 p.m., Thomas conducts the orchestra in an all-Stravinsky program beginning with Suite from 'L'oiseau de feu' and "Canticum sacrum ad honorem Sancti Marci nominus" with Kenneth Reigel tenor, David Evitts bass and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, Oliver conductor.

The concert continues with J.S. Bach's "Choral-variationen uber das Weinachtslied 'Vom Himmel hoch da komm 'ich her'" arranged by Igor Stravinsky (its first performance at the Berkshire Festival). Thomas closes the concert with Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, Oliver conductor.

On Sunday, at 2:30 p.m. Thomas conducts the orchestra in Mozart's German Dances and follows it with Cage's Suite for toy piano, orchestrated by Lou Harrison. Thomas continues the program with Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel and closes the concert with Brahms' Piano concerto no. 2 in B flat with Malcolm Frager soloist.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
S. 135,000
JUL 29 1973
New England Newsclip

Michael Tilson Thomas

Thomas will conduct full Tanglewood weekend

Michael Tilson Thomas, principal guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct all three of this weekend's concerts, which mark the beginning of the second-half of the Tanglewood season.

BMC Fellow

The 28-year-old conductor is also music director of the Buffalo Philharmonic and is in charge of some of the New York Philharmonic's Young People's Concerts this year. He was previously a conducting fellow at the Berkshire Music Center, where he was awarded the Koussevitsky Prize in conducting.

The weekend prelude at 7 p.m. Friday will feature the Tanglewood Festival Chorus under the direction of John Oliver. The works to be performed are Schutz's "Cantate Domino Canticum Novum" for four voices; G. Gabrielli's "Cantate Domino Canticum Novum" in six parts; J.S. Bach's "Komm, Jesu, Komm" motet; Wolf's "Sechs geistliche Lieder nach Gedichten von Joseph von Eichendorff"; and Brahm's "Funf Lieder."

At 9, Thomas will conduct the orchestra in Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 and Copland's Symphony No. 3.

On Saturday at 10:30 a.m., there will be an open rehearsal of works to be preformed on Sunday.

Thomas will conduct the BSO in an all-Stravinsky program on Saturday evening at 8:30. The concert will begin with the suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu" and "Canticum Sacrum ad Honorem Sancti Marci Nominus" with Kenneth Riegel, tenor, David Evitts, on bass, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus with Oliver conducting.

The concert will also include the first performance at the Berkshire Festival of Bach's "Choral-variationen Uber das Weinachtslied Von Himmel Hoch da komm ich her" arranged by Igor Stravinsky. The program will close with "Symphony of Psalms" with the chorus.

On Sunday at 2:30, Thomas will conduct Mozart's "German Dances" and the first performance by the BSO of Cage's "Suite for Toy Piano," orchestrated by Lou Harrison. The concert will close with Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" and Brahm's Piano Concerto No. 2 in B Flat with pianist Malcolm Frager as soloist.

Tanglewood Weekend

LENOX, Mass. — The fifth weekend at Tanglewood begins 7 p.m. on Friday, August 3 with the Weekend Prelude concert featuring the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor. Mr. Oliver opens the program with Schutz' "Cantate Domino canticum novum" for four voices; follows with G. Gabrieli's "Cantate Domino canticum novum" in six parts; next J. S. Bach's "Komm, Jesu, komm" motet; then Wolf's "Sechs geistliche Lieder nach Gedichten von Joseph von Eichendorff"; and closes the program with Brahm's "Funf Lieder."

At 9 p.m. Principal Guest Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in Beethoven's Symphony no. 7 in A and Copland's Symphony no. 3.

On Saturday, August 4 at 10:30 a.m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday.

On Saturday evening at 8:30, Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in an all-Stravinsky program beginning with Suite from "L'oiseau de feu" and "Canticum sacrum ad honorem Sancti Marci nominus" with Kenneth Riegel tenor, David Evitts bass and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor. The concert continues with J. S. Bach's "Choral-variationen uber das Weinachtslied 'Vom Himmel hoch da komm 'ich her' " arranged by Igor Stravinsky (its first performance at the Berkshire Festival). Mr. Thomas closes the concert with Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor.

On Sunday, August 5 at 2:30, Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in Mozart's German Dances and follows it with Cage's Suite for toy piano, orchestrated by Lou Harrison. This is the first performance of this work by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Thomas continues the program with Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel and closes the concert with Brahms' Piano concerto no. 2 in B flat with Malcolm Frager soloist.

Next at Tanglewood

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, Mass. — The Fifth weekend at Tanglewood begins 7:00 p.m. Friday, Aug. 3, with the Weekend Prelude concert featuring the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor. Oliver opens the program with Schutz' "Cantate Domino canticum novum" for four voices; follows with G. Gabrieli's "Cantate Domino canticum novum" in six parts; next J. S. Bach's "Komm, Jesu, komm" motet; then Wolf's "Sechs geistliche Lieder nach Gedichten von Joseph von Eichendorff"; and closes the program with Brahms' "Funf Lieder".

At 9:00 p.m. Principal Guest Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A and Copland's Symphony no. 3.

Saturday at 10:30 a.m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday.

Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in an all-Stravinsky program beginning with Suite from 'L'oiseau de feu' and "Canticum sacrum ad honorem Sancti Marci nominus" with Kenneth Riegel tenor, David Evitts bass and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor. The concert continues with J. S. Bach's "Choral-variationen uber das Weinachtslied 'Vom Himmel hoch da komm 'ich her'" arranged by Igor Stravinsky (its first performance at the Berkshire Festival). Thomas closes the concert with Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms.

Sunday, Aug. 5 at 2:30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in Mozart's German Dances and follows it with Cage's Suite for toy piano, Straus' Til Eulenspiegel and Brahms' Piano Concert No 2 featuring Malcolm Frager.

THE TIMES RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 42,181
AUG 3 1973

Tanglewood Features Thomas As Conductor

LENOX, Mass. — The fifth weekend of concerts at Tanglewood will feature Michael Tilson Thomas conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three performances.

Tonight at 9 o'clock, Thomas will conduct Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A and Copland's Symphony No. 3. The concert will be preceeded by an evening prelude at 7 p.m. featuring the Tanglewood Festival Chorus under the direction of John Oliver.

On Saturday at 8:30 p.m. Thomas will conduct the Boston players in an all-Stravinsky program. Included will e "Suite From L'oiseau de feu" and "Canticum sacrum ad honorem Sancti Marci nominus," with tenor Kenneth Riegel, bass David Evitts and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

On the same program will be J. S. Bach's "Choral-variationen uber das Weinachtslied 'von Himmel hoch da komm ich her" arranged by Stravinsky, and the Symphony of Psalms by Stravinsky.

On Sunday at 2:30 p.m., Thomas will conclude Tanglewood's fifth weekend with performances of Mozart's German Dances, Cage's Suite for Toy Piano, the tone poem "Till Eulenspiegel" by Strauss, and Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 2 with Malcolm Frager the soloist.

AT TANGLEWOOD

It's Chorus Time

LENOX — The fifth weekend at Tanglewood begins 7 p.m. on Friday with the Weekend Prelude concert featuring the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor. Mr. Oliver opens the program with Schutz' "Cantate Domino canticum novum" for four voices; follows with G. Gabrieli's "Cantate Domino canticum novum" in six parts; next J. S. Bach's "Komm, Jesu, komm" motet; then Wolf's "Sechs geistliche Lieder nach Gedichten von Joseph von Eichendorff"; and closes the program with Brahms' "Funf Lieder."

At 9 p.m. principal guest conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the orchestra in Beethoven's Symphony no. 7 in A and Copland's Symphony no. 3.

On Saturday at 10.30 a.m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday.

On Saturday evening at 8.30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the orchestra in an all-Stravinsky program beginning with Suite from 'L'oiseau de feu' and "Canticum sacrum ad honorem Sancti Marci nominus'' with Kenneth Riegel tenor, David Evitts bass and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor. The concert continues with J. S. Bach's "Choral - variationen uber das Weinachtslied 'Vom Himmel hoch da komm 'ich her' " arranged by Igor Stravinsky (its first performance at the Berkshire Festival). Mr. Thomas closes the concert with Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor.

On Sunday at 2.30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the orchestra in Mozart's German Dances and follows it with Cage's Suite for toy piano, orchestrated by Lou Harrison. This is the first performance of this work by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Thomas continues the program with Strauss' Til Eulenspiegel and closes the concert with Brahms' Piano concerto no. 2 in B flat with Malcolm Frager soloist.

KENNETH RIEGEL

MICHAEL T. THOMAS

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 24,500
AUG 2 1973
New England Newsclip

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
S. 170,000
JUL 29 1973
New England Newsclip

NEWS (E)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528
AUG 2 1973
New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 33,000
AUG 1 1973
New England Newsclip

Michael Tilson Thomas is guest conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood next weekend.

TRANSCRIPT (E)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
D. 13,700
JUL 27 1973
New England Newsclip

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
S. 126,158
JUL 29 1973
New England Newsclip

Tilson Thomas to Conduct at Fifth Tanglewood Weekend

The fifth weekend at Tanglewood begins 7 p.m. on Friday, Aug. 3, with the Weekend Prelude concert featuring the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor. Mr. Oliver opens the program with Schutz' "Cantate Domino canticum novum" for four voices; follows with G. Gabrielli's "Cantate Domino canticum novum" in six parts; next J. S. Bach's "Komm, Jesu, komm" motet; then Wolf's "Sechs geistliche Lieder nach Gedichten von Joseph von Eichendorff"; and closes the program with Brahms' "Funf Lieder".

On Saturday, Aug. 4, at 10:30 a.m. as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday.

On Saturday at 8:30 p.m. Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the orchestra in an all-Stravinsky program beginning with Suite from 'L'oiseau de feu' and "Canticum sacrum ad honorem Sancti Marci nominus" with Kenneth Riegel tenor, David Evitts bass and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor. The concert continues with J. S. Bach 's "Choral-variationen uber das Weinachtslied 'Vom Himmel hoch da komm 'ich her' arranged by Igor Stravinsky (its first performance at the Berkshire Festival). Mr. Thomas closes the concert with Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor.

On Sunday, Aug. 5, at 2:30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in Mozart's German Dances and follows it with Cage's Suite for toy piano, orchestrated by Lou Harrison. This is the first performance of this work by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Thomas continues the program with Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel and closes the concert with Brahms' Piano concerto no. 2 in B flat with Malcolm Frager soloist.

SUN (E)
HUDSON, MASS.
D. 3,050
AUG 2 1973
New England Newsclip

Michael Tilson Thomas Tanglewood Conductor

The fifth weekend at Tanglewood begins 7 p.m. on Friday with the Weekend Prelude concert featuring the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor.

Oliver opens the program with Schutz' "Cantate Domino canticum novum" for four voices; follows with G. Gabrielli's "Cantate Domino canticum novum" in six parts; next J.S. Bach's "Komm, Jesu, komm" motet; then Wolf's "Sechs geistliche Lieder nach Gedichten von Joseph von Eichendorff"; and closes the program with Brahms' "Funf Lieder".

At 9 p.m. principal guest Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the orchestra in Beethoven's Symphony no. 7 in A and Copland's Symphony no. 3.

On Saturday, at 10:30 a.m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an open rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday.

On Saturday at 8:30 p.m., Thomas conducts the orchestra in an all-Stravinsky program beginning with Suite from 'L'oiseau de feu' and "Canticum sacrum ad honorem Sancti Marci nominus'' with Kenneth Reigel tenor, David Evitts bass and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, Oliver conductor.

The concert continues with J.S. Bach's "Choral-variationen uber das Weinachtslied 'Vom Himmel hoch da komm 'ich her'" arranged by Igor Stravinsky (its first performance at the Berkshire Festival). Thomas closes the concert with Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, Oliver conductor.

On Sunday, at 2:30 p.m. Thomas conducts the orchestra in Mozart's German Dances and follows it with Cage's Suite for toy piano, orchestrated by Lou Harrison. Thomas continues the program with Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel and closes the concert with Brahms' Piano concerto no. 2 in B flat with Malcolm Frager soloist.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
S. 135,000
JUL 29 1973
New England Newsclip

Michael Tilson Thomas

Thomas will conduct full Tanglewood weekend

Michael Tilson Thomas, principal guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct all three of this weekend's concerts, which mark the beginning of the second-half of the Tanglewood season.

BMC Fellow

The 28-year-old conductor is also music director of the Buffalo Philharmonic and is in charge of some of the New York Philharmonic's Young People's Concerts this year. He was previously a conducting fellow at the Berkshire Music Center, where he was awarded the Koussevitsky Prize in conducting.

The weekend prelude at 7 p.m. Friday will feature the Tanglewood Festival Chorus under the direction of John Oliver. The works to be performed are Schutz's "Cantate Domino Canticum Novum" for four voices; G. Gabrielli's "Cantate Domino Canticum Novum" in six parts; J.S. Bach's "Komm, Jesu, Komm" motet; Wolf's "Sechs geistliche Lieder nach Gedichten von Joseph von Eichendorff"; and Brahm's "Funf Lieder."

At 9, Thomas will conduct the orchestra in Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 and Copland's Symphony No. 3.

On Saturday at 10:30 a.m., there will be an open rehearsal of works to be preformed on Sunday.

Thomas will conduct the BSO in an all-Stravinsky program on Saturday evening at 8:30. The concert will begin with the suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu" and "Canticum Sacrum ad Honorem Sancti Marci Nominus" with Kenneth Riegel, tenor, David Evitts, on bass, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus with Oliver conducting.

The concert will also include the first performance at the Berkshire Festival of Bach's "Choral-variationen Uber das Weinachtslied'Von Himmel Hoch da komm ich her" arranged by Igor Stravinsky. The program will close with "Symphony of Psalms" with the chorus.

On Sunday at 2:30, Thomas will conduct Mozart's "German Dances" and the first performance by the BSO of Cage's "Suite for Toy Piano," orchestrated by Lou Harrison. The concert will close with Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" and Brahm's Piano Concerto No. 2 in B Flat with pianist Malcolm Frager as soloist.

Tanglewood Weekend

LENOX, Mass. — The fifth weekend at Tanglewood begins 7 p.m. on Friday, August 3 with the Weekend Prelude concert featuring the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor. Mr. Oliver opens the program with Schutz' "Cantate Domino canticum novum" for four voices; follows with G. Gabrieli's "Cantate Domino canticum novum" in six parts; next J. S. Bach's "Komm, Jesu, komm" motet; then Wolf's "Sechs geistliche Lieder nach Gedichten von Joseph von Eichendorff"; and closes the program with Brahm's "Funf Lieder."

At 9 p.m. Principal Guest Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in Beethoven's Symphony no. 7 in A and Copland's Symphony no. 3.

On Saturday, August 4 at 10:30 a.m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday.

On Saturday evening at 8:30, Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in an all-Stravinsky program beginning with Suite from "L'oiseau de feu" and "Canticum sacrum ad honorem Sancti Marci nominus" with Kenneth Riegel tenor, David Evitts bass and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor. The concert continues with J. S. Bach's "Choral-variationen uber das Weinachtslied 'Vom Himmel hoch da komm 'ich her' " arranged by Igor Stravinsky (its first performance at the Berkshire Festival). Mr. Thomas closes the concert with Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor.

On Sunday, August 5 at 2:30, Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in Mozart's German Dances and follows it with Cage's Suite for toy piano, orchestrated by Lou Harrison. This is the first performance of this work by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Thomas continues the program with Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel and closes the concert with Brahms' Piano concerto no. 2 in B flat with Malcolm Frager soloist.

Next at Tanglewood

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, Mass. — The Fifth weekend at Tanglewood begins 7:00 p.m. Friday, Aug. 3, with the Weekend Prelude concert featuring the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor. Oliver opens the program with Schutz' "Cantate Domino canticum novum" for four voices; follows with G. Gabrieli's "Cantate Domino canticum novum" in six parts; next J. S. Bach's "Komm, Jesu, komm" motet; then Wolf's "Sechs geistliche Lieder nach Gedichten von Joseph von Eichendorff"; and closes the program with Brahms' "Funf Lieder".

At 9:00 p.m. Principal Guest Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A and Copland's Symphony no. 3.

Saturday at 10:30 a.m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday.

Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in an all-Stravinsky program beginning with Suite from 'L'oiseau de feu' and "Canticum sacrum ad honorem Sancti Marci nominus" with Kenneth Riegel tenor, David Evitts bass and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor. The concert continues with J. S. Bach's "Choral-variationen uber das Weinachtslied 'Vom Himmel hoch da komm 'ich her'" arranged by Igor Stravinsky (its first performance at the Berkshire Festival). Thomas closes the concert with Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms.

Sunday, Aug 5 at 2:30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in Mozart's German Dances and follows it with Cage's Suite for toy piano, Straus' Til Eulenspiegel and Brahms' Piano Concert No 2 featuring Malcolm Frager.

THE TIMES RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 42,181
AUG 3 1973

Tanglewood Features Thomas As Conductor

LENOX, Mass. — The fifth weekend of concerts at Tanglewood will feature Michael Tilson Thomas conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three performances.

Tonight at 9 o'clock, Thomas will conduct Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A and Copland's Symphony No. 3. The concert will be preceeded by an evening prelude at 7 p.m. featuring the Tanglewood Festival Chorus under the direction of John Oliver.

On Saturday at 8:30 p.m. Thomas will conduct the Boston players in an all-Stravinsky program. Included will e "Suite From 'L'oiseau de feu" and "Canticum sacrum ad honorem Sancti Marci nominus," with tenor Kenneth Riegel, bass David Evitts and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

On the same program will be J. S. Bach's "Choral-variationen uber das Weinachtslied 'von Himmel hoch da komm ich her" arranged by Stravinsky, and the Symphony of Psalms by Stravinsky.

On Sunday at 2:30 p.m., Thomas will conclude Tanglewood's fifth weekend with performances of Mozart's German Dances, Cage's Suite for Toy Piano, the tone poem "Till Eulenspiegel" by Strauss, and Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 2 with Malcolm Frager the soloist.

TANGLEWOOD

Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday night at 9 and Saturday evening at 8:30 in selections by Beethoven, Copeland and Stravinsky. The Tanglewood Festival Chorus of Lenox, Mass. will perform on Friday at 7 p.h. and on Saturday the Boston Symphony Orchestra will hold an open rehearsal at 10:30 a.m.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 187,097
AUG 9 1973
New England Newsclip

Mozart dances set feet tapping at Tanglewood finale

By Louis Snyder

Lenox, Mass.

An almost faultless combination of shining summer weather and invigorating music to embellish it, brought 12,116 listeners to Tanglewood last Sunday afternoon. To conclude the Berkshire Festival's fifth week, all three Boston symphony concerts of which he had conducted,

Music

Michael Tilson Thomas provided Mozart, John Cage, and Richard Strauss for pure enjoyment, to balance the weightier Second Piano Concerto by Brahms (B flat), played by Malcolm Frager as the program's second half.

Mozart's six German dances, we were reminded, were written not as concert pieces but to be danced to, laughed and talked through, even if this wasn't their reception on Tanglewood's Greensward or in the shed. Nevertheless, the exuberance of their performance and the general euphoria they evoked quickly removed the curse of formality from them, to set the feet tapping and heads wagging.

AP photo

Tilson Thomas

Something new — a first performance, in fact, by the BSO — was Lou Harrison's orchestration of John Cage's "Suite for Toy Piano." Sure enough, there was a child's toy piano, on a waist-level stand beside Mr. Thomas, and a microphone to send its nostalgic, thumping sounds to the far reaches of the lawn. The conductor was the "child pianist" in this case, and he played the suite through with becoming solemnity before taking up his baton for the Harrison orchestral version.

Diverting exercise

The piece, which to those who are wary of Cage's serious intentions, might have seemed suspect at the start, soon became something else again — a straightforward, delightful, and diverting exercise. Mr. Harrison, in his use both of strings and percussion, has cleverly done much to suggest tonally the elemental timbre of the toy-piano note, meanwhile appropriately disclosing the essential melodic inventiveness of the suite itself. As it turned out, it wasn't a put-on for Cage lovers or haters — just charming, easy listening.

Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," was also easy if considerably more familiar listening. The orchestra made glowing sounds and Mr. Thomas adroitly interwove them in this sassy musical account of a 15th-century Dick Tuck who, as legend would have it, was apprehended and permanently chastised. Mr. Thomas, who manages to add an extra personal touch to everything he does, did so in this case with a sensitive shaping of the afterpiece, which follows the sad end of Till — a whimsical "and this is the way it all happened" statement at once wry and poignant.

Self-contented mood

Perhaps the mood already established was too self-contented, or the ear too ready to seek challenges. For some reason, the mighty B flat Piano Concerto No. 2 of Brahms never quite struck fire. Mr. Frager's technical command, which is tremendous, seemed unduly to be battling a keyboard which responded with something less than the sought-for richness, and the balance between soloist and orchestra, which never flagged, imparted an uncomfortable air of conformity, dictated more by necessity than easy rapport.

Things improved after the opening Allegro movement, and there was much beautiful pianism in the Andante as well as brilliant pyrotechnics to conclude. All in all, not the hoped-for definitive performance.

It must be said, however, that the audience greeted the conclusion of each movement with rapturous applause, including the end of the third which proceeds, without pause, into the Finale. For this, the vociferous ones were stared down by Mr. Thomas, who conducted with his back to the orchestra until the interruption had faded away.

AUG 9 1973
New England Newsclip

Most Interestingly Varied Concert

By RICHARD CONWAY

Sunday's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Michael Tilson Thomas, was one of the most interestingly varied ones of the season. Works by Mozart, Cage, Strauss, and Brahms provided something for everyone, and a crowd of 12,116 came to hear the music and enjoy a particularly beautiful day in the Berkshires.

With the exception of the long and powerful Brahms' Second Piano Concerto, given a strong reading by soloist Malcolm Frager, which found its greatest fulfillment in the final two movements, the concert was one that was particularly conducive to just lying on the grass and rather passively enjoying the music.

Thomas opened the program with the 'Six German Dances, K.509", composed by Mozart in 1787. Undoubtedly composed for some wealthy patron's Grand Ball, the dances are based on the triple meter Laendler, a peasant dance that was one of the fore-runners of the waltz. They are delightfully charming, filled with Mozart's ever flowing melodic stream. One is ever amazed at the wealth of beautiful music written for purely background purposes.

Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel", which seemed to be a bit hurried, yet captured enough of the fun and humor of the work to be pleasingly rewarding.

The most interesting work of the first half was John Cage's "Suite for Toy Piano".

Cage has been one of the most influential composers of this century. He has been particularly interested in the possibilities of aleatoric, or chance music. His interest in Zen Buddhism has also led him to explore the meaning of silence in music — that is, rather than thinking of rests, he sees these points of silence as having as much inherent meaning as the lines of sound.

Because of this, and the often rather outlandish experimental works he has put before the public, Sunday's Toy Piano Suite was quite surprising. Conductor Thomas began the work by playing the opening movement on an amplified toy paino. After the first section, which is entirely the solo piano, the orchestra enters.

Oriental influence is everywhere apparent, particularly in these first two sections. Medievalisms pervade the third section, which is followed by a very surprising romantically scored one. The final part is processional in character.

The surprising thing is that the music is absolutely accessible and contains none of the absurdities that frequently characterize Cage's music. Much of the credit for the success of the Suite has to go to Lou Harrison, who did the orchestral arrangement, and created some of the colorful sounds that give atmosphere to the work.

Malcolm Frager is, in my opinion, one of the finest pianists before the public today. He brings a particular intelligence and sensitivity to his playing that is not all that common these days. There are many brilliant technicians, but musicianship is another matter. Frager's Weekend Prelude program a few weeks ago, when he performed the music of Haydn and Mozart, was one of the outstanding concerts of the season. His playing of the Brahms on Sunday added yet another dimension of his expressive power.

AUG 9 1973
New England Newsclip

Sound of music rings from Bridgeport to the Berkshires

By RUTH LAMPLAND ROSS

It was the biggest mute horn I have ever seen.

Topping the flashing brass tuba like a giant black marshmallow, it was there on stage with the full ensemble, augmented by two harps, for one tingling phrase of the Saturday night Tanglewood performance of Stravinsky's "Firebird Suite;" then was taken out like a giant black ice cream cone the next.

The strikingly beautiful music went on there in the airy but crowd-packed shed in this scenic Berkshire center where the Boston symphony draws thousands of music lovers and students like a magnet to its Summer performances.

Westport's French horn player, David Ohanian, was there in this prestigious ensemble playing under young Michael Tilson Thomas' genius baton. We recognized other Fairfield County music lovers in the audience.

The tone of the muted tuba was just one of the many exotic instrumental colors in an evening illuminated by the brilliant orchestration and choral composition of Stravinsky, opening the Fromm Festival of Contemporary Music.

There were 180 members of the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, trained by John Oliver, in the background of the stage, along with outstanding New York City Opera tenor Kenneth Riegel and David Evitts, bass.

The Boston Symphony provided before-and-after intermission performances of Stravinsky's "Canticum Sacrum" and his "Symphony of Psalms."

Sound of music

This was just one event in our annual treasured music-in-the-Berkshires weekend. "The hills are alive with the sound of music" to those resolute ones who can resist the endless roadside tag sales and antiques shops and art [illegible]

Saturday afternoon we [illegible] a polished performance [illegible] Berkshire String quartet on Music Mountain, with talented Boston harpsichordist Irma Rogell.

Miss Rogell, making her fourth appearance there, brought out the sonority of her concert size harpsichord, and augmented the beautifully sensitive playing of the group.

Songs in the shed

Sunday afternoon in the Music Shed on the Battell Estate, with members of the Litchfield County Choral Union singing, and 20 Yale instrumentalists accompanying, the season's final concert of Yale-In-Norfolk, presented an unforgettable reading of Honegger's "King David."

Jack Litten was tenor soloist; Joy Zornig, mezzo; Judith Fay, soprano, and Benjamin DeLoache as narrator.

Preceding it was the premiere of conductor Fenno Heath's just-written, extremely moving musical setting for the Dylan Thomas poem, "In The Beginning," presented with eight-piece brass and woodwind accompaniment.

Sunday evening, the animated weekly revue of the Sacred Heart University Cabaret gave tribute to the danceable tunes and lyrics of Stephen Sondheim. Next Saturday, "Jacques Brel is Alive and Well," will be presented in their informal checked-tablecloth night club tradition.

Electronic bard

A Fairfield County Summer weekend is not complete without at lease some contact with the Shakespeare theatre. The electronic music of "Macbeth" couldn't have been a greater contrast to the classic fare.

The effect of the tolling bells at the beginning and end of Act Two was eerie; the easily understandable incantation of the black-robed courtly witches as they peered with dignity into the green-lighted [illegible] cauldron [illegible] was entirely different from any [illegible] the role I have previously seen.

As they sang at Yale-in-Norfolk, sweet is the work of a music critic.

NEW WILMINGTON, MASS.
AUG 9 1973
New England Newsclip

Mostly Music

Tanglewood

By Jim Richter

Sunday at Tanglewood Malcolm Frager's performance of Brahms' Second Piano Concerto highlighted a well rounded program given by Michael Tilson Thomas and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The first half of the concert featured works by Mozart, Cage and Richard Strauss. The afternoon began with The Six German Dances K. 509 by Mozart. These are among his lighter works, having been composed as occasional music Thomas conducted them well though they are not really wha one could call a "test" for a conductor. John Cage's "Suite for Toy Piano" was performed next, first by Thomas alone and then by the orchestra. Though this reviewer is not particularly a Cage fan the Suite proved a pleasant surprise. It dates from 1948, and is much more conservative than most of Cage's recent works. At times it was relatively melodic. Much of its appeal may be attributed to the orchestration which was done by Lou Harrison.

The big work of the first part of the program was Strauss' tone poem "Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche" Op. 28. It is a lavishly orchestrated work demanding orchestral virtuosity and a good conductor. Thomas conducted well, and the performance was good but not great. This, incidently, was this reviewer's feeling about Thomas' conducting during the entire concert.

The real heart of the program was Brahms' Second Piano Concerto in B flat, one of the greatest masterpieces in all of music. It is a piece which most pianists think twice about before daring to perform it. The first movement is full of impossible leaps, runs and chords which make it a technical monster. The soloist, Mr. Frager, was, for the most part, able to handle this difficult movement, though he had a tendency to play some sections more slowly so as not to miss notes. Where this occurred one could only wish that he had been more daring, but, considering the difficulties involved, this is but a minor point.

The second movement (Allegro Appasionato) was excellent, with Frager giving an energetic performance. The slow movement (Andante) was, perhaps, the high point. Frager played beautifully, and the movement worked its spell upon the audience, which could not resist applauding it. The final movement was also well done. Its jovial first theme belies its being a difficult piece. Frager was able to bring it off with a good deal of feeling...

In assessing the performance as a whole, it must be stressed that Frager gave the concerto its due. The only shortcoming was that the element of excitement, which only the greatest pianists can achieve, was not fully present. As a fellow concertgoer was heard to remark: "Good, but not Serkin!"

UNION (M)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 84,000

AUG 4 1973

New England Newspap

Copland Symphony Fills Night With Special Sound

By R.C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — This is Michael Tilson Thomas weekend at Tanglewood. Friday night he conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra with music of Beethoven and Copland. Tonight it's all Stravinsky, and Sunday it's a mixed pot of Mozart, Strauss, Cage and Brahms.

The Copland Symphony No. 3 was the main event Friday. It filled 40 minutes after intermission with that special sound unique to America's foremost composer, personal and contemporary but still traditional and American.

Thomas helped its sinewy power to cut through the heavy, humid night air. Its brassy dissonances contrasted dramatically with almost benign passages tranquil in modd but raspy in harmony.

It may turn out that the best conductors of this kind of tradition - in- formation will be those born about the same time it was coming into being.

Thomas was born in 1943: Copland started composing his third symphony in 1944.

The Beethoven Symphony No. 7 which opened the program had its niceties, the fascinating second movement, for instance, which floats a lovely melody over a persistent, rhythmic plucking of the cellos and basses.

The first movement seemed a bit slower than might be expected and consequently took on an air of deliberation; and the third was routinely satisfying.

The final movement, however, left me with an uncomfortable feeling. Famously identified as an example of Beethoven's "unbuttoned" style, Thomas tended to overplay its exuberance, and its final few measures nearly came undone.

The 100-member Tanglewood Festival Chorus, which has contributed many beautiful moments to the Berkshire Festival this summer, sang a 50-minute program from the 18th and 19th centuries for the 7 o'clock prelude program.

The chorus has been trained by John Oliver to express a subtlety worthy of a smaller, more nimble group, and Friday it achieved an especially lyric beauty by slightly shading off the crispness it is capable of to enhance a gracefully flowing smoothness.

The program included two Cantate Dominos, one by Schutz and another by G. Gabrieli, six sacred songs by Wolf and five songs by Brahms.

All of it was characterized by a musical taste that avoided the theatricality of sudden changes of volume and speed while retaining a pulsing liveliness.

Tonight Thomas will conduct an all-Stravinsky program featuring the chorus and two vocal soloists with the orchestra.

Frager Carefully Delineates Brahms

By RICHARD VINCENT
Music Critic

The music lovers continue to roll in at Tanglewood. (over 30,000 for the weekend) and for the most part they are being well served both by the music and the weather.

The conductor for this weekend was young Michael Tilson Thomas who cut his teeth around these parts, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra seems to, in the main, play very well for him.

ON A BEAUTIFUL Sunday afternoon, over 12,000 people showed up to hear a varied concert that featured Malcom Frager, that fine pianist, play the Brahms Concerto No 2. We heard this same work several days before with Andre Watts and Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia at Saratoga, and odious or not, some comparisons were inevitable.

Frager's performance seemed more musically structured, or, more musically coherent than Watts' and, in terms of technique more carefully played and therefore more concise.

This is a massive work, called by one musicologist a symphony with piano obligato, and this is not a bad description.

IT IS LONG. (Ormandy and Watts took 30 seconds more to play it or so it seemed) and very complex. Some of the complexities stem from the fact that there are some parts of it that are pianistically somewhat awkward and the way these parts are played is indicative to a degree of the players temperment and approach to the instrument and the music. One may opt as Watts did, to speed through them or to carefully delineate them as Frager did. Take your choice.

Ormandy's accompaniment to the work was more exact and nonetheless still more lush, particularly in the last movements with the singing melodies in the strings.

The important cello solo in the third movment was played by both Samuel May, (PO) and Jules Eskin (BSO) with competence and adequately, but not with any particular flair. It would be nice, one time, to hear a Starker or Bernard Greenhouse play this lovely melody just to see if there is a marked qualitative difference. (I know, pick, pick, pick. . .)

ANOTHER WORK on Sunday was John Cage's "Suite for Toy Piano" (1948) with Thomas himself playing just that, a toy piano, albeit amplified.

Cage must be embarrassed by this work nowadays, not because it is a poor piece of music, on the contrary, it is imaginative and even original in spots. But it is also emminently playable because it is structured, and Cage the acknowledged master of the aleatory and of the musical "put-on" must be uneasy about a work that just 25 years after it was written doesn't even offend anyone. True, one doesn't come away whistling an air from it, but, with a little concentration, one could.

'CRUCIBLE' STARS — Margaret Yauger, as Elizabeth Proctor, and Fredereick Burchinal, as John Proctor, appear in scene from the Lake George Opera Festival's production of "The Crucible" which premieres at the Festival theater on Aviation Road, Queensbury, Thursday at 8:15 p.m.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 141,169

AUG 7 1973

5 FIFTH WEEKEND

AUGUST 3
7 pm Weekend Prelude
Tanglewood Festival Chorus,
John Oliver, Director
9 pm MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS
Beethoven: Symphony No. 7
Copland: Symphony No. 3

AUGUST 4
10:30 am Open Rehearsal
8:30 pm MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS
STRAVINSKY PROGRAM
Firebird Suite
Canticum Sacrum Kenneth Riegel, David Evitts,
Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, Dir.
Vom Himmel Hoch Variations
Symphony of Psalms
Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, Dir.

AUGUST 5
2:30 pm MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS
Mozart: German Dances
Cage: Suite for Toy Piano
Strauss: Till Eulenspiegel
Brahms: Piano Concerto No. 2
Malcolm Frager

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 58,838

AUG 6 1973

Inspiring Weekend on Orchestra Scene

At the Concert

By EDWARD FRENCH

The 5,000-plus audience that came to the Saratoga Performing Arts Center Friday evening to hear Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra with violinist Isaac Stern as soloist was rewarded with a performance of the Brahms Violin Concerto that, for sheer perfection and inspiration, will not be surpassed for many a day.

The concerto is one of the great masterpieces of the literature, and this time it received its just due from soloist and orchestra.

As Isaac Stern was in his very best form it was violin playing at its loftiest level technically and musically. We have yet to hear a more eloquent conception of the Adagio than the one Stern gave us. It was almost unbearably beautiful. The grandeur of the first movement and the rhythmic vitality of the third were projected with equal authority.

FOR COMPLETE rapport with a soloist, Eugene Ormandy is in a class by himself. Every nuance, every rhythmical inflection was faithfully mirrored, thus creating an ensemble of exceptional unity as to mood and color.

Unfortunately, a jet, presumably off course and flying low, passed over the amphitheater in the middle of the slow movement. Soloist and orchestra stopped until the noise died away and then resumed as though nothing had happened.

Ormandy and the Philadelphians have been widely acclaimed for their playing of the Shostakovich Symphony No. 5, one of that composer's best regarded works. We were given firsthand verification as to the validity of this assumption by the powerful impact Ormandy's masterful and convincing reading made.

It was a virtuoso performance contemporary symphony.

MICHAEL TILSON Thomas conducted all three concerts of the fifth weekend of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood. Friday's program offered Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 and Copland's Third Symphony while Saturday was devoted to stravinsky with emphasis on works for chorus.

Sunday afternoon there was a stunning performance of Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 2 with Malcolm Frager as soloist.

It has been a long time since we have heard playing that so satisfactorily illustrated Brahms' special kind of romanticism. Frager is a master pianist with a superb technique and a tone that is beautiful at all levels, loud and soft.

Both the opening movement and the Scherzo are massive in structure and power. This aspect was perfectly realized in Frager's interpretation. A large ringing tone, incisive rhythmic accents and what seemed to be just the right choice of tempi distinguished his playing of these movements.

IT SEEMED that Thomas wanted a slightly faster pace in the Andante than Frager desired, but this was quickly adjusted when the solo piano entered. Frager's perfect shaping of Brahms' expressive phrases and the lovely sound he coaxed from his instrument made this movement a sheer joy to hear.

The tempo and grace of the Allegretto grazioso made a perfect balance for what had preceeded it. We have never heard the accelerando leading to the coda done so marvelously. It was so gradual and steady in its growing intensity that it made the coda twice as exciting.

Other music on the program included a deftly performed contemporary trifle, John Cage's "Suite for a Toy Piano," as orchestrated by Lous Harrison, and a colorful, superbably played Strauss "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Concert Review

Michael Tilson Thomas: Less Than Best At Lenox

By MARTHA deB. BEAVER

For the fifth weekend of the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood in Lenox, Michael Tilson Thomas, one of the two principal guest conductors, presented three varied programs.

Friday evening's performance consisted of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A., Op. 92, and Aaron Copland's Third Symphony.

For the Beethoven, Thomas rearranged the orchestral seating, (not unusual in itself) placing the second violins at his right, with the violas assuming the former's usual position next to the first violins, and cellos where the violas normally play.

Thus the higher pitched string instruments framed the other sections, not always an audial success, especially in the first movement when the second violins were submerged in the unhampered cello and double bass parts, and again during the Allegretto.

If Thomas was seeking to emphasize the counterpuntal play, the movement and development of a theme from one section to another, the violins would have been better off in their original positions. After all, the F-holes through which the tones emerge, are mostly turned inward and much of the sound must be amalgamated with the other instruments before it is projected outward, thus losing its clarity and distinction.

We found the first movement's introduction extremely slow for prolonged interest in the music's harmonic sparseness and repetitiveness, on which Thomas seemed to linger and emphasize, with much springing forward and pointing of his baton. Often these had little meaning throughout the symphony, since parts and stresses were not always indicated or came later than the directions.

The second movement, Allegretto, produced excellent coloration and build-up, the rhythmic repetitions inexorable as intended, and suggesting a dance from the catacombs, or nether world. With the Allegro con brio finale, taken too fast for clarity, or because the strings just weren't coordinated, Thomas whirled from one section to another in almost as swift a manner as the music quickened and moved.

It was not the most uplifting performance. Silences were not always sustained, and tonal edges soft instead of sharp. The audience didn't seem to mind and applauded Thomas vigorously. To many the young conductor can do no wrong.

With the orchestra returned to its accustomed seating, Copland's symphony was distinguished by outstanding percussion production, including piano, pitted against and with horns, trumpets and trombones. The apposite rhythms of the Allegro molto, the ebb and flow of movement were impressively used.

A moving melody by the first and second violins in the andantino, after which the clarinet brings in the low strings to develop it, suggested a simple country dance. The final movement was introduced by a fanfare of chorale from the winds and strings, splendidly intoned.

Against low-pitched accents by the drums, the atonal melody developed and built into a full orchestral ending, brass and tympani predominating. Copland always displays good clean writing, modestly inventive, and never offensive to the ear. The audience displayed their appreciation with prolonged applause.

Thomas showed himself to better advantage during Saturday morning's rehearsal, when we heard him spend a good bit of time on Mozart's Six German Dance, K.509, stressing style and clarity. Charming dances in triple time, full of grace notes, each with a trio, and transition to the following dance, as we listened we wondered why some of the simpler classical compositions (that includes all centuries) are seldom, if ever, introduced to the multitudes who are bombarded with canned music wherever they go.

Certain to delight the Sunday audience was John Cage's "Suite for Toy Piano," composed in 1948, and arranged for orchestra by his friend Lou Harrison. Harrison's version calls for a regular piano, but Thomas selected and played a toy piano, amplified, (it sounded like bells struck with a wooden gong), and not especially effective.

We cannot report on Malcolm Frager's performance of Brahms' second piano concerto, since Thomas rehearsed only a few scattered parts. Our office co-worker was disappointed in the coordinated interpretation Sunday, pronouncing it uninspired. The Strauss, "Til Eulenspiegel," perhaps because the writing is less involved than the Brahms, had more verve.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE (M)
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
D. 15,835

AUG 7 1973

New England Newspap

Frager Carefully Delineates Brahms

By RICHARD VINCENT
Music Critic

The music lovers continue to roll in at Tanglewood, over 30,000 for the weekend, and for the most part they are being well served both by the music and the weather.

The conductor for this weekend was young Michael Tilson Thomas who cut his teeth around these parts, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra seems to, in the main, play very well for him.

ON A BEAUTIFUL Sunday afternoon, over 12,000 people showed up to hear a varied concert that featured Malcolm Frager, that fine pianist, play the Brahms Concerto No. 2. We heard the same work several days before with Andre Watts and Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia at Saratoga, and unless I am not some comparisons were inevitable.

Frager's performance seemed more musically structured, or, more musically coherent than Watts' and, in terms of technique more carefully played and therefore more concise.

This is a massive work, called by one musicologist a symphony with piano obligato, and this is not a bad description.

IT IS LONG. Ormandy and Watts took 30 seconds more to play it or so it seemed, and very complex. Some of the complexities stem from the fact that there are some parts of it that are pianistically somewhat awkward and the way these parts are played is indicative to a degree of the players temperament and approach to the instrument and the music. One may opt as Watts did, to speed through them or to carefully delineate them as Frager did. Take your choice.

Ormandy's accompaniment to the work was more exact and nonetheless still more lush, particularly in the last movements with the singing melodies in the strings.

The important cello solo in the third movment was played by both Samuel Mayes (PO) and Jules Eskin (BSO) with competence and adequately, but not with any particular flair. It would be nice, one time, to hear a Starker or Bernard Greenhouse play this lovely melody just to see if there is a marked qualitative difference. I know, pick, pick, pick.

ANOTHER WORK on Sunday was John Cage's "Suite for Toy Piano" (1948) with Thomas himself playing just that, a toy piano, albeit amplified.

Cage must be embarrassed by this work nowadays, not because it is a poor piece of music, on the contrary, it is imaginative and even original in spots. But it is also eminiently playable because it is structured, and Cage the acknowledged master of the aleatory and of the musical "put-on" must be uneasy about a work that just 25 years after it was written doesn't even offend anyone. True, one doesn't come away whistling an air from it, but with a little concentration, one could.

'CRUCIBLE' STARS — Margaret Yauger, as Elizabeth Proctor, and Frederick Burchinal, as John Proctor, appear in scene from the Lake George Opera Festival's production of "The Crucible" which premieres at the Festival theater on Aviation Road, Queensbury, Thursday at 8:15 p.m.

Copland Symphony Fills Night With Special Sound

By R.C. HAMMERICH

LENOX. — This is Michael Tilson Thomas weekend at Tanglewood. Friday night he conducted the Boston symphony Orchestra in a mixed music of Beethoven and Copland, Tonight it's all Stravinsky, and Sunday it's a mixed pot of Mozart, Strauss, Cage and Brahms.

The Copland Symphony No. 3 was the main event Friday. It filled 40 minutes after intermission with that special sound unique to America's foremost composer, part [illegible] and contemporary but [illegible] traditional and American.

Thomas helped [illegible] power to cut through heavy, humid air [illegible] brassy dissonances [illegible] trasted dramatically [illegible] almost benign [illegible] tranquil in mood and [illegible] in harmony.

It may take [illegible] best conductors to [illegible] of tradition [illegible] will be those born since [illegible] same time it was composed [illegible] being.

Thomas was born in 1947. Copland started composing his third symphony in 1944.

The Beethoven Symphony No. 7 which opened the program had its niceties, the fascinating second movement, for instance, which floats a lovely melody over a persistent, rhythmic plucking of the cellos and basses.

The first time [illegible] seemed a bit slower than might be expected and consequently took on an air of deliberation; and the third was routinely satisfying.

The final movement, however, left me with an uncomfortable feeling. Famously identified as an example of Beethoven's "unbuttoned" style, Thomas tended to overplay its exuberance, and its final two measures nearly came unglued.

The [illegible] Tanglewood Festival Chorus, which has contributed many beautiful moments to the Berkshire Festival this summer, sang a 50-minute program from the 15th and 19th centuries for the 9 o'clock prelude program.

The chorus has been trained by John Oliver to express a subtlety worthy of a smaller, more nimble group, and Friday achieved an especially beauty by slightly slowing the crisoness it [illegible] to enhance a graceful, flowing smoothness.

The program included two Cantate Dominus, one by Schutz and another by G. Gabrieli, six sacred songs by Wolf and five songs by Brahms.

All of it was characterized by a musical [illegible] that avoided the [illegible]

[illegible] Francis [illegible] accompanying the [illegible] vocal [illegible]

Weekend Prelude
Tanglewood Festival Chorus,
John Oliver, Director
MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS
Beethoven: Symphony No. 7
Copland: Symphony No. 3

FIFTH WEEKEND

Open Rehearsal
MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS
STRAVINSKY PROGRAM
Firebird Suite
Canticum Sacrum Kenneth Riegel, David Evitts, Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, Dir.
Vom Himmel Hoch Variations
Symphony of Psalms
Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, Dir.

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS
Mozart: German Dances
Cage: Suite for Toy Piano
Strauss: Till Eulenspiegel
Brahms: Piano Concerto No. 2
Malcolm Frager

Inspiring Weekend on Orchestra Scene

By EDWARD FRENCH

At the Concert

The 5,000-plus audience that came to the Saratoga Performing Arts Center Friday evening to hear Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra with violinist Isaac Stern as soloist was rewarded with a performance of the Brahms Violin Concerto that, for sheer perfection and inspiration, will not be surpassed for many a day.

The concerto is one of the great masterpieces of the literature, and this time it received its just due from soloist and orchestra.

As Isaac Stern was in his very best form it was violin playing at its loftiest level technically and musically. We have yet to hear a more eloquent conception of the Adagio than the one Stern gave us. It was almost unbearably beautiful. The grandeur of the first movement and the rhythmic vitality of the third were projected with equal authority.

FOR COMPLETE rapport with a soloist, Eugene Ormandy is in a class by himself. Every nuance, every rhythmical inflection was faithfully mirrored, thus creating an ensemble of exceptional unity as to mood and color.

Unfortunately, a jet, presumably off course and flying low, passed over the amphitheater in the middle of the slow movement. Soloist and orchestra stopped until the noise died away and then resumed as though nothing had happened.

Ormandy and the Philadelphians have been widely acclaimed for their playing of the Shostakovich Symphony No. 5, one of that composer's best regarded works. We were given firsthand verification as to the validity of this assumption by the powerful impact Ormandy's masterful and convincing reading made.

It was a virtuoso performance of contemporary symphony.

MICHAEL TILSON Thomas conducted all three concerts of the fifth weekend of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood. Friday's program offered Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 and Copland's Third Symphony while Saturday was devoted to Stravinsky with emphasis on works for chorus.

Sunday afternoon there was a stunning performance of Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 2 with Malcolm Frager as soloist.

It has been a long time since we have heard playing that so satisfactorily illustrated Brahms' special kind of romanticism. Frager is a master pianist with a superb technique and a tone that is beautiful at all levels, loud and soft.

Both the opening movement and the Scherzo are massive in structure and power. This aspect was perfectly realized in Frager's interpretation. A large ringing tone, incisive rhythmic accents and what seemed to be just the right choice of tempi distinguished his playing of these movements.

IT SEEMED that Thomas wanted a slightly faster pace in the Andante than Frager desired, but this was quickly adjusted when the solo piano entered. Frager's perfect shaping of Brahms' expressive phrases and the lovely sound he coaxed from his instrument made this movement a sheer joy to hear.

The tempo and grace of the Allegretto grazioso made a perfect balance for what had preceeded it. We have never heard the accelerando leading to the coda done so marvelously. It was so gradual and steady in its growing intensity that it made the coda twice as exciting.

Other music on the program included a deftly performed contemporary trifle, John Cage's "Suite for a Toy Piano," as orchestrated by Lous Harrison, and a colorful, superbably played Strauss "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Concert Review

Michael Tilson Thomas: Less Than Best At Lenox

By MARTHA deB. BEAVER

For the fifth weekend of the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood in Lenox, Michael Tilson Thomas, one of the two principal guest conductors, presented three varied programs.

Friday evening's performance consisted of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A, Op. 92, and Aaron Copland's Third Symphony.

For the Beethoven, Thomas rearranged the orchestral seating, (not unusual in itself) placing the second violins at his right, with the violas assuming the former's usual position next to the first violins, and cellos where the violas normally play.

Thus the higher pitched string instruments framed the other sections, not always an audial success, especially in the first movement when the second violins were submerged in the unhampered cello and double bass parts, and again during the Allegretto.

If Thomas was seeking to emphasize the counterpuntal play, the movement and development of a theme from one section to another, the violins would have been better left in their original positions. After all, the F-holes through which the tones emerge, are mostly turned inward and much of the sound must be amalgamated with the other instruments before it is projected outward, thus losing its clarity and distinction.

We found the first movement's introduction extremely slow for prolonged interest in the music's harmonic sparseness and repetitiveness, on which Thomas seemed to linger and emphasize, with much springing forward and pointing of his baton. Often these had little meaning throughout the symphony, since parts and stresses were not always indicated or came later than the directions.

The second movement, Allegretto, produced excellent coloration and build-up, the rhythmic repetitions inexorable as intended, and suggesting a dance from the catacombs, or nether world. With the Allegro con brio finale, taken too fast for clarity, or because the strings just weren't coordinated, Thomas whirled from one section to another in almost as swift a manner as the music quickened and moved.

It was not the most uplifting performance. Silences were not always sustained, and tonal edges soft instead of sharp. The audience didn't seem to mind and applauded Thomas vigorously. To many the young conductor can do no wrong.

With the orchestra returned to its accustomed seating, Copland's symphony was distinguished by outstanding percussion production, including piano, pitted against and with horns, trumpets and trombones. The apposite rhythms of the Allegro molto, the ebb and flow of movement were impressively used.

A moving melody by the first and second violins in the andantino, after which the clarinet brings in the low strings to develop it, suggested a simple country dance. The final movement was introduced by a fanfare of chorale from the winds and strings, splendidly intoned.

Against low-pitched accents by the drums, the atonal melody developed and built into a full orchestral ending, brass and tympani predominating. Copland always displays good clean writing, modestly inventive and never offensive to the ear. The audience displayed their appreciation with prolonged applause.

Thomas showed himself to better advantage during Saturday morning's rehearsal, when we heard him spend a good bit of time on Mozart's Six German Dance, K 509, stressing style and clarity. Charming dances in triple time, full of grace notes, each with a trio, and transition to the following dance, as we listened we wondered why some of the simpler classical compositions (that includes all centuries) are seldom, if ever, introduced to the multitudes who are bombarded with canned music wherever they go.

Certain to delight the Sunday audience was John Cage's "Suite for Toy Piano," composed in 1948, and arranged for orchestra by his friend Lou Harrison. Harrison's version calls for a regular piano, but Thomas selected and played a toy piano, amplified, it sounded like bells struck with a wooden gong, and not especially effective.

We cannot report on Malcolm Frager's performance of Brahms' second piano concerto, since Thomas rehearsed only a few scattered parts. Our office co-worker was disappointed in the coordinated interpretation Sunday, pronouncing it uninspired. The Strauss, "Til Eulen-piegel," perhaps because the writing is less involved than the Brahms, had more verve.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (F)
PITTSFIELD, MASS
D. 30,400
AUG 6 1973

Music review

Michael Tilson Thomas at the helm

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

THE BOSTON Symphony Orchestra, completing the fifth weekend of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood yesterday afternoon, showed mid-season signs of having submitted to a half-dozen, more or less, cavalieri servente, for whom it has patently shown different degrees of artistic respect.

* * *

The program opened with a couple of cute numbers, each amusing in its way but of little challenge to an ensemble of grown men, so that when the musicians were supposed to buckle down seriously to Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," they displayed an indifference which the conductor of the weekend, Michael Tilson Thomas, sought to dispel by inciting them by more violent gestures and asking for voce piena.

The saving grace of the afternoon was the broad and splendid performance of the Brahms Second Piano Concerto by Malcolm Frager. A mature comprehension of the overpowering score was facilitated by complete mastery of the keyboard and never ceasing attention to the production of an impressive tone. Especially significant was Frager's observance of spaciousness where effective and the injection of a proper spirit in each of the four movements. The lovely cello solo introduction of the andante was played by Jules Eskin.

Mozart's Six German Dances are charming dinner music, and the Cage Suite for Toy Piano, orchestrated by Lou Harrison, is worth trying — once. "Till" cannot be spoiled, even by indeterminate wind intonation nor the conductor's disregard of a proper character for the lovely solo for the viola section. The short violine cadenza by Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein redeemed many other flaws.

* * *

On Friday Thomas changed the disposition of his strings by placing the second violins outside to his right with the cellos behind them, and the violas behind the first violins to his left. This was advantageous in the first movement of the Beethoven Seventh Symphony, where the seconds have a theme which should be prominent and can be obscured if they are tonally hidden on the stage. It was effective and highly commendable, in most cases, although Thomas still allowed the firsts, with their ascending semiquavers, to overpower the excellent Boston second violin section.

In the allegretto, Thomas achieved one of the most beautiful performances of that gem within recent memory. Striking a felicitous tempo at once, the orchestra produced a great variety of subdued tonal nuances within the circumscribed limits which are properly imposed, and went from one degree of lovely restraint to a still more delicate one with exquisite finesse. As for the last movement, some small part of the audience was glad that the intermission allowed them to come up for air.

Copland's Third Symphony gave deep pleasure. He suggests that it be played "with simple expression," and it blooms in that atmosphere. Copland has a marvelously individual identification in his language. The first movement was hardly under way when his own proper harmonic intervals and delightfully nostalgic moods become apparent. "The Tender Land" and this symphony were in his thinking surely at the same time, and especially in the hoedown of the final movement, his incitement to get us up from our seats and dance was increasingly urgent.

Michael Tilson Thomas

Malcolm Frager

In the andantino, he resorts to the eerie reaches of the violins which were not convincingly consummated, but he then descends to a deeply effective chorale which only steers clear of a Dresden Amen by a whisper. Copland uses a large orchestra, and he effects a brassy excitement in the second movement by his personal grasp of tonal texture. He fortifies some of his treble strings by a piccolo and a sharply struck piano and is constantly adding to the fabric of his composition by such happy and special devices.

In addition, it was a great change of pace to hear something within the scope of a fairly recent if wide generation. The orchestra and the conductor were together the greater part of the time.

* * *

Saturday night Thomas devoted the whole evening to Stravinsky. An orchestral suite from the ballet "Firebird," which the composer arranged himself 10 years after its composition, is full of drama and pathos and embellishes any program that it graces.

After its performance, the violin section of the orchestra was dismissed for the evening. Thereafter, in the "Canticum Sacrum," the choral variations on Bach's "Von Himmel hoch da komm' ich her" and "Symphony of Psalms," only violas and double basses from the strings were used, but the winds were all retained.

Thomas took to a microphone before starting the "Canticum" and announced that it was being played after an interval of 15 years. He said that its performance was to be dedicated to honor the memory of Serge Koussevitzky, and, furthermore, that the work would be repeated immediately after the intermission. This is sometimes done to offer an audience a better opportunity to assay an unfamiliar work. The repetition did not invalidate an impression of incoherence which the first performance established. In addition, some ragged pizzicato in the viola section revealed as much bewilderment among the players as there was in at least a part of the audience.

The "Symphony of Psalms" ends with a deeply impressive Alleluia. Laudate Dominum, which is a supreme example of Stravinsky's powerful use of a minimum of means. The final Laudate Eum gives the chorus a very slow, sustained dirge resting on an ominous beat slowly and softly thumped on a tympani and plucked on a harp, building up to an agonizing effect as the incessant dripping of water on the upturned sole of a culprit's foot in Chinese torture is said to overwhelm the victim. Stravinsky achieves this by giving the voices minute adjacent intervals, which the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director, executed with alert responses and abundant volume but not completely convincing intonation. But the composer makes impossible demands on voices and gives them no sustaining relevant points of departure. Augmented and diminished intervals are used both in both the symphony and the Canticum, which are pure hell for voices but were evidently operatively executed.

Springfield Union Aug 6

Brahms' Sounds Give Weekend a Boost

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Michael Tilson Thomas' weekend on the podium at Tanglewood ended Sunday afternoon with a boost from some of Brahms' nicest sounds . . . the third and fourth movements of the Second Piano Concerto.

Malcolm Frager, a pianist of international repute who happens to live down the road from Tanglewood, was soloist. With the kind of inspired touch he uses for Mozart, he filled the merry last movement with lightness and joy.

And there was sunny beauty in the sleepy third movement also, largely because Jules Eskin, first cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, delivered the familiar solo melody with grace and sensitivity.

The earlier movements seemed a bit heavy going for the August sun, but the sound was round and well-fed, and those who like Brahms were happy.

The program before intermission offered six of Mozart's German Dances (K. 509), and orchestration by Lou Harrison of John Cage's "Suite for Toy Piano" and Strauss' always popular "Till Eulenspiegel."

The suite was mildly disappointing because the orchestration was less interesting than the original, or at least Thomas' version of it, which he played on an amplified toy piano so that the audience might know how the music began.

The sound of the toy was entertaining for a while, but the musical material was of shallow range, and the orchestral trickery used later to expand it was too much for it.

Saturday night Thomas asked the audience to listen twice to one piece on the all-Stravinsky program as a tribute to Serge Koussevitsky, who probably would win a poll among the orchestra members as their favorite former conductor.

But the piece, "Cánticum Sacrum", didn't seem to be the favorite of the evening in the audience, although it was performed effectively both times by the orchestra, Tanglewood festival chorus and two soloists, Kenneth Riegel, tenor and David Evitts, bass.

It's a spare unforgiving, demanding work without violins or cellos, and its medieval, pagan style is ultimately depressing.

For me, the "Sympnhony of Psalms" and Stravinsky's —"Choral Variations on The Christmas Song," which orchestration of Bach's came after intermission, provided the happiest moments of the evening mostly because of their inventive use of sparkling orchestral tone colors as contrast to full-bodied choral resonance.

Both pieces are deadly serious, but the absence of violins and the quirky use of harps, piano, trumpets and kettledrums give the music a welcome spicy variety.

The explanation of the sudden switch of harpists during the "Firebird" Suite early in the evening is that one of the controlling pedals on the first-chair harp broke putting it out of commission just before several measures during which the harp provides one of the dominant sounds.

Bernard Zighera quickly switched places with Ann Hobson and carried on with a cool aplomb befitting his 47 years with the orchestra.

Attendance: Friday night, 5839; Saturday morning 3740; Saturday night, 9213; Sunday 12,116; weekend, 30,908.

Democrat and Chronicle
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
D. 144,697 SUN. 221,661
AUG 6 1973

Thomas Conducts Stravinsky Works

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Michael Tilson Thomas, conductor. At Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. PROGRAM: All-Stravinsky "Firebird" Suite (1919 version); "Canticum Sacrum ad honorem Sancti Marci nomins" (1955); "Choral-variationen weber das Weihnachtslied "Vom Himmel hoch da komm' ich her" by J. S. Bach, arranged by Stravinsky (1955); "Symphony of Psalms" (1930).

By MICHAEL WALSH
D&C Staff Writer

TANGLEWOOD — Michael Tilson Thomas led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a sparkling performance of Igor Stravinsky's "Firebird" suite to open Saturday night's all-Stravinsky program

Things went down hill from there, however, with performances of three other Stravinsky works: "Canticum Sacrum" (played twice), "Variations on 'Vom Himmel Hoch,'" and the "Symphony of Psalms."

The "Firebird" suite was one of the finest performances I've heard from Thomas, the young conductor and music director of the Buffalo Philharmonic, who is also a principle guest conductor of the Boston Symphony.

HE SHOWED great care in judging instrumental balances and phrasings were always meticulously, but not prosacially, observed. The relationship of the tempos of each of the seven sections of the suite was just right.

Thomas' conception of the 1919 version of the "Firebird" was one of strong internal unity and the Boston players rose to the occasion with technical perfection and solid musicanship.

The performance of the "Symphony of Psalms," composed in 1930, was almost as successful. Thomas' intimate knowledge of, and affinity for, the Stravinsky style showed through in a committed, musical performance.

* * *

MEMBERS OF the Boston Symphony were assisted by the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, which ably sang the difficult choral part of the work. Their Latin pronunciation, however, was not always clear and precise.

Thomas performed the "Canticum Sacrum" written in 1955, twice, at the end of the first half of the program and again after intermission, to give the unfamiliar piece a fair hearing.

In an impromptu speech, Thomas noted that the piece was last performed at Tanglewood about 15 years ago, after hearing the music twice, the audience could readily understand why.

It may be that future generations will come to recognize Stravinsky's last compositions as being masterworks, just as 19th-Century audiences finally came to view late Beethoven as the composer's finest period.

THAT REMAINS to be seen. The "Canticum Sacrum" got as technically competent a performance from the BSO and the Tanglewood chorus as any composer could ask for. But spirit and commitment were lacking and the reason was those qualities were not written into the piece by its composer. The "Canticum Sacrum" is dry, lifeless music that is better left unheard when there is so much worthwhile music to play.

Thomas is a conductor possessed of good technique and strong musical conviction and he is to be congratulated for a fine performance Saturday night, despite some incredibly rude behavior on the part of some members of the audience, who arrived late, talked, smoked and ran around the grounds while he was conducting.

Thomas Guest At Tanglewood

By SYLVIA MEYERS

Michael Tilson Thomas, the young principal guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted the orchestra in an interesting potpourri of music ranging from J.S. Bach to John Cage in the concert series at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., last week end.

Thomas, who is also music director of the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra, brought a vibrancy and exuberance to the Tanglewood podium and introduced several delightful innovations in programming. For example, on Saturday night, before conducting the orchestra in Igor Stravinsky's relatively obscure "Canticum sacrum ad honorem Sancti Marci nominis," Thomas announced to the 9,213 listeners in attendance that they would have a chance to hear the piece twice that evening, as if he realized that the dissonant and modern-sounding piece might be more readily appreciated after a second hearing. It is very unconventional for an orchestra to play the same piece twice in an evening, but Thomas' idea struck this reviewer as a clever one, even though the Stravinsky piece was only slightly more appealing the second time around.

Another Thomas innovation occurred Sunday afternoon when, in addition to conducting, he played a toy piano, propped up on a music stand adjacent to the podium. The occasion was the Tanglewood premiere of John Cage's Suite for Toy Piano, orchestrated by Lou Harrison. Harrison's score eliminates Cage's original toy piano part, but Thomas chose to reintroduce the instrument, with himself at its little keyboard—a delightful treat for the Sunday afternoon audience of 12,116.

Friday evening's concert, attended by 5,839 listners, featured a program of symphonies separated by over 100 years: The Symphony No. 7 in A by Ludwig Van Beethoven, and the Symphony No. 3 by Aaron Copland. The prelude concert earlier Friday evening consisted entirely of choral music performed by the Tanglewood Festival Chorus under direction of John Oliver. Works by Schutz, G. Gabrielli, J.S. Bach, Wolf, and Brahms were performed.

Saturday night's concert was devoted to works by Igor Stavinsky. In addition to the Canticum Sacrum, the orchestra performed the famous Firebird Suite, the Symphony of Psalms, and the Stravinsky arrangement and elaboration of J.S. Bach's Choral variations on the Christmas song, "Von Himmel hoch da komm ich her."

The orchestra's rendition of the Firebird, which was originally written for a ballet, was brilliant and dramatic. The Bach-Stravinsky chorale variations were especially interesting for their contrasts: The stately orderliness of the Bach passages juxtaposed against the more fanciful and spontaneous-sounding orchestration of Stravinsky. The Symphony of Psalms, which Stravinsky composed in 1930 in honor of the Boston Symphony's 50th anniversary, is a solemn and deeply religious work. It was given a beautiful performance.

The Tanglewood Festival Chorus, directed by John Oliver, gave outstanding performances in all three Stavinsky choral works. It was joined in the Canticum Sacrum by the very fine soloists Kenneth Riegel, tenor, and David Evitts, bass.

For this reviewer, Sunday afternoon's concert was the highlight of the weekend. It featured a delightful montage of works by Mozart, Cage, Strauss, and Brahms. The concert opened with a sprightly rendition of the rarely performed Six German Dances, K. 509, by Mozart. Next on the program was the Cage Suite for Toy Piano, followed by an unforgettable performance of Strauss' droll and ebullient Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche. The concert concluded with a bravura performance by soloist Malcolm Frager in the Brahms Piano Concerto No. 2 in B Flat.

For all three of next weekend's concerts at Tanglewood, Colin Davis will be the guest conductor. Friday night at 9, the orchestra will perform an all-Mozart program featuring the Prague Symphony and the Coronation Mass. Saturday evening at 8:30, the orchestra will perform Berlioz's overture "Beatrice and Benedict," Haydn's Symphony No. 84, and Brahms' Symphony No. 82. Sunday afternoon at 2:30, the Boston Symphony and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus will perform Handel's Messiah.

The weekly prelude concert next Friday at 7 p.m. will feature the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, with Phyllis Curtin and Ryan Edwards, singers

HARTFORD, CONN.
AUG 6 1973

FADED TEXT

TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM (E)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
D. 30,000
AUG 7 1973
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Tones

Thomas Draws Full Force From Stravinsky Program

Odd is perhaps not the word that appreciators of Stravinsky's work would choose to describe his compositions unless by odd one means angular. His compositions are odd as a prime number which cannot be divided into its parts is odd. The over-all sound is angular, pronounced and incisive.

Stravinsky's compositions were the bolder for Michael Tilson Thomas 'interpretation of them at the Stravinsky program Saturday night at Tanglewood. Tilson Thomas, one of the principal guest conductors at Tanglewood this summer, led the 200 performers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus through the difficult program with unerring unity.

The most sensational moments of the concert came at its opening, with a familiar Suite from the "Firebird" ballet, which Stravinsky composed in 1919. It is a powerful piece which begins with the hushed tones of the bass violins followed, by an onrush of piercing notes, lurching to an abrupt finale.

Added Strength

Strength is added to he Symphony's horn section, along with the strong parts written for the stringed bass; thus, shrill tones contrasted with deep ones provide a necessary contrast for his style.

The second piece of the program, which was played wice for the benefit of music students, was Stravinsky's 'Canticum Sacrum" (the Sacred Canticle in honor of the name of St. Mark). Composed in 1955, it s a piece not often performed-- it was last played 15 years ago.

The "Canticum Sacrum", dedicated by Tilson Thomas to Serge Koussevitky, founder of Tanglewood, is unusual in its solemnity. The use of an organ gives it the effect of a hymnal in parts, while in others it lapses almost into a dirge with the solitary voices of Kenneth Riegal, tenor, and David Evitts, bass, ringing out above the dark tones of the chorus.

Ornate Contrast

Offering an ornate contrast to the sometimes explosive, sometimes almost funeral music of Stravinsky was Bach's "Choral-variationen uber das Weihnachtslied 'Von Himmel hoch da komm ich her", arranged by Igor Stravinsky. The concert concluded with Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms".

All of Stravinsky's compositions reflect the soul of an improvisor in their author, unshackeled by conventional classical form, although Stravinsky always made a point of the fact that there was little or no relation between his music and jazz.

TELEGRAM (M)
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 60,219
AUG 6 1973
New England Newsclip

NEWS (E)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 55,528
AUG 4 1973
New England Newsclip

Thomas at Tanglewood Creates Exuberant Mood

By RICHARD CONWAY

Michael Tilson Thomas, one of the most well-known and popular of the young conductors, stepped to the Tanglewood podium Friday night to conduct exuberant performances of Beethoven's "Symphony No. 7 in A, Op. 92" and Copland's "Symphony No. 3".

The Beethoven is a most joyous, exhilarating work, abounding in marvelous dance rhythms and whimsical good humor. Beethoven's great wealth of inventiveness is everywhere apparent, always taking place over a characteristic rhythm that remains incessant while the composer's rich genius finds ever fresh expression.

Thomas conducted the work with a boyish enthusiasm tempered with intelligence. At one or two points in the last movement he literally did a dance step on the podium, and throughout the work his arms were shooting out in all directions dramatically cueing the entrances.

Great Vitality

The result was a performance of great vitality and excitement. The last movement literally burst with robust and boisterous good humor.

After intermission, Thomas returned to conduct a wonderfully expressive performance of the Copland Third Symphony. Commissioned in 1943, the work was not completed until September of 1946. It is unmistakably Copland.

Although the composer denies any conscious reference to folk-music or jazz, this work clearly evokes those images, and one cannot escape the Copland of "Appalachian Spring," "Billy the Kid," etc.

The first movement is based largely on the interval of the falling fourth, an interval that is prominent in much of Copland's work. There are the composer's marvelous use of orchestral colors. One notices especially the very personal way of handling the brass and woodwinds. And one notes too the wealth of rhythmic inventiveness that is also characteristic of this most well-known of American composers.

The Week-end Prelude featured the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, under the direction of John Oliver.

With the exception of a continuo - accompanied performance of J.S. Bach's motet "Komm, Jesu, Komm," the 45 minute program was entirely a capella choral music ranging from a "Cantate Domino" by Giovanni Gabrieli to "Five Songs" by Brahms, opus 104, and "Six Sacred Songs on texts by Joseph von Eichendroff" by Hugo Wolf.

With the exception of the sopranos who did not have good control of the upper notes, particularly in the early part of the program, the chorus sang with beautiful quality and sensitive interpretation.

Friday night, the chorus was at its best in the softer passages, and some of the rewarding work was done at the cadential points in the Brahms' songs.

Tonight's concert at Tanglewood will feature the Festival Chorus in two works of Stravinsky, the "Canicum sacrum" and the "Symphony of psalms," and the same composer's arrangement of Bach's setting of variations on "Von Himmel hoch."

Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct the orchestra.

Fifth Tanglewood weekend Begins On Friday Night

[illegible] Fifth weekend at Tanglewood begins at 7 p.m. Friday with the Weekend Prelude concert featuring the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor.

Oliver will open the program with Schutz' "Cantate Domino canticum novum" for four voices; following with G. Gabrieli's "Cantate Domino canticum novum", J. S. Bach's "Komm, Jesu, Komm" motet, Wolf's "Sech's geistliche Lieder nach Gedichten von Joseph von Eichendorff"; and Brahm's "Funf Lieder."

At 9 p.m. Principal Guest Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the orchestra in Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A and Copland's Symphony No. 3.

Open Rehearsal

Saturday morning at 10 a.m. as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday.

Saturday, beginning at 8:30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in an all-Stravinsky program beginning with Suite from "L'oiseau de feu" and "Canticum sacrum ad honorem Sancti Marci nominis" with Kenneth Riegel tenor, David Evitts bass and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor. The concert continues with J.S. Bach's "Choral-variationen uber das Weihnachtslied 'Von Himmel hoch da komm ich her'" arranged by Igor Stravinsky. It ends closely the evening with Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor.

Sunday at 2:30 p.m. Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Orchestra in Mozart's German Dances and follows it with Cage's Suite for toy piano, orchestrated by Lou Harrison — the first performance of the work by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Thomas continues

TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM (E)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
D. 30,000
JUL 27 1973
New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. [illegible]
AUG 6 1973
New England Newsclip

Second-best weekend at Tanglewood

LENOX — Tanglewood's three concerts drew a total of 30,908 persons this weekend, according to Berkshire Music Festival officials, but Lenox and state police reported no major traffic problems. The attendance was the second highest of the season.

Saturday night's traffic was increased by the 4,500 people who attended the Richie Havens concert at the Music Inn. Police detoured traffic bound for the 6 p.m. Music Inn concert around Lenox, on Bean Hill Road, for the second time this summer.

Charles Fischer of the county sheriff's office said there were no major traffic tie-ups over the weekend, although Sunday afternoon's Tanglewood concert caused traffic to be backed up as far as the Lenox Memorial at the corner of Routes 7 and 183.

Varied Program Played at Tanglewood Festival's 5th Weekend

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — The Berkshire Music Festival's fifth weekend at Tanglewood delved with uneven results into varied repertory played by the Boston Symphony conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas.

Total attendance was 30,908.

Mozart, Beethoven and Brahms were balanced by Richard Strauss, a full program of better and lesser Stravinsky, and John Cage's amusing tidbit, "Suite for Toy Piano and Orchestra."

Saturday night's Stravinsky program fortunately included the "Firebird" music and Symphony of Psalms. The abysmal Stravinsky was "Canticum Sacrum" and workmanlike but contrived variations on Bach's Christmas Song.

"Canticum Sacrum" was performed here with yawning results in 1957 and 1958, Charles Munch conducting.

Thomas took it upon himself to inform the audience that the 17-minute work would be repeated after intermission. Therefore, any of the 9,213 members of the audience who wished to hear the Bach-Stravinsky or Symphony of Psalms were required to endure "Canticum" a second time whether they liked it or not.

Charitable Reward

In spite of its biblical sources, "Canticum" is a musically dull, meandering, objective-less treatise. The reduced orchestra played dutifully well. Thomas conducted it persistently. The Tanglewood Chorus of 100 miked voices made good sounds, if you weren't looking for continuity or relevance.

Music Review

Singers Kenneth Riegel, tenor, and David Evitts, baritone, did what they could to make sense of the solo passages.

There was one curtain call for all after each performance. At Tanglewood that can be interpreted as a charitable reward for valor.

Symphony of Psalms is a better work and was kinder to the chorus. Communication was clear and controlled — petition for divine pity and gratitude, and the hymn of praise.

The Bach-Stravinsky variations do little for either composer. Program notes stated that Stravinsky had "fashioned a striking new piece from the bones of Bach's variations." It was, indeed, a striking new piece.

Collaboration Splendid

Had "Firebird" been played last instead of first, it might have healed the wounds. Thomas conducted it efficiently. The orchestra produced gorgeous hues, especially in the lullaby, and smarting sounds in Kastchei's infernal dance.

Malcolm Frager's delivery of Brahms' Second Piano Concerto yesterday afternoon was one of heroic dimension, intensity, and incidents of bravura without excesses.

Thomas gave the soloist advantages through passages in which the piano can be engulfed in heavy instrumentation. It was a splendid orchestral collaboration.

Frager, is one of the piano platform's most solid citizens — clear in his judgments, a stickler for truth, disdainer of disconcerting mannerisms and a sound musician.

John Cage intended a real piano to be used in his suite.

It came as no surprise that Thomas thought differently. He used a toy piano, amplified, playing the solo keyboard introduction, himself. The short-lived piano score (heavily amplified and harsh) sounds like an ungifted student essaying nursery rhymes.

There followed a commonplace orchestral excursion, sparked by pompous exclamations in brass and an expressive solo sequence by concert master Joseph Silverstein.

Strauss' "Till" was played brilliantly, even if overly heavy in brass and timpani. The work gave Thomas all the openings he needed to demonstrate his colorful style of conducting. He did bring out the ragamuffin, facetious, pathetic aspects of the central figure in Strauss' brilliant tone picture.

Thomas gave a realistic account of Mozart's Six German Dances — light-weight and cheery. They were admirably represented as examples of the composer's "background music."

Worcester Telegram

FADED TEXT

TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM (E)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
D. 30,000
AUG 7 1973
New England Newspaper

Tanglewood Tones

Thomas Draws Full Force From Stravinsky Program

Odd is perhaps not the word that appreciators of Stravinsky's work would choose to describe his compositions unless by odd one means angular. His compositions are odd as a prime number which cannot be divided into its parts is odd. The over-all sound is angular, pronounced and incisive.

Stravinsky's compositions were the bolder for Michael Tilson Thomas 'interpretation of them at the Stravinsky program Saturday night at Tanglewood. Tilson Thomas, one of the principal guest conductors at Tanglewood this summer, led the 200 performers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus through the difficult program with unerring unity.

The most sensational moments of the concert came at its opening, with a familiar Suite from the "Firebird" ballet, which Stravinsky composed in 1919. It is a powerful piece which begins with the hushed tones of the bass violins followed, by an onrush of piercing notes, lurching to an abrupt finale.

Added Strength

Strength is added to he Symphony's horn section, along with the strong parts written for the stringed bass; thus, shrill tones contrasted with deep ones provide a necessary contrast for his style.

The second piece of the program, which was played wice for the benefit of music students, was Stravinsky's 'Canticum Sacrum" (the Sacred Canticle in honor of the name of St. Mark). Composed in 1955, it s a piece not often performed--it was last played 15 years ago.

The "Canticum Sacrum", dedicated by Tilson Thomas to Serge Koussevitky, founder of Tanglewood, is unusual in its solemnity. The use of an organ gives it the effect of a hymnal in parts, while in others it lapses almost into a dirge with the solitary voices of Kenneth Riegal, tenor, and David Evitts, bass, ringing out above the dark tones of the chorus.

Ornate Contrast

Offering an ornate contrast to the sometimes explosive, sometimes almost funeral music of Stravinsky was Bach's "Choral-variationen uber das Weihnachtslied 'Von Himmel hoch da komm ich her", arranged by Igor Stravinsky. The concert concluded with Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms".

All of Stravinsky's compositions reflect the soul of an improvisor in their author, unshackeled by conventional classical form, although Stravinsky always made a point of the fact that there was little or no relation between his music and jazz.

NEWS (E)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
AUG 4 1973
New England Newspaper

Thomas at Tanglewood Creates Exuberant Mood

By RICHARD CONWAY

Michael Tilson Thomas, one of the most well-known and popular of the young conductors, stepped to the Tanglewood podium Friday night to conduct exuberant performances of Beethoven's "Symphony No. 7 in A, Op. 92" and Copland's "Symphony No. 3".

The Beethoven is a most joyous, exhilarating work, abounding in marvelous dance rhythms and whimsical good humor. Beethoven's great wealth of inventiveness is everywhere apparent, always taking place over a characteristic rhythm that remains incessant while the composer's rich genius finds ever fresh expression.

Thomas conducted the work with a boyish enthusiasm tempered with intelligence. At one or two points in the last movement he literally did a dance step on the podium, and throughout the work his arms were shooting out in all directions dramatically cueing the entrances.

Great Vitality

The result was a performance of great vitality and excitement. The last movement literally burst with robust and boisterous good humor.

After intermission, Thomas returned to conduct a wonderfully expressive performance of the Copland Third Symphony. Commissioned in 1943, the work was not completed until September of 1946. It is unmistakably Copland.

Although the composer denies any conscious reference to folk-music or jazz, this work clearly evokes those images, and one cannot escape the Copland of "Appalachian Spring," "Billy the Kid," etc.

The first movement is based largely on the interval of the falling fourth, an interval that is prominent in much of Copland's work. There are the composer's marvelous use of orchestral colors. One notices especially the very personal way of handling the brass and woodwinds. And one notes too the wealth of rhythmic inventiveness that is also characteristic of this most well-known of American composers.

The Week-end Prelude featured the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, under the direction of John Oliver.

With the exception of a continuo - accompanied performance of J.S. Bach's motet "Komm, Jesu, Komm," the 45 minute program was entirely a capella choral music ranging from a "Cantate Domino" by Giovanni Gabrieli to "Five Songs" by Brahms, opus 104, and "Six Sacred Songs on texts by Joseph von Eichendroff" by Hugo Wolf.

With the exception of the sopranos who did not have good control of the upper notes, particularly in the early part of the program, the chorus sang with beautiful quality and sensitive interpretation.

Friday night, the chorus was at its best in the softer passages, and some of the rewarding work was done at the cadential points in the Brahms' songs.

Tonight's concert at Tanglewood will feature the Festival Chorus in two works of Stravinsky, the "Canicum sacrum" and the "Symphony of psalms," and the same composer's arrangement of Bach's setting of variations on "Von Himmel hoch."

Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct the orchestra.

TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM (E)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
D. 30,000
JUL 27 1973
New England Newspaper

TELEGRAM (M)
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 60,213
AUG 6 1973
New England Newspaper

Varied Program Played at Tanglewood Festival's 5th Weekend

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — The Berkshire Music Festival's fifth weekend at Tanglewood delved with uneven results into varied repertory played by the Boston Sumphony conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas.

Total attendance was 30,908.

Mozart, Beethoven and Brahms were balanced by Richard Strauss, a full program of better and lesser Stravinsky, and John Cage's amusing tidbit, "Suite for Toy Piano and Orchestra."

Saturday night's Stravinsky program fortunately included the "Firebird" music and Symphony of Psalms. The abysmal Stravinsky was "Canticum Sacrum" and workmanlike but contrived variations on Bach's Christmas Song.

"Canticum Sacrum" was performed here with yawning results in 1957 and 1958, Charles Munch conducting.

Thomas took it upon himself to inform the audience that the 17-minute work would be repeated after intermission. Therefore, any of the 9,213 members of the audience who wished to hear the Bach-Stravinsky or Symphony of Psalms were required to endure "Canticum" a second time whether they liked it or not.

Charitable Reward

In spite of its biblical sources, "Canticum" is a musically dull, meandering, objective-less treatise. The reduced orchestra played dutifully well. Thomas conducted it persistently. The Tanglewood Chorus of 100 mixed voices made good sounds, if you weren't looking for continuity or relevance.

Music Review

Singers Kenneth Riegel, tenor, and David Evitts, baritone, did what they could to make sense of the solo passages.

There was one curtain call for all after each performance. At Tanglewood that can be interpreted as a charitable reward for valor.

Symphony of Psalms is a better work and was kinder to the chorus. Communication was clear and controlled — petition for divine pity and gratitude, and the hymn of praise.

The Bach-Stravinsky variations do little for either composer. Program notes stated that Stravinsky had "fashioned a striking new piece from the bones of Bach's variations." It was, indeed, a striking new piece.

Collaboration Splendid

Had "Firebird" been played last instead of first, it might have healed the wounds. Thomas conducted it efficiently. The orchestra produced gorgeous hues, especially in the lullaby, and smarting sounds in Kastchei's infernal dance.

Malcolm Frager's delivery of Brahms' Second Piano Concerto yesterday afternoon was one of heroic dimension, intensity, and incidents of bravura without excesses.

Thomas gave the soloist advantages through passages in which the piano can be engulfed in heavy instrumentation. It was a splendid orchestral collaboration.

Frager is one of the piano platform's most solid citizens — clear in his judgments, a stickler for truth, disdainer of disconcerting mannerisms and a sound musician.

John Cage intended a real piano to be used in his suite.

It came as no surprise that Thomas thought differently. He used a toy piano, amplified, playing the solo keyboard introduction, himself. The short-lived piano score (heavily amplified and harsh) sounds like an ungifted student essaying nursery rhymes.

There followed a commonplace orchestral excursion, sparked by pompous exclamations in brass and an expressive solo sequence by concert master Joseph Silverstein.

Strauss' "Till" was played brilliantly, even if overly heavy in brass and timpani. The work gave Thomas all the openings he needed to demonstrate his colorful style of conducting. He did bring out the ragamuffin, facetious, pathetic aspects of the central figure in Strauss' brilliant tone picture.

Thomas gave a realistic account of Mozart's Six German Dances — light-weight and cheery. They were admirably represented as examples of the composer's "background music."

Worcester Telegram

AUG 6 1973

Second-best weekend at Tanglewood

LENOX — Tanglewood's three concerts drew a total of 30,908 persons this weekend, according to Berkshire Music Festival officials, but Lenox and state police reported no major traffic problems. The attendance was the second highest of the season.

Saturday night's traffic was increased by the 4,500 people who attended the Richie Havens concert at the Music Inn. Police detoured traffic bound for the 6 p.m. Music Inn concert around Lenox, on Bean Hill Road, for the second time this summer.

Charles Fischer of the county sheriff's office said there were no major traffic tie-ups over the weekend, although Sunday afternoon's Tanglewood concert caused traffic to be backed up as far as the Lenox Memorial at the corner of Routes 7 and 183.

Steinberg finds Tanglewood solid, spicy

B Sym

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

LENOX — Tanglewood is the child of idealism. Most big American orchestras now have some sort of summer activity, hopefully called "festival," because contracts call for year-round employment. The Boston Symphony was one of the first to get there, and, ironically, at a time when it was the last major holdout against unionization. But Serge Koussevitzky, music director 1924 to 1949, thought that good music should not stop in April, and he was perhaps the first to see that an orchestra was potentially an extraordinary educational institution.

And so this thing called Tanglewood was born. It is two things really. There is the Berkshire Music Festival, whose main manifestation is a series of 24 concerts, eight weekends in July and August, by the Boston Symphony. The other part is the Berkshire Music Center, a school for a hundred or so highly qualified students from all over the world. The Center is the less visible component, but, as I shall explain in a moment, it is worth looking for. Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller are co-directors, with Ozawa, music director of the Boston Symphony, in charge of the festival, and Schuller, composer, president of the New England Conservatory, musician-at-large, running the school.

The BSO concerts are Fridays at 9, Saturdays at 8:30, and Sundays at 2:30. The Friday concerts are scheduled late for the benefit of people driving out from the city, but for those who can be there earlier, there is an hour-long concert at 7, usually chamber music and related in content to the weekend's other concerts, admission for which is included in the Friday symphony ticket. The BSO makes an effort to keep the programs interesting, something by no means to be taken for granted, first because rehearsal time is restricted (three different programs to be prepared in not much more time than is considered necessary for one in the winter), and because it is traditionally assumed that intellectual and artistic appetites are down in the summer. But the programs are solid, not without spice and allure. The conductors and soloists are eminent or good (some are both), this year's list including, among others, Ozawa, Edo de Waart, Stanislaw Skrowaczewski, Eugene Ormandy, Colin Davis, Michael Tilson Thomas, Andre Watts, Christoph Eschenbach, Benita Valente and Malcolm Frager.

The orchestra sits at the narrow end of a fanshaped, roofed but open-sided shed which seats about 6000 and which is an acoustic marvel that delivers a clear, well-proportioned, if somewhat reduced sound, even to its farthest reaches. Normal concert ticket prices are charged.

For $3 you can get a lawn pass, something many people do by preference. As a musician I find it a little hard to understand just why because you can't really hear a whole lot out there. Evidently, though, there is a public that likes distant Mozart and Rachmaninoff as accompaniment to star-gazing and related activities, and in as much as this provides the orchestra with a fair piece of income each, the arrangement is clearly of redeeming social value.

Something about extra-musical issues: the country roads leading into Lenox from Stockbridge, Lee, Richmond, and the other surrounding villages and towns were not built with the idea in mind that performance of Beethoven's' Ninth Symphony would, on a day of good weather, draw a crowd of 14,000 to Tanglewood.

LENOX, Page 82

15

Michael Steinberg is the Globe's music critic.

TANGLEWOOD: A MUSICAL FEAST SET AMID A BEAUTIFUL COUNTRYSIDE.

(Globe photo by Phil Preston)

Being Tanglewood 'Friend' is rewarding

15

★ LENOX

Continued from Page 73

Getting there is not half the fun. It can, in fact, be maddening because not only are the access roads inadequate, but the local police are not always adroit at dealing with the traffic jam. Parking some distance and walking the last mile or so is one solution. A bicycle is another: It is lovely to pedal between the lines of stalled, overheated cars and drivers.

For most people the best advice is to get there early, which leads me to another suggestion: Take a picnic. That takes care of what to do when you have arrived an hour and a half before the concert begins, and it is also the most likely path to a good meal. Berkshire County is not good eating country. There are some good, honest places — I remember with gratitude many a good dinner at The Log Cabin, a steak house on Rte. 7 between Lenox and Pittsfield— but most of the restaurants are pretentious, over-priced, and plain bad. They leave you angry and depressed. So the picnic is quite a Tanglewood institution, fun even for picnic-watchers, because many of the concert-goers take it really seriously, Waterford crystal, Chateau Haut-Brion, and all.

The traffic is bad getting out, too, and that is a nice time to visit the bookstore, an oddly run place where you can find "Inside Linda Lovelace" but not always the scores of what is being played on that day's concert program.

There is also "the tent," where dinner is available before the concert and drinks before, during, and afterwards. It takes $50 for the season to "join the tent," or for just $5 you can join for one night.

Actually that $50 gets you membership in the Friends of Music at Tanglewood, and that is enormously worthwhile, though indeed you can join the Friends for as little as $15 per season. Again, you are doing good, but the benefit and pleasure to yourself if you love music and spend any of the summer in the Berkshires is inestimable. The more expensive categories of Friendship net various sorts of pleasing frills, but what I want to point out is that being a Friend, any category, is the only means of admission to the many concerts — orchestral, chamber music, choral, the annual contemporary music festival — which come out of the work of the Berkshire Music Center. Those can be extraordinary events. There are many who can recall hearing musicians who are now household names when they were still BMC students, and none who heard them will forget, for example, the concerts Leonard Bernstein has conducted in recent summers with the BMC Orchestra. Penny for penny, or penny for eighth-note, membership in the Friends of Music at Tanglewood is the biggest musical bargain in the country.

TANGLEWOOD—ROOM TO ENJOY MUSIC

Finally Tanglewood is not the only source of music in the neighborhood. and Stockbridge have tourist information booths which are well informed about that sort of thing (for the matter, the wall next to the Tanglewood box office is a rich bulletin board in itself) and also helpful when it comes to finding places to stay.

It is some of America's loveliest countryside, good music (sometimes great), high prices, so-so food, too many people, enough mosquitos. Not everyone finds the mixture attractive. Some of us are hooked.

There is often superb chamber music Saturday afternoons at South Mountain, Pittsfield, interesting music theatre at the Lenox Arts Center, or concerts at the Yale Summer Music School at Norfolk, Conn.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
S. 561,160

AUG 12 1973

New England Newsclip

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
S. 135,000
AUG 5 1973
New England Newscip

BRITISH CONDUCTOR COLIN DAVIS
... with Phyllis Curtin and Ryan Edwards

Conductor Colin Davis for Weekend Of Tanglewood Music

Special to The Times

LENOX, Mass. — The sixth weekend at Tanglewood begins Friday, Aug. 10 (7 p.m.) with Phyllis Curtin soprano, Ryan Edwards, piano and members of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players (Joseph Silverstein), violin, Jules Eskin, cello and Harold Wright, clarinet), performing Shostakovich's "Romances on Words of Alexander Block" and Rorem's "Ariel," for soprano, clarinet and piano.

Principal guest conductor Colin Davis will conduct the orchestra at 9 p.m. in an all Mozart program.

Davis will open the concert with Symphony No. 38 (the 'Prague') and follow it with the Violin concerto in G with Joseph Silverstein as soloist.

The concert will close with Mozart's Mass in C, the "Coronation," featuring Benita Valente, soprano; Helen Watts, contralto; Ryland Davies, tenor; Stafford Dean, bass; the Tanglewood Choir and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus (John Oliver, conductor).

On Saturday, Aug. 11, at 10:30 a.m. (as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season), there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed Sunday.

On Saturday evening at 8:30, Davis will conduct the orchestra in Berlioz' Overture to "Beatrice et Benedict" and Haydn's Symphony No. 84 in E flat, the first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert will close with Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D.

On Sunday, Aug. 12 (2:30 p.m.) Davis will conduct the orchestra in Handel's "Messiah."

Soloists are Benita Valente, soprano, Henel Watts, contralto, Ryland Davies, tenor, Stafford Dean, bass, Robert Levin, harpsichor, John Gibbons, organ and members of the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, conductor.

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
S. 126,138
AUG 5 1973
New England Newscip

Tanglewood Weekend

LENOX, Mass. — The sixth weekend at Tanglewood begins on Friday at 7 with Phyllis Curtin soprano, Ryan Edwards piano and members of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players (Joseph Silverstein violin, Jules Eskin cello and Harold Wright clarinet) performing Shostakovich's "Romances on Words of Alexander Block" and Rorem's "Ariel", for soprano, clarinet and piano. Then at 9, Principal Guest Conductor Colin Davis conducts the Orchestra in an all Mozart program. Mr. Davis opens the concert with Symphony No. 38 the "Prague' and follows it with the Violin concerto in G. with Joseph Silverstein as soloist. The concert closes with Mozart's Mass in C, the 'Coronation' with Benita Valente soprano, Helen Watts contralto, Ryland Davies tenor, Stafford Dean bass, the Tanglewood Choir and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus John Oliver conductor.

On Saturday, August 11, at 1:30 as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed Sunday.

On Saturday evening at 8:30, Colin Davis will conduct the Orchestra in Berlioz' Overture to 'Beatrice et Benedict' and Haydn's Symphony No. 84 in E flat, the first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The concert closes with Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D.

On Sunday, Aug. 12 at 2:30, Colin Davis conducts the Orchestra in Handel's 'Messiah'. Soloists are Benita Valente soprano, Helen Watts contralto, Ryland Davies tenor, Stafford Dean bass, Robert Levin harpsichord, John Gibbons organ and members of the Tanglewood Festival Chorus John Oliver conductor.

AUG 12 1973

TANGLEWOOD, Tanglewood, Mass. — Concert today at 2:30 p.m.; Colin Davis conducts the Boston Symphony orchestra with soloists Benita Valente, Helen Watts, Ryland Davis, Stafford Dean, Robert Levin, John Gibbons and members of the Tanglewood Festival chorus, directed by John Oliver; Seventh Weekend concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra; Friday at 7 and 9 p.m.; Saturday at 10:30 a.m., open rehearsal of the Boston Symphony; Saturday at 8:30 p.m., next Sunday at 2:30 p.m.; all concerts take place in the Shed; tickets on sale at Tanglewood box office and Ticketron; Tuesday at 8:30 p.m., Tanglewood-on-Parade Gala concert, the Symphony conducted by Seiji Ozawa with solos by Andre Watts, guest conductor, Gunther Schiller, grounds open all day with mini-concerts by members of the Berkshire Music center, tickets available at Tanglewood box office.

TRANSCRIPT (E)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
D. 12,700
AUG 10 1973

At a glance...

Williamstown

Olympia Dukakis is playing the lead role in Williamstown's production of "Good Woman of Setzuan". The play concludes its run tomorrow night.

What the Butler Saw is scheduled for Aug. 14 to 18.

At press time, the Theatre had still not decided on its final two productions of the season. According to press releases, unless contributions to the annual Patron drive increase considerably, the final two productions will be repeats of successful shows produced earlier this year.

Arena Theatre

Arena Civic Theatre at the Franklin County Fairgrounds will wind up its third successful season on Aug. 18 with "Oliver," which opened last night.

The musical, according to the Theatre, is one of the best productions ever put on in Greenfield and is sure to be a perfect finale to a highly successful season.

South Mountain

Ruth and Jaime Laredo are guest artists at South Mountain's second production of the season. The couple will perform in a violin and piano recital, featuring the works of Stravinsky, Mozart, Brahms and Grieg.

Music Mountain

Guest artists Kyril Magg and Rebecca Magg will perform tomorrow afternoon in a special flute program at Music Mountain. The program includes a concert for two flutes and strings in C by Vivaldi; Schilber's Flute quartet and Opus 65. Next week, Aug. 18, Gyogy Sebok, pianist will be featured. The program includes Baccherini's quartet in A; Bartok's quartet No. 4 and Mendelssohn's Piano trio in D minor.

Berkshire

Jan Sterling returns to Berkshire Theatre Festival in Stockbridge Aug. 14 to Aug. 26 in her starring role of "Summer Brave" by William Inge. The production ran last month and played to sell out audiences. It is a new version of a romantic comedy which began as "Picnic." Crystal, Crystal Chandelier by Lawrence Roman will end tomorrow. It stars Joyce Van Patton.

The Syracuse drama workshop-in-residence will offer free productions in the Walrus and Unicorn Theatres, both of which are located in the large barn adjacent to the playhouse mainstage on the same grounds. All shows begin at 8.30 p.m. "Born To Be Hanged" will be given tonight and tomorrow in the Unicorn Theatre. On Aug. 16 and 17, a program of "One Act Plays" will be produced in the Walrus Theatre.

Jan Sterling returns to Stockbridge next week to star in "Summer Brave" which is being repeated at Berkshire Playhouse. Because critics and audiences received the play so well, Berkshire Playhouse agreed to return Aug. 14 to Aug. 19.

Dorset Playhouse

"Who Needs A Waltz," Fred Charmichael's newest comedy runs through Aug. 18 at Dorset Playhouse on Rt. 30 in Dorset Vt. Elizabeth Franz, a longtime favorite at Dorset, is co-staring opposite the author in a role written especially for her. The production opened last night. The final show of the season is "Home" by David Storey. The production opens Aug. 23 and runs through Sept. 2 and will be directed by and star Patricia Carmichael. Others in lead roles are Charles Dickens and Marian Baer.

Tanglewood

The sixth weekend at Tanglewood begins tonight at 7 with Phyllis Curtin, Ryan Edwards and members of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performing Shostakovich's "Romances on Words of Alexander Block." At 9 p.m., guest conductor Colin Davis conducts the orchestra in an all Mozart program. Mr. Davis will open the concert with Symphony no. 38 the "Prague" and follow with the Violin concerto in G with Joseph Silverstein, soloist. The concert closes with Mozart's Mass in C, the "Coronation" with Benita Valente soprano, Helen Watts contralto, Ryland Davies tenor, Stafford Dean bass, and the Tanglewood Choir and Festival Chorus.

Tomorrow night at 8:30 Mr. Davis will conduct the Berlioz' Overture to "Beatrice et Benedict" and Haydn's Symphony no. 84 in E flat. On Sunday at 2:30 the orchestra will conduct Handel's "Messiah."

Next weekend's program opens Friday, Aug. 17 with Lawrence Foster conducting the "Berlioz Overture "Corsair"; Bruch's Scottish Fantasy and Prokofieff's Symphony No. 5. Arthur Fiedler conducts Saturday night's program with Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 2 and Wagner's Prelude to Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg. Seiji Ozawa will conduct the Sunday afternoon performance. Included are Franck's Symphonic Variations and Liszt's Totentanz. Andre Watts will be featured.

Continued on following page

Andre Watts, pianist, will be featured as guest soloist next Sunday afternoon at Tanglewood.

catch it if you can

TOM RUSH

Tom Rush, Lori Lieberman and Arthur Hurley & Gottlieb will perfom in concert on Saturday, August 11 at Suffolk Downs in Revere as part of its Sunset Series.

★

THE ALLMAN BROTHE'

The Allman Brothers will be appearing in concert at the Shaefer Stadium in Foxboro, Mass. on Monday, August 26. Tickets are available at Ticketron outlets. Concerts begin at 6 p.m.

★

CANNED HEAT

Canned Heat, John Lee Hooker and the James Cotton Blues Band will perform in concert on Wednesday, August 22 at Suffolk Downs in Revere as part of its Sunset Series.

★

BOLSHOI

S. Hurok will bring the Bolshoi Ballet of 75 dancers to Boston's Music Hall for two performances only on Aug. 21 and 22 at 8:30 p.m. The program for both evenings will be "Giselle."

★

Gallagher will perform in concert with Z.Z. Top on Monday, August 20 at Suffolk Downs in Revere as part of its Sunset Series.

★

BONNIE RAITT

B.B. King, Bonnie Raitt and the James Montgomery Band will perform in concert on Wednesday, August 15 at Suffolk Downs in Revere as part of its Sunset Series.

★

B.B. KING

B.B. King, Wishbone Ash and Swallow will perform in concert on Monday, August 13 at Suffolk Downs in Revere as part of its Sunset Series.

★

TANGLEWOOD SATURDAY

An open rehearsal by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held at 10:30 a.m. A concert at 8:30 p.m. will feature Berlioz, Haydn and Brahms.

★

TANGLEWOOD SUNDAY

A 2:30 p.m. concert will feature the Boston Symphony Orchestra playing Handel's "Messiah" with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

★

TANGLEWOOD FRIDAY

A Mozart program which will include "Prague" Symphony and the Coronation Mass will be presented at 9 p.m. at Tanglewood at Lenox, Mass. by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Colin Davis will conduct.

BRITISH CONDUCTOR COLIN DAVIS
... with Phyllis Curtin and Ryan Edwards

Conductor Colin Davis for Weekend Of Tanglewood Music

Special to The Times

LENOX, Mass. — The sixth weekend at Tanglewood begins Friday, Aug. 10 (7 p.m.) with Phyllis Curtin soprano, Ryan Edwards, piano and members of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players (Joseph Silverstein), violin, Jules Eskin, cello and Harold Wright, clarinet), performing Shostakovich's "Romances on Words of Alexander Block" and Rorem's "Ariel," for soprano, clarinet and piano.

Principal guest conductor Colin Davis will conduct the orchestra at 9 p.m. in an all Mozart program.

Davis will open the concert with Symphony No. 38 (the 'Prague') and follow it with the Violin concerto in G with Joseph Silverstein as soloist.

The concert will close with Mozart's Mass in C, the "Coronation," featuring Benita Valente, soprano; Helen Watts, contralto; Ryland Davies, tenor; Stafford Dean, bass; the Tanglewood Choir and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus (John Oliver, conductor).

On Saturday, Aug. 11, at 10:30 a.m. (as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season), there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed Sunday.

On Saturday evening at 8:30, Davis will conduct the orchestra in Berlioz' Overture to "Beatrice et Benedict" and Haydn's Symphony No. 84 in E flat, the first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert will close with Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D.

On Sunday, Aug. 12 (2:30 p.m.) Davis will conduct the orchestra in Handel's "Messiah."

Soloists are Benita Valente, soprano, Henel Watts, contralto, Ryland Davies, tenor, Stafford Dean, bass, Robert Levin, harpsichor, John Gibbons, organ and members of the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, conductor.

Tanglewood Weekend

LENOX, Mass. — The sixth weekend at Tanglewood begins on Friday at 7 with Phyllis Curtin soprano. Ryan Edwards piano and members of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players (Joseph Silverstein violin, Jules Eskin cello and Harold Wright clarinet) performing Shostakovich's "Romances on Words of Alexander Block" and Rorem's "Ariel", for soprano, clarinet and piano. Then at 9, Principal Guest Conductor Colin Davis conducts the Orchestra in an all Mozart program. Mr. Davis opens the concert with Symphony No. 38 the "Prague' and follows it with the Violin concerto in G. with Joseph Silverstein as soloist. The concert closes with Mozart's Mass in C, the 'Coronation' with Benita Valente soprano, Helen Watts contralto, Ryland Davies tenor, Stafford Dean bass, the Tanglewood Choir and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus John Oliver conductor.

On Saturday, August 11, at 1:30 as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed Sunday.

On Saturday evening at 8:30, Colin Davis will conduct the Orchestra in Berlioz' Overture to 'Beatrice et Benedict' and Haydn's Symphony No. 84 in E flat, the first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The concert closes with Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D.

On Sunday, Aug. 12 at 2:30, Colin Davis conducts the Orchestra in Handel's 'Messiah'. Soloists are Benita Valente soprano, Helen Watts contralto, Ryland Davies tenor, Stafford Dean bass, Robert Levin harpsichord, John Gibbons organ and members of the Tanglewood Festival Chorus John Oliver conductor.

TANGLEWOOD, Tanglewood, Mass. — Concert today at 2:30 p.m.: Colin Davis conducts the Boston Symphony orchestra with soloists Benita Valente, Helen Watts, Ryland Davis, Stafford Dean, Robert Levin, John Gibbons and members of the Tanglewood Festival chorus, directed by John Oliver; Seventh Weekend concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra; Friday at 7 and 9 p.m.; Saturday at 10:30 a.m., open rehearsal of the Boston Symphony; Saturday at 8:30 p.m., next Sunday at 2:30 p.m.; all concerts take place in the Shed; tickets on sale at Tanglewood box office and Ticketron; Tuesday at 8:30 p.m., Tanglewood-on-Parade Gala concert, the Symphony conducted by Seiji Ozawa with solos by Andre Watts, guest conductor, Gunther Schiller, grounds open all day with mini-concerts by members of the Berkshire Music center, tickets available at Tanglewood box office.

At a glance...

Williamstown

Olympia Dukakis is playing the lead role in Williamstown's production of "Good Woman of Setzuan". The play concludes its run tomorrow night.

What the Butler Saw is scheduled for Aug. 14 to 18.

At press time, the Theatre had still not decided on its final two productions of the season. According to press releases, unless contributions to the annual Patron drive increase considerably, the final two productions will be repeats of successful shows produced earlier this year.

Arena Theatre

Arena Civic Theatre at the Franklin County Fairgrounds will wind up its third successful season on Aug. 18 with "Oliver," which opened last night.

The musical, according to the Theatre, is one of the best productions ever put on in Greenfield and is sure to be a perfect finale to a highly successful season.

South Mountain

Ruth and Jaime Laredo are guest artists at South Mountain's second production of the season. The couple will perform in a violin and piano recital, featuring the works of Stravinsky, Mozart, Brahms and Grieg.

Music Mountain

Guest artists Kyril Magg and Rebecca Magg will perform tomorrow afternoon in a special flute program at Music Mountain. The program includes a concert for two flutes and strings in C by Vivaldi; Schilber's Flute quartet and Opus 65. Next week, Aug. 18, Gyogy Sebok, pianist will be featured. The program includes Baccherini's quartet in A; Bartok's quartet No. 4 and Mendelssohn's Piano trio in D minor.

Berkshire

Jan Sterling returns to Berkshire Theatre Festival in Stockbridge Aug. 14 to Aug. 26 in her starring role of "Summer Brave" by William Inge. The production ran last month and played to sell out audiences. It is a new version of a romantic comedy which began as "Picnic." Crystal, Crystal Chandelier by Lawrence Roman will end tomorrow. It stars Joyce Van Patton.

The Syracuse drama workshop-in-residence will offer free productions in the Walrus and Unicorn Theatres, both of which are located in the large barn adjacent to the playhouse mainstage on the same grounds. All shows begin at 8.30 p.m. "Born To Be Hanged" will be given tonight and tomorrow in the Unicorn Theatre. On Aug. 16 and 17, a program of "One Act Plays" will be produced in the Walrus Theatre.

Jan Sterling returns to Stockbridge next week to star in "Summer Brave" which is being repeated at Berkshire Playhouse. Because critics and audiences received the play so well, Berkshire Playhouse agreed to return Aug. 14 to Aug. 19.

Dorset Playhouse

"Who Needs A Waltz," Fred Charmichael's newest comedy runs through Aug. 18 at Dorset Playhouse on Rt. 30 in Dorset Vt. Elizabeth Franz, a longtime favorite at Dorset, is co-staring opposite the author in a role written especially for her. The production opened last night. The final show of the season is "Home" by David Storey. The production opens Aug. 23 and runs through Sept. 2 and will be directed by and star Patricia Carmichael. Others in lead roles are Charles Dickens and Marian Baer.

Tanglewood

The sixth weekend at Tanglewood begins tonight at 7 with Phyllis Curtin, Ryan Edwards and members of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performing Shostakovich's "Romances on Words of Alexander Block." At 9 p.m., guest conductor Colin Davis conducts the orchestra in an all Mozart program. Mr. Davis will open the concert with Symphony no. 38 the "Prague" and follow with the Violin concerto in G with Joseph Silverstein, soloist. The concert closes with Mozart's Mass in C, the "Coronation" with Benita Valente soprano, Helen Watts contralto, Ryland Davies tenor, Stafford Dean bass, and the Tanglewood Choir and Festival Chorus.

Tomorrow night at 8:30 Mr. Davis will conduct the Berlioz' Overture to "Beatrice et Benedict" and Haydn's Symphony no. 84 in E flat. On Sunday at 2:30 the orchestra will conduct Handel's "Messiah."

Next weekend's program opens Friday, Aug. 17 with Lawrence Foster conducting the "Berlioz Overture "Corsair"; Bruch's Scottish Fantasy and Prokofieff's Symphony No. 5. Arthur Fiedler conducts Saturday night's program with Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 2 and Wagner's Prelude to Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg. Seiji Ozawa will conduct the Sunday afternoon performance. Included are Franck's Symphonic Variations and Liszt's Totentanz. Andre Watts will be featured.

Continued on following page

Andre Watts, pianist, will be featured as guest soloist next Sunday afternoon at Tanglewood.

catch it if you can

TOM RUSH

Tom Rush, Lori Lieberman and Arthur Hurley & Gottlieb will perfom in concert on Saturday, August 11 at Suffolk Downs in Revere as part of its Sunset Series.

★

THE ALLMAN BROTHE'

The Allman Brothers will be appearing in concert at the Shaefer Stadium in Foxboro, Mass. on Monday, August 26. Tickets are available at Ticketron outlets. Concerts begin at 6 p.m.

★

CANNED HEAT

Canned Heat, John Lee Hooker and the James Cotton Blues Band will perform in concert on Wednesday, August 22 at Suffolk Downs in Revere as part of its Sunset Series.

★

BOLSHOI

S. Hurok will bring the Bolshoi Ballet of 75 dancers to Boston's Music Hall for two performances only on Aug. 21 and 22 at 8:30 p.m. The program for both evenings will be "Giselle."

★

Gallagher will perform in concert with Z.Z. Top on Monday, August 20 at Suffolk Downs in Revere as part of its Sunset Series.

★

BONNIE RAITT

B.B. King, Bonnie Raitt and the James Montgomery Band will perform in concert on Wednesday, August 15 at Suffolk Downs in Revere as part of its Sunset Series.

★

B.B.KING

B.B. King, Wishbone Ash and Swallow will perform in concert on Monday, August 13 at Suffolk Downs in Revere as part of its Sunset Series.

★

TANGLEWOOD SATURDAY

An open rehearsal by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held at 10:30 a.m. A concert at 8:30 p.m. will feature Berlioz, Haydn and Brahms.

★

TANGLEWOOD SUNDAY

A 2:30 p.m. concert will feature the Boston Symphony Orchestra playing Handel's "Messiah" with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

★

TANGLEWOOD FRIDAY

A Mozart program which will include "Prague" Symphony and the Coronation Mass will be presented at 9 p.m. at Tanglewood at Lenox, Mass. by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Colin Davis will conduct.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE (E)
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
D. 15,895
AUG 11 1973 New England Newscip

COLIN DAVIS

RYLAND DAVIES

Tanglewood Offers 'Messiah' Tomorrow

LENOX--The sixth weekend at Tanglewood began last night with a performance of Shostakovich's "Romances on Words of Alexander Block" and Rorem's "Ariel", for soprano, clarinet and piano. At 9 p.m., Principal Guest Conductor Colin Davis conducted the orchestra in an all-Mozart program.

Today at 10:30 a.m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an open rehearsal of works to be performed Sunday.

Tonight at 8:30, Colin Davis will conduct the orchestra in Berlioz' Overture to 'Beatrice et Benedict' and Haydn's Symphony no. 84 in E flat, the first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The concert closes with Brahms Symphony no. 2 in D.

On Sunday, at 2:30 p.m., Colin Davis conducts the orchestra in Handel's 'Messiah'. Soloists are Benita Valente soprano, Helen Watts contralto, Ryland Davies tenor, Stafford Dean bass, Robert Levin harpsichord, John Gibbons, organ and members of the Tanglewood Festival Chorus John Oliver conductor.

Colin Davis to conduct full Tanglewood weekend

Colin Davis, principal guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and musical director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, will conduct the three weekend concerts at Tanglewood.

Rorem work

The weekend prelude opens with soprano Phyllis Curtin, pianist Ryan Edwards and members of the BSO chamber players (violinist Joseph Silverstein, cellist Jules Eskin and clarinetist Harold Wright) performing Shostakovich's "Romances on Words of Alexander Block" and Rorem's "Ariel."

At 9 p.m., Davis will conduct an all-Mozart program. The orchestra will perform Symphony No. 38, the "Prague," Violin Concerto in G with Silverstein as soloist and Mozart's Mass in C, the "Coronation," with soprano Benita Valente, contralto Helen Watts, tenor Ryland Davies, bassist Stafford Dean, the Tanglewood Choir and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus under John Oliver.

As usual, an open rehearsal of Sunday's works will be performed on Saturday morning at 10:30.

On Saturday evening at 8:30, the orchestra will play Berlioz's Overture to Beatrice et Benedict and Haydn's Symphony No. 84 in E Flat, the first performance by the BSO. The concert will close with Brahm's Symphony No. 2 in D.

Handel's "Messiah" will be performed on Sunday at 2:30. Soloists are Miss Valente, Miss Watts, Davies, Dean, harpsichordist Robert Levin, organist John Gibbons and the Tanglewood Chorus.

This is Davies first appearance with the BSO. He has sung leading roles with the Scottish and Munich operas, the Chicago Lyric Opera, at the Hollywood Bowl and with the San Francisco Opera and Symphony.

GLOBE (E)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 252,9[illegible]
AUG 10 1973 New England Newscip

Globe critics Recommend . . .

MOVIES

Brando Double-bill — Two of Marlon Brando's best performances can be seen in "On the Waterfront" and "The Wild Ones," the first a powerfully directed movie by Elia Kazan from a screenplay by Budd Schulberg, the second a tightly made bike epic by Laslo Benedek from a material by John Paxton. Friday and Saturday, Park Square Moviehouse.

"Oklahoma Crude" — George C. Scott teams with Faye Dunaway in Stanley Kramer's new action movie set in the Oklahoma oil fields of 1913. Old-fashioned and elemental with a predictable plot; nevertheless Kramer's direction and the acting by the two stars makes it gush into good summer escapist fare. Paris, Boston, and Cinemas in Framingham, Braintree, Peabody and Burlington.

NIGHT LIFE

Helen Reddy, Harry Chapin — Helen's all woman with voice to match; Harry's "Taxi" fared well on the charts. Tonight only (9) at Cape Cod Coliseum, South Yarmouth.

B.B. King, plus special guest star (Monday), plus Bonnie Raitt, James Montgomery Band (Wednesday) — Lucille's definitely not a nag, even though she'll be at Suffolk Downs. She's B.B.'s ever-loving guitar. Could be peak shows of Sunset Series.

Muddy Waters — The mojo will be in residence, beginning Monday, for a week at Paul's Mall.

MUSIC

Tanglewood — "Messiah" in the middle of August seems weird, but with Colin Davis conducting the Tanglewood Festival Chorus and the Boston Symphony, and with Benita Valente, Helen Watts, Ryland Davies, and Staford Dean as soloists, it should be worth hearing. Sunday at 2:30. Davis is in charge all weekend, conducting a Mozart program tonight at 9, and one of Berlioz, Haydn, and Brahms Saturday at 8:30.

Marlboro — The final weekend of the Marlboro (Vt) Music Festival with concerts tonight and tomorrow at 8:30 and Sunday at 3. Marlboro programs are not available ahead of time, but our plumbers team tells us that Stravinsky's "Soldier's Tale," Beethoven's "Archduke" Trio, the Adolf Busch Saxophone Quintet are among the compositions being diligently rehearsed, and the Festival will end with the traditional performance of Beethoven's Choral Fantasy, Leon Kirchner conducting and with Rudolf Serkin as piano soloist.

Art

Contemporary Abstracts — Kenworth Moffett, curator of the Boston Museum of Fine Arts' Contemporary Painting Department, has placed the Department's canvases on view for the summer. From Jackson Pollock's "No 10," to the work of Friedel Dzubas and Ellsworth Kelly, it's among the most stimulating events of the season and evidence, certainly, that in terms of sheer painting our era ranks with the best of the past.

Out-of-Town

#6

Soprano Phyllis Curtin will appear with the Boston Symphony Chamber Players tonight at 7 p.m. at Tanglewood (Lenox, Mass). Tomorrow morning at 10:30 there will be an open rehearsal of works to be performed Sunday. At 8:30 p.m. Colin Davis conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra featuring Berlioz, Haydn and Brahms. On Sunday at 2:30 p.m., Handel's "Messiah" will be presented . . . Alexander Gibson will lead the Philadelphia Orchestra tonight at 8 at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center (Saratoga Springs, NY). Tomorrow at 8 p.m., Eugene Ormandy conducts, Susan Starr at piano. Sunday at 3 and 8 p.m., Liberace will star. Harpsichordist Robert Conant appears Monday evening . . . Pianist Rudolf Serkin is the soloist and Leon Kirchner will conduct the Marlboro Festival Chorus and Orchestra Sunday at 3

Herald American
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
S. 251,004
AUG 5 1973

Tanglewood opening slated

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, Mass. — The sixth weekend at Tanglewood begins Friday at 7 p.m., with Phyllis Curtin, soprano, Ryan Edwards, piano, and members of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players (Joseph Silverstein, violin, Jules Eskin, cello and Harold Wright, clarinet, performing Shostakovish's "Romances on Words of Alexander Block" and Rorem's "Ariel", for soprano, clarinet and piano.

Then at 9, principal guest conductor Colin Davis conducts the orchestra in all-Mozart program. Davis opens the concert with Symphony No. 38, the "Prague" and follows it with the Violin Concerto in G with Silverstein as soloist.

RYLAND DAVIES

COLIN DAVIS

The concert closes with Mozart's Mass in C, the "Coronation" with Benita Valente, soprano; Helen Watts, contralto; Davies; Stafford Dean, bass; the Tanglewood Choir and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, conductor.

On Saturday evening at 8:30, Davis will conduct the Orchestra in Berlioz' "Overture to 'Beatrice et Benedict'" and Haydn's Symphony No. 84 in E flat, the first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The concert closes with Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D.

Next Sunday at 2:30 p.m., Colin Davis conducts the orchestra in Handel's 'Messiah.' Benita Valente, soprano, Helen Watts, contralto, Ryland Davies, tenor, Stafford Dean bass, Robert Levin, harpsichord, John Gibbons, organ and members of the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 24,500
AUG 9 1973 New England Newscip

Colin Davis to Conduct BSO In Sixth Tanglewood Weekend

The sixth weekend at Tanglewood begins on Friday, Aug. 10, at 7 pm with Phyllis Curtin, soprano, Ryan Edwards, piano, and members of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players (Joseph Silverstein, violin, Jules Eskin, cello, and Harold Wright, clarinet) performing Shostakovich's "Romances on Words of Alexander Block" and Rorem's "Ariel," for soprano, clarinet and piano. Then at 9 pm, Principal Guest Conductor Colin Davis conducts the orchestra in an all-Mozart program.

Mr. Davis opens the concert with Symphony No. 38 the "Prague" and follows it with the Violin concerto in G with Joseph Silverstein as soloist. The concert closes with Mozart's Mass in C, the "Coronation" with Benita Valente, soprano, Helen Watts, contralto, Ryland Davies, tenor, Stafford Dean, bass, the Tanglewood Choir and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, conductor.

On Saturday, Aug. 11, at 10:30 am, as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed Sunday.

On Saturday evening at 8:30 pm, Colin Davis will conduct the orchestra in Berlioz' Overture to "Beatrice et Benedict" and Haydn's Symphony No. 84 in E flat, the first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The concert closes with Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D.

On Sunday, Aug. 12, at 2:30 pm Colin Davis conducts the orchestra in Handel's "Messiah." Soloists are Benita Valente, soprano, Helen Watts, Contralto, Ryland Davies, tenor, Stafford Dean, bass, Robert Levin, harpsichord, John Gibbons, organ, and members of the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, conductor.

ENTERPRISE-SUN (E)
MARLBORO, MASS.
D. 13,150
AUG 9 1973 New England Newscip

"Messiah" with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

★

TANGLEWOOD FRIDAY

A Mozart program which will include "Prague" Symphony and the Coronation Mass will be presented at 9 p.m. at Tanglewood at Lenox, Mass. by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Colin Davis will conduct.

★

TANGLEWOOD SUNDAY

A 2:30 p.m. concert will feature the Boston Symphony Orchestra playing Handel's "Messiah" with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus John Oliver conductor.

RAVENA, N. Y.
NEWS-HERALD
(ALBANY MARKET AREA)
W. 2,000
AUG 10 1973

Soprano Slated For Weekend At Tanglewood

The sixth weekend at Tanglewood begins on Friday, Aug. 10 at 7:00 p. m. with Phyllis Curtin soprano, Ryan Edwards piano and members of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players (Joseph Silverstein violin, Jules Eskin cello and Harold Wright clarinet) performing Shostakovich's "Romances on Words of Alexander Block" and Rorem's "Ariel", for soprano, clarinet and piano. Then at 9 p. m., Principal Guest Conductor Colin Davis conducts the Orchestra in an all-Mozart program. Mr. Davis opens the concert with Symphony no. 38 the 'Prague' and follows it with the Violin concerto in G with Joseph Silverstein as soloist. The concert closes with Mozart's Mass in C, the 'Coronation' with Benita Valente coprano, Helen Watts contralto, Ryland Davies tenor, Stafford Dean bass, the Tanglewood Choir and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus John Oliver conductor.

On Saturday, August 11 at 10:30 a. m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed Sunday.

On Saturday evening at 8:30 p. m., Colin Davis will conduct the Orchestra in Berlioz' Overture to 'Beatrice et Benedict' and Haydn's Symphony no. 84 in E flat, the first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The concert closes with Brahms' Symphony no. 2 in D.

On Sunday, August 12 at 2:30 p. m. Colin Davis conducts the Orchestra in Handel's 'Messiah'. Soloists are Benita Valente soprano, Helen Watts contralto, Ryland Davies tenor, Stafford Dean bass, Robert Levin harpsichord, John Gibbons organ and members of the Tanglewood Festival. Chorus John Oliver conductor.

LET YOURSELF GO

A Medley of Events, Activities and Whimsy to Keep in Mind This Week

BY ANN SHANAHAN

—HEAR THE SOUNDS and see the sights of western Massachusetts on Channel 57's new "Down the Road" show which starts a ten-week run Friday at 9 p.m. (If the Watergate hearings run Friday, the show will get "bumped" and you may then see it Saturday from 7 to 8 p.m., instead). Channel 57 has made use of its new mobile filming unit to record some of the things that are going on this summer in our area - a practice it hopes to continue and expand as time and money permit. The first segment of the show will feature part of a Northampton Farm League baseball game between the Moose Club and Lashway Logging teams. One of the stars of this bit is the pitcher which turns out to be a machine. The first show will also include a walking tour of the Tanglewood grounds. Future segments will go to a crafts fair in Shelburne Falls, a Fiddler's convention in South Deerfield and to hear some Cabaret singers in Williamstown.

Channel 57 will continue its gavel-to-gavel coverage of the day's Senate Watergate hearings, starting at 8 p.m., each evening. Also, Sunday at 10 p.m., Channel 57 will air "Point of Order," the classic film documentary about the late Senator Joseph McCarthy, McCarthyism and those other hearings, the Army-McCarthy ones. Ed Baumeister of "The Reporters" program will put the film in the proper time frame and perspective with his introduction and will follow it with two exclusive interviews with participants in the hearings. Baumeister talks to former subcommittee chief counsel Roy Cohn and James St. Clair, a former legal associate of the "simple trial lawyer" from Boston, Joseph Welch.

—EXPRESS YOURSELF WITH flowers. Enter the Goshen Flower Show. As usual the show has an overall theme and designated artistic categories of considerable imagination and wit.

The title of this year's show: "Artistic Interpretation of Some Biblical Views on the Proper Place and Relative Merit of Women." Arrangements are asked for under such categories as: one which evokes an feeling of oppression and slavery; one to illustrate "It is better to live in a desert land than with a contentious woman" (using cactus); one to be called "Jezebel" (a loud and brassy arrangement); and so on.

Exhibitors from anywhere are welcome to bring their entries to the Goshen Congregational Church between 8:30 and 10:30 a.m. Saturday; judging will follow. The show will be open to the public from 3:30 to 9 p.m. In addition, there will be a fair at 3:30 and a smorgasbord supper from 5:30 to 7 at the Town Hall.

Copies of the rules and instructions for the flower show, which is conducted in cooperation with the Mass. Department of Agriculture, may be obtained from Mrs. Homer Bissell, Goshen.

Other offerings:

"Captain Horatio Hornblower," with Gregory Peck and Virginia Mayo will be shown free on a seats available basis at 8 p.m., Tuesday in the Campus Center Auditorium, UMass.

Noon Tuesday is the deadline for reserving space for your child at the two-week Vacation Church School sponsored by St. John's Episcopal Church, in cooperation with other Northampton churches. The school, which will run from 9 a.m. to noon Monday place at Nonotuck Park in Easthampton. At this writing I can't be sure, but depending on the results of a game played in Great Barrington on Saturday Northampton's East All Stars may be playing in Easthampton. In any case, Friday's games will be at 3 and 5:30 p.m. Saturday the consolation game will be at 12:30 and the championship game at 3:30 p.m. Seating has been provided for about 800 people and there will undoubtedly be a large crowd.

The New England Quarter Horse Show will be held from 8 a.m. to 10 p.m. Saturday and Sunday at the Eastern States Exposition West Springfield. There is an admission charge.

The Orange, Mass. Airport will be the scene of a 10-man Star Parachute Meet Saturday and Sunday, for those who like the vicarious thrill of seeing others sail through the air.

The title of Saturday's Mohawk Trail Concert is "A Rachmaninoff Retrospective." The concert will be held at 8:30 p.m., in The Federated Church, Charlemont.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE (E)
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
D. 16,895
AUG 6 1973
New England Newsclip

"A THOUSAND CLOWNS," Herb Gardner's funny and touching story about fun-loving Murray and his lovable nephew Nick, is this week's offering at the Mount Holyoke Summer Theatre. John Grassilli and Ken Barton play the two major roles in this story about eccentrics in a constant bout with the nine-to-five world.

—SEE A SHOW. There is good lighthearted summer entertainment around to take your want to go.

—TREAT YOURSELF TO Handel's "Messiah" at Tanglewood. The Messiah will be the featured work at Sunday's concert at 2:30 p.m. A word of warning: Tanglewood gets more popular each year with the result that it is practically impossible to listen seriously to the music from the lawn anymore - a sad (and apparently irreparable) fact of some of us who used to enjoy the economy and reasonably good acoustics of lawn seats. Shed tickets to Tanglewood are admittedly expensive and hard to come by, as the hour of a given concert draws near. However, we have concluded that it's probably more sensible to treat yourself to inside seats once during the summer than to sit frequently, but distractedly, on the lawn. You can always enjoy your picnic on the grass and repair to your seats inside when the music begins. There are two more weekends of concerts after the coming one.

Colin Davis Conductor at Tanglewood

Bos Symphony

The sixth week end at Tanglewood, Lenox, begins on Friday at 7 p.m. with Phyllis Curtin, soprano, Ryan Edwards piano and members of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players (Joseph Silverstein violin, Jules Eskin cello and Harold Wright clarinet) performing Shostakovich's "Romances on Words of Alexander Block" and Rorem's "Ariel," for soprano, clarinet and piano.

Then at 9 p.m., principal guest conductor Colin Davis conducts the orchestra in an all - Mozart program. Davis opens the concert with Symphony no. 38 the "Prague" and follows it with the Violin concerto in G with Joseph Silverstein as soloist.

The concert closes with Mozart's Mass in C, the "Coronation" with Benita Valente soprano, Helen Watts contralto, Ryland Davies tenor, Stafford Dean bass, the Tanglewood Choir and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus John Oliver conductor.

On Saturday at 10:30 a.m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an open rehearsal of works to be performed Sunday.

On Saturday at 8:30 p.m., Colin Davis will conduct the orchestra in Berlioz' Overture to "Beatrice et Benedict" and Haydn's Symphony no. 84 in E flat, the first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The concert closes with Brahms' Symphony no. 2 in D.

On Sunday, at 2:30 p.m., Colin Davis conducts the orchestra in Handel's "Messiah." Soloists are Benita Valente soprano, Helen Watts contralto, Ryland Davies tenor, Stafford Dean bass, Robert Levin harpsichord, John Gibbons organ and members of the Tanglewood Festival Chorus John Oliver conductor.

ENTERPRISE-SUN (E)
MARLBORO, MASS.
D. 10,150
AUG 9 1973
New England Newsc

TANGLEWOOD SATURDAY

An open rehearsal by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held at 10:30 a.m. A concert at 8:30 p.m. will feature Berlioz, Haydn and Brahms.

HERALD (E)
MANCHESTER, CONN.
D. 15,000
AUG 10 1973
New Engla Newsc

Tanglewood

The weekend at Tanglewood in the Berkshires, Lenox, Mass., begins tonight at 7 with Phyllis Curtin, soprano, Ryan Edwards, pianist, and members of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performing Shostakovich's "Romances on Words of Alexander Block," and Rorem's "Ariel," for soprano, clarinet and piano.

At 9 p.m., principal guest conductor Colin Davis conducts the orchestra in an all-Mozart program. The concert closes with Mozart's Mass in C, with Benita Valente, soprano, Helen Watts, contralto, Ryland Davies, tenor, Stafford Dean, bass, the Tanglewood Choir and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

Saturday at 10:30 a.m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed Sunday.

Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m., Davis will conduct the orchestra in works by Berlioz and Haydn. The concert will close with Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D.

Sunday at 2:30 p.m., the orchestra will perform Handel's Messiah with the soloists who appeared Friday in addition to Robert Levin, harpsichord, John Gibbons, organ, and members of the Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
S. 135,000
AUG 12 1973
New England Newsclip

TANGLEWOOD — Lenox, Mass. Boston Symphony Orchestra in residence, with guest artists. Today at 2:30 p.m., Colin Davis conducts Handel's Messiah (Valente, Watts, Davies, Dean, soloists). Friday, Aug. 17, 7 p.m., weekend prelude, 9 p.m. Lawrence Foster conducts Berloiz: Overture "Corsair," Bruch: Scottish Fantasy featuring concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, and Prokofieff: Sym. No. 5; Saturday, Aug. 18, open rehearsal at 10 a.m. Concert, 8:30 p.m., Arthur Fiedler conducts, Dvorak New World Sym., Rachmaninoff Piano Concerto No. 2 with Earl Wild, and Wagner: Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg." Tanglewood - on - Parade, Tues., Aug. 14, many events during the day, with Seiji Ozawa conducting an 8:30 p.m. concert.

New York Post
D. 623,245 SAT. 354,797
AUG 10 1973

SMALL STEWART BARASH WEBSTER

p.m. at the Marlboro Music Festival (Marlboro, Vt) . . . The Fifth Dimension is at the Garden State Arts Center (Holmdel, NJ) tonight at 9 and tomorrow evening at the same time, Judy Collins. On Sunday the National Symphony makes their final appearance at 8:30 p.m. . . . Walter Terry hosts a dance-laboratory session along with pianist Mary Campbell at Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival (Lee, Mass) Sunday at 3 p.m. Marcia Haydee opens for one week on Tuesday . . . Martha Graham Dance Company will present "Night Journey" Tuesday at 8:30 p.m. at the Center of Music, Drama and Art (Lake Placid, NY).

Cellist Samuel Mayers is the guest artist with the Silvermine String Quartet Sunday at 8 p.m. at Silvermine Guild Chamber Music Center in Gifford Hall (New Cannan, Conn) . . . Old Westbury Gardens (Old Westbury, LI) presents the All-American Banjo Team Wednesday at 7 p.m. . . . Pianist Beveridge Webster appears with the Orchestra Society of Westchester Symphony (Lyndhurst, NY), tomorrow night at 8:30 . . . The Four Freshmen will be featured in concert tonight at 8:30 at the Lakeside Theater of Eisenhower Park (East Meadow, LI) . . . "Anything Goes" continues nightly except Monday at Theater-by-the-Sea (Matunuck, RI) . . . Howard Duff, Betty Garrett and Don Porter open Monday in "The Price" at Falmouth Playhouse (Falmouth, Mass.) . . . The Tappan Zee Playhouse (Nyack, NY) will present "The Gershwin Years" beginning Monday . . . Jerry Lewis and Lana Cantrell continue through Sunday at the Cape Cod Melody Tent (Hyannis, Mass) . . . Mary Small is featured in "Follies" opening Monday at Camden Music Fair (Cherry Hill, NJ) . . . Also opening Monday are Patty Duke and John Astin in "A Shot in the Dark" at Ivoryton Playhouse (Ivoryton, Conn) . . . Don Stewart is the headliner tomorrow night at the Club Bene (Morgan, NJ) . . . "The World of Kurt Weill" begins a run Monday through Aug. 18 at the John Drew Theater (East Hampton, LI) . . . Sheila Linne Barash is featured in "Last of the Red Hot Lovers," Wednesday through Sundays until Sept. 2 at Carl Hoppl's Malibu (Lido Beach, LI) . . . Milton Berle is the director and star of "Norman, Is That You?" at Westchester Country Playhouse (Yonkers, NY) bowing Monday.

An All-Mozart Program

LENOX — The sixth weekend at Tanglewood begins on Friday evening at 7 with Phyllis Curtin soprano, Ryan Edwards piano and members of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players (Joseph Silverstein violin, Jules Eskin cello and Harold Wright clarinet) performing Shostakovich's "Romance on Words of Alexander Block" and Rorem's "Ariel," for soprano, clarinet and piano.

At 9 p.m. principal guest conductor Colin Davis conducts the Orchestra in an all-Mozart program. Mr. Davis opens the concert with Symphony. No. 38 the "Prague" and follows it with the Violin concerto in G with Joseph Silverstein as soloist. The concert closes with Mozart's Mass in C, the "Coronation" with Benita Valente soprano, Helen Watts contralto, Ryland Davies tenor, Stafford Dean bass, the Tanglewood Choir and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus John Oliver conductor.

On Saturday, at 10:30 a.m. as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed Sunday.

On Saturday evening at 8:30, Colin Davis will conduct the Orchestra in Berlioz' Overture to "Beatrice et Benedict" and Haydn's Symphony No. 84 in E flat, the first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The concert closes with Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D.

On Sunday, at 2:30 p.m. Davis conducts the Orchestra in Handel's "Messiah". Soloists are Benita Valente soprano, Helen Watts contralto, Ryland Davies tenor, Stafford Dean bass, Robert Levin harpsichord, John Gibbons organ and members of the Tanglewood Festival Chorus John Oliver conductor.

COLIN DAVIS

RYLAND DAVIES

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
S. 130,000
AUG 5 1973
New England Newsclip

LET YOURSELF GO

BY ANN SHANAHAN

A Medley of Events, Activities and Whimsy to Keep in Mind This Week

—HEAR THE SOUNDS and see the sights of western Massachusetts on Channel 57's new "Down the Road" show which starts a ten-week run Friday at 9 p.m. (If the Watergate hearings run Friday, the show will get "bumped" and you may then see it Saturday from 7 to 8 p.m., instead). Channel 57 has made use of its new mobile filming unit to record some of the things that are going on this summer in our area - a practice it hopes to continue and expand as time and money permit. The first segment of the show will feature part of a Northampton Farm League baseball game between the Moose Club and Lashway Logging teams. One of the stars of this bit is the pitcher which turns out to be a machine. The first show will also include a walking tour of the Tanglewood grounds. Future segments will go to a crafts fair in Shelburne Falls, a Fiddler's convention in South Deerfield and to hear some Cabaret singers in Williamstown.

Channel 57 will continue its gavel-to-gavel coverage of the day's Senate Watergate hearings, starting at 8 p.m., each evening. Also, Sunday at 10 p.m., Channel 57 will air "Point of Order," the classic film documentary about the late Senator Joseph McCarthy, McCarthyism and those other hearings: the Army-McCarthy ones. Ed Baumeister of "The Reporters" program will put the film in the proper time frame and perspective with his introduction and will follow it with two exclusive interviews with participants in the hearings. Baumeister talks to former subcommittee chief counsel Roy Cohn and James St. Clair, a former legal associate of the "simple trial lawyer" from Boston, Joseph Welch.

—EXPRESS YOURSELF WITH flowers. Enter the Goshen Flower Show. As usual the show has an overall theme and designated artistic categories of considerable imagination and wit.

The title of this year's show: "Artistic Interpretation of Some Biblical Views on the Proper Place and Relative Merit of Women." Arrangements are asked for under such categories as: one which evokes an feeling of oppression and slavery; one to illustrate "It is better to live in a desert land than with a contentious woman" (using cactus); one to be called "Jezebel" (a loud and brassy arrangement); and so on.

Exhibitors from anywhere are welcome to bring their entries to the Goshen Congregational Church between 8:30 and 10:30 a.m. Saturday; judging will follow. The show will be open to the public from 3:30 to 9 p.m. In addition, there will be a fair at 3:30 and a smorgasbord supper from 5:30 to 7 at the Town Hall.

Copies of the rules and instructions for the flower show, which is conducted in cooperation with the Mass. Department of Agriculture, may be obtained from Mrs. Homer Bissell, Goshen.

Other offerings:

"Captain Horatio Hornblower," with Gregory Peck and Virginia Mayo will be shown free on a seats available basis at 8 p.m., Tuesday in the Campus Center Auditorium, UMass.

Noon Tuesday is the deadline for reserving space for your child at the two-week Vacation Church School sponsored by St. John's Episcopal Church, in cooperation with other Northampton churches. The school, which will run from 9 a.m. to noon Monday place at Nonotuck Park in Easthampton. At this writing I can't be sure, but depending on the results of a game played in Great Barrington on Saturday Northampton's East All Stars may be playing in Easthampton. In any case, Friday's games will be at 3 and 5:30 p.m. Saturday the consolation game will be at 12:30 and the championship game at 3:30 p.m. Seating has been provided for about 800 people and there will undoubtedly be a large crowd.

The New England Quarter Horse Show will be held from 8 a.m. to 10 p.m. Saturday and Sunday at the Eastern States Exposition West Springfield. There is an admission charge.

The Orange, Mass. Airport will be the scene of a 10-man Star Parachute Meet Saturday and Sunday, for those who like the vicarious thrill of seeing others sail through the air.

The title of Saturday's Mohawk Trail Concert is "A Rachmaninoff Retrospective." The concert will be held at 8:30 p.m., in The Federated Church, Charlemont.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE (E)
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
D. 16,895
AUG 6 1973
New England Newsclip

"A THOUSAND CLOWNS," Herb Gardner's funny and touching story about fun-loving Murray and his lovable nephew Nick, is this week's offering at the Mount Holyoke Summer Theatre. John Grassilli and Ken Barton play the two major roles in this story about eccentrics in a constant bout with the nine-to-five world.

—SEE A SHOW. There is good lighthearted summer entertainment around to take your want to go.

—TREAT YOURSELF TO Handel's "Messiah" at Tanglewood. The Messiah will be the featured work at Sunday's concert at 2:30 p.m. A word of warning: Tanglewood gets more popular each year with the result that it is practically impossible to listen seriously to the music from the lawn anymore - a sad (and apparently irreparable) fact of some of us who used to enjoy the economy and reasonably good acoustics of lawn seats. Shed tickets to Tanglewood are admittedly expensive and hard to come by as the hour of a given concert draws near. However, we have concluded that it's probably more sensible to treat yourself to inside seats once during the summer than to sit frequently, but distractedly, on the lawn. You can always enjoy your picnic on the grass and repair to your seats inside when the music begins. There are two more weekends of concerts after the coming one.

Colin Davis Conductor at Tanglewood

Bost Sym Orch
AUG 8 1973
APR 20 1973

The sixth week end at Tanglewood, Lenox, begins on Friday at 7 p.m. with Phyllis Curtin, soprano, Ryan Edwards Piano and members of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players (Joseph Silverstein violin, Jules Eskin cello and Harold Wright clarinet) performing Shostakovich's "Romances on Words of Alexander Block" and Rorem's "Ariel," for soprano, clarinet and piano.

Then at 9 p.m., principal guest conductor Colin Davis conducts the orchestra in an all - Mozart program. Davis opens the concert with Symphony no. 38 the "Prague" and follows it with the Violin concerto in G with Joseph Silverstein as soloist.

The concert closes with Mozart's Mass in C, the "Coronation" with Benita Valente soprano, Helen Watts contralto, Ryland Davies tenor, Stafford Dean bass, the Tanglewood Choir and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus John Oliver conductor.

On Saturday at 10:30 a.m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an open rehearsal of works to be performed Sunday.

On Saturday at 8:30 p.m., Colin Davis will conduct the orchestra in Berlioz' Overture to "Beatrice et Benedict" and Haydn's Symphony no. 84 in E flat, the first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The concert closes with Brahms' Symphony no. 2 in D.

On Sunday, at 2:30 p.m., Colin Davis conducts the orchestra in Handel's "Messiah." Soloists are Benita Valente soprano, Helen Watts contralto, Ryland Davies tenor, Stafford Dean bass, Robert Levin harpsichord, John Gibbons organ and members of the Tanglewood Festival Chorus John Oliver conductor.

TANGLEWOOD SATURDAY

An open rehearsal by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held at 10:30 a.m. A concert at 8:30 p.m. will feature Berlioz, Haydn and Brahms.

Tanglewood

The weekend at Tanglewood in the Berkshires, Lenox, Mass., begins tonight at 7 with Phyllis Curtin, soprano, Ryan Edwards, pianist, and members of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performing Shostakovich's "Romances on Words of Alexander Block," and Rorem's "Ariel," for soprano, clarinet and piano.

At 9 p.m., principal guest conductor Colin Davis conducts the orchestra in an all-Mozart program. The concert closes with Mozart's Mass in C, with Benita Valente, soprano, Helen Watts, contralto, Ryland Davies, tenor, Stafford Dean, bass, the Tanglewood Choir and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

Saturday at 10:30 a.m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed Sunday.

Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m., Davis will conduct the orchestra in works by Berlioz and Haydn. The concert will close with Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D.

Sunday at 2:30 p.m., the orchestra will perform Handel's Messiah with the soloists who appeared Friday in addition to Robert Levin, harpsichord, John Gibbons, organ, and members of the Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

TANGLEWOOD — Lenox, Mass. Boston Symphony Orchestra in residence, with guest artists. Today at 2:30 p.m., Colin Davis conducts Handel's Messiah (Valente, Watts, Davies, Dean, soloists). Friday, Aug. 17, 7 p.m., weekend prelude. 9 p.m. Lawrence Foster conducts Berloiz: Overture "Corsair," Bruch: Scottish Fantasy featuring concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, and Prokofieff: Sym. No. 5; Saturday, Aug. 18, open rehearsal at 10 a.m. Concert, 8:30 p.m., Arthur Fiedler conducts, Dvorak New World Sym., Rachmaninoff Piano Concerto No. 2 with Earl Wild, and Wagner: Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg." Tanglewood - on - Parade, Tues., Aug. 14, many events during the day, with Seiji Ozawa conducting an 8:30 p.m. concert.

New York Post
D. 623,245 SAT. 354,797
AUG 10 1973

SMALL STEWART BARASH WEBSTER

p.m. at the Marlboro Music Festival (Marlboro, Vt) . . . The Fifth Dimension is at the Garden State Arts Center (Holmdel, NJ) tonight at 9 and tomorrow evening at the same time, Judy Collins. On Sunday the National Symphony makes their final appearance at 8:30 p.m. . . . Walter Terry hosts a dance-laboratory session along with pianist Mary Campbell at Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival (Lee, Mass) Sunday at 3 p.m. Marcia Haydee opens for one week on Tuesday . . . Martha Graham Dance Company will present "Night Journey" Tuesday at 8:30 p.m. at the Center of Music, Drama and Art (Lake Placid, NY).

Cellist Samuel Mayers is the guest artist with the Silvermine String Quartet Sunday at 8 p.m. at Silvermine Guild Chamber Music Center in Gifford Hall (New Cannan, Conn) . . . Old Westbury Gardens (Old Westbury, LI) presents the All-American Banjo Team Wednesday at 7 p.m. . . . Pianist Beveridge Webster appears with the Orchestra Society of Westchester Symphony (Lyndhurst, NY), tomorrow night at 8:30 . . . The Four Freshmen will be featured in concert tonight at 8:30 at the Lakeside Theater of Eisenhower Park (East Meadow, LI) . . . "Anything Goes" continues nightly except Monday at Theater-by-the-Sea (Matunuck, RI) . . . Howard Duff, Betty Garrett and Don Porter open Monday in "The Price" at Falmouth Playhouse (Falmouth, Mass.)

. . . The Tappan Zee Playhouse (Nyack, NY) will present "The Gershwin Years" beginning Monday . . . Jerry Lewis and Lana Cantrell continue through Sunday at the Cape Cod Melody Tent (Hyannis, Mass) . . . Mary Small is featured in "Follies" opening Monday at Camden Music Fair (Cherry Hill, NJ) . . . Also opening Monday are Patty Duke and John Astin in "A Shot in the Dark" at Ivoryton Playhouse (Ivoryton, Conn) . . . Don Stewart is the headliner tomorrow night at the Club Bene (Morgan, NJ) . . . "The World of Kurt Weill" begins a run Monday through Aug. 18 at the John Drew Theater (East Hampton, LI) . . . Sheila Linne Barash is featured in "Last of the Red Hot Lovers," Wednesday through Sundays until Sept. 2 at Carl Hoppl's Malibu (Lido Beach, LI) . . . Milton Berle is the director and star of "Norman, Is That You?" at Westchester Country Playhouse (Yonkers, NY) bowing Monday.

An All-Mozart Program

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
AUG 6 1973
New England Newsclip

LENOX — The sixth weekend at Tanglewood begins on Friday evening at 7 with Phyllis Curtin soprano, Ryan Edwards piano and members of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players (Joseph Silverstein violin, Jules Eskin cello and Harold Wright clarinet) performing Shostakovich's "Romance on Words of Alexander Block" and Rorem's "Ariel," for soprano, clarinet and piano.

At 9 p.m. principal guest conductor Colin Davis conducts the Orchestra in an all-Mozart program. Mr. Davis opens the concert with Symphony. No. 38 the "Prague" and follows it with the Violin concerto in G with Joseph Silverstein as soloist. The concert closes with Mozart's Mass in C, the "Coronation" with Benita Valente soprano, Helen Watts contralto, Ryland Davies tenor, Stafford Dean bass, the Tanglewood Choir and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus John Oliver conductor.

On Saturday, at 10:30 a.m. as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed Sunday.

On Saturday evening at 8:30, Colin Davis will conduct the Orchestra in Berlioz' Overture to "Beatrice et Benedict" and Haydn's Symphony No. 84 in E flat, the first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The concert closes with Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D.

On Sunday, at 2:30 p.m. Davis conducts the Orchestra in Handel's "Messiah". Soloists are Benita Valente soprano, Helen Watts contralto, Ryland Davies tenor, Stafford Dean bass, Robert Levin harpsichord, John Gibbons organ and members of the Tanglewood Festival Chorus John Oliver conductor.

COLIN DAVIS

RYLAND DAVIES

Thor, Angels Vie For Supremacy At Tanglewood

UNION (M)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 84,000
AUG 1 1973
New England Newscliip

By R.C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Thor and the Angels were at odds at Tanglewood Friday night. Thor made a couple of points, but the Angels won the dispute.

Shortly after Colin Davis gave the Boston Symphony start of Mozart's Symphony Orchestra the sign for the No. 38, Thor gave a few ominous rumbles and shot a couple of lightning bolts.

Then came the really big sound and a cloudburst and wind that blew mist all the way under the great shed to the stage.

The angels didn't start the symphony's second movement for 10 or 12 minutes, and it is one of Mozart's nicest. The rain started again while the music was still floating, but the angels persevered.

Then the orchestra's concertmaster stepped up to play the solo part for Mozart's Violin Concerto No. 3 (K216). It was beautiful . . . especially the middle section which is as sweetly lyrical as Mozart can be.

Silverstein's style is ideal for this kind of music. He draws a gentle and agile tone from his violin that has just the right aura of purity.

It makes the whole world seem clean. It banished Thor and let the audience out for a much cooler intermission than it had anticipated.

The sudden storm caused no great damage to Tanglewood's famous trees, but there were reports that two or three big ones were lost in Lenox.

After the intermission a quartet of vocal soloists and the combined Tanglewood Choir and Festival Chorus filed on stage with Davis and the orchestra to do one of Mozart's loveliest choral pieces, the "Coronation" Mass (K 317).

I didn't hear much of it because of the delay caused by the storm and the demand of the deadline, but I heard enough to feel secure that the chorus maintained the unusually high standard it had established this season.

It was full of crisp vitality and hair-trigger responsiveness to the subtleties of speed and volume asked for by the conductor.

And, with Mozart calling the tune, who can lose?

The prelude program at 7 p.m. asked a lot from the listeners. It asked that they sit still, for the seriousness of Shostakovich and the insecurity of Ned Rorem as demonstrated by a few of their songs; and it asked that they keep track of the words on the mimeographed sheets in near darkness.

Often the words of the songs are needless (as in acid rock, for instance, where the sensation is all). But with art songs, the words are essential because the composer invariably has gone to great trouble to illuminate or extend the meaning of the words with his music.

However, there is much musical meaning to be had without the words, The Shostakovich songs. Opus 127, were accompanied by piano, or violin, or cello, or all three, and the Rorem songs ("Ariel") included a clarinet with the piano to accompany the soprano.

In both cases, for me, the instruments often had the better of the score ... unless my prejudice about words causes instrumental abstraction to sound more valid than vocal abstraction.

Anyway, Phyllis Curtin's clear, cool, exacting tones seemed appropriate to the latent intensity in the songs can do with diction; Jules Eskin's cello contributed a few moments of welcome warmth, and Harold Wright's clarinet seemed, once again, to be under the control of a magician.

And of course, Ryan Edwards at the piano and Joseph Silverstein with his violin served the cause of professionalism with skill.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 187,897
AUG 16 1973
New England Newscliip

Tanglewood Performances Are Even More Brilliant

Bos. Symphony

By RICHARD CONWAY

It was a very special night at Tanglewood. So special, that not even the impressive storm that broke during the opening movement of the Mozart "Prague" Symphony, and delayed the concert for several minutes while those on the lawn outside sought shelter in the Shed, and then made everyone wait, hoping that the fortissimo chords of the thunder and lightning would die down enough that the pianissimo chords of the beautiful second movement could be heard, could diminish its particular lustre.

More Brilliantly

The Boston Symphony is playing more brilliantly than it ever has in my four years of going up to Tanglewood. In particular, my attention has been drawn time and again to the almost incredible, delicate loveliness of their pianissimo playing.

A few weeks ago there was that second movement of a Mozart clarinet concerto that I felt would not be matched in a long time. But in addition to the second movement of the "Prague," conductor Colin Davis, soloist Joseph Silverstein, and an orchestra that seemed to sense the special communication, left the audience spell-bound with an absolutely beautiful second movement of the "Violin Concerto No. 3 in G, K.216."

As Good As There Is

I have written many times that I feel that Silverstein is as fine a violinist as one can hear on the concert stage today. The lovely, lyrical tones he draws from his instrument are like those of a truly great and expressive singer, such as Dietrich Fischer - Dieskau, for instance. Silverstein's playing of the Mozart was one of the finest things I have heard him do.

And Friday night's concert convinced me that Colin Davis is one of the premiere conductors in the world today. My first impression of him last season was not especially overwhelming. But as a friend pointed out, you have to stay with him for awhile.

Absolute Clarity

His podium technique is not very impressive, but then you begin to listen to the music that he's getting — the marvelous precision, the absolute clarity of everything, the shadings and sensitivities — and you begin to realize what a formidable musician he really is.

One of Davis' strong points is his handling of choral works. He proved it again Friday night with a richly rewarding performance of Mozart's great "Mass in C, K317," more commonly known as the "Coronation."

With the Tanglewood Festival Chorus and Choir, definitely rehearsed by John Oliver, responding with some excellent choral singing, Davis infused the Mass with great vigor and drama, never allowing the tempos to flag.

Tended to Lag

The only major drawbacks to the performance were that the solo quartet did not sing well as a unit in their ensemble work.

Soprano Benita Valente, who had been unimpressive in Haydn's "Creation" earlier in the season, sang a beautifully expressive "Agnus Dei." The other members of the quartet were Helen Watts, alto; Ryland Davies, tenor; and Stafford Dean, bass, whose work was all in ensemble.

Colin Davis will conduct tonight's concert and also Sunday afternoon's, which will be a performance of Handel's "Messiah." One awaits that with eager expectation.

NEWS (E)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,028
AUG 11 1973
New England Newscliip

'Messiah' as a succession of hit tunes

By Louis Snyder

Lenox, Mass.

Christmas in August? "Messiah" in the summer? Handel in the hills, outside a formal frame?

It happened on Sunday afternoon at Tanglewood, when conductor Colin Davis, the Boston Symphony, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, and four well-matched soloists put their formidable collective force together to remind us that the day for "Messiah" is everyday (likeMother's Day), and that snow needn't be falling or temperatures dropping for 11,400 listeners to respond to what is a musical celebration for all seasons.

Music

Certainly the Boston Symphony hasn't done "Messiah" at Tanglewood before, nor is it probable that it often has in Boston where the Handel and Haydn has had a traditional monopoly in big-time Yuletide performances for well over 100 years. Therefore this was something of a ground-breaking event, and as such, an eye-and-ear-opener for old-timers and initiates alike.

Mr. Davis, like many other forward-looking musicians today, is not above scraping off the overpaintings that time has left on old musical masterpieces — not just for the sake of doing so, but to discover the composer's intent and let it shine through intermediate layers of what may have been the social, moral, or musical prejudices of the centuries between. He isn't the only one to have taken "Messiah" in hand interpretatively, but this performance bore the hallmark of his taste, musicianship, and above all, awareness of "Messiah" as a shared experience with the audience, as opposed to a sermon in notes being preached at it.

Particularly for its devotees, "Messiah" is an unbroken succession of hit tunes, if you will, which, thanks to their melodic and harmonic variety, are capable of being accepted and loved without rhyme or reason. How often have listeners asked themselves what is really being said, what is happening here?

Altogether remarkable

"Messiah" as Mr. Davis presented it, was anything but self-complacent or soporific. From the beginning, it progressed with force and purpose (except for a distressing five-minute interruption for the seating of latecomers). Thanks to a series of rhythmic and coloristic contrasts — accompanied throughout by great attention to diction on the part both of soloists and chorus as there was re-created a well-known story, motively and pictorially, which had been conceived at least 150 years before viewers could see such things on screens before their eyes. Using musical means, Mr. Davis's evocation of the visual aspect of "Messiah" proved to be not only unique, but altogether remarkable.

There was an orchestra of about 45; the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, which John Oliver has trained impeccably, seemed to be at its usual complement of 80 or so, and the soloists — soprano Benita Valente, contralto Helen Watts, tenor Ryland Davies, and bass Stafford Dean — were quite unlike the four or more (depending on the version used) singers who traverse this beautiful score with predictable inflections and mannerisms.

Of the four, Miss Valente is the most familiar, but like the lovely artist she is, always surprising in a breathtaking way. The purity of "There Were Shepherds," the serenity of "He Shall Feed His Flock," and the inspired lyricism of "I Know That my Redeemer Liveth," were clear and clean and gemlike in this splendid setting.

Not the Handel norm

The three British singers, who had made their BSO debuts in Friday's Mozart program, were again welcome and quite different from the Handel norm, as we know it. Miss Watts's voice is not the often-ripe alto usually associated with this music. But it is even, warm in quality, and she projects it with a musicianly intelligence and fervor that made of "Then Shall the Eyes of the Blind" and, particularly, "He Was Despised" moving dramatic experiences.

Mr. Davies is a Welsh tenor of refinement and style, again not a large voice but unmannered, sweet, and facile. And Mr. Dean, seemingly, is long everdue on these shores. As a bass of wide range and firm technique, he was overwhelmingly impressive, through musical rather than stentorian means, in those great bass blockbusters, "The People That Walked in Darkness," "Why Do the Nations," and "The Trumpet Shall Sound" (with Armando Ghitalla's brilliant partnership). Mr. Dean's is a very special, very appealing and versatile gift, worthy of wide recognition.

When shall we hear again a live orchestra sound like this group from the BSO, or choral forces so musically malleable, in this Handelian masterpiece? Or a realization of it so clear and compact as this performance directed by Mr. Davis? Probably as Beatrice said to Benedick, "Not till a hot January." And this was reflected in audience reluctance to let the performers go after the last "Amens" were sung, and infinite bows taken.

AUG 13 1973

Hub Symphony Plays at Stormy Lenox

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — The Berkshire Music Festival's sixth weekend at Tanglewood was a mixture of menacing weather and superb playing by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and soloists, conducted by Colin Davis.

Davis is principal guest conductor of the Boston Symphony and musical director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, London.

Weekend total attendance was 27,972. Friday night's audience of 5,978 heard an all-Mozart program to an obligato of deafening thunder and a wind-blown rain that soaked some of the patrons under the huge music shed cover.

People scrambling for protection and the noisy elements made it quite impossible for some to hear Joseph Silverstein play Mozart's G major Violin Concerto.

The concert was halted for about 15 minutes after the first movement of the "Prague" Symphony. The audience encountered fallen trees and debris when they left the grounds.

Some described the storm as a "small twister."

Saturday night, Davis conducted an all-orchestral program of Berlioz, Haydn and Brahms that gave a marvelous exposure of his refined, perceptive, conservative but musically exciting style.

Unique Experience

Yesterday afternoon it was Handel's Messiah ... a unique experience to hear it during another month than December.

Start of Berlioz' "Beatrice and Benedict" Overture on Saturday night was swift, secure and faithful to notation. Sentiment was beautifully expressed in strings and reeds.

The overture's light character and tonal brilliance were in full force. For some it may have bordered on "hoop-la," but the end result was exciting and heavily applauded.

Haydn's E flat Symphony, No. 84, received an unpretentious performance. The fleet, tuneful first movement was a delight, played with disarming ease.

Some of the most euphonious string sounds of the festival were heard in the andante. The minuet was vigorous, unhurried and in character.

It took the Boston Symphony to oblige Davis with the tempo he selected for the rondo, without running into peril.

After a slightly imprecise start, Brahms' Second Symphony reached a magnificence that earned an ovation for Davis and rhythmic applause. The orchestra joined in.

In Slow Movement

Melody of the Brahms was the thing; for example, the second theme in cellos and brass material that is often lost in the melange.

The horns did excellent work in the slow movement. The third sped along at what could have been a dangerous speed, but wasn't. Davis brought forth a grandiose finals — a little blatant, perhaps, but bursting with energy.

John Oliver's preparation of the Tangelewood Festival Chorus of 125 mixed voices must share in an enthusiastic report of yesterday's Messiah.

Davis' approach was based on several obvious premises — and this was Davis' decision.

Every last note, choral and instrumental, was polished to a sheen and every last word sung by the chorus was understood. Too often these vital requirements are excused by the protective barrier of a spiritual text.

The average chorus would have brought about a disaster. Davis' tempos were unrelentingly swift — yet, the roulades hit every note, voice mergers were solid and there was none of the quavering that you hear from choral ensembles that plunge into the mechanics with trepidation.

Bursting Fullness

Davis certainly didn't overrule Handel's incentives, even though some of the choruses (even "He shall purify" and "For unto us") were pretty jazzy.

But apparently Davis preferred to dispense Handel as composer, and not a theologian.

Choral tone ranged from bursting fullness to pastel delicacy.

It was a joy to hear the orchestral overture played expertly (except for the opening phrases that were imprecise) without some of the strings struggling to catch up. Davis conducted the Pastoral Symphony as the dance Handel intended and not a convenient rest stop for the singers.

Soprano Benita Valente reigned over the soloists. She sang such arias as "rejoice greatly" with a true coloratura flair. "For Unto Him" was spiritually impressive even though Davis dictated a running speed.

Stafford Dean's big, resonant bass voice and clear diction were tailor-made for such as "Why do the nations." His clear diction was not suffocated in resonance, as is so often the case.

Despite a weakness in his low range, tenor Ryland Davies contributed a clear, youthful voice with enough power to complete phrases firmly.

Possibly due to nervousness, contralto Helen Watts seemed to be more concentrated on vocal than textural matters. Handel's gorgeous alto arias do not succumb to this limitation. She had some problems with pitch and stability, although Miss Watts' low range confidently encompassed its territory.

Authenticity was increased by Robert Levin at the harpsichord; John Gibbons, portable organ; and Armando Ghitalla's splendid trumpeting.

GLOBE (E)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 156,032
AUG 14 1973
New England Newsclip

MICHAEL STEINBERG

Davis 'Messiah' something special

LENOX—I hope Benita Valente, who was soprano soloist in the performance of Handel's "Messiah", which Colin Davis conducted at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon, will not mind my quoting her without permission. "This is something to hold on to," she said. It is. It was marvellous, in many ways the most exciting, moving "Messiah" performance I have heard; yet it got there from a strange and questionable point of departure.

I have heard Davis on the subject of corrupt Berlioz still in circulation and still used by some conductors. I can imagine what he would say about a Mozart performance in which parts were reassigned to other voices or shifted up or down by octaves. Or his comments if in Brahms or Stravinsky someone arbitrarily turned fortes into pianos and arsy-versy. Yet he takes all those as legitimate operations to perform on Handel. (The issue of cuts I shall not belabor: because of overtime costs, they are unfortuntely a given at Tanglewood, though I would hope to avoid harmonic mayhem like the jump from "But thou didst not leave" in A major to the B flat of "The Lord gave the word.")

It was, then, a performance full of disconcerting moments: "But who may abide" divided so as to give the first section to the alto (as Handel did), but the "refiner's fire" coloraturas to the bass (which he never did); "Behold the Lamb of God," marked forte by Handel, sung pianissimo except for one single, startling measure; the sopranos sent to squeal improbably high notes in "All we like sheep" and "He trusted in God" when they were given the alto line an octave up; and more. Not one of these changes can I hear as an improvement on Handel.

COLIN DAVIS
. . . a blend

At the same time, Davis speaks Handel with a superb and possessive flair. His "Messiah" recording makes it mostly on its virtues of omission: it is a taut, somewhat anxious statement of not being one of those bloated old Sargent performances. Sunday was many a mile beyond that. Davis found a wonderful blend of (English?) vigor and (Italian?) elegance, and, if he imposed some anachronistic ideas of texture and dynamics, his feeling for pace, harmony, and phrasing was grandly right. He had the text — surely the richest ever put together for a piece of sacred music — "spoken" incisively and vividly. Enough, all that, for a great "Messiah."

The actual sounds were made by a group of singers from the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, an exceptional quartet of soloists, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. John Oliver had prepared the virtuosic chorus, and their singing was sonorous and transparent. The soloists were Benita Valente, Helen Watts, Ryland Davies, and Stafford Dean. About Valente I must seem monotonous, but I can only say once more that she sang with her special conjunction of warmth and simplicity, with radiant sound and exquisite phrasing. Watts, an English contralto and one of the superb Lieder singers of our time, I had known only from records: hearing her in concert added, to what I already knew about her rich but robustly unsentimental timbre, superlative musicianship and lively diction, a sense of intense and touching communicative power. She is a great artist. Davies and Dean, Welsh and English respectively, both very young, are engaging singers whose urgency of projection and word sense goes some way to make up for a certain vocal inelegance.

The Boston Symphony strings played beautifully. At the same time, a heavier peppering of oboe and bassoon tone and some attention paid to Handel's distinction between passages for solo strings and those for the whole group would have given a better sense of the energy in Handel's scoring (good scholarship being not some sort of fancy extra activity but a means of making a livelier performance). Is huge Tanglewood, by the way, not a place where a revival of Mozart's edition of "Messiah," that bizarre, fascinating, beautiful hybrid, would be in order? But, to return to the playing Sunday, special acknowledgment is due the imaginative work at the keyboards by Robert Levin (harpsichord) and John Gibbon (organ).

UNION (M)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
AUG 13 1973

Tanglewood Presents 11,400 An Out-of-Season Present

By Richard C. Hammerich

LENOX — There are so many really great passages in Handel's Messiah, it's a bit too bad that most people have heard only condensed, underrehearsed versions of it at Christmas time.

But there were 11,400 at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon to hear its three parts in an inspired two hour and 14 minute performance plus intermission — they probably don't wish to forget.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was reduced to a baroque size of about 50 and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus to about 75. Soloists were Benita Valente, soprano; Ryland Davies, tenor; Helen Watts, contralto and Stafford Dean, bass.

There are, of course, at least 44 things to be said about a 232-year-old musical masterpiece that presents (in this version) 44 separate recitatives, airs, orchestral pieces and choruses.

And "Messiah" in all its variations is a well-known quantity, but perhaps the one quality of this performance as compared to all those memorable Christmases is "vitality."

To be sure, a large measure of verve has been evident this summer in the chorus as trained by John Oliver, but Colin Davis, guest conductor, seems to have a special talent for inducing his singers and orchestras to infuse their music with throbbing vitality.

This Messiah was full of bouncing, pulsing life, and the participants, especially the conductor, seemed to be deeply and happily involved — they were breaking out in spontaneous smiles.

Davis did not lead his singers into big theatrical displays of vibrating volume, which are effective when appropriate, but controlled the dynamics with such tasteful judgement that the whispery tones were otherworldy and the big chords powerful and expressive without being shouted.

The soloists were strong, rather than loud — which is a blessing — and produced pleasing tones (soprano and bass) as well as emotional intensity (tenor and contralto).

Saturday night Davis did a similar thing with a purely instrumental program. The music seemed to be a direct projection of his podium personality. It was amiable, genial, comfortable — unburdened by nervousness but infused with emotional depth at appropriate places.

Brahams' Second Symphony came across with a leisurely spaciousness and all its lyricism intact. It established an unusual sense of completeness.

The Haydn Symphony (No. 84) which preceded it was sweetly exuberant, free, easy, like the summer breezes that surrounded it. A traditional distinction between the music of Haydn and his compatriot, Mozart, was felt throughout — warmth from Haydn, elegance from Mozart.

The concert opened with the brightly orchestrated overture from Berlioz' opera "Beatric et Benedict."

Attendance: Friday night, 5978; Saturday morning 2959; Saturday night 7653; Sunday afternoon, 11,400; weekend total, 27,972.

HERALD NEWS (E)
FALL RIVER, MASS.
D. 42,275
AUG 15 1973
New England Newsclip

'Messiah In August' Celebration Has Freshened, Cleansed Spirit

By ELLEN PFEIFER
(Music Critic)

There is a so-called underground church in Boston which has for a number of years celebrated Christmas twice a year — once at the regular time and the other on July 25. The idea is to remove the event from all the 20th century accretions surrounding its observation — artificial trees, lights and gigantic merchandising pressures — and members generally spend the day together sharing food, beverage and sun at the beach.

Performing Handel's "Messiah," like emptying one's purse on gifts and gorging on turkey dinners, is regulation activity at the holiday season and often the performances, like the shopping and stuffing produce the same leaden feeling (although Boston is luckier than most with its Handel and Haydn Society performances).

Colin Davis and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, however, threw a "Messiah in August" celebration last weekend and, much like the above-mentioned underground church Christmas, there was a freshened, cleansed spirit about it. It was an event that had recaptured its sense of celebration.

• Music Review

The score Davis used was the one usually heard in records and performances, no unusual editions such as Thomas Dunn has been unearthing in recent years. However, Davis shares with Dunn and most musicologists a concern for performing "Messiah" according to the stylistic conventions of its era. Hence, the portative organ, harpsichord, reduced choir (although not all that small. More on that later), and careful ornamentation.

There were, however, two strange things about this performance edition and that was the alternation of contralto and bass, for no discernable reason, in the air "But who may abide the day of his coming—For he is like a refiner's fire." The other was the handful of cuts — which included "Lift up your heads, Oh ye gates" — which were necessary for reasons of time, but were still unfortunate.

What one did get to hear, however, was beautifully played. One thinks of the light, pure choral singing by the Tanglewood Festival Choir of "And he shall purify" and the "Glory to God" chorus; the wonderful contrast between the frivolous sheep who have gone astray and the weight of sin pressing down on the redeeming Christ in "All we like sheep;" and the tragic air of that tiny and wonderful recitative "Thy rebuke hath broken his heart."

Davis' soloists, Benita Valente, Helen Watts, Ryland Davies, Stafford Dean, presented a mixed bag with the ladies incomparably better singers and word-painters.

Ms. Valente, who seemed to be in the best voice she has been all summer, sang exquisitely the series of numbers that detail the birth of Christ. Ms. Watts, whose voice is absolutely velvety, provided some of the most moving moments in the afternoon with her beautifully ornamented "He was despised."

Davies' voice is small and seemed forced and he sang without much in the way of dramatic involvement, with the exception of a deeply touching "Thy rebuke." Dean, who sounds like Francis Hester but without Hester's musicality, gargled his way through his chains of 16th notes and frequently found himself behind the beat in his various solos (some of the most interesting music in the whole oratorio).

The chorus, as I mentioned earlier, sang gorgeously with great spirit and clear, youthful tone. While not as small a choral ensemble as one usually finds in "authentic" performances, its size did not hamper it except in a couple of spots ("Let us break their bonds," for example) where the execution of coloratura got a bit muddy.

NEWS (E)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,572
AUG 13 1973
New England Newsclip

Performance of Handel's 'Messiah' Dances With Joy

By RICHARD CONWAY

Springfield Daily News
The Arts
14 SPRINGFIELD, MASS., MONDAY, AUGUST 13, 1973

It was a performance of Handel's "Messiah" that literally danced with joy. Emotionally, it was filled with the brightness of promise, the richness of understanding, and the triumph of assurance. Musically, it was a performance that wonderfully re-created many of the performance practices of Handel's own day, and thus conductor Colin Davis' interpretation was enormously rewarding, a positive delight to hear.

Sunday afternoon, at Tanglewood, a crowd of 11,400 heard and cheered one of the most exciting performances of the great masterpiece that this critic has ever heard. Attempting to re-create the performance practices of Handel's day, Davis used an orchestra of perhaps 40 to 50 musicians, a chorus of around one hundred, and the added color of a harpsichord and portative organ. The chorus, of course, was a good deal larger than the 30 or so singers that would have sung in Handel's day, but their singing was absolutely superb, performed with a nimbleness and clarity that one would expect out of a madrigal - sized ensemble.

Davis kept the work literally dancing along, as well he should have, for many of the choruses and arias are based on dance rhythms of the day. The singers responded beautifully to the bright tempos, singing the scale and ornamental passages with marvelous precision and clarity. Special mention should be made of the basses in this regard, for too often bass sections sing with a certain ponderous weightiness that sort of slogs along instead of dancing. Not so on Sunday. The Tanglewood Festival Chorus was thrilling in its handling of light and pianissimo passages.

Another interesting facet of the performance was the work of the soloists soprano Benita Valente, alto Helen Watts, tenor Ryland Davies, and bass Stafford Dean. Again, in accordance with the accepted practices of the day, the soloists richly ornamented their various recitatives and arias. Many of these gave the particular works a refreshingly new expressivity.

Davis offered the audience other interesting ideas. The aria, "But who may abide," originally written for a male alto, and now usually sung by a bass, was divided between the alto and bass soloists, the alto singing the reflective "But who may abide" section, and the bass taking the dramatic "For he is like a refiner's fire" part. In the last part of the oratorio, we heard a complete performance of "The trumpet shall sound" aria, the contrasting section of which is usually cut in performance. Sunday it was done complete with da capo.

If there was one disappointment in the performance, it was that Davis chose not to use a counter - tenor for the alto solos. This is not to slight the work of Ms. Watts, who brought a deeply sensitive understanding to her recitatives and arias, especially the moving "He was despised." But these arias were originally sung by the male alto voice, and it adds a tonal coloring that is particularly right for these Baroque works.

Sunday's performance saw two cuts made in the score. David omitted the choruses "Lift up your heads" and "Let all the angels of God," and the recit and aria "Unto which of the angels" and "Thou art gone up on high," in the second part; and the recit and duet "Then shall be brought to pass" and "O Death, where is thy sting?" and the chorus "But thanks be to God" in the third section.

It was a wonderfully refreshing performance of Handel's timeless masterpiece.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
AUG 13 1973
New England Newspaper

Music review

Colin Davis surmounts the elements

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

UNTIL LAST Friday night, no Tanglewood concert had been disrupted by the weather for 22 years. But the storm which had been brewing for several hours in the late afternoon exploded with old-time fury just as conductor Colin Davis was reaching the close of the First movement of the Mozart "Prague" symphony, which had opened the program, and for the moment all bets were off.

Davis made no pretense of protest with the elements. He stepped down from his podium, sat down facing the first desk of the first violins and engaged in conversation with Boston Symphony Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, smilingly conceding the loss of round No. 1. If he had not taken the long repeat which is the option Mozart offers, he might have been in the succeeding Andante, but a good-natured patience favored all concerned and the concert got under way again in a short quarter-hour.

The rumblings, however, did not cease, and there was well-disguised anxiety at certain moments on both sides of the "footlights." The distant cannons sounded erratically even on through the Mozart violin concerto in which Silverstein was the soloist. But after intermission, the elements were no longer a problem.

* * *

The "Prague" under Davis received a fairly straight reading, one clear and forceful and mindful of all the many details of beauty but without any of the debatable particles of "give" which have been observed in some of the previous performances of this beautiful symphony. The orchestra played with galvanic verve.

Silverstein plays the violin with unsurpassed suave facility, and that facet of his art is a pure delight. Mozart, to be sure, presents no elementary hurdles, and thus those which the soloist erected in his own cadenza and which he executed with sparkling virtuosity are remnants of a tradition which becomes less and less valid as time goes on.

The Mozart Mass in C, called the Coronation Mass (K. 317), had the assistance of the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, conductor, and of four particularly suitable soloists. Soprano Benita Valente is allotted a more prominent share of the solo assignments, and she produced then with effective sonority. Her colleagues, contralto Helen Watts, tenor Ryland Davies, and bass Stafford Dean were more than trustworthy supports of the ensemble.

The chorus makes a mighty assertion on its initial entrance, and the impact which Davis elicited and which the singers provided set a standard of power and vitality which never waned throughout the whole Mass. The ensuing Gloria bristled vi-

Whitestone

Colin Davis

brantly, and each new section was given a forceful rendition.

* * *

Phyllis Curtin in the Prelude concert Friday had chosen a program of a character for which she has a widely acclaimed flair. Not one to remain within hackneyed paths, Miss Curtin chose two song cycles, Shostakovich's "Romances on words of Alexander Bloch," his Op. 127, and Ned Rorem's "Ariel" for soprano, clarinet and piano, a cycle based on poems of Sylvia Plath and dedicated to Miss Curtin. In this she had the inimitable assistance of clarinetist Harold Wright and pianist Ryan Edwards. In the Shostakovich, she was assisted by violinist Silverstein, cellist Jules Eskin and Edwards.

Shostakovich wrote exquisite lyrical "vocalises" for the violin and cello which, respectively, accompanied the voice alone. Bloch's poems were so interwoven with the vocal line that one might have wondered which came first, the poetry or the music, and Miss Curtin conveyed them with a comprehension quite above and apart from the basic beauties of her voice.

Rorem's penetration of the Plath poems was less demanding vocally, at times even diverting to narration, but there calling upon Miss Curtin's histrionic talents in addition to her other gifts. Wright's clarinet had the grace of a premiere ballerina. The large audience which had braved the threatening weather would not release Miss Curtin, and she responded with Berlioz' bolero "Zaide" from his Op. 19 Feuillets D'Album, which she portrayed, not neglecting the expert use of castanets, with utter fascination.

* * *

Saturday's program was less venturesome but decidedly not less enjoyable. The evening was not entirely free of rumbling in the sky, but a cooler air may have affected the instruments or released the musicians from the burdensome humidity. In any case, the orchestra never sounded more full of zing and gusto.

The spirit of the evening was instantly apparent with the stunning introduction Berlioz gives the strings in his overture to "Beatrice and Benedict" and continued on through the stratospheric yeast of the first movement of the Haydn Symphony in E Flat, No. 84, a picture of pure delight.

Davis was not a minor factor in the evening's ebullience. He seemed to enjoy holding the reins of such vivacious steeds and gave them their head at every turn. In the second Brahms symphony there was a slightly different element. He seemed to be caught in the inexorable current of the ongoing momentum and gave little heed to opportunities for flexibility. There are so many instances in this century-old, beloved symphony where one might wish to linger an infinitesimal second to savor the fragrance of certain pungent and pithy expressions, but the conductor did not vary his pressure on the accelerator.

Davis had demonstrated on the previous evening, as well as in his previous appearances at Tanglewood with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that he is not a sentimentalist, and he rates respect for that approach. The D Major Brahms is as much a favorite of conductors as of audiences, and the steadily cumulative liberation of all decibel restraints at the finale unfailingly arouses tumults of applause, sending the musicians to the showers and the audience to the parking lots in the best of all possible moods. That is possibly the motive for its always being placed to conclude a program.

* * *

One of the great monuments of music had its first Tanglewood performance yesterday afternoon, when Davis directed the BSO and members of the Tanglewood Festival Chorus in Handel's sacred oratorio, "Messiah."

The chorus had been trained to a superb level by Oliver and from its remarkably controlled "And with His stripes" to the magnificent full-throated "Hallelujah," it responded to Davis's baton with confident fidelity. There is no more thrilling moment in music than this latter famous chorus, and when such exciting sonority issues from the hundred-odd vibrant voices, it is one of the great experiences of our day, as it has been for more than 200 years.

The aria "He shall feed His flock" provided Miss Watts with one of her moving opportunities; the tenor aria "Every Valley" was one of the early successes for Davies: "Why do the nations" brought glory among his many instances to bass Dean, and "If God be for us" was one of Miss Valente's best offerings. Her "Justifieth" was a remarkable feat of vocalism.

Davis made but a very few "cuts" in the score in Parts II and III, but even at his brisk conception, the oratorio finished a short time after 5. There was no intimation of solemn lugubriousness in his grasp of the score, but conviction and nimble animation which in no way deprived the verses of their import.

Ryland Davies

* * *

In an afternoon filled with unforgettable moments, the aria "The trumpet shall sound" was the occasion for bass Dean to benefit by the beautiful trumpet obbligato of Armando Ghitalla.

Davis used reduced orchestra personnel and kept them in significant restraint so that the balance, without exception, all afternoon was admirable and the short pastoral symphony was a delightfully soothing interlude. The concluding "Amen" chorus was sung with dolce credence, and the fugue was developed with easy clarity culminating in a final radiant resolution.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
AUG 13 1973
New England Newspaper

Weekend rainstorms cut Tanglewood attendance

LENOX — Weekend rainstorms caused a drop in Tanglewood attendance and forced Music Inn officials to postpone Saturday's scheduled Muddy Waters concert until Sunday.

Tanglewood's sixth weekend drew 27,972 people to three concerts and one open rehearsal, making it the season's fourth largest crowd, according to officials at Tanglewood.

However, Thomas D. Perry, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said today, "I think it was inevitable that fewer people came because of the rain."

Loudly clapping thunder during the first movement of Mozart's Prague Symphony Friday night caused conductor Colin Davis to wait 15 minutes before beginning the second movement.

Power failure

During the extended pause, there was a one-minute power failure which caused a brief blackout in the music shed. However, the rest of the concert was apparently unaffected by the momentary loss of electricity.

Saturday's twilight concert scheduled for 6 p.m. at the Music Inn was postponed until Sunday at 1 p.m. because of Saturday morning's heavy rain, according to Music Inn manager, David Rothstein.

About 2,500 people attended Sunday's rock concert which featured Muddy Waters and Leo Kotke, according to Rothstein.

Police who directed Tanglewood and Music Inn traffic reported no major tie-ups caused by the weekend concert goers.

AUG 13 1973

A Felicitous Night at Tanglewood

By DOROTHY STOWE
Times Music Critic

LENOX, Mass. — Mozart, complete with a light show and quadraphonic "surround sound" percussion, was the lot of Tanglewood visitors last night, as the forces of nature flexed their muscles in a Berkshire spectacular of their own.

Yet genial Colin Davis, Boston Symphony's principal guest conductor and a personal favorite of the audience, snatched serenity and even good humor from the teeth of the raging gale.

Following the opening movement of Mozart's Symphony No. 38, he smilingly seated himself on the podium, yielding the limelight to the better show going on outside; whereupon the shed audience rose in a body and turned to watch the non-stop flashing of lightning and the squealing lawsitters rushing for cover.

An inauspicious beginning indeed for the order and dignity usually associated with an all-Mozart program yet little was lost in the interim before the orchestra took up its performance again, delivering the remainder of the Prague Symphony with the hallmark characteristics one has come to expect of Davis — marvels of linear continuity, ever so subtly stretched and heightened by the most suave nuances. Moreover, Davis approaches Mozart with the effervescence of genuine enthsiasm which makes tired eyes light up.

For the Violin Concerto No. 3, K. 216, Joseph Silverstein, BSO concertmaster, was soloist in a performance of delicate tracery. Silverstein is an artist one is grateful to hear. His is a small tone, and his delivery is lacking in the dashing bravura of the bit soloists.

Yet upon close examination his art, like the flower in the crannied wall, is found to be as worthy in its way as the splashy poppies of sound offered by showier artists. Davis and the orchestra supported him with sensitivity, and the lovely Adagio had the pristine lift of a first re-creation.

Orchestra, Tanglewood Chorus and soloists were amassed for the evening's finale, the Mass in C, "Coronation," K. 317. And the excellent chorus never had a chance to use the chairs placed behind them, so integral is their part to the mass.

While its depths nowhere near approach those of the Requiem, there is splendor and breadth in its straightforward movements, the work of a young man of 23.

Benita Valente, putting in an active season at Tanglewood this year, brought her usual vocal strengths and felicities to the soprano solos, with simple profundity in the Agnus Dei, a striking foreshadowing of the "Dove sono" from "Figaro."

Helen Watts, Ryland Davies and Stafford Dean had little to do. They with Miss Valente will be featured in a performance of the "Messiah" tomorrow afternoon, when their apparent capabilities will be on more obvious display.

Besides the Messiah tomorrow, the Colin Davis weekend will continued with an orchestral concert tonight featuring works of Berlioz and Haydn, and the Brahms 2nd Symphony.

6 SIXTH WEEKEND

AUGUST 10
7 pm Weekend Prelude
Phyllis Curtin and Ryan Edwards with Boston Symphony Chamber Players
9 pm COLIN DAVIS MOZART PROGRAM
"Prague" Symphony
Coronation Mass
Benita Valente, Helen Watts, Ryland Davies, Stafford Dean, Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, Director

AUGUST 11
10:30 am Open Rehearsal
8:30 pm COLIN DAVIS
Berlioz: Overture "Beatrice and Benedict"
Haydn: Symphony No. 84
Brahms: Symphony No. 2

AUGUST 12
2:30 pm COLIN DAVIS
Handel: Messiah
Benita Valente, Helen Watts, Ryland Davies, Stafford Dean, Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, Director

Music review

Colin Davis surmounts the elements

By Jay Rosenstein

Colin Davis

Ryland Davies

Weekend rainstorms cut Tanglewood attendance

A felicitous Night at Tanglewood

SIXTH WEEKEND

Weekend Prelude
Phyllis Curtin and Ryan Edwards with
Boston Symphony Chamber Players
. COLIN DAVIS MOZART PROGRAM
"Prague" Symphony
Coronation Mass
Benita Valente, Helen Watts, Ryland Davies,
Stafford Dean, Tanglewood Festival Chorus,
John Oliver, Director

Open Rehearsal
COLIN DAVIS
Berlioz: Overture "Beatrice and Benedict"
Haydn: Symphony No. 84
Brahms: Symphony No. 2

COLIN DAVIS
Handel: Messiah
Benita Valente, Helen Watts, Ryland Davies,
Stafford Dean, Tanglewood Festival Chorus,
John Oliver, Director

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Tanglewood will feature pianist Earl Wild on Friday

TANGLEWOOD — The seventh weekend at Tanglewood begins on Friday, August 17 at 7:00 p.m. with pianist Earl Wild performing Schumann's Etudes symphoniques and Liszt's Mephisto polka and waltz.

At 9 p.m. Lawrence Foster, music director of the Houston Symphony and chief guest conductor of the Royal Philharmonic makes his debut with the Boston Sympony. Mr. Foster opens the program with Berlioz' Overture 'Le Corsaire' and follows it with Bruch's Scottish fantasy for violin and orchestra with Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as soloist. Mr. Foster closes the concert with Prokofiev's Symphony no. 5.

On Saturday, August 18 at 10:30 a.m. as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed Sunday.

On Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m. Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Dvorak's Symphony no. 9 in E minor, the 'New World;' Rachmaninov's Piano concerto no. 2 in C minor with Earl Wild as soloist, and Wagner's Prelude to 'Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg.'

On Sunday, August 19 at 2:30 p.m. Seiji Ozawa, music director of the Boston Symphony, conducts the orchestra in Franck's Symphonic variations for piano and orchestra followed by Liszt's Totentanz for piano and orchestra, both featuring Granrud Artist-in-Residence Andre Watts as soloist. Mr. Ozawa closes the concert with Tchaikovsky's Symphony no. 4 in F minor.

BERKSHIRE COURIER
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
AUG 9 1973
New England Newscip

TIMES
BEVERLY, MASS.
AUG 16 1973
New England Newscip

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
W. 4,405
AUG 16 1973
New England Newscip

TIMES UNI
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,
AUG 19 1973

BEACON, N. Y.
NEWS
DAILY 32,000
AUG 11 1973

Tanglewood

Fiedler Scheduled For Two Concerts

The seventh weekend at Tanglewood begins on Friday, August 17 at 7 p.m. with pianist Earl Wild performing Schumann's "Etudes symphoniques" and Liszt's "Mephisto" polka and waltz.

At 9 p.m., Lawrence Foster, music director of the Houston Symphony and chief guest conductor of the Royal Philharmonic, makes his debut with the Boston Symphony. Mr. Foster opens the program with Berlioz' Overture, "Le Corsaire" and follows it with Bruch's Scottish fantasy for violin and orchestra with concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as soloist. Mr. Foster closes the concert with Prokofiev's Symphony no. 5.

On Saturday, August 18 at 10:30 a.m. as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an open rehearsal of works to be performed Sunday.

On Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m. Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Dvorak's Symphony no. 9 in E minor, the "New World;" Rachmaninov's Piano concerto no. 2 in C minor with Earl Wild as soloist, and Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."

On Sunday, August 19 at 2:30 p.m. Seiji Ozawa, music director of the Boston Symphony, conducts the orchestra in Franck's Symphonic variations for piano and orchestra, followed by Liszt's Totentanz for piano and orchestra, both featuring Granrud-Artist-in-Residence Andre Watts as soloist.

Mr. Ozawa closes the concert with Tchaikovsky's Symphony no. 4 in F minor.

August 21

Arthur Fiedler returns Tuesday, Aug. 21 at 8:30 p.m. for the annual Boston Pops-at-Tanglewood concert for the benefit of the Pension Fund.

Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, appears at Tanglewood to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday evening, Aug. 18, and again Tuesday evening, Aug. 21, to conduct the Boston Pops. Fielder, who is 78 years old, joined the Boston Symphony when he was 20 years old and has conducted the Boston Pops Orchestra for 43 years. Total sales of his recordings are today not far from 50 million. — Photo contributed

POST
AUG 18 1973
New England Newscip

TANGLEWOOD, Tanglewood, Mass. — Concert today at 2:30 p.m.; Seiji Ozawa conducts the Boston Symphony orchestra with soloist Andre Watts, pianist; Eighth weekend concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra; Friday at 7 and 9 p.m.; Saturday at 10:30 a.m., open rehearsal of the Boston Symphony; Saturday at 8:30 p.m., next Sunday at 2:30 p.m.; all concerts take place in the Shed; tickets on sale at Tanglewood box office and Ticketron.

PHILADELPHIA BAR
TET — Monday evenin
field Casino, Congress I Springs.

STAGE LEERS AND I
— The Lenox (Mass.
at Wheatleigh presents
through Sunday an ever
Silverman's songs from
ade. The curtain rises
cept 9:30 p.m. Saturday

COLONIE SUMMER
Monday through Friday
Saturday 7 p.m. and 1
Franchi and the Trin
Steel Band with guest M form at the Coliseum, L

PHILADELPHIA ORC
Saratoga Performing Ar
concerts begin at 8 p.m
Robert Benzi conducts kovsky program: Symp
"The Voyevoda," Suit
Nutcracker," and Pianc
1 with Van Cliburn. Th
Ormandy conducts an program: Overture t
Piano Concerto No. 5 and Symphony No. 3 ( William Masselos, pian
erto Benzi conducts Mo
No. 28, Mozart, Concer
Aria featuring Frederi
mezzo-soprano, and Fla
ny. Saturday's perform ed by Eugene Ormand
"Those Fabulous Phil
cludes Smetana: Ove
Bartered Bride," D
World" Symphony, S
Swan of Tuonela," De Fire Dance from "El
Rimsky-Korsakov: Hy
Cog d'Or," an and Fugue from per."

X ARTS FESTI presents Bonn
Prine in concert a

AM MUSIC THE N.Y., opens W
with Frank Heff
f "Merry Widow"

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA — Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. At 2:30 p.m. Sunday, Seiji Ozawa conducts Franck: Symphonic Variations and Liszt's Totentanz, both featuring piano soloist Andre Watts. Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 closes the concert. At 9 p.m. Friday Mr. Ozawa leads the Orchestra accompanied by the Tanglewood Festival chorus in Berlioz's Symphonic Fantasique "Lelio." Saturday at 10 A.M. an Open Rehearsal proceeds the evening program of Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 3, Byron Janis soloist, and Shostakovitch's Symphony No. 9 conducted by James De Preist.

SARATOGA FESTIVAL — Glen Campbell in concert Monday evening at 8:00.

Colin Davis, Principal Guest Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Musical Director of The Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, will conduct three weekend concerts at Tanglewood beginning with an all Mozart program Friday evening at 9:00.

In recent years Colin Davis has conducted many of the world's leading orchestras, including the Berlin Philharmonic, the Israeli Philharmonic, the Montreal and Toronto Symphonies, the Philadelphia Orchestra and the New York Philharmonic.

Mozart Program Opens Weekend At Tanglewood

LENOX —The sixth weekend at Tanglewood begins on Friday at 7:00 p.m with Phyllis Curtin soprano, Evan Edwards piano and members of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players (Joseph Silverstein violin, Jules Eskin cello and Harold Wright clarinet) performing Shostakovich's "Romances on Words of Alexander Block" and Rorem's "Ariel", for soprano, clarinet and piano. Then at 9 p.m. principal guest conductor Colin Davis conducts the orchestra in an all-Mozart program. Davis opens the concert with Symphony no. 38 the 'Prague' and follows it with the violin concerto in G with Joseph Silverstein as soloist. The concert closes with Mozart's Mass in C, the 'Coronation ' with Benita Valente soprano, Helen Watts contralto, Ryland Davis tenor, Stafford Dean bass, the Tanglewood Choir and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus John Oliver conductor.

On Saturday, at 10:30 a.m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed Sunday.

Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m., Colin Davis will conduct the orchestra in Berlioz 'Overturn to 'Beatrice et Benedict' and Haydn's Symphony no. 84 in E. Flat, the first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The concert closes with Brahms' Symphony no. 2 in D.

On Sunday, at 2:30 p.m. Colin Davis conducts the orchestra in Handel's 'Messiah'. Soloists are Benita Valente, Soprano, Helen Watts, contralto, Ryland Davies, tenor, Stafford Dean, bass, Robert Levin , harpsichord, John Gibbons, organ and members of the Tanglewood Festival chorus , John Oliver conductor.

Earl Wild Due at Tanglewood

Entertainment

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass — The seventh weekend at Tanglewood begins next Friday at 7 p.m. with pianist Earl Wild performing Schumann's Etudes symphoniques and Liszt's Mephisto polka and waltz.

At 9 p.m., Lawrence Foster, music director of the Houston Symphony and chief guest conductor of the Royal Philharmonic, makes his debut with the Boston Symphony. Foster opens the program with Berlioz' Overture 'Le Corsaire' and follows it with Bruch's Scottish fantasy for violin and orchestra with Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein aso soloist. Foster closes the concert with Prokofiev's Symphony No. 5.

Next Saturday at 10:30 a.m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an open rehearsal of works to be performed Sunday.

Next Saturday evening at 8:30 Arthur Fieldler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Dvorak's Symphony No. 9 in E minor, the 'New World'; Rachmaninov's Piano Concerto No. 2 in C minor with Earl Wild as soloist, and Wagner's Prelude to 'Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg'.

On Sunday, Aug. 19, at 2:30 p.m. Seiji Ozawa, music director of the Boston Symphony, conducts the orchestra in Franck's Symphonic variations for piano and orchestra followed by Liszt's Totentanz for piano and orchestra, both featuring Granrud Artist-in-Residence Andre Watts as soloist. Ozawa closes the concert with Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 in F minor.

Program for the weekend of Aug. 17-19:

Aug. 17 — shed — 7 p.m. weekend prelude, Earl Wild, piano: Schumann: Etudes symphoniques and Liszt: Mephisto polka and waltz.

9 p.m. — shed — Lawrence Foster, conductor: Berlioz: Overture 'Le corsaire' and Bruch: Scottish fantasy, John Silverstein, violin, Prokofiev: Symphony No. 5.

Aug. 18 — 10:30 a.m. — shed — Boston Symphony Orchestra Open Rehearsal.

8:30 p.m. — shed — Arthur Fiedler, conductor: Dvorak: Symphony No. 9 in E minor 'New World,' Rachmaninov: Piano concerto No. 2 in C minor.

Earl Wild — Wagner: Prelude to 'Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg.'

Aug. 19 — 2:30 p.m. — shed — Seiji Ozawa, conductor: Franck: Symphonic variations for piano and orchestra.

NEW YORK ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
AUG 16 1973
New England Newscip

Silverstein, Wild, Watts Soloists at Tanglewood

The seventh weekend at Tanglewood begins on Friday, Aug. 17 at 7 p.m. with pianist Earl Wild performing Schumann's Etudes symphoniques and Liszt's Mephisto polka and waltz.

At 9 p.m., Lawrence Foster, music director of the Houston Symphony and chief guest conductor of the Royal Philharmonic, makes his debut with the Boston Symphony. Mr. Foster opens the program with Berlioz' Overture 'Le Corsaire' and follows it with Bruch's Scottish fantasy for violin and orchestra with Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as soloist. Mr. Foster closes the concert with Prokofiev's Symphony no. 5.

On Saturday, Aug. 18, at 10:30 a.m. as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed Sunday.

On Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m., Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Dvorak's Symphony no. 9 in E minor, the 'New World'; Rachmaninov's Piano concerto no. 2 in C minor with Earl Wild as soloist and Wagner's Prelude to 'Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg'.

On Sunday, Aug. 19, at 2:30 p.m., Seiji Ozawa, music director of the Boston Symphony, conducts the orchestra in Franck's Symphonic variations for piano and orchestra followed by Liszt's Totentanz for piano and orchestra, both featuring Granrud Artist-in-Residence Andre Watts as soloist. Mr. Ozawa closes the concert with Tchaikovsky's Symphony no. 4 in F minor.

TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM (E)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
D. 30,000
AUG 13 1973 New England Newslip

Seventh weekend at Tanglewood

The seventh weekend at Tanglewood in Lenox begins on Friday, at 7 p.m. wth pianist Earl Wild performing Schumann's Etudes symphoniques and Liszt's Mephisto polka and waltz.

At 9 p.m., Lawrence Foster, Music Director of the Houston Symphony and chief guest conductor of the Royal Philharmonic makes his debut with the Boston Symphony. Mr. Foster opens the program with Berlioz' Overture 'Le Corsaire' and follows it with Bruch's Scottish fantasy for violin and orchestra with Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as soloist. Mr. Foster closes the concert with Prokofiev's Symphony No. 5.

On Saturday, at 10:30 a.m. as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed Sunday.

On Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m. Arthur Fiedler, conductor oof the Boston Pops Orchestra, conducts the Boston Symphony in Dvorak's Symphony No. 9 in E minor, the 'New World'; Rachmaninov's Piano concerto No. 2 in C minor with Earl Wild as soloist. Mr. Ozawa closes the concert with Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 in F Minor.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
S. 150,000
AUG 12 1973 New England Newslip

GLE
NEWTOWN, CONN
W. 14,788
AUG 17 1973 New England Newslip

Concerts at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. info at 413 637 1600:

Weekend Prelude, Fri 7 pm, Earl Wild, piano, Schumann, Etudes symphoniques, Liszt, Mephisto polka and waltz 9 pm, Lawrence Foster, conductor, Berlioz, Overture 'Le corsaire'; Bruch: Scottish fantasy; Joseph Silverstein, violin; Prokofiev, Symphony No. 5.

Sat, Aug 18
10:30 am, Boston Symphony Orch Open Rehearsal; 8:30 pm, Arthur Fiedler, cond, Dvorak: Symphony No. 9 in E minor 'New World'; Rachmaninoc: Piano Concerto No. 2 in C minor, Earl Wild, Wagner Prelude to 'Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg'
Sunday, Aug 19
2:30 pm, Seiji Ozawa, cond, Franck, Symphonic variations for piano and orch, Andre Watts; Liszt: Totentanz for piano and orch, Andre Watts; Tchaikovsky, Symphony No 4 in F minor.

Music of Mozart, Ravel, Brahms, Aug 23, 25.

PROMOTED. Lawrence Foster, former conducting fellow at the Berkshire Music Center, returns there tomorrow to conduct the Boston Symphony at 9 p.m. in the shed at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Foster is music director of the Houston Symphony and guest conductor of the Royal Philharmonic. The program will feature music by Berlioz, Bruch and Prokofiev.

SCI
NEWTOWN, CONN
AUG 16 1973 New England Newslip

At Tanglewood

Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, top, and Lawrence Fostor, Music Director of the Houston Symphony and Guest Conductor of the Royal Philharmonic, will be appearing in separate concerts at Tanglewood this week-end.

The seventh weekend at Tanglewood begins on Friday, August 17, at 7 pm with Pianist Earl Wild performing Schumann's Etudes symphoniques and Liszt's Mephisto polka and waltz.

At 9 pm, Lawrence Foster, music director of the Houston Symphony and chief guest conductor of the Royal Philharmonic, makes his debut with the Boston Symphony. Mr Foster opens the program with Berlioz' Overture 'Le Corsaire' and follows it with Bruch's Scottish fantasy for violin and orchestra with Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as soloist. Mr Foster closes the concert with Prokofiev's Symphony No. 5.

On Saturday, August 18, at 10:30 am, as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an open rehearsal of works to be performed Sunday.

On Saturday evening at 8:30 pm Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Dvorak's Symphony No. 9 in E minor, the 'New World'; Rachmaninov's Piano concerto No. 2 in C minor with Earl Wild as soloist, and Wagner's Prelude to 'Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg.'

On Sunday, August 19, at 2:30 pm Seiji Ozawa, music director of the Boston Symphony, conducts the Boston Symphony, conducts the Orchestra in Franck's Symphonic variations for piano and orchestra followed by Liszt's Totenanz for piano and orchestra, both featuring Granrud Artist-in-Residence Andre Watts as soloist. Mr Ozawa closes the concert with Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 in F minor.

AT TANGLEWOOD

Arthur Fiedler Conducts

ARTHUR FIEDLER

At Tanglewood Saturday night

LENOX — The seventh weekend at Tanglewood begins on Friday evening at 7 with pianist Earl Wild performing Schumann's Etudes symphoniques and Liszt's Mephisto polka and waltz.

At 9 p.m. Lawrence Foster, music director of the Houston Symphony and chief guest conductor of the Royal Philharmonic makes his debut with the Boston Symphony. Mr. Foster opens the program with Berlioz' Overture 'Le Corsaire' and follows it with Bruch's Scottish fantasy for violin and orchestra with Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as soloist. Mr. Foster closes the concert with Prokofiev's Symphony No. 5.

On Saturday at 10:30 a.m. as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed Sunday.

On Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m., Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Dvorak's Symphony No. 9 in E minor, the 'New World'; Rachmaninov's Piano concerto No. 2 in C minor with Earl Wild as soloist, and Wagner's Prelude to 'Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg.'

On Sunday at 2:30 p.m., Seiji Ozawa, music director of the Boston Symphony, conducts the Orchestra in Franck's "Symphonic variations for piano and orchestra followed by Liszt's Totentanz for piano and orchestra, both featuring Granrud Artist - in - Residence Andre Watts as soloist. Mr. Ozawa closes the concert with Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 in F minor.

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 56,638
AUG 16 1973

Tanglewood Charts Weekend Programs

The seventh weekend at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., will begin at 7 p.m., Friday, with pianist Earl Wild performing Schumann's Etudes symphoniques and Liszt's Mephisto polka and waltz.

Lawrence Foster, music director of the Houston Symphone and chief guest conductor of the Royal Philharmonic, will make his debut with the Boston Symphony at 9 p.m. Foster will open the program with Berlioz' Overture "Le Corsaire" and follow with Bruch's Scottish Fantasy for violin and orchestra, with concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as soloist. The concert will close with Prokofiev's Symphony No. 5.

On Saturday at 10:30 a.m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an open rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday.

ON SATURDAY, at 8:30 p.m. Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Dvorak's Symphony No. 9 in E minor, the "New World;" Rachmaninov's Piano Concerto No. 2 in C minor, with Earl Wild as soloist, and Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."

On Sunday at 2:30 p.m., Seiji Ozawa, music director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct the orchestra in Franck's Symphonic variations for piano and orchestra, followed by Liszt's Totentanz for piano and orchestra, both featuring Granrud Artist-in-Residence Andre Watts as soloist.

Ozawa will close the concert conducting Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 in F minor.

GLOBE (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042
AUG 17 1973 New England Newslip

Tanglewood — Lawrence Foster, a Berkshire Music Center graduate and music director of the Houston Symphony, makes his Boston Symphony Orchestra conducting debut Aug. 17 at 9 p.m. on a program of Berlioz, Prokofiev and Bruch (the "Scottish Fantasia," with Joseph Silverstein as soloist). Arthur Fiedler conducts Aug. 18 at 8:30 p.m. (Earl Wild soloist). And Seiji Ozawa conducts Aug. 19 at 2:30 p.m. with Andre Watts as soloist in works of Franck and Liszt. Open rehearsal is Saturday at 10 a.m. on the large Lenox estate.

GLOBE (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042
AUG 18 1973 New England Newslip

Fiedler will conduct at Tanglewood Saturday

Three major conductors will be featured at the seventh weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts at Tanglewood, which begins with the Weekend Prelude on Friday.

At 7 p.m., pianist Earl Wild will perform Schumann's Etudes Symphoniques and Liszt's Mephisto polka and waltz.

Lawrence Foster, music director of the Houston Symphony and chief guest conductor of the Royal Philharmonic, will make his debut conducting Boston Symphony Orchestra at 9. The program will include Berlioz's "Corsair" overture, Bruch's "Scottish Fantasy" for violin and orchestra with Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as soloist, and Prokofieff's Symphony No. 5.

An open rehearsal of Sunday's works will be performed Saturday morning at 10:30.

On Saturday evening at 8:30, Arthur Fiedler, now in his 44th year as conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, will conduct the BSO in Dvorak's Symphony No. 9 in E Minor, "The New World"; Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 2 in C Minor, with Wild as soloist; and Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nuernberg."

On Sunday at 2:30, Seiji Ozawa, BSO music director, will conduct Franck's Symphonic Variations and Liszt's "Totentanz," both for piano and orchestra. The two works will feature Andre Watts as soloist.

The concert will close with Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 in F Minor.

New York Post
D. 623,245 SAT. 354,797
AUG 3 1973

Out-of-Town

Melissa Hayden and Peter Martins under the direction of Walter Terry appear in a pas de deux program tonight and tomorrow night at 7:30 at The Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival (Lee, Mass). Carmen De Lavallade and The Dance Theater of Harlem perform Tuesday through next Saturday . . . Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra featuring Beethoven and Copland tonight at 9 at Tanglewood-Berkshire Festival (Lenox, Mass.). Tomorrow night at 8:30 Thomas conducts the orchestra in an all-Stravinsky program. Sunday at 2:30 p.m., Mozart, Cage, Strauss and Brahms are featured . . . Janos Starker, cellist, will play the works of Bach, Beethoven, Mozart and Brahms at 5:30 p.m. at the Caramoor Festival (Katonah, N. Y.) . . . "No, No, Nanette" is on stage at the Garden State Arts Center (Holmdel, N. J.) tonight and tomorrow night starring Don Ameche and Evelyn Keyes . . . Conductor Eugene Ormandy and Isaac Stern, violinist, appear with the Philadelphia Orchestra tonight at 8 at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center Saratoga Springs, N. Y.). Tomorrow night Andre Kostelanetz conducts.

NEWS (E)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,575
AUG 16 1973
New England Newspapers

SYRACUSE
Herald Journal
D. 129,668
AUG 16 1973

Fiedler to Conduct BSO at Tanglewood

Bos Symphony

The seventh week end at Tanglewood in Lenox begins on Friday at 7 p.m. with pianist Earl Wild performing Schumann's Etudes symphoniques and Liszt's Mephisto polk and waltz.

At 9 p.m., Lawrence Foster, music director of the Houston Symphony and chief guest conductor of the Royal Philharmonic makes his debut with the Boston Symphony. Foster opens the program with Berlioz' Overture "Le Corsaire" and follows it with Bruch's Scottish fantasy for violin and orchestra with Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as soloist. Foster closes the concert with Prokofiev's Symphony no. 5.

Springfield Daily News

The Arts

On Saturday at 10:30 a.m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed Sunday.

On Saturday at 8:30 p.m. Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Dvorak's Symphony no. 9 in E minor, the "New World"; Rachmaninov's Piano concert no. 2 in C minor with Earl Wild as soloist, and Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."

On Sunday at 2:30 p.m. Seiji Ozawa, music director of the Boston Symphony, conducts the orchestra in Franck's Symphonic variations for piano and orchestra followed by Liszt's Totentanz for piano and orchestra, both featuring Granrud Artist - in - Residence Andre Watts as soloist. Ozawa closes the concert with Tchaikovsky's Symphony no. 4 in F minor.

NORFOLK COUNTY PRESS
DEDHAM, MASS.
W. 21,000
AUG 9 1973
New England Newspapers

TANGLEWOOD — A weekend camping and musical excursion to Tanglewood beginning August 17 will be offered to Sharon high school students by the committee to run the high school alternative school.

Sharon

Bernard Jacobs, chairman of the alternative school's resource committee and a music teacher at the school, said he suggested the trip as a forerunner to a course he will teach beginning in September.

In addition to attending performances of Dvorak's New World Symphony and Rachmaninov's Concerto No. 2 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Arthur Fiedler, the students will enjoy camping in the foothills of the Berkshires and a side trip to Stockbridge.

Mr. Jacobs noted several teachers from both the high school and alternative school would go along on the outing, along with a good sprinkling of other adults.

He indicated the cost of the trip for each participant would be kept to a minimum, probably about $12.00 including admission to the concert grounds.

Mr. Jacobs indicated he expects 55 to 60 students to participate in the trip, and said the weekend is open to any youngster. "We are not limiting it to alternative school students," he stated.

To accommodate the youngsters, Mr. Jacobs said he had made arrangements with a campground in Lennoxdale. He said arrangements have been made to have 10 trailers along with tents brought out to the campsite from Sharon to house participants.

The caravan will leave Sharon August 17, according to Mr. Jacobs. He said youngsters will be able to attend the orchestra's rehearsal the morning of August 18 in addition to the afternoon concert, if desired.

Saturday night will feature a musical campfire with folk singing. A visit to artist Norman Rockwell's home and Alice's Restaurant in Stockbridge will also be worked into the schedule.

Mr. Jacobs, who has been a teacher for four years, said he hoped he could show the students the sociological concept as well as human concept that inspired the music.

Mr. Jacobs said he plans other such trips to serve as stimulants during the school year.

He noted he plans student visits to concerts at Symphony Hall and Jordan Hall in Boston when school is in session, and possibly a trip to the Metropolitan Opera in New York over Christmas vacation.

+ + +

The Herald-News
PASSAIC, N. J.
D. 80,500
AUG 17 1973

Arthur Fiedler at Tanglewood

Seventh weekend at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., begins at 7:00 p.m. this evening with Earl Wild, pianist, performing Schumann's Etudes symphoniques and Liszt's Mephisto polka and waltz.

At 9:00 p.m. Lawrence Foster, music director of the Houston Symphony and chief guest conductor of the Royal Philharmonic makes his debut with the Boston Symphony. Mr. Foster opens the program with Berlioz' Overture 'Le Corsaire' and follows it with Bruch's Scottish fantasy for violin and orchestra with concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, as soloist.

Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, at 8:30 p.m. tomorrow conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Dvorak's Symphony No. 9 in E minor, the 'New World'; Rachmaninov's Piano concerto No. 2 in C minor with Earl Wild as soloist.

At 2:30 p.m. Sunday Seiji Ozawa, music director of the Boston Symhpony, conducts the orchestra in Franck's Symphonic variations for piano and orchestra followed by Liszt's Totentanz for piano and orchestra, both featuring Granrud Artist-in-Residence Andre Watts as soloist. Mr. Ozawa closes the concert with Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 in F minor.

Poughkeepsie Journal
POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.
D. 35,739 SUN. 41,303
AUG 15 1973

Tanglewood Programs Set

LENOX, Mass. — The seventh weekend at Tanglewood begins Friday, 7 p.m., with pianist Earl Wild performing Schumann's "Etudes" and Liszt's "Mephisto" polka and waltz.

At 9 p.m. on Friday, Lawrence Foster will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the overture to Berlioz' "Le Corsaire," Bruch's "Scottish Fantasy" (with Joseph Silverstein as violin soloist) and Prokofiev's "Symphony No. Five."

On Saturday, at 10:30 a.m., there will be an open rehearsal of works to be performed Sunday.

On Saturday at 8:30 p.m., Arthur Fiedler will conduct the orchestra in Dvorak's "Symphony No. Nine" ("New World"); Rachmaninov's "Piano Concerto No. Two" (featuring Wild) and the prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."

On Sunday at 2:30 p.m., Seiji Lzawa will conduct the orchestra in Franck's "Symphonic Variations for Piano and Orchestra," Liszt's "Totentanz for Piano and Orchestra," both featuring artist-in-residence Andre Watts on piano, and Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. Four."

Tanglewood's Week To Open With Pianist

The seventh weekend at Tanglewood begins on Friday, August 17 at 7:00 p. m. with pianist Earl Wild performing Schumann's Etudes symphoniques and Liszt's Mephisto polka and waltz.

At 9:00 p. m., Lawrence Foster, Music Director of the Houston Symphony and Chief Guest Conductor of the Royal Philharmonic makes his debut with the Boston Symphony. Mr. Foster opens the program with Berlioz' Overture 'Le Corsaire' and follows it with Bruch's Scottish fantasy for violin and orchestra with Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as soloist. Mr. Foster closes the concert with Prokofiev's Symphony no. 5.

On Saturday, August 18 at 10:30 a. m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed Sunday.

On Saturday evening at 8:30 p. m. Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Dvorak's Symphony no. 9 in E minor, the 'New World'; Rachmaninov's Piano concerto no. 2 in C minor with Earl Wild as soloist, and Wagner's Prelude to 'Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg'.

On Sunday, August 19 at 2:30 p. m. Seiji Ozawa, Music Director of the Boston Symphony, conducts the Orchestra in Franck's Symphonic variations for piano and orchestra followed by Liszt's Totentanz for piano and orchestra, both featuring Granrud Artist-in-Residence Andre Watts as soloist. Mr. Ozawa closes the concert with Tchaikovsky's Symphony no. 4 in F minor.

RAVENA, N. Y.
NEWS-HERALD
(ALBANY MARKET AREA)
W. 2,000
AUG 17 1973

NEWS (E)
MANCHESTER, N. H.
AUG 17 1973
New England Newspapers

bb Opus 1

June B. Tompkins
Tanglewood

The seventh weekend at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., begins tonight at 7 with pianist Earl Wild performing Schumann's Etudes Symphoniques and Liszt's Mephisto Polka and Waltz.

At 9 p.m., Lawrence Foster debuts with the Boston Symphony as its director. The program will include Prokofiev's Symphony No. 5 and Bruch's Scottish Fantasy with Joseph Silverstein, violinist.

On Saturday at 10:30 a.m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed Sunday.

Saturday evening at 8:30, Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Dvorak's Symphony No. 9 in E minor, Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 2 in C minor with Earl Wild as soloist, and Wagner's Prelude to Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg.

Sunday at 2:30 p.m., Seiji Ozawa, music director of the Boston Symphony, conducts the orchestra in Franck's Symphonic Variations for piano and orchestra followed by Liszt's Totentanz for piano and orchestra, both featuring Granrud Artist-in-Residence Andre Watts as soloist. Ozawa closes the concert with Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 4 in F minor.

Arthur Fiedler Conductor
Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, appears at Tanglewood to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday evening and again Tuesday evening to conduct the Boston Pops. Fiedler, who is 78 years old, joined the Boston Symphony when he was 20 years old. He has been conductor of the Pops for 43 years. The total sales of Mr. Fiedler's albums, singles, tapes and cassettes are not far from 50 million.

Trinity College

A guest carillonneur and organist will play the Trinity College carillon Wednesday at 7:15 p.m. The summer concert series which is free and open to the public continues through Aug. 29.

After each concert, the audience is invited to take a guided tour of the College Chapel.

The Pillow

Principal dancers Cynthia Gregory and Terry Orr and six members of the American Ballet Theatre take over Jacob's Pillow in Lee, Mass., Tuesday through Saturday, with one premiere and four traditional works.

Cynthia Gregory will perform "Three Bach Dances" to J.S. Bach's Lute Suite No. 1. Although the form and music are formal, the dance will be modern in concept as opposed to traditional ballet in toe slippers. Miss Gregory will also perform the poignantly beautiful "Dying Swan" for the first time in her career.

The programs will also include pas de deux and divertissements.

Performances are Tuesday evening at 7:30; Wednesday, Friday and Saturday evenings at 8:40. Matinees are Thursday and Saturday at 3 p.m. There are no Thursday evening performances. Box office, 413-243-0745.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE (E)
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
D. 16,895
AUG 16 1973
New England Newsclip

Fiedler, Ozawa To Conduct Weekend Tanglewood Fare

ARTHUR FIEDLER

LENOX — The seventh weekend at Tanglewood begins on Friday at 7 p.m. with pianist Earl Wild performing Schumann's Etudes symphoniques and Liszt's Mephisto polka and waltz.

At 9 p.m., Lawrence Foster, music director of the Houston Symphony and Chief Guest Conductor of the Royal Philharmonic makes his debut with the Boston Symphony. Foster opens the program with Berlioz' Overture 'Le Corsaire' and follows it with Bruch's Scottish fantasy for violin and orchestra with Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as soloist. Foster closes the concert with Prokofiev's Symphony No. 5.

On Saturday at 10:30 a.m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an open rehearsal of works to be performed Sunday.

On Saturday at 8:30 p.m., Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Dvorak's Symphony No. 9 in E minor, the 'New World'; Rachmaninov's Piano Concerto No. 2 in C. minor with Earl Wild as soloist, and Wagner's Prelude to 'Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg'.

On Sunday at 2:30 p.m. Seiji Ozawa, Music Director of the Boston Symphony, conducts the Orchestra in Franck's Symphonic variations for piano and orchestra followed by Liszt's Totentanz for piano and orchestra, both featuring Granrud Artist-in-Residence Andre Watts as soloist. Ozawa closes the concert with Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 in F minor.

PROGRAM
WEEKEND VII

Friday, Aug. 17, 1973
Shed
7 p.m., Weekend Prelude
EARL WILD piano
Schumann: Etudes symphoniques
Liszt: Mephisto polka and waltz

9 p.m.
Shed
LAWRENCE FOSTER conductor
Berlioz: Overture 'Le corsaire'
Bruch: Scottish fantasy
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violin
Prokofiev: Symphony no. 5
Saturday, Aug. 18
10:30 a.m.
Shed
BOSTON SYMPHONY OPEN REHEARSAL

8:30 p.m.
Shed
ARTHUR FIELDER conductor
Dvorak: Symphony no. 9 in E minor 'New World'
Rachmaninov: Piano concerto no. 2 in C minor
EARL WILD
Wagner: Prelude to 'Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg'

Sunday, Aug. 19
2:30 p.m.
Shed
SEIJI OZAWA conductor
Franck: Symphonic variations for piano and orchestra
ANDRE WATTS
Liszt: Totentanz for piano and orchestra
ANDRE WATTS
Tchaikovsky: Symphony no. 4 in F minor

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
AUG 28 1973
New England Newsclip

MUSIC

CANAAN, Conn., Canaan Valley Sporting Club.
Aug. 19: Country Music Festival; country-western, blue grass; free admission, small parking charge, noon-6 p.m.

LENOX ARTS CENTER AT WHEATLEIGH, Lenox, Mass. (413-637-2227), 9:30 p.m.
Aug. 18: Candlelight Concert, Lenox Arts Center Esnemble, Andrew Thomas, director, works by Schubert, Silverman, Schoenberg.

LENOX ARTS FESTIVAL, Lenox, Mass. (413-637-2200). On the Lawn, Sat. 6 p.m.
Aug. 18: Tom Rush, solo artist; David Bromberg, guest artist.

MUSIC MOUNTAIN, Falls Village, Connn. (203-824-7126). Sat. 3 p.m.
Aug. 18: Berkshire Quartet; guest artist, Gyorgy Sebok, piano; works by Boccherini, Bartok, Mendelssohn.

SOUTH MOUNTAIN, Pittsfield, Mass. (413-442-5864). Sat. 3 p.m.
Aug. 18: Jaime and Ruth Laredo, violin-piano recital, in works by Stravinsky, Mozart, Brahms.

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass. (413-637-1600).
Aug. 17: Weekend Prelude, Earl Wild, 7 p.m.; Boston Symphony Orchestra, Lawrence Foster, conductor, works by Berlioz, Bruch, Prokofieff, 9 p.m.
Aug. 18: Boston Symphony, Open Rehearsal, 10:30 a.m.; Arthur Fiedler, conductor; Earl Wild, piano; works by Dvorak, Rachmaninoff, Wagner, 8:30 p.m.
Aug. 19: Boston Symphony, Seiji Ozawa, conductor; Andre Watts, piano; works by Franck and Liszt, 2:30 p.m.
Aug. 21: Boston Pops-at-Tanglewood, Arthur Fiedler, conductor, benefit of Pension Fund, 8:30 p.m.

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
S. 125,155
AUG 12 1973
New England Newsclip

musical briefs

TANGLEWOOD

LENOX, Mass. — The seventh weekend at Tanglewood begins on Friday at 7 with pianist Earl Wild performing Schumann's Etudes symphoniques and Liszt's Mephisto polka and waltz.

At 9, Lawrence Foster, Music Director of the Houston Symphony and Chief Guest Conductor of the Royal Philharmonic makes his debut with the Boston Symphony. Mr. Foster opens the program with Berlioz' Overture 'Le Corsaire' and follows it with Bruch's Scottish fantasy for violin and orchestra with Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as soloist. Mr. Foster closes the concert with Prokofiev's Symphony No. 5.

On Saturday at 10:30, as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed Sunday.

On Saturday evening at 8:30 Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Dvorak's Symphony No. 9 in E minor, the 'New World'; Rachmaninov's Piano concerto No. 2 in C minor with Earl Wild as soloist, and Wagner's Prelude to 'Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg'.

On Sunday, Aug. 19 at 2:30 Seiji Ozawa, Music Director of the Boston Symphony, conducts the Orchestra in Franck's Symphonic variations for piano and orchestra followed by Liszt's Totentanz for piano and orchestra, both featuring Granrud Artist-in-Residence Andre Watts as soloist. Mr. Ozawa closes the concert with Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 in F minor.

HERALD-AMERICAN (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 401,634
AUG 17 1973
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood's Week To Open With Pianist

The seventh weekend at Tanglewood begins on Friday, August 17 at 7:00 p. m. with pianist Earl Wild performing Schumann's Etudes symphoniques and Liszt's Mephisto polka and waltz.

At 9:00 p. m., Lawrence Foster, Music Director of the Houston Symphony and Chief Guest Conductor of the Royal Philharmonic makes his debut with the Boston Symphony. Mr. Foster opens the program with Berlioz' Overture 'Le Corsaire' and follows it with Bruch's Scottish fantasy for violin and orchestra with Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as soloist. Mr. Foster closes the concert with Prokofiev's Symphony no. 5.

On Saturday, August 18 at 10:30 a. m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be periormed Sunday.

On Saturday evening at 8:30 p. m. Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Dvorak's Symphony no. 9 in E minor, the 'New World'; Rachmaninov's Piano concerto no. 2 in C minor with Earl Wild as soloist, and Wagner's Prelude to 'Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg'.

On Sunday, August 19 at 2:30 p. m. Seiji Ozawa, Music Director of the Boston Symphony, conducts the Orchestra in Franck's Symphonic variations for piano and orchestra followed by Liszt's Totentanz for piano and orchestra, both featuring Granrud Artist-in-Residence Andre Watts as soloist. Mr. Ozawa closes the concert with Tchaikovsky's Symphony no. 4 in F minor.

GREENVILLE, N. Y.
LOCAL
(ALBANY MARKET AREA)
W. 1,000
AUG 15 1973

BANNER (E)
PEMBROKE, MA.
AUG 23 1973
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood weekend bills Dvorak, Franck

LENOX, Mass. — The seventh weekend at Tanglewood begins on Friday, Aug. 17 at 7 p.m. with pianist Earl Wild performing Schumann's Etudes symphoniques and Liszt's Mephisto polka and waltz.

At 9 p.m., Lawrence Foster, music director of the Houston Symphony and chief guest conductor of the Royal Philharmonic makes his debut with the Boston Symphony. Foster opens the program with Berlioz' Overture 'Le Corsaire' and follows it with Bruch's Scottish fantasy for violin and orchestra with concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as soloist. Foster closes the concert with Prokofiev's Symphony No. 5.

On Saturday, Aug. 18 at 10:30 a.m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an open rehearsal of works to be performed Sunday.

On Saturday evening at 8:30 Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Dvorak's Symphony no. 9 in E minor, the 'New World'; Rachmaninov's Piano concerto no. 2 in C minor with Earl Wild as soloist, and Wagner's Prelude to 'Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg.'

On Sunday, Aug. 19 at 2:30 p.m. Seiji Ozawa, music director of the Boston Symphony, conducts the orchestra in Franck's Symphonic variations for piano and orchestra followed by Liszt's Totentanz for piano and orchestra, both featuring Granrud artist-in-residence Andre Watts as soloist. Ozawa closes the concert with Tchaikovsky's Symphony no. 4 in F minor.

New Officers of Service League, Boston Museum of Science, recently elected are (from left) Mrs. John Warner of Lincoln, vice-president; Mrs. Richard O. Howe, Belmont, treasurer; Mrs. Arthur Schwartz, Swampscott, president; and Mrs. E. Lee Perry, Brookline, secretary.

Rose Walsh

Charlestown Tour Set on Sept. 22

Charlestown plans to roll out the red carpet on Saturday, Sept. 22, for a tour of homes and gardens in combination with the sale and exhibit of the works of Charlestown artists and craftsmen. In addition to the work of professional artists the handwork of users of the Charlestown Activities Center will be on display.

The Center, a neighborhood drop-in and adult education facility, will soon be the base of a crafts cooperative, selling locally-made goods to area shops.

On the house tour, over a dozen of both traditional and contemporary decor, will be open to the public from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. A champagne hour in the courtyard of 81 Warren st. from 4 to 5 o'clock is an added pleasure.

Proceeds of the day sponsored by the Charlestown Preservation Society, Inc. will help to fund its Bicentennial activities, especially in the possible battle to prevent the moving of the USS Constitution from her berth in Charlestown.

Tickets are $3 ($2 for persons of 65 or over) and will be on sale the day of the tour at 81 Warren st., beginning at 9:30 a.m.

★

Lawrence Foster, music director of the Houston Symphony and Chief Guest Conductor of the Royal Philharmonic, makes his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, this evening, 9 o'clock at Tanglewood.

Saturday evening at 8:30 Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra conducts the B.S.O. in Dvorak's Symphony No. 9 in E minor, the 'New World"; Rachmaninov's Piano concerto No. 2 in C minor with Earl Wild as soloist.

★

Mr. and Mrs. Walter W. Prue of Winchester and South Dennis have announced the engagement of their daughter, Jeanne Marie, to Francis M. Carrick of Chelmsford. They have chosen August 24 for the nuptials.

The bride-to-be attended the University of Massachusetts in Amherst and received her Master's from Northeastern. Her fiance attended Wentworth Institute.

Review: Fiedler at Tanglewood

By John Massameno

SATURDAY EVENING at Tanglewood was a night for reminiscences. The evening's performance, markedly more gala than the afternoon series, seemed to have brought the past alive — not only in a musical sense, but in a historical, and therefore, somewhat nostalgic, sense as well.

The romantic fervor of Dvorak's "New World," Symphony, the first work of the evening, pervaded the audience and set the mood for the remainder of the concert. Following the intense opening statement, the spirited and aggressive first movement soon gave way to the famous second, in which the oboe was featured in a lilting and serene solo.

The tranquillity which the music transmitted was complimented by the cool evening breeze, reminding us in a delightful way that we were, after all, outside.

The Scherzo which followed was impulsive and vibrant. Far from what many would call a composite of American folk tunes, the original inspiration of the piece, the dancelike movement, often changing from one tempo to another, revealed typically Bohemian influences. Full bass, chimes and triangle augmented the sonorous voyage into the past.

Introduced by the brass, the fourth movement boldly restated Dvorak's most predominant theme. The perpetual motion of this final section was subtley expressed, even in the string interludes, and finally reached its climax in a mass of juxtaposed themes and variations.

An intermission was followed by Earl Wild, guest pianist, who loaned his aesthetic interpretations to Rachmaninov's piano concerto no. 2 in C minor, op 18. Wild walked out on stage displaying his stunning and natural platinum hair and was followed by Fiedler, who's hair is also white — though one might suppose for different reasons.

THE IMPORTANT THEME in the first movement was rendered sensitively by Wild who emptied himself in the passionate surging of one of Rachmaninov's most moving concertos. In the second movement a combination of composer-performer resulted in music exhibiting all the romantic power and expression the work possesses.

The allegro scherzando, which ended the piece, called for muted violins which provided a hushed, but excited background for the soloist's final splendor. Shouts of approval greeted Wild, Fiedler, and the Boston Symphony.

Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg" was the closing work of the program. In a grandioso and operatic style, Wagner presented a musical buffet, a sampling of what was to come. A vivid imagination could easily reconstruct the scenery for one of Wagner's most colorful operas.

Fiedler's selections for the program, which were not particularly varied, catered to a singular pallet of musical color, and I'm certain those whose tastes coincided with his were delighted with the performance.

CONNECTICUT
WESTERN NEWS
CANAAN, CONN.
W. 2,875

AUG 22 1973

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169

AUG 21 1973

Two Sunday Concerts Provide Quality Music

By RICHARD VINCENT
Music Critic

It was another two concert day Sunday, the first being provided by talents of considerable note: Seiji Ozawa, Andre Watts, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the afternoon at Tanglewood, and the last that same evening in the great hall at Indian Hill in Stockbridge where Michael Emery coming of note, played his solo recital with the student orchestra. More on this in a trice.

WATTS WHO failed to impress earlier in the summer with a lackluster rendition of a Mozart concerto, and a solo recital, failed to impress, that is, in terms of the almost universally fine notices he has been getting, was very good indeed on Sunday afternoon. Having also played the Brahms Concerto No. 2 two weeks ago at SPA, there were then indications that he is much more at home in the big romantic repertory and this was made even more apparent this afternoon when he played the Ceasar Franck "Symphonic Variations" and the Liszt, "Totentanz."

The Franck was less his kind of raw meat, one is still inclined to prefer the old 78 recording by Casadesus (Jean) with its subtle ebb and flow, but the Liszt was right in Watts' wheelhouse and he played with a positive flair that had not been present (with some exceptions in the Brahms) earlier on this summer.

The work means "Dances of Death" and takes as its programmatic "raison d'etre" the powerful and ominous "Dies Irae" from the liturgical mass. Although it appears on the surface to have only bombast and flash, the fact is the music has a real and urgent strength to it, and Watts was called upon to deliver some strong and accurate playing which he did. Whereas he does not seem to understand what Mozart is trying to do, he does understand a good deal better the mind and creative machinery of a Franz Liszt.

LATER IN the evening, Michael Emery, the first winner in what is now the Albany League of Arts-Indian Hill Scholarship, was among the few students chosen for the annual Concerto Night at the music School, (Indian Hill). He chose to play the 1st movement of the Mendessohn Violin Concerto, and along with five others, piano, French horn, violin and bassoon, (there were two pianists) he was by any objective view the most accomplished of all. The quality was high throughout, even the earnest orchestra made up of students and directed the musical staff members, did some very good ensemble work. They were particularly inspired to quality when the soloist himself was very good; it brought them more up to the mark.

The concerti chosen were not any kind of compromise, Bach, Beethoven, Mozart, and Mendelssohn being the composers. One guess at who had three of his works performed. Right, Mozart, who wrote something for every known instrument of his day.

Going briefly back to the Shed at Tanglewood, the entire concert under Ozawa which also included Tchaikowsky's Symphony No. 4, was above the average set by concerts here this summer. They were full of bite and drive, and the orchestra seemed more up to the ocassion than it was otherwise this summer.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
VILLAGE VOICE
W. 116,500

AUG 16 1973

NYACK, N. Y.
JOURNAL-NEWS
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
D. 29,000

AUG 25 1973

7
SEVENTH WEEKEND

AUGUST 17
7 pm Weekend Prelude
Earl Wild
9 pm LAWRENCE FOSTER
Berlioz: Overture "Corsair"
Bruch: Scottish Fantasy
Joseph Silverstein
Prokofieff: Symphony No. 5

AUGUST 18
10:30 am Open Rehearsal
8:30 pm ARTHUR FIEDLER
Dvorak "New World" Symphony
Rachmaninoff: Piano Concerto No. 2
Earl Wild
Wagner: Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg"

AUGUST 19
2:30 pm SEIJI OZAWA
Franck: Symphonic Variations
Liszt: Totentanz
André Watts

Fiedler, some Japanese and Tanglewood

By LOUISA KREISBERG

LENOX, MASS.—The night was three-quarter-mooned and the light so bright and sweet it was painful. Outlines and edges were razor sharp. And under Tanglewood's Music Shed, Arthur Fiedler was doing what he does better than anyone in the world—popularizing the classics.

Fiedler is 79 going on 37 and if you ran him for president he might just win. The Viennese virtuoso has led the Boston "Pops" for 43 years. Under his direction the orchestra has made more recordings than any in the world. The total sales of "Pops" albums, singles, tapes and cassettes hover around 50 million. . .one million recordings alone of Gade's "Jalousie."

FIELDER WAS making the first of two appearances this week at the Berkshire Music Festival and the crowd was thick with interesting types. Germaine Greer-like females and Norman Mailer-like males. An usher paging William Buckley. A grandmother reading "Jonathan Livingston Seagull." Three nuns in miniskirts. A black executive bearing a bouquet of plastic flowers as a present to Fiedler. Box holders in white summer tux eyeing denimed teens singing Bob Dylan numbers a cappella at intermission.

And. . .hordes of Japanese with a yen for western symphonic music. Americans have so devalued the dollar that Japanese tourists are surfacing in droves from Lenox Hill, to Lenox, Mass.

THIS PAST winter Japanese buyers snapped up millions of dollars in fine art at Parke Bernet auctions and this summer they're snapping up millions of notes of fine music at festivals throughout the Berkshires.

Tanglewood is a mecca for orientals. "We have nothing like this," one Japanese tourist told me. By "this" he meant not only the music festival but Seiji Ozawa, its artistic director who will begin his first season as music director of the Boston Symphony this fall.

Ozawa was born in Hoten, Manchuria, in 1935 and graduated from the Toho School of Music in Tokyo. There is no American-born, American-trained conductor who can boast a similar position in Japan.

Yet Ozawa seems more occidental than oriental. Hovering near Arthur Fielder Saturday night, Ozawa talked about how the landscape at Tanglewood brings out the best in artists and audiences.

Arthur Fiedler

"Melville wrote "Moby Dick" here," Ozawa said with reverence "Hawthorne completed "The House of Seven Gables." And the Boston Symphony has summered here since 1934.

"We've broken all previous attendance records at Tanglewood this year,'' Ozawa smiled, estimating total single admissions at more than 300,000.

CERTAINLY TANGLEWOOD brings out the best in Arthur Fiedler. Snaking his way across the stage Saturday, sporting a yellow jacket and black tie, looking, if possible, more healthy than Dave Whottle, Fiedler leaped—not stepped—onto the podium.

Talk about Super Energy. Fiedler grew younger, not older, as he conducted. The white-haired maestro gave the audience exactly what it wanted: old standards like Dvorak's "New World Symphony," Rachmaninoff's Second Piano Concerto (with Earl Wild, soloist) and Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

The program was a perfect example of Fiedler's philosophy. Approach the audience directly with familiar, but emotional music. It's the same formula that sold 50 million Fiedler recordings.

Fiedler romped through the program with breathtaking organizational skill and the results were immediately evident. Applause followed every movement. More formal, constrained audiences would have remained silent until each piece was completed. This audience made its feelings known instantly.

At the end, people clambered to their feet, howling "More! More!" The Japanese, many of whom had followed the music directly from the original scores, began running down the aisles to shake the maestro's hand. Even the hoi polloi, the esoterics who complained Fielder was just playing the same old stuff over again, grudgingly approved.

. . .as I was saying, if you ran Arthur Fiedler for president, he might just win.

music

Olatunji

Charlie Parker

"OLATUNJI and His African Drums of Passion": Will seem surreal when his rhythm and song float out over the Hudson River. Wall Street is in view and so is a Clipper Ship. (The South Street Seaport, at South and Fulton Streets, August 18, 8 p.m. $2.50) VV

It hasn't become Tradition yet, but in the spirit of summer the Guggenheim concerts are here for the second year running:
20th Century Chamber Music: Works by Villa-Lobos, Kodaly, Dohnanyi, and Copeland will be performed: organized and directed by cellist Robert Sylvester, (August 21, 8 p. m. $3)
Jimmy Giuffre on Flute: will be in the main gallery, with his group, playing good Jazz. The title: "Music for people, birds, butterflies and mosquitoes." (Guggenheim Museum, 88th Street and Fifth Avenue, August 23, 8 p. m. $3) VV

"The Bebop Era: Bird and Diz": An exhibit rare photos, original artwork, films and tapes in praise of the two Jazz Masters. Thanks be that Dizzy Gillespie and his trumpet are still around. But it's all we have left of the late Charlie "Bird" Parker and his magic. (The N. Y. Jazz Museum, 125 W. 55th Street, opening August 21 through November, Tuesday-Sunday, noon to 7 p. m. 765-2150) VVV

Mostly Mozart: Prospective highlights for the week are an all-Mozart chamber-music program August 16 by the much-acclaimed Tokyo String Quartet, joined by the German horn virtuoso, Hermann Baumann, and our own Lorin Hollander at the piano. August 17 and 18 brings in Raymond Leppard, controversial musicologist and celebrated conductor, in his New York debut, conducting his edition of the complete "Water Music" of Handel. August 20 and 22 are the dates for Edo de Waart conducting Bach's Fourth Suite and Mozart's "Jupiter," Gary Graffman playing the Mozart D-Minor Piano Concerto, and Leonard Arner in a Handel Oboe Concerto. The London Chamber Orchestra introduce themselves to New York August 21 and in a matinee August 22. (Philharmonic Hall, 8 p. m., plus 2 p.m. August 22. TR 4-2424.) NR

Tanglewood: This will be a virtuoso weekend. BSO concertmaster Joseph Silverstein plays Bruch's Scottish Fantasy Friday night, Earl Wild storms the keyboard for a short twilight recital Friday and in Rachmaninoff's Second Piano Concerto Saturday night, with Arthur Fiedler conducting that plus Dvorak's "New Yorld". Andre Watts takes over the piano Sunday afternoon for Franck's Symphonic Variations and Liszt's "Totentanz," and Seiji Ozawa conducts Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony. (413-637-1600) NR

Free Music in Washington Square Park: Fritz Rikko conducts and Robert Conant plays the harpsichord in a Bach-Hayden-Mozart-Respighi program. Be prepared for lots of environmental noise, however. (Southeast corner of the park. 8 p. m. If it rains, the concert is in the Loeb Student Center, across East Fourth Street.) NR

Review: Fiedler at Tanglewood

By John Massameno

SATURDAY EVENING at Tanglewood was a night for reminiscences. The evening's performance, markedly more gala than the afternoon series, seemed to have brought the past alive — not only in a musical sense, but in a historical, and therefore, somewhat nostalgic, sense as well.

The romantic fervor of Dvorak's "New World," Symphony, the first work of the evening, pervaded the audience and set the mood for the remainder of the concert. Following the intense opening statement, the spritely and aggressive first movement soon gave way to the famous second, in which the oboe was featured in a lilting and serene solo.

The tranquillity which the music transmitted was complimented by the cool evening breeze, reminding us in a delightful way that we were, after all, outside.

The Scherzo which followed was impulsive and vi[illegible]nt. Far f[illegible]n what many would call a composite of American f[illegible] tunes, the original inspiration of the piece, the dancelike movement, often changing from one tempo to another, revealed typically Bohemian influences. Full bass, chimes and triangle augmented the sonorous voyage into the past.

Introduced by the brass, the fourth movement boldly restated Dvorak's most predominant theme. The perpetual motion of this final section was subtley expressed, even in the string interludes, and finally reached its climax in a mass of juxtaposed themes and variations.

An intermission was followed by Earl Wild, guest pianist, who loaned his aesthetic interpretations to Rachmaninov's piano concerto no. 2 in C minor, op 18. Wild wa[illegible]d out on st[illegible]splaying his stunning and natural pl[illegible]num hair and was followed by Fiedler, who's hair is also white — though one might suppose for different reaso[illegible]

THE IMPORTANT THEME in the first movement was rendered sensitively by Wild who emptied himself in the passionate surging of one of Rachmaninov's most moving concertos. In the second movement a combination of composer-performer resulted in music exhibiting all the romantic power and expression the work possesses.

The allegro scherzando, which ended the piece, called for muted violins which provided a hushed, but excited background for the soloist's final splendor. Shouts of approval greeted Wild, Fiedler, and the Boston Symphony.

Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg" was the closing work of the program. In a grandioso and operatic style, Wagner presented a musical buffet, a sampling of what was to come. A vivid imagination could easily reconstruct the scenery for one of Wagner's most colorful operas.

Fiedler's selections for the program, which were not particularly varied, catered to a singular pallet of musical color, and I'm certain those whose tastes coincided with his were delighted with the performance.

Two Sunday Concerts Provide Quality Music

By RICHARD VINCENT
Music Critic

[illegible]

WATTS WHO [illegible] to go [illegible] with a lackluster rendition of a Mozart concerto, and a solo recital, failed to impress, that is, in terms of the almost universally fine notices he has been getting. [illegible] was very good indeed on Sunday afternoon. Having also played the Brahms Concerto No. 2 two weeks ago at [illegible] then indeed [illegible] much [illegible]

[illegible] Wagner was [illegible] to deliver [illegible] accurate playing [illegible] and Wagner [illegible] Mozart's [illegible] to do, [illegible] better the mind and [illegible] manipulators of Franz Liszt.

LATER IN [illegible] Mendes [illegible] Wattsie's [illegible] the new students chosen for the annual Concerto Night at the Juilliard School. Andrew Hill [illegible] the chance to play the first movement of the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto, and along with [illegible] Francis [illegible] Sued [illegible] he has to [illegible] the most [illegible]

[illegible] average set by [illegible] here this summer. They were full of bite and [illegible] and the orchestra [illegible] otherwise [illegible]

SEVENTH WEEKEND

Weekend Prelude
Earl Wild
LAWRENCE FOSTER
Berlioz: Overture "Corsair"
Bruch: Scottish Fantasy
Joseph Silverstein
Prokofieff: Symphony No. 5

Open Rehearsal
ARTHUR FIEDLER
Dvorak "New World" Symphony
Rachmaninoff: Piano Concerto No. 2
Earl Wild
Wagner: Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg"

SEIJI OZAWA
Franck: Symphonic Variations
Liszt: Totentanz
André Watts

AUG 25 1979

Fiedler, some Japanese and Tanglewood

By LOUISA KREISBERG

LENOX, MASS.—The night was three-quarter-mooned and the light so bright and sweet it was painful. Outlines and edges were razor sharp. And under Tanglewood's Music Shed, Arthur Fiedler was doing what he does better than anyone in the world—popularizing the classics.

Fiedler is 79 going on 37 and if you ran him for president he might just win. The Viennese virtuoso has led the Boston "Pops" for 43 years. Under his direction the orchestra has made more recordings than any in the world. The total sales of "Pops" albums, singles, tapes and cassettes hover around 50 million. . .one million recordings alone of Gade's "Jalousie."

FIELDER WAS making the first of two appearances this week at the Berkshire Music Festival and the crowd was thick with interesting types. Germaine Greer-like females and Norman Mailer-like males. An usher paging William Buckley. A grandmother reading "Jonathan Livingston Seagull." Three nuns in miniskirts. A black executive bearing a bouquet of plastic flowers as a present to Fiedler. Box holders in white summer tux eyeing denimed teens singing Bob Dylan numbers a cappella at intermission.

And. . .hordes of Japanese with a yen for western symphonic music. Americans have so devalued the dollar that Japanese tourists are surfacing in droves from Lenox Hill, to Lenox, Mass.

THIS PAST winter Japanese buyers snapped up millions of dollars in fine art at Parke Bernet auctions and this summer they're snapping up millions of notes of fine music at festivals throughout the Berkshires.

Tanglewood is a mecca for orientals. "We have nothing like this," one Japanese tourist told me. By "this" he meant not only the music festival but Seiji Ozawa, its artistic director who will begin his first season as music director of the Boston Symphony this fall.

Ozawa was born in Hoten, Manchuria, in 1935 and graduated from the Toho School of Music in Tokyo. There is no American-born, American-trained conductor who can boast a similar position in Japan.

Yet Ozawa seems more occidental than oriental. Hovering near Arthur Fielder Saturday night, Ozawa talked about how the landscape at Tanglewood brings out the best in artists and audiences.

Arthur Fiedler

"Melville wrote "Moby Dick" here," Ozawa said with reverence "Hawthorne completed "The House of Seven Gables." And the Boston Symphony has summered here since 1934.

"We've broken all previous attendance records at Tanglewood this year," Ozawa smiled, estimating total single admissions at more than 300,000.

CERTAINLY TANGLEWOOD brings out the best in Arthur Fiedler. Snaking his way across the stage Saturday, sporting a yellow jacket and black tie, looking, if possible, more healthy than Dave Whottle, Fiedler leaped—not stepped—onto the podium.

Talk about Super Energy. Fiedler grew younger, not older, as he conducted. The white-haired maestro gave the audience exactly what it wanted: old standards like Dvorak's "New World Symphony," Rachmaninoff's Second Piano Concerto (with Earl Wild, soloist) and Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

The program was a perfect example of Fiedler's philosophy. Approach the audience directly with familiar, but emotional music. It's the same formula that sold 50 million Fiedler recordings.

Fiedler romped through the program with breathtaking organizational skill and the results were immediately evident. Applause followed every movement. More formal, constrained audiences would have remained silent until each piece was completed. This audience made its feelings known instantly.

At the end, peo[illegible] clambered to their feet, howling "More! More!" The Japanese, many of whom had followed the music directly from the original scores, began running down the aisles to shake the maestro's hand. Even the hoi polloi, the esoterics who complained Fielder was just playing the same old stuff over again, grudgingly approved.

. . .as I was saying, if you ran Arthur Fiedler for president, he might just win.

music

Olatunji

Charlie Parker

"OLATUNJI and His African Drums of Passion": Will seem surreal when his rhythm and song float out over the Hudson River. Wall Street is in view and so is a Clipper Ship. (The South Street Seaport, at South and Fulton Streets, August 18, 8 p. m. $2.50) VV

It hasn't become Tradition yet, but in the spirit of summer the Guggenheim concerts are here for the second year running:
20th Century Chamber Music: Works by Villa-Lobos, Kodaly, Dohnanyi, and Copeland will be performed, organized and directed by cellist Robert Sylvester. (August 21, 8 p. m. $3)
Jimmy Giuffre on Flute: will be in the main gallery, with his group, playing good Jazz. The title: "Music for people, birds, butterflies and mosquitoes." (Guggenheim Museum, 88th Street and Fifth Avenue, August 23, 8 p. m. $3) VV

"The Bebop Era: Bird and Diz": An exhibit rare photos, original artwork, films and tapes in praise of the two Jazz Masters. Thanks be that Dizzy Gillespie and his trumpet are still around. But it's all we have left of the late Charlie "Bird" Parker and his magic. (The N. Y. Jazz Museum, 125 W. 55th Street, opening August 21 through November, Tuesday-Sunday, noon to 7 p. m. 765-2150) VVV

Mostly Mozart: Prospective highlights for the week are an all-Mozart chamber-music program August 16 by the much-acclaimed Tokyo String Quartet, joined by the German horn virtuoso, Hermann Baumann, and our own Lorin Hollander at the piano. August 17 and 18 brings in Raymond Leppard, controversial musicologist and celebrated conductor, in his New York debut, conducting his edition of the complete "Water Music" of Handel. August 20 and 22 are the dates for Edo de Waart conducting Bach's Fourth Suite and Mozart's "Jupiter," Gary Graffman playing the Mozart D-Minor Piano Concerto, and Leonard Arner in a Handel Oboe Concerto. The London Chamber Orchestra introduce themselves to New York August 21 and in a matinee August 22. (Philharmonic Hall, 8 p. m., plus 2 p.m. August 22. TR 4-2424.) NR

Tanglewood: This will be a virtuoso weekend. BSO concertmaster Joseph Silverstein plays Bruch's Scottish Fantasy Friday night. Earl Wild storms the keyboard for a short twilight recital Friday and in Rachmaninoff's Second Piano Concerto Saturday night, with Arthur Fiedler conducting that plus Dvorak's "New World." André Watts takes over the piano Sunday afternoon for Franck's Symphonic Variations and Liszt's "Totentanz," and Seiji Ozawa conducts Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony. (413-637-1600) NR

Free Music in Washington Square Park: Fritz Rikko conducts and Robert Conant plays the harpsichord in a Bach-Hayden-Mozart Respighi program. Be prepared for lots of environmental noise, however. (Southeast corner of the park, 8 p. m. if it rains, the concert is in the Loeb Student Center, across East Fourth Street.) NR

THE ARTS

Prokofiev's 5th still delightful

LENOX — Prokofiev's Fifth was the last symphony whose first performances were anticipated and received with something like universal excitement. Koussevitzky introduced it to America late in 1945, which was even a sort of homecoming, because the work turned out to have been written on some of the manuscript paper which Koussevitzky had one of the Boston music stores send regularly to wartime shortage-bedeviled Russian composers.

I remember those early performances, the Boston Symphony's elegant recital at Hunter College, Artur Rodzinski's with the New York Philharmonic, which was both burlier and more incisive, and, most brilliant of all, those of the Philadelphia Orchestra under George Szell, then just about to take over the Cleveland Orchestra.

MICHAEL STEINBERG

I don't know how long it has been since I last heard the work — eight or nine years at least — but when Lawrence Foster conducted it at Tanglewood Friday evening, I was delighted to see how handsomely it has stood up. All that excitement was about something real. (What has worn badly is John Burk's program note with its war-oriented reading of the expressive content.)

The Fifth is scored with some of that best-of-both-worlds combination of richness and translucence you hear in the best "Nutcracker" and "Pathetique" Tchaikovsky (Prokofiev is edgier and keeps the middle rather more spare). The melodies are good; they are full of energy and they have personality. I shall never enjoy any of Prokofiev's later music as much as the acid stuff he wrote in the 1920s, but his humor in the Fifth has grace and an appealingly casual quality.

I love, in fact, how unforced everything is in this symphony, the grandly serious utterance of the two slower movements included. And how genuinely felt, how rediscovered, reinvented the traditional forms are, and how masterful Prokofiev's control of his material.

I was, obviously enough, mightily impressed, and Foster's performance, by revealing the work so clearly and with such vitality, had a lot to do with that. At 31, Foster is the senior of that trio of remarkable American conductors — the other two being James Levine and Michael Tilson Thomas — who came to prominence in the later 60s. Foster was the Koussevitzky Prize winner at Tanglewood in 1966, and I still remember his cool management that summer of a piece by Henry Weinberg which was as difficult an assignment as any student conductor has ever had put into his life. He is now music director of the Houston Symphony and principal guest conductor of the Royal Philharmonic in London.

Foster is quiet and direct on the podium, and he is inclined to keep the rhetoric of his interpretations on the understated side. The great strengths of his Prokofiev performance were structural intelligence and good rhythm. Because the surface is so brilliant, almost any conductor with a good orchestra can make some sort of effect with the Fifth; Foster, with his sure sense of hill and dale, of anticipation and arrival, of upbeat and accent, steered through it with a mastery that is really uncommon.

The first half of the concert had, however, been disappointing, beginning with a lusterless run-through of Berlioz's "Corsaire" overture. I was sorrier that, with Joseph Silverstein as soloist, so weak a case was made for Bruch's Scottish Fantasy for Violin and Orchestra. It is a very soft sort of Scotland—definitely Johnny Walker Black Label rather than Laphroiagh— but the piece has an authentic, if slightly long-winded charm, and its sounds are lovely. It is fragile, though, in that it depends on stylish performance.

Silverstein offered refined taste and clean fiddling; on the other hand, he executes romantic gestures a little unspontaneously, and his playing was wanting something in robustness. Nor was Foster much of a dynamo. The result was predictable: at intemission everybody was moaning and asking why that piece of you-know-what had been dug up. And I, I had left my "Unfair to Bruch" sign at home.

Music review

Potpourri weekend at Tanglewood

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

TANGLEWOOD had an end-of-season clearance this past weekend. Management evidently found itself with some of its most popular numbers still on the shelves and not in the least shopworn. Consequently, they were pushed forward — the Tchaikovsky Fourth Symphony, the Dvorak "New World Symphony," the Wagner Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," the Rachmaninoff second Piano Concerto and the Cesar Franck Symphonic Variations. With several outstanding window-dressers on hand — Andre Watts, Earl Wild and Joseph Silverstein — they put on a special which had the crowds cheering in the aisles. In between the sure-fire crowd pleasers they slipped a noisome "Totentanz" of Liszt in which Watts shot off incredible fireworks.

Seiji Ozawa conducted yesterday afternoon and gave Watts marvelous collaboration in the Franck Variations. But the soloist strangely failed to inject significance into the opening two quavers of his initial statement, and only rose to splendor in later episodes of the concerto where there were sparks flying between the piano and the orchestra in the exciting exchange of episodes which develop.

Watts performed miraculous feats in the Liszt, but it is so full of bombast and the two unaccompanied solo interludes so boringly unworthy that whoever contrived to place it on the program must have been out of ordure. It may be interesting to notice that several of the string sections in these two piano works did not utilize their first-chair men.

* * *

Arthur Fiedler has appeared on the Tanglewood stage many times over the years, but always before as the conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, which is a sort of bastard offspring that is usually presented with a degree of insouciance by the parents. But Fiedler is an old, experienced hand at the helm of any orchestral ship and the rapport between him and the musicians of the orchestra is of the closest.

The program he presented Saturday night needed no concessions nor compromises, especially in the state in which the orchestra finds itself at this present moment, without a disciplinarian or authoritarian taskmaster, so that it plays as well and no different for an exceptionably able but spontaneous routineer as it does for multifarious Marcel Marceaus with their rehearsed and studied gestures.

In spite of the quasi-bargain basement atmosphere it was an evening of good music and good music-making. Fiedler kept his head in the score more than one might have expected, but he certainly made his program sound as well as some others who want to impress their audiences by seeming to have the score in their heads.

* * *

Earl Wild gave an excellent account of the Rachmaninoff Concerto in C Minor and the flute and clarinet obbligatos in the adagio added substantially to the tonal distinction developed in his weaving figures.

The "New World" of Dvorak is one of the most ingratiating works in the repertory. He wrote it early in the 1890s when he was teaching in New York, and while we would like to believe that the endearing themes are endemic with us here in this country, it has been pretty well established that Dvorok brought them with him from his beloved Bohemia.

* * *

It is noteworthy that the weekend programs contained music by several composers whose works are conspicuous for their grasp of sound per se. The Dvorak is affectionate music and the results achieved by manipulating simple basic formulas which are always found to be touching and tender. Rachmaninoff, in his own style, also treats his inspirations with the same type of coloring and shading. So in his way, too, does Franck. As for Tchaikovsky, his sense of sound is overwhelming. It may sound strange that such a factor should be pointed out in music, of all places, but there are others whose goals are reached by other factors not so welcome to the ear. Ozawa's Tchaikovsky was outstandingly sensitive and the rightness of his Canzona was pure joy.

* * *

Berlioz is one of a very few composers who wasn't a good instrumentalist. He played the flute, but little is to be found about his ability as a performer. It is ordinarily thought that a composer must have the "feel" of instruments for which he writes because he can learn the potential range, the nature of the texture of the sound and many other necessary factors. For instance, Brahms, a pianist, went to his friend, Joachim, when he wrote his violin concerto to find out if a violinist would find what he had written conveniently "in his hand."

Berlioz wrote tremendously demanding tasks for the strings and nowhere was it more evident than in the "Corsair" overture with which the Friday evening program began. Guest conductor Lawrence Foster gave the string sections no quarter at the very outset, but established a tempo which almost left a few of the laggards straggling. There is a similar demanding stint at the outset of the same composer's "Beatrice and Benedict," and one cannot help querying whether he quite knew what he was imposing.

* * *

The Corsair overture is based on a story, "The Red Rover," of Fenimore Cooper which Berlioz had read as a young man and which had stayed with him through all the years until he got ready to portray the narrative with his pen. Cooper had lived in Europe for many years and had been one of the most popular American writers in the European public's approval. Berlioz and Mendelssohn had been close friends and once in a gesture of friendship they exchanged batons, but Berlioz offered his confrere a tomahawk!

It is remarkable how the two outstanding Russian composers of the present regime have been able to express their inward thoughts in the language of music of traditional inheritance. Whereas most of their contemporaries have written in styles and methods which abandon previous modes of the rules of music, Prokofieff and Shostakovitch have been able to strike out in new paths with the old equipment. So it was with the Prokofieff Fifth Symphony which Foster unfolded with such vivid contrasts that it needed little translation for most of us to grasp.

Joseph Silverstein in the Bruch "Scottish Fantasy" played with overabundant proficiency and fastidious detailing. Bruch conducted in Great Britain for several years but is not recorded as having spent time in Scotland, but wherever he got them the familiar and beautiful old tunes and folksongs stood out like gems of nature among all the intricate growth of Bruch's ecological effulgence.

Whitestone

SUPERSTAR Danny Kaye attended yesterday's concert at Tanglewood and congratulated his friend, Seiji Ozawa, after the latter finished his conducting stint.

Over 33,000 Flock to Lenox For Festival's 7th Weekend

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — Tanglewood audiences rarely have heard concerts of such widely contrasted merit as the last two of the Berkshire Music Festival's seventh weekend.

Total attendance, from Friday night through yesterday afternoon, was 33,530.

The near-record summer attendance of 13,017 for Arthur Fiedler Saturday night attested to the popularity of the man whom the program described as "Boston's best known and best loved citizen."

Both programs were popular works drawn from the Romantic era. Therefore, there was no real question of repertory preference.

Earl Wild was Fiedler's piano soloist Saturday night. Yesterday afternoon Andre Watts was the piano soloist for Seiji Ozawa.

Fiedler received great applause — before, during and after the program. In fact, the concluding "Meistersinger" Overture brought a standing ovation.

Inseparable

The Pops and Fiedler are so inseparable that many who came may have expected that kind of program. Were it not that Fiedler conducted a complete "New World" Symphony by Dvorak, it could have been classified as such.

Saturday night's concert was several notches lower in standard than yesterday's sensational program.

The lowest point was an erratic performance of Rachmaninoff's Second Piano Concerto by Wild, under Fiedler.

To begin with, Fiedler exercised the same will in the Rachmaninoff as in the preceding "New World." One might have thought that Wild was trying to escape Fiedler's dictatorial tempos. But Wild's own treatment of solo fragments was suffused in dripping sentimentality rather than emotion. Instead of Rachmaninoff's broad statements, one heard an arbitrary lacing of tidbits that drooled from the instrument.

All of which might conceivably have been tolerable if Wild's technique had atoned with accuracy for his saccharine palpitations.

Traditional

Fiedler gave a traditional and, in some ways, exciting account of the "New World." His cues were plentiful, along with hasty page turning forward, and back for repeats.

The orchestra did nobly. It followed the conductor down to the last semiquaver, obliging him with his nuances, accents, volume and tempo. Seldom have the brasses played better. Strings were loaded with vibrato and the English horn solo by Laurence Thorstenberg was spotless.

As with the Pops Orchestra, Fiedler drew no elaborate baton designs in the air. He moved the Dvorak scherzo along at a brisk pace and everything was clear enough to be taken down in dictation.

Yesterday's concert was something else again.

The orchestra yielded to Ozawa's control and Watts did his share by contributing two of this summer's outstanding solo performances.

Actually Liszt's "Totentanz" for piano and orchestra was more in the nature of a dazzling exhibition, as the composer intended.

Far more musical, and in many ways just as exciting, was Franck's neglected "Symphonic Variations."

For most pianists, the Franck is as thankless a vehicle as "Totentanz" is an impossibility.

Virtuoso Performance

After an intensely personal delivery of the Franck, "Totentanz" gave Watts a clear track on which to unloose his virtuosic technique. He all but tore the keyboard apart with note-populous passages, glissandos in both directions, and pummeling of the "Dies Irae" theme over which the work goes on a rampage. By holding sentimentality in tow, Watts gave a musicianly and discerning performance of Liszt's rip-snorting, blowhard display of keyboard calisthenics.

Ozawa's concept of Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony was equally devoid of exaggerations and melodrama. He served notice that it would be so with an unusually speedy tempo for the first movement, and comparative speeds thereafter.

It had much in common with the "specialty of the house," Tchaikovsky Fourth, which the late Serge Koussevitzky conducted many times at Tanglewood.

Ozawa kept the "fate motif" in a unifying role. If anything, he downgraded (or avoided) Tchaikovsky's wholesale exploitation of despair.

The orchestra did its part superbly.

TELEGRAM (M)
WORCESTER, MASS.
AUG 20 1973

PROGRAMS

Saturday Night

Arthur Fiedler, conductor
Symphony in E minor, Opus 95, "New World" — Dvorak
Piano Concerto No. 2 in C minor, Opus 18 — Rachmaninoff

Earl Wild, pianist
Prelude to "Die Meistersigner" — Wagner

Sunday Afternoon

Seiji Ozawa, conductor
Symphonic Variations for Piano and Orchestra — Franck

Andre Watts, pianist
"Totentanz" for Piano and Orchestra — Liszt

Andre Watts, pianist
Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Opus 36 — Tchaikovsky

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169

AUG 20 1973

Laredos Make Beautiful Music in a Lovely Setting

By RICHARD VINCENT
Music Critic

One of the oldest chamber and recital series in the East, South Mountain in Pittsfield, presented its second concert of the season Saturday afternoon, when Ruth and Jaime Laredo, piano and violin, were presented.

Right on the go let it be stated that it was a fine concert, tenderly and lovingly played by this famous husband and wife combination.

OF COURSE the physical beauty of the site is always a very real and positive factor in these concerts, perched as it is on the slopes of South Mountain, surrounded by tall whispering forests, the trees nodding and bending in a natural benificience. There is harmony inside the tall wooded chapel-like hall also, particularly on this day.

The program included works by Stravinsky, Mozart, Ravel and Greig and with the exception of the latter sonata, which to me is a clumsy even awkward piece, the works chosen were all marked by particular musical attributes, grace, a high degree of creativity, melodic beauty and (in the Ravel) originality.

Stravinsky's neo-classic work "Suite Italienne" was composed partly in answer to those critics, who, before they were sent floundering in dissarray, held that Stravinsky wrote dissonant and fragmented music because he didn't know how to write traditionally. Nonsense, of course.

MOZART'S variation of the old French tune, "Helas, j'ai perdu mon amant" was, slight as it may have been, delightful and graceful and, in fact, a welcome change to ears that are getting leaden with the thunders and lightnings of the great orchestras who are going full bore at the moment. It was much akin to a touch of light and delicate cheese and fruit following the heavier batteries of the entree and the rich sauces.

The Ravel sonta, particularly the second movement marked "blues," was musically intriguing because of its debt to the old black rag time and stride pianists whose flavor Ravel tried to capture. He did capture it to a degree, it was recognizable as blues in flavor, but, as always when written on the page, something is lost, that mysterious but real freedom and emotion that characterizes the idiom. Ruth Laredo couldn't have played it any better in technical terms, but one wonders if she might not change her musical concepts of this movement if she had heard at any length such players as Jody Bolden (Booby Henderson) or Willy "The Lion" Smith.

This is in no way intended to denigrate the players, they were right on the written mark, and the first and last movements were splendidly played.

MS. LAREDO is an alumnus of Indian Hill in Stockbridge where Albany League of Arts scholarship winner, violinist Michael Emery is at present in residence, and I am happy to report that he is reputed to be the best violinist among the students there.

Tanglewood Saturday evening presented another old lion, Arthur Fiedler, still functional at 78 years of age, and still drawing the faithful to all his concerts.

The program in the Shed featured Earl Wild as soloist in the Rachmaninoff Concerto for Piano and Orchestra No. 2, replete with all of Freddy Martin's old tunes, and the audience loved it and indeed why not.

IT WAS NOT however a particularly memorable reading of this familiar work, it was done competently of course, but lacked that central core of any great performance, a unified and mutually dynamic understanding of what they are about between conductor and soloist. For a big, bravura, romantic work such as this, to make it really go, someone must build a fire somewhere and keep it glowing throughout. This was not the case here. The words that come to mind are of those damning with faint praise variety, competent, workmanlike, proper, and ultimately unexciting.

GREENVILLE, N. Y.
LOCAL (ALBANY MARKET AREA)
W. 1,000

AUG 15 1973

Tanglewood's Week To Open With Pianist

The seventh weekend at Tanglewood begins on Friday, August 17 at 7:00 p. m. with pianist Earl Wild performing Schumann's Etudes symphoniques and Liszt's Mephisto polka and waltz.

At 9:00 p. m., Lawrence Foster, Music Director of the Houston Symphony and Chief Guest Conductor of the Royal Philharmonic makes his debut with the Boston Symphony. Mr. Foster opens the program with Berlioz' Overture 'Le Corsaire' and follows it with Bruch's Scottish fantasy for violin and orchestra with Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as soloist. Mr. Foster closes the concert with Prokofiev's Symphony no. 5.

On Saturday, August 18 at 10:30 a. m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed Sunday.

On Saturday evening at 8:30 p. m. Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Dvorak's Symphony no. 9 in E minor, the 'New World'; Rachmaninov's Piano concerto no. 2 in C minor with Earl Wild as soloist, and Wagner's Prelude to 'Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg'.

On Sunday, August 19 at 2:30 p. m. Seiji Ozawa, Music Director of the Boston Symphony, conducts the Orchestra in Franck's Symphonic variations for piano and orchestra followed by Liszt's Totentanz for piano and orchestra, both featuring Granrud Artist-in-Residence Andre Watts as soloist. Mr. Ozawa closes the concert with Tchaikovsky's Symphony no. 4 in F minor.

NEWS (D)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

AUG 26 1973

New England Newschip

Earl Wild and Silverstein Lift Up an Ordinary Night

By RICHARD CONWAY

The dashing pianistic style of Earl Wild and the always remarkable lyricism of violinist Joseph Silverstein highlighted a rather ordinary evening at Tanglewood. Friday night was a far cry from the excellence that has characterized much of this year's Berkshire Festival.

Wild, who was the guest artist for the Weekend Prelude, offered a small crowd two works containing the kind of bravura passages that he plays so excitingly, if not always with the greatest clarity. It is this tendency toward a certain carelessness that disturbs me about Wild's playing.

Extremely Popular

But he is extremely popular with Tanglewood audiences, and his playing of the Schumann "Etudes symphoniques en forme de variations, op. 13" and the Liszt "Mephisto polka and waltz" drew prolonged applause from the enthusiastic crowd.

Silverstein, who is concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has done a good deal of solo work this summer. Friday night was not the best we have heard him play, but even so, the man's impeccable musicianship is always rewarding.

Under the baton of guest conductor Lawrence Foster, Silverstein played Max Bruch's "Scottish fantasy for violin and orchestra, op. 46." This 19th century work is based on four, Scottish, folk-songs, and while much of the music is very obvious, it is highly pleasing and eminently tuneful. (Many people were wandering around the Tanglewood grounds at intermission humming or whistling the easily remembered melodies.)

At His Best

Silverstein was at his best in the slower movements where the singing tone that he draws from his instrument could be given beautiful expression.

Guest conductor Foster, though, failed to make much of an impression. He got little out of the ordinary out of the orchestra. Certainly the accompaniment to the Bruch violin piece was characterized by a general lack of precision, rather indifferent playing, especially on the part of the woodwinds, and a general lack of attention to detail. The playing of the last movement gave one the impression that it was being sight-read.

Nor did conductor Foster bring any particular inspiration to the performance of the Berlioz "Overture 'Le Corsaire,' op. 21" or the Prokofiev "Symphony no. 5, op. 100."

There were, to be sure, colorful moments in the Berlioz, particularly in the final measures. And something of the prevailing tragic sense that underlies Prokofiev's wartime (1944) work haunts the listener. But these things are inherent in the music. Foster failed to probe much below the surface.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
W. 4,465

AUG 23 1973

New England Newschip

Tanglewood

Friday, Aug. 17

Lawrence Foster, the music director of the Houston Symphony and the principal guest conductor of the Royal Philharmonic, made his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening. Traffic delays forced us to miss the Berlioz overture to "Corsair" which opened the program.

Joseph Silverstein, the artistic coordinator and concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, was the soloist in the Max Bruch Scottish Fantasy for violin and orchestra. We had been suffering from overexposure in respect to this piece. Mr. Silverstein's sensitive, lyrical playing forced us, however, to re-examine the work in a new light, and to come away with more positive feelings about its place in the virtuoso violin literature.

His performance was truly exciting; unfortunately, the same could not be said for the orchestra, which played as badly as we can ever remember having heard it play. Poor attacks, pitch and balance problems were everywhere evident. The work seemed under-rehearsed.

The Prokofiev Symphony no. 5 was the final work on the program, and the orchestra's playing seemed not to have improved much from that of the Bruch by the end of the first movement. Suddenly in the second movement, everything jelled — the orchestra seemed to understand Mr. Foster's approach to this whimsical scherzo and things became truly exciting thereafter.

The third movement was a study in controlled tension, and the fourth movement came to a hair-raising climax. The audience seemed to sense the electrical change and stayed to applaud Mr. Foster and the orchestra again and again instead of running off for the parking lot as is usually the case.

Mr. Foster showed that he can do exceptional things and we hope to hear him with the Boston Symphony soon under more favorable circumstances.

Franklin Coleman

Arthur Fiedler

James de Priest

Lawrence Foster

Tanglewood conductors all. Mr. Fiedler will be on the podium Aug. 18 and 21, Mr. de Priest of Washington bows with the BSO Aug. 25, and Lawrence Foster from Houston makes his BSO debut Aug. 17.

Tanglewood Frommfest: musicians waiting for worthy music

By Louis Snyder

Lenox, Mass.

One of the most vivid reminders that all the notes haven't yet been set down is the Festival of Contemporary Music, cosponsored by the Fromm Music Foundation at Harvard and the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, where the Boston Symphony holds forth in the summer.

This is the 11th year of these festivals-within-a-festival, in which a smattering of today's seriously intended music has had a hearing. So far, the cumulative impact has been sufficient to warrant Tanglewood's being called "the contemporary music capital of the world" during its annual short but vociferous examination of new scores.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE
MONITOR (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 187,337

AUG 11 1973

New England
Newscip

Three premieres

This summer's FOCM began on Aug. 4 and ended Thursday night, presenting one concert of vocal and three of instrumental chamber music, and two evenings of music theater — the latter done by singers of the Music Theater Project, directed by Ian Strasfogel. The concerts were performed by Berkshire Music Center fellows, faculty, musicians-in-residence, etc. On the basis of one evening at a concert, and one at music theater, it seems too late to be alarmed, too early to be encouraged by the state of contemporary music as presented here.

Three out of five pieces done on Tuesday were first performances. One of them — Peter Lieberson's Concerto for Four Groups of Instruments — was a festival commission, and the "oldest" — Lester Trimble's "Panels I" — had been composed way back in 1970. Peter Farmer's Sonata for Five Brass Instruments (1971), the third premiere, was a reasonably brief introductory piece, which paid some attention to sonority, and at least made no pretensions in the coy direction of avant-garde trimmings, as did Lieberson's and Trimble's.

Leslie Bassett's "Time and Beyond," a setting for baritone of Emerson, Tagore, and Mark Van Doren texts, and Donald Martino's "Notturno," both composed this year, completed the program. In the former, whether as performed or as written, the words were overpowered by instrumental sound (cello, clarinet, piano). In the atmospheric "Notturno," some of its 19 "night moods" must still depend on the once way-out business of plucking piano strings, tapping a cello case, and knock-knocking the clarinet cylinder.

In similar deference to the avant-garde just passed, the Lieberson Concerto is a species of intricate interior design, and "Panels I" is a game of controlled improvisation that composers used to play, and apparently still do. Neither means much on first acquaintance, but might later on, if you like that kind of thing.

Musical facility

In this respect, contemporary music seems to have stood still. Not that these pieces aren't well made, whether one is willing or not to accept the embellishments which have come with the new music. It is a tribute to the high state of development of the young BMC players that none of these pieces fail because of inadequate performance or an inability to project the wishes of the composer.

One is constantly amazed at the facility with which many extraordinarily difficult demands are met. However, the public which sits before these contemporary experiments often confuses the content of the work with the expertise of the musicians. It couldn't be possible, they think, that these youngsters are better than the materials they have to work with. Truth to tell, in many cases, it is the musicians who are marking time for music really worthy of their capabilities.

Barn bill

It used to be that members of the younger generation, daring to be experimental and slightly naughty, would attempt to smoke corn silk behind the barn. Nowadays, instead, they present contemporary music theater inside it. Or at least this was the impression left by the Music Theater Project's double bill at its West Barn headquarters off-Tanglewood.

From Capt. James Cook's 1770 diary, and a Thomas Merton poem, composer Bo Lawergren has extracted a scenario, "Tryptych," involving the meeting of Christian and pagan in the South Pacific, for which he has provided the most negligible of scores. Bruno Maderna, the Italian composer-conductor, has gone back even further, to Petronius Arbiter, in fact, for a Cecil B. DeMille look at "Satyricon," during which the whole catalog of Roman excesses is accompanied by taped sound effects and supposedly appropriate musical references to Wagner, Sousa, Puccini, and others.

Since neither of these pieces contain enough to challenge their musical or histrionic abilities, the young singers and musicians involved could only do their best to invest this juvenile material with conviction. Too bad that the Music Theater, which has in past years done some truly experimental work with pieces by Maxwell Davies, Birtwistle, Selig, Ligeti, and Monteverdi, should have spent so much time and money on these two labored exercises.

by Anne Peters for The Day

Left to right, Frederic Hunter, Arthur Ballet, Yale Udoff, at Waterford

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 56,638

AUG 20 1973

Saratoga-Potsdam Chorus Stars in SPAC Concert

By EDWARD FRENCH

The star of Friday evening's concert at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center was the Saratoga-Potsdam Chorus.

Verdi's Four Sacred Pieces, not heard too frequently, were given a performance as close to perfection as is humanly possible. The quartet included an "Ave Maria" and "Laudi alla Vergine Maria" for chorus alone and the "Te Deum" and "Stabat Mater" with orchestra .

"Laudi alla Vergine Maria" is for women's voices and what a joy it was to hear the alto and mezzo-soprano parts in balance with the sopranos.

The young Italian conductor, Aldo Ceccato, with a background of considerable operatic experience, had just the right approach for Verdi. The gentle devotional character of the a cappella pieces was clearly indicated in his beautifully shaped readings.

In the larger scaled "Stabat Mater" and "Te Deum" chorus and orchestra were splendidly integrated, with the typical Verdi dramatic contrasts sharply drawn.

It was too bad that this outstanding choral performance was heard by one of the season's smaller audiences.

Bruckner's Symphony No. 3 in D. minor was the purely orchestral offering. It is a lengthy work with much repetition, loud climaxes and a far from cohesive formal structure. Ceccato's reading did little to hold it together. Whether it was because of a lack of rehearsal or poor communication between conductor and orchestra, the playing was not up to the usual Philadelphia standard.

At the Concert

SATURDAY AFTERNOON the South Mountain Association of Pittsfield presented Ruth and Jaime Laredo in a program of magnificently performed duos for piano and violin.

These young virtuosi have been a part of the famed Marlboro Festival for several seasons and are chamber music performers par excellence.

baroque dances, composed / In a program ranging from the classic variations of Mozart to the neo-baroque "Suite Italienne" of Stravinsky the Laredo duo displayed exceptional technical facility, perfectly attuned ensemble and superior musicianship. Their Mozart Variations were fluent, graceful and beautifully polished.

The Stravinsky version of baroque dances, composed before his "serial" period, had rhythmic and tonal charm.

Two sonatas, one a highly polished and sophisticated work by Ravel and the other the frankly romantic one by Grieg, were given performances that were stylistically perfect and technically dazzling.

The C minor Greig Sonata had a warmth and sweep that completely won the audience. This was one of the summer's outstanding concerts.

SUNDAY AFTERNOON at Tanglewood was essentially a bravura affair with Seiji Ozaw conducting and pianist Andre Watts making his third Berkshire Festival appearance of the season.

The program included two works for piano and orchestra, the Cesar Franck Symphonic Variations and Liszt's "Totentanz" (Dance of Death) and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 in F minor.

Andre Watts has been very successful with his all-Liszt recitals in past seasons and his recordings of Listz's piano music are very popular these days.

The totentanz is a work in which Liszt incorporated every conceivable pianistic device aimed at astounding an audience. Massive chords, interlocked octaves, glissandi and rolling arpeggios are all there. This was the fourth time we have heard Watts this season and his Totentanz was by far the most impressive exhibition of virtuoso pianism of the lot. He can and did play fast, loud, soft and accurately. He is completely at home in the intricacies of the Lisztian technique.

Ozawa and the San Francisco Symphony gave a London concert in May which won rave reviews for his command of the score. After hearing his reading of the same Tchaikovsky symphony Sunday it was easy to see why the English critics were so impressed.

From beginning to end it was an exhibition of virtuoso orchestral plang. Brasses, woodwinds and strings all were in top form tonally and technically, and what an overwhelming finale Ozawa built up. The kind of balance and rhythmic precision Ozawa got from the orchestra augurs well for the coming season when he takes over as musical director of the Boston Orchestra.

Union Mon. Aug. 20th

Silverstein Comes Across Beautifully

R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Joe Silverstein came up with another beautiful performance Friday night in the great shed at Tanglewood.

He is the concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the sound of his violin is inveriably sweet, flexible, agile and widely expressive.

Friday he was soloist for a performance of Bruch's "Scottish Fantasy" for violin and orchestra, opus 46, a 32-minute work which, in spite of its "free use of Scottish folk - melodies," begins as if it is a sad, near - eastern lullaby.

It has many moments of lyrical beauty as well as lively song - melodies and majestic sonority from the brass.

Lawrence Foster, 32, music director of the Houston Symphony Orchestra and 1966 winner of the Koussevitsky Conducting Prize at Tanglewood, was on the podium looking something like a nuclear physicist or classics professor.

His treatment of the music, however, was unburdened by excess or pedantry. He seemed to approach it with a businesslike seriousness, and it came across pleasingly.

The program opened with a lively and colorful performance of Berlioz' overture "Le Corsaire," opus 21.

At the 7 p.m. prelude concert Earl Wild, who is scheduled to play Rachmaninov's second piano concerto with the orchestra tonight, played a couple of the famous, grand old romantic pieces that used to wow the gentle ladies of the 19th Century.

They were Schumann's symphonic etudes, Opus 13, and Liszt's "Mephisto" polka and waltz, a total of 36 minutes of incredible pianism.

Wild's fingers are among the most agile in the business, and he is known for his understanding of the romantic Grand Manner.

These pieces are full of contrasts of moods. The feeling jumps suddenly from the lyric to the exclamatory, from beauty to pomposity, from simplicity to complexity, from rhapsody to percussion.

Consequently, they seem episodic to ears more accustomed to homogeneous works. But Wild understands them; he keeps their many moods clearly separate usually by expressing the essence of each without letting them dilute each other. At the same time he hooks them together, end to end, as if they belong together, a feat many pianists are unable to do smoothly.

It is always a pleasure to hear Wild play, even if the grandiose music he presents is somewhat out of fashion. But, on second thought, how else would we have a chance to hear it?

NEWS (E)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

AUG 17 1973

New England Newschp

Tanglewood Weekend Preludes Memorable Musical Moments

By RICHARD CONWAY

Perhaps the finest "bargain" in the musical world these days is the Two-for-One Friday night Tanglewood ticket. Friday nights, the concert-goer not only gets the regular program at 9 p.m., but by arriving at 7, he is entitled to also hear the chamber music Weekend Preludes. These are frequently among the most memorable musical moments of the Berkshire Festival

Yet, oddly enough, to my way of thinking, a surprising number of people fail to take advantage of the double concert. Perhaps it is the idea of chamber music that "scares" them off. But chamber music is an inclusive term covering a good deal more than just string quartets.

This season has already seen two brilliant piano recitals, one by Malcolm Frager and the other by Andre Watts; a most fascinating and unusual, if not completely successful program of Beethoven songs sung by basso Peter Lagger; a fine choral concert by the Tanglewood Festival Chorus; and an interesting and excellently performed recital of two contemporary song cycles sung by Phyllis Curtin.

Part of the reason that more people do not take advantage of the double programs could be the hour's wait between the end of the prelude and the starting time of the regular concert. Since the prelude recitals are not usually over 45 minutes in length, it doesn't seem unreasonable that the regular concert could be ready to start by 8:30, the Saturday night starting time. It doesn't take all that long to change the stage set-up.

Another thing is that there doesn't seem to be all that much publicity emphasis given to the preludes. They are, of course, mentioned in the advances, but inevitably the thrust of the release is given to the regular evening program and whatever guest conductor and - or soloist is appearing. That is only to be expected, I suppose, but it seems to me that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is missing a good bet in not giving more space to these excellent programs.

Another key to this point is that there are no program notes for these concerts included in the festival programs. Translations for the vocal works are handed out at the door, but no one thinks to include the same kind of information for these works as are put in for the music played at the regular concerts.

(Pianist Andre Watts took it upon himself to supply some informal ones from the stage the night he performed.)

Fortunately, more and more people do seem to be taking advantage of these Weekend Preludes, but anyone who has a Friday night ticket should certainly make the effort to get up there for these 7 p.m. programs.

Tonight's artist is pianist Earl Wild, not one of my personal favorites, but very popular with Tanglewood audiences.

Ozawa Makes Dusty Tchaikovsky Vibrate

Union Aug 7th

By R.C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Andre Watts wowed the throng at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon with an impressive combination of virtuosic keyboard work and beautiful music making ... but the day belonged to Seiji Ozawa, conductor.

Watts was cheered and he deserved it. He played the solo piano with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for two works that have their virtues, one is pretty and the other dramatic but do not have the encompassing substance of the symphony that followed intermission.

It was Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony, the one which has all that fiddle plucking during the third movement. It has become an old war horse laden with cliches precisely because of the wealth of its substance ... except for the fourth movement, perhaps, which reminds me of a marching brass band at full bore.

Anyway, Tchaikovsky's music at its best is full of magnificent melodies presented with sumptous tones, and the first two movements Sunday were exactly that plus electric excitement.

Ozawa often establishes an atmosphere of suspension, of bated - breath expectancy leading into a phrase, and he was doing it with great success Sunday. It took Tchaikovsky off the dusty shelf and made him vibrate.

But it didn't obscure the memory of Watts' grace under pressure before intermission.

He played Franck's "Symphonic Variations" with rhapsodic delicacy and precise coordination with the orchestra (rather in conflict, as the program notes say the piece can be played).

And he took the staccato percussiveness and spectacular fingerwork of the Liszt "Totantanz" at breakneck speed and high drama.

He made it sould like important music and the 11,331 listeners (most of them anyway) seemed entranced.

Saturday Night

The Saturday night concert was distinguished by at least three things: the style of the conductor, the size of the audience (13,000) and the sounds of the brass and strings.

Also there was Earl Wild, one of the more reliable practitioners of the romantic, 19th Century, grand manner with piano music. The fact that he plays flourishing music while appearing to be cool is to his credit and helps keep the music from becoming overblown.

He played Rachmaninof's second piano concerto with Arthur Fiedler on the podium and seemed intent on protecting, even enhancing, the flowing, flowering, dreaming moods rather than the jumping excitement occasionally available in the score.

Fiedler's style as a sturdy, no-nonsense, let's-keep-moving kind of conductor was appropriate to the program, which included Dvorak's "New World" symphony and Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

The prelude seems to exist for letting three rows of French horns, trumpets and trombones boom out with rafter-shaking resonance, and the Dvorak symphony would be half empty without these stalwart ranks of brasses.

Fiedler persuaded the orchestra to fill the music with muscular vitality and the string sections joined the brasses with tones that sometimes seemed almost palpable.

The music had such strength and security that I had to restrain myself from looking over my shoulder as I was leaving to see if it was still hanging up there.

Attendance: Friday, 4885; Saturday morning 4297; Saturday night, 13,017; Sunday afternoon, 11,331.

Total weekend attendance, 33,530.

Next weekend is the last of this year's festival. The program is an all Berlioz one with Ozawa Friday at 9; Byron Janis soloing with Rachmaninov's third piano concerto Saturday at 8.30 and Verdi's Manzoni Requiem with Ozawa Sunday at 2.30.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
AUG 20 1973
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood draws 33,530 over weekend

LENOX — Last weekend's Tanglewood crowd of 33,530 was the second largest of the season.

Attendance at the three concerts and one open rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was surpassed only by the weekend of July 20, the annual all-Beethoven weekend, which drew 42,604.

Police Chief Anthony Romeo whose Lenox police force helped direct cars to and from Tanglewood, would not comment on the weekend traffic.

Deputy reports

However, one deputy from the county sheriff's office who directed traffic to and from Saturday's Music Inn concert said cars going to Tanglewood's 8:30 p.m. concert were backed up on Hawthorne and West streets to the center of Lenox.

The deputy sheriff said there were no tie-ups in connection with the 6 p.m. concert at the Music Inn. David Rothstein, manager of the Music Inn, said 3,200 people came to hear folksingers Tom Rush and David Bromberg.

NEWS
WILLIAMSTOWN, MASS.
W. 1,350
AUG 16 1973
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood

By Arnold Perlstein

"The musicians were forced to stop for several minutes by the eruption of a violent thunderstorm." Woodstock? Watkin's Glen? Neither, but, improbably, the Tanglewood Music Festival Friday night, Aug. 11. In spite of the unseemly intervention by Dame Nature, guest conductor Colin Davis, the Boston Symphony orchestra, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, and soloists collaborated on an evening of Mozart's more congenial kind of heavenly music.

The Weekend Prelude got the concert off to a great start, as the gifted Met soprano Phyllis Curtin, accompanied by Ryan Edwards on piano and members of the symphony's chamber players, performed Shostakovitch's "Romances on words of Alexander Block" and Rorem's "Ariel for soprano, clarinet and piano". Ms Curtin's bravura reading-singing of the works, especially Rorem's scoring of the mordant and morbid verse of Sylvia Plath, jarred the crowd, awaiting Mozartean beauty, from its slumber. With her powerful voice, she paralled the grotesque imagery with effortless disjunct leaps and scales. The audience gave a number of ovations, and Berlioz' "Zaida" was the encore.

The main program began with Mr. Davis conducting Symphony #38 in D, K.504, "The Prague". The antecedent in the genre of the famous triumvirate composed 2 years later, the less renowned Prague is nonetheless one of Mozart's supreme efforts. He incorporated within its unusual three movement structure (slow introduction, no minuet) contrapuntal writing equal to the heralded polyphony of the Jupiter. It is dramatic in tone, as befits a work composed between "Figaro" and "Don Giovanni."

The first movement was barely a third over, when the storm began. At movement's end, the frustrated Mr. Davis waited patiently for 10 minutes, and then bravely commenced the slow movement. The juxtaposition of ponderous thunderclaps and Mozart was disquieting, but the musicians gave a rousing performance, and were roundly cheered.

The second piece, the Violin Concerto #3 in G, K.216, witnessed the regular Concertmaster, Joseph Silverstein, in the role of soloist. The work, youthful and brilliant, was well-suited to Mr. Silverstein, who played his own cadenzas. The part is not flashy, an early indication of the composer's unsurpassed skill in orchestra-virtuoso integration. Though his volume increases were not always successful, the Concertmaster produced a fine tone, and his interpretation was excellent.

The well-rounded program resumed after intermission with a spirited performance of the "Coronation" Mass in C, K.317. It is a deeply religious yet festive work, and particularly orchestral. Mr. Davis seemed more at home with a vocal work (he is Musical Director at the Royal Opera House), and the performance was a great success. All in all, a long, diverse, and thoroughly satisfying night of music.

Matched jewels: Andre Watts plays Franck and Liszt

At Tanglewood: Fiedler, Foster, Watts

By Louis Snyder

Lenox, Mass.

A Tanglewood weekend, which included one of veteran Arthur Fiedler's rare appearances as a non-Pops conductor of the Boston Symphony (it drew a crowd of 13,017), also reintroduced a younger American maestro to the Berkshire scene. And for pianist Andre Watts, it summed up a summer of close association with the Berkshire Festival.

Lawrence Foster, in 1966, was a conducting fellow at the Berkshire

Music

Music Center and that summer walked off with the prestigious Koussevitzky Conducting Prize. Since then he has continued a career that began on the West Coast, where he assisted Zubin Mehta at the Los Angeles Philharmonic and accompanied that orchestra on its 1967 world tour. Appearances in England with the Royal Philharmonic and the Halle Orchestra resulted in his being chosen for the post of Chief Guest Conductor of the former, and when the Royal was visiting the United States, Houston offered him the music directorship of its orchestra. With these two positions in hand, and a mounting list of guest engagements here and abroad, he came back for his BSO debut on Friday evening.

Although in his early 30's, Mr. Foster doesn't share the podium flamboyance which characterizes many of his up-and-coming contemporaries. While his conducting could hardly be called restrained, it is not given to gymnastics — emphatically business-like might well describe it. His beat is vigorous and forthright, leaving little room for confusion, and the results on this occasion, at least, were solid and winning.

No-nonsense approach

To begin with there was a rousing performance of the Overture, "Le Corsaire" of Berlioz, done with flourish and dispatch, a reassuring indication of the quality of music-making to come.

Then concertmaster Joseph Silverstein was soloist in the Max Bruch "Scottish Fantasy." This is, of course, a violinist's dream, with its fragrant bouquet of vaguely familiar airs which drip off the strings like honey. Anyone who might have been rather surprised by the choice of this mock-Mendelssohn effort for a place on a regular BSO program could be consoled by an almost flawless performance by Mr. Silverstein, handsomely contained by Mr. Foster in its complementary Bruchian orchestral frame.

Prokofiev's Symphony No. 5, which the BSO had introduced to America in 1945, occupied the second half of the evening. Here Mr. Foster demonstrated again what had become apparent previously — a no-nonsense approach to the music, based on intelligently conceived values and happily undistorted by experiments in interpretation. While none of the works played could be called a definitive test of Mr. Foster's ultimate range, there was no mistaking his substantial down-to-earth approach, which some of the younger generation take much longer to acquire, and some of their elders have long since lost sight of. Now let us see what else he can do.

Watts in residence

This summer, pianist Andre Watts has spent eight weeks at Tanglewood as performer, teacher, and consultant for young conductors and chamber-music players — a welcome new approach for a 27-year-old star whose 10-year-old career hitherto has been almost frenetic in its global activity.

On Sunday afternoon, Mr. Watts wound up his residency with a brace of dazzling performances with the BSO under Seiji Ozawa that confirmed his position at the top of the list of young American virtuoso pianists. His choice was a disparate pair of piano variations with orchestra — Cesar Franck's "Symphonic Variations," and Liszt's "Totentanz" — and he polished them off in a way to add two glowing ornaments to an already shining afternoon.

In themselves, the Franck "Variations" can supply enough brilliance and sparkle for any orchestral soloist, but for Mr. Watts and Mr. Ozawa this was only the beginning. It was conceived almost along chamber music lines — with a kind of filigreed delicacy that sent the sound shimmering out across Tanglewood's green lawns, and kept down the fortissimos until an impressive, but certainly not overstated finale.

The Liszt "Totentanz" followed it immediately, and here not only the crashing drama of the "Dies Irae" theme, which forms the basis for the four variations, but the terrific demands on the solo pianist became startlingly evident. Percussive power, celestial soft passages, and lightning flights of fingers across the keyboard provided 11,000-plus listeners and watchers with the kind of breath-taking astonishment that Liszt himself must have induced from his own awed public.

Conductor Lawrence Foster
. . . makes a triumphant return to Tanglewood

What made the occasion even more satisfying was a maturity and containment in these electric exhibitions that went far beyond bravura technique. This was the coming of age of a master pianist.

The program concluded with a strongly structured reading of Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony (F minor) by Mr. Ozawa. It was full of nuances and floating sound, and the crowd took it to its heart, but somehow one had the feeling that Mr. Watts had already put the afternoon in his pocket before the intermission.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
AUG 21 1973
New England Newsclip

PASTE OVER

Gossip on

RIALTO

By Fred H. Russell

POST
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
S. 87,381

AUG 26 1973

New England Newsclip

music star, opens a week's usical Theater in Walling-been making records and the past 20 odd years.
e son of a sharecropper,
the blues
ea. Hav-
t in the Eddy be-

Eddy Arnold

gan his steady progression at local concerts and radio shows, and was eventually rewarded with an RCA contract which served as a vehicle for his skyrocketing career. His music, like the man, is a rare synthesis of the rural and the urban, the folksy and the sophisticated. Whatever the mixture, Eddy's songs have his warm and mellow voice as a permanent ingredient. Included in Arnold's wide assortment of monster hits are "Anytime," "Make the Work Go Away," "Lonely Again" and "You Don't Know Me." There will be performances of "The Eddy Arnold Show" at 8:30 o'clock Monday through Friday nights. Curtain time on Saturday night is scheduled for 9:30 o'clock.

Manager Henry Cohan is getting ready for a busy fall season at his Beverly theater. And, as usual, a "Pencil Box" back-to-school matinee is included in his plans. In fact, this children's event is scheduled for next Tuesday afternoon at 1:30 o'clock. The feature film will be "Isle of the Dolphins" and each child attending will receive a pencil box well stocked for school use. Sponsoring this special show are the State National Bank at Fairfield avenue and Brewster street and Howard Johnson's on the Post road in Fairfield. Manager Cohan says "I can't play all the movies made in Hollywood, but intend to screen the best of them." At the present time he is showing "Sound of Music" with Julie Andrews and Christopher Plummer. Also scheduled soon is "Romeo and Juliet" . . . Taking in shows last week at the American Shakespeare Theater in Stratford were comedian Milton Berle, playwright Arthur Miller of Roxbury, Kennedy Center producer Roger L. Stevens, actress Barbara Britten, director Michael Nichols, actor Paul Hecht and Madge, the Manicurist, Jan Miner of Bethel . . . The marital comedy, "The Marriage-Go-Round," opens Tuesday night at the Candlewood theater in New Fairfield. Dana Andrews and Mary Todd are co-starred and the show will run through Sunday night . . . Actress Bette Davis is switching residences in Westport . . . The Polka Dot Players will conduct tryouts tonight for members seeking roles in "The Last of the Red Hot Lovers," the group's final production of the season. They will be held at the Joe Vilane Dance Studio, 222 Charles street. Auditions for non-members will take place at the same place and time on Tuesday night. Backstage help is also needed. Val Chevron will direct . . . The Who's rock Opera "Tommy," scheduled to play the Oakdale Musical Theater in Wallingford Sept. 10 through 15, has been cancelled . . . Fredric March, the stage and screen star who makes his home in New Milford, will celebrate a birth anniversary on Friday . . . The Berkshire Quartet winds up its 44th season with an all-Beethoven concert on next Saturday afternoon at 3 o'clock atop Music Mountain in Falls Village. To give Saturday's music lovers a sampling of the great composer's rich treasury of chamber music the Quartet will play one work from each of his three periods.

Henry Cohan

Mariette Hartley, the actress who grew up in Westport, is joining the Bob Newhart television show in the fall. She will be seen as a resident of a neighboring apartment—a divorcee who is ready for anything . . . Milton Daly, Connecticut division manager for UA Theaters for the past 18 months, has been promoted to assistant general manager. He will be based in New York City. Prior to joining UA, Daly was with the then Stanley-Warner Theaters in Connecticut. Replacing him in Connecticut is Tony Reynaud, who was previously UA New York division manager...Reynaud will have his headquarters at the Playhouse in Darien . . . Lucille Lortel's White Barn theater in Westport will present "Three on Broadway" Sunday night, Sept. 2, at 8 o'clock. This anthology of the American musical theater stars Ronald Rogers and Jan McArt with Richard Otto. It is a scintillating revue of great songs from the Operetta era through Cohan, Kern, Gershwin, Porter, Berlin, Bernstein, Rodgers and Hammerstein, Lerner and Loewe to Broadway of today . . . Stamford's Joshua Logan and his wife, Nedda, are off for London where Josh will direct the musical version of "Bus Stop." Back in 1956 Logan directed the film version of the play with Marilyn Monroe starred . . . An evening of one act plays will bow Tuesday night at the Playhouse in Southbury . . . Alfred M. Pickus, who has owned and operated the Stratford theater since 1926, is the subject of a three-column story and photograph in the current issue of Boxoffice, the national motion picture trade magazine. The article was the result of Pickus recently being named "Man of the Year" by the Stratford Civitan Club. He is a former president of the Theater Owners of America . . . Sympathy to the family of Custer J. DelGrosso, 68, of Westport, who died last week. At one time he was a property man at the Long Island studios of Paramount Pictures . . . The Cinema theater in Greenwich has been purchased by the Westport-based Nutmeg Theater Circuit . . . "Summer and Smoke," with Eva Marie Saint, broke all existing box office records at the Westport Country Playhouse when it spent a week there recently . . . This afternoon at 2:30 o'clock the final concert of the 1973 Tanglewood season at Lenox, Mass., will take place with Seiji Ozawa conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Verdi's "Manzoni Requiem" with Lou Ann Wyckoff, soprano; Maureen Forrester, contralto; Giuseppe Giacomini, tenor; Stafford Dean, bass; the Tanglewood Choir and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conducting.

Mariette Hartley

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169

AUG 26 1973

2 SEIJIOZAWA CLOSES BSO TANGLEWOOD SEASON
Today at 2:30 p.m.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

AUG 25 1973

New England Newsclip

As I Hear It

Last Tanglewood in Lenox

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

THE TANGLEWOOD season's final weekend is dominated by two composers whose overlapping life-span bridged the past century. Berlioz, born in 1803, lived until 1869; Verdi, born in 1813, lived to 1901.

The 19th century will stand forever as a watershed in the history of progress, in music as well as in the main arteries of society. Two factors which completely altered the routine of our lives — transportation and communication — were put into service in that century and influenced every facet of our development.

* * * *

The Haydn and Mozart symphonies are still pure delights, but the Beethoven symphonies which started to be published in 1800 began to disclose an ingredient that had not been known before. His final symphony, the "Choral," came out in 1824, when Beethoven was 54. Six years later, 26-year-old Berlioz wrote his "Fantastic Symphony," which was not only a continuation in inspiration of Beethoven but really an autobiographical narration in music. He went on to write his great choral works, his "Requiem," "Romeo and Juliet," "Damnation of Faust" and "L'Enfance du Christ" up through the 1850s, just about when Verdi was to publish the operas "Rigoletto," "Il Trovatore," and "La Traviata," for which he is today so highly admired and respected. Berlioz's "Requiem," which will be played tomorrow afternoon, was written a century ago.

* * * *

What is it about Berlioz and Verdi that prompts program devisers to choose their works for the culminating weekend of a great summer festival? The question really answers itself. Works of art are not perishable. Grecian temples are not dependent on the popular favor of a moment or a generation. Shakespeare's plays, scarcely 400 years old, are not comparable chronologically, and Beethoven's symphonies are only approaching their second centennial, but we apply the term classical to anything artistic which endures.

Classical music is considered by musicians to have been written in accordance with established principles and methods. Thus, Haydn and Mozart symphonies are classics, but the public sometimes applies the term "classic" to music which is sober and old, without regard for its construction. In that connotation such music is sometimes considered to be "serious." In that classification it is difficult to identify the contrary of such terms.

* * * *

Classic sometimes is understood to be long-lasting, and in that sense the Grecian temples, Shakespeare and Beethoven fit perfectly, but Berlioz's "Fantastic" bids fair to remain in favor for the foreseeable future even though it departs from the framework of Mozart and Beethoven by wide margins. The contrary of "serious" music is not "frivolous." There can be the implication, too, that classical is of lasting significance and the contrary kind (shall we call it popular?) is of passing sanction.

Music refuses to stay within definitions. Some folk tunes are as old and, hence as lasting, as any other artifacts, but no one calls them classics. Classic as applied to architecture has something of the same symmetrical significance when applied to music. Popular songs of the day are usually fads and are discarded as swiftly as some women's styles, which are all the rage one moment and then disappear spurlos versenkt.

* * * *

Music being written today, while it may be devoid of inspiration in some cases, yet responds to mathematical calibration so that it can be validated on structural grounds even if not on emotionally stimulated bases, and it thus becomes hollow sound. Richard Strauss's tone-poems will not fit in the rules of classics, but it would be foolhardy to wager a small coin that they will not endure.

Who wants to place a small bet on the future of Verdi's operas? A glance backward to the programs of past Tanglewood seasons discloses variety in content more often due to the inclinations of the reigning conductor than to any other influences. But it would be safe to bet that Berlioz's "Fantastic" and Verdi's "Requiem" will be back on the programs of the years ahead at Tanglewood as often as they have been in the past.

In years gone by the "Fantastic" has been played at Tanglewood by Carvalho, Munch (five times), Martinon and by Ozawa (three times, counting last night). The Verdi "Requiem" has been played by Leinsdorf twice. Tomorrow will be its first reading by Ozawa here.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE (E)
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
C. 15,699

AUG 31 1973

New England Newsclip

Pianist Peter Serkin

Final Tanglewood Weekend Coming

LENOX — The eighth and closing weekend at Tanglewood begins on Friday at 7 p.m. with pianist Peter Serkin and the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performing Brahms' Clarinet trio in A minor and Pavel's Pinao trio.

At 9 p.m., Music Director Seiji Ozawa conducts the Orchestra in an all-Berlioz program, beginning with the Symphonie fantastique and followed by Lelio with Mallory Walker tenor, Victor Braun baritone, Michael Wager narrator and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus John Oliver conductor.

On Saturday, at 10:30 a.m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an open rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday.

On Saturday at 8:30 p.m. James de Preist, associate conductor of the Washington National Symphony, conducts the orchestra in Mussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovanshchina," Rachmaninov's Piano concerto no. 3 in D minor with Byron Janis as soloist, and Shostakovich's Symphony no. 5.

On Sunday at 2:30 p.m., the final concert of the 1973 Tanglewood season, Seiji Ozawa conducts the Orchestra in Verdi's Manzoni Requiem with Lou Ann Wyckoff soprano, Maureen Forrester contralto, Giuseppe Giacomini tenor, Stafford Dean bass, the Tanglewood Choir and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor.

BYRON JANIS

JAMES De. PREIST

PROGRAM

Friday, August 24, 1973
7 p.m., Weekend Prelude
Shed
PETER SERKIN piano
BOSTON SYMPHONY CHAMBER PLAYERS
Brahms' Clarinet trio in A minor
Ravel: Piano trio
9 p.m.
Shed
SEIJI OZAWA conductor
Berlioz: Symphonie fantastique
Lelio
MALLORY WALKER tenor
VICTOR BRAUN baritone
MICHAEL WAGER narrator
TANGLEWOOD FESTIVAL CHORUS John Oliver conductor
Saturday, August 18
10:30 a.m.
Shed
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA OPEN REHEARSAL
8:30 p.m.
SHED
JAMES DE PREIST conductor
Mussorgsky: Prelude to "Khovanshchina"
Rachmaninov: Piano concerto no. 3 in D minor
BYRON JANIS piano
Shostakovich: Symphony no. 5
Sunday, August 26
2:30 p.m.
Shed
SEIJI OZAWA conductor
Verdi: Manzoni Requiem
LOU ANN WYCKOFF soprano
MAUREEN FORRESTER contralto
GIUSEPPE GIACOMINI tenor
STAFFORD DEAN bass
TANGLEWOOD CHOIR
TANGLEWOOD FESTIVAL CHORUS John Oliver, conductor

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
S. 135,001

AUG 22 1973

New England Newsclip

HARTFORD CITY PARKS: Hartford — Volunteer Concerts: Goodwin Park, Misty Mourning, Aug. 20; 6:15-7:45 p.m. Bushnell Park, Seaweed. Aug. 22; 12-1:30 p.m. Pope Park South, Irma, Carolyn Reed. Aug. 23; 6:15-7:45 p.m. Elizabeth Park West, Rock & Jazz Festival. Aug. 25; 2-5 p.m. Free.

TANGLEWOOD — Lenox, Mass. Boston Symphony Orchestra in residence with guest artists. Today—Seiji Ozawa, Franck: Symphonic Variations, Liszt: Totentanz, Andre Watts, 2:30 p.m. Aug. 24—Weekend Prelude, Boston Symphony Chamber Players, 7 p.m. Seiji Ozawa, Berlioz Program, Symphonie fantastique, "Lelio", Mallory Walker, Victor Braun, Colin Fox, Tanglewood Festival Chorus. Aug. 25—Open Rehearsal, 10:30 a.m. James DePreist, Rachmaninoff: Piano Concerto No. 3, Byron Janis, Shostakovitch: Symphony No. 5. 8:30 p.m.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 24,500

AUG 23 1973

New England Newsclip

Final Tanglewood Weekend To Feature Conductor Ozawa

The eighth and closing weekend at Tanglewood begins on Friday, ~~Aug. 24 at 7~~ p.m., with pianist Peter Serkin and the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performing Brahms' Clarinet trio in A minor and Pavel's Piano trio.

At 9 p.m. Music Director Seiji Ozawa conducts the orchestra in an all-Belioz program, beginning with the Symphonie fantastique and followed by Lelio with Mallory Walker, tenor, Victor Braun baritone, Michael Wager, narrator and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, conductor.

On Saturday, Aug. 25 at 10:30 a.m. there will be an open rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday.

On Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m. James de Preist, associate conductor of the Washington National Symphony, conducts the orchestra in Mussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovanshchina," Rachmaninov's Piano concerto no. 3 in D minor with Byron Janis as soloist and Shostakovich's Symphony no. 5.

On Sunday, Aug. 26, at 2:30 p.m., the final concert of this Tanglewood season, Seiji Ozawa conducts the orchestra in Verdi's Manzoni Requiem with Lou Ann Wyckoff, soprano, Maureen Forrester, contralto, Giuseppe Giacomini, tenor, Staf-

Berkshire Music Festival Closes Curtain on 36th Season

Special to The Press

LENOX, Mass. — The music ends at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood this afternoon with a performance of Verdi's "Requiem" so perhaps this is an appropriate time to offer an appreciation of this 36-year-old summer music happening.

Tanglewood, which is in westernmost Massachusetts, about 40 miles southeast from Albany, N.Y., is the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The centerpiece of the eight-week festival are 24-weekend concerts by the orchestra.

But music happens every summer's day on Tanglewood's 210 acres of lawns and meadows. In addition to the weekend concerts (Friday and Saturday nights and Sunday afternoon), the orchestra holds open rehearsals Saturday mornings, there are Boston Pops concerts, a festival of contemporary music, a series of concerts by folk artists, chamber music recitals and concerts by students of the Berkshire Music Center, who come from around the world to study at Tanglewood.

Tanglewood was once the estate of a Boston banker and merchant named William Aspinall Tappan. In 1936, his descendents offered it as a gift to the Boston Symphony and the next summer the first concert was given on the grounds.

The estate [illegible] minutes from this Berkshire town which has been well known as a resort for over 100 years. In winter this is a major ski area and it was in the Berkshires that Melville wrote "Moby Dick" and Hawthorne completed "The House of Seven Gables."

In fact, Hawthorne took up residence in 1848 in a small cottage which stood on the borders of Tanglewood. Today, a replica of the cottage stands on the spot.

Most of the major musical events take place in the Music Shed, a 6,000 seat pie-shaped wedge open to the air on all sides except the stage end. Plans for the shed were drawn by architect Eliel Saarinen and modified by Josef Franz of nearby Stockbridge, who directed the construction. The building was completed in 1938. By 1941 the Theare-Concert Hall, the Chamber Music Hall and several small studios had been built and the Berkshire Music Center established. Tanglewood today has an annual attendance of a quarter of a million for the eight-week season.

Seats in the Shed range from $4.00 to $9.00, one of the real charms of a visit to Tanglewood is spreading a picnic blanket on the vast lawn and listening to a concert from there. Lawn tickets are available before each concert for $3.00. If you fail to pack your own, sandwiches are available. On a recent trip some visitors sampled Tanglewood lox and bagels along with Haydn and Brahms. Haydn and Brahms soared. They found the bagels rather heavy and doughy and more earth bound.

Rain, of course, is a particular hazard if you're on the lawn. If you can spend more than one day and want to guarantee that your music will not be rained out (the concerts are never rained out; lawn sitters may be), it might be wise to purchase seats for the Saturday night concert for example, and plan to sit on the lawn Sunday afternoon.

If it rains Sunday and the Shed is sold out, you can always visit nearby Stockbridge (home of Alice's Restaurant and the only permanent, public display of Norman Rockwell's paintings at the "The Old Corner House"), or Kinderhook, N.Y., birth and burial place of President Martin Van Buren, or even Albany for a wide-eyed look at the new state mall and office complex.

The Boston Symphony is one of the world's foremost orchestras and each summer it's led by a host of conductors. This season Eugene Ormandy, William Steinberg, Colin Davis, Michael Tilson Thomas, Rafael Fruhbeck De Burgos and Seiji Ozawa, who this fall will take over as permanent music director of the orchestra were among those who shared th podium. Incidentally, Mr. Ozawa once came here as a conducting student.

The eight-week program is wide and varied. Mr. Ormandy conducted two all Beethoven programs, Mr. Thomas an all Stravinsky program and the next day Mozart, Brahms, Strauss and Cage.

Acoustics in the Shed are fine and the sound on the lawn more than adequate.

Tanglewood is about 240 miles from the New Jersey shore area. The quickest way to ge there is via the New York Thurway to the Berkshire Section interchange, just south of Albany. Somewhat more scenic, it slower, is the Taconic Parkway north, which parallels the thruway on the east side of the Hudson River. Take the parkway also to the Berkshire Section of the thruway and from there it is inly a short drive to Tanglewood.

By the way, this is a popular, year-round resort, so whenever you go it would be wise to arrange for accommodations well in advance.

NEWBURGH, N. Y.
NEWS
D. 32,000

AUG 18 1973

Tanglewood In Finale

LENOX, Mass. — The eighth and closing weekend at Tanglewood here begins Aug. 24 at 7 p.m. with pianist Peter Serkin and the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performing Brahms' "Clarinet Trio in A Minor" and Pavel's "Piano Trio."

At 9 p.m., Music Director Seiji Ozawa conducts the orchestra in an all-Berloiz program, beginning with the "Symphonie Fantastique" and followed by Lelio with Mallory Walker tenor, Victor Braun baritone, Michael Wager as narrator and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus — John Oliver conducting.

On Aug. 25 at 10:30 a.m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an open rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday

On Saturday at 8:30 p.m James de Preist, associate conductor of the Washington National Symphony, conducts the orchestra in Mussorgskv's Prelude to "Khovanshchina," Rachmaninov's "Piano Concerto no. 3 in D Minor," with Byron Janis as soloist, and Shoktakovich's "Symphony No. 5."

MILLERTON, N. Y.
NEWS
W. 1,500

AUG 23 1973

Tanglewood finale will feature Berlioz program

The eighth and closing weekend at Tanglewood begins tonight at 7 with pianist Peter Serkin and the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performing Brahms' Clarinet trio in A minor and Pavel's Piano trio.

At 9 pm, Music Director Seiji Ozawa conducts the Orchestra in an all-Berlioz program beginning with the Symphonie fantastique and followed by Lelio with Mallory Walker tenor, Victor Braun baritone, Michael Wager narrator and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus John Oliver conductor.

As on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal tomorrow at 10:30 a.m. of works to be performed on Sunday.

At 8:30 pm tomorrow James de Preist, associate conductor of the Washington National Symphony, Conducts the Orchestra in Mussorgky's Prelude to "Khovanshchina", Rachmaninov's Piano concerto no. 3 in D minor with Byron Janis as soloist, and Shostakovich's Symphony no. 5.

On Sunday, at 2:30 p.m., the final concert of the 1973 Tanglewood season, Seiji Ozawa conducts the Orchestra in eVrdi's Manzoni Requiem with Lou Ann Wyckoff soprano, Maureen Forrester contralto, Giuseppe Giacomini tenor, Stafford Dean bass, the Tanglewood Choir and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor.

PRESS (E)
BRISTOL, CONN.
D. 18,000

AUG 23 1973

New England Newsclip

POUGHKEEPSIE, N.Y.
STAR
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
D. 13,000

AUG 25 1973

Tanglewood

Verdi's Requiem Set For Final Concert

The eighth and closing weekend at Tanglewood begins on Friday, August 24 at 7 p.m. with pianist Peter Serkin and the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performing Brahms' Clarinet trio in A minor and Pavel's Piano trio.

At 9 p.m., Music Director Seiji Ozawa conducts the orchestra in an all-Berlioz program, beginning with the Symphonie fantastique and followed by Lelio, with Mallory Walker, tenor, Victor Braun, baritone, Michael Wager, narrator, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus with John Oliver as conductor.

On Saturday, Aug. 25 at 10:30 a.m., there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday.

On Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m. James de Preist, associate conductor of the Washington National Symphony, conducts the orchestra in Mussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovanshchina," Rachmaninov's Piano concerto no. 3 in D minor with Byron Janis as soloist, and Shostakovich's Symphony no. 5.

On Sunday, Aug. 26 at 2:30 p.m., the final concert of the 1973 Tanglewood season, Seiji Ozawa conducts the orchestra in Verdi's Manzoni Requiem with Lou Ann Wyckoff, soprano, Maureen Forrester, contralto, Giuseppe Giacomini, tenor, Stafford Dean, bass, the Tanglewood Choir and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, conductor.

James De Priest, associate conductor of the Washington National Symphony, makes his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood on Saturday evening, Aug. 25. He has conducted many of the world's major orchestras [illegible] country and in Europe. — Photo contributed

The City Center Acting Company finishes up its second season at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center with a visually stunning production of John Gay's "The Beggar's Opera" through Saturday in the Spa Summer Theater. Although we sadly bid the company goodbye, the farewell is only temporary, since the whole troupe will return from Sept. 20 through 22 to present "The Beggar's Opera," "The Three Sisters" and "Measure for Measure" at Albany State University.

What's that about inflation? Ray Rizzo, who runs the film festival at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center, informs us tickets to the festival cost $1.50 during the week and $2 on weekends — the same price he's been charging the past seven years! And Ray isn't reluctant to admit he's still making a good profit. The festival will show "Slaughterhouse Five," the film adaptation of Kurt Vonnegut's novel, on Monday and Tuesday in the Regent Street Theater. The film stars Michael Sacks of Albany.

Local theater groups have begun to announce their new seasons, and playwright Paul Zindel ("Miss Reardon Drinks A Little," "The Effects of Gamma Rays on Man-in-the-Moon Marigolds") seems to be a popular choice. The Albany and Schenectady Civic Theaters will both do Zindel plays, and we're particularly looking forward to the Slingerlands Community Players production of Shakespeare's "The Tempest." Shakespeare is rarely undertaken by local companies, and "The Tempest" is, in our opinion, Shakespeare's best.

This weekend ,the Philadelphia Orchestra and the Boston Symphony take their leave from, respectively, the Saratoga Performing Arts Center and Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass. Maestro Eugene Ormandy will conduct the orchestra Saturday in the traditional "Fabulous Philadelphians" concert, while over at Tanglewood, the season ends Sunday with the inimitible Seiji Ozawa conducting the Boston Symphony in the Verdi Requiem. Ozawa made society page news last week by turning up late for Mrs. Neville Berry's dinner, at which he was guest of honor, in Cap D'Ail, France. (Neville Berry, in case you didn't know, is a son of the late Viscount Kemsley, who owned the London Times.)

Best new[illegible] cerned, is th[illegible] and Robert S[illegible] Coward's "Pr[illegible] same produc[illegible] forming in L[illegible] for "The Pri[illegible] the best stag[illegible] re con- Smith in Noel s is the is per- winner well be

HERALD (E)
MANCHESTER, CONN.
D. 15,000

AUG 24 1973

New England Newsclip

Music

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass.

FRI., AUG. 24

7 p.m. Weekend prelude with Peter Serkin, pianist and Boston Symphony Chamber players. Brahms Clarinet trio in A minor and Ravel's Piano trio.

9 p.m. Seiji Ozawa conducts. Berlioz Symphonie fantastique. Featuring Mallory Walker, tenor; Victor Braun, baritone; Michael Wagner, narrator and Tanglewood Festival Chorus with John Oliver, conductor.

SAT., AUG. 25

10.30 a.m. Open Rehearsal of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

8.30 p.m. James De Priest conducts. Mussorgsky's "Prelude to Khovanshchina"; Rachmaninov's Piano Concerto No. 3 in D minor, featuring Byron Janis) Shostakovich's Symphony No. 5.

SUN., AUG. 26

2.30 p.m. Seiji Ozawa conducts Verdi's Manzoni Requiem. Guest soloists: Lou Ann Wyckoff, Maureen Forrester, Giuseppe Giacomini, Stafford Dean, Tanglewood Choir and Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

ASBURY PARK EVENING PRESS
ASBURY PARK, N. J.
D. 57,614 SUN. 63,640

AUG 26 1973

RECORD
AMHERST, MASS.
W. 4,559

AUG 22 1973

New England Newsclip

BYRON JANIS appears with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday evening as a soloist in Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 2 at Tanglewood. See Summer Week for details.

THE TIMES RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 42,181

AUG 22 1973

Seiji Ozawa Highlights Tanglewood Finale

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, Mass. — The eighth and closing weekend at Tanglewood begins on Friday, at 7 p.m. with pianist Peter Serkin and the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performing Brahms' Clarinet trio in A minor and Pavel's Piano trio.

At 9 p.m. Music Director Seiji Ozawa condusts the Orchestra in an all-Berlioz program, beginning with the Symphonie fantastique and followed by Lelio with Mallory Walker tenor, Victor Braun baritone, Michael Wager narrator and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus John Olivar conductor.

On Saturday, at 10:30 a.m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday.

On Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m. James de Preist, Associate Conductor of the Washington National Symphony, conducts the Orchestra in Mussorgskv's Prelude to "Khovanshchina", Rachmaninov's Piano concerto no. 3 in D minor with Byron Janis as soloist, and Shoktakovich's Symphony no. 5.

On Sunday, at 2:30 p.m. the final concert of the 1973 Tanglewood season, Seiji Ozawa conducts the Orchestra in Verdi's Manzoni Requiem with Lou Ann Wyckoff soprano, Maureen Forrester contralto, Giuseppe Giacomini tenor, Stafford Dean bass, the Tanglewood Choir and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor.

Tanglewood

The eighth and closing weekend at Tanglewood begins tonight at 7 with pianist Peter Serkin and the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performing Brahms' Clarinet Trio in A Minor and Pavel's Piano Trio.

At 9 tonight, Music Director Seiji Ozawa will conduct the orchestra in an all-Berlioz program, beginning with the Symphonie Fantastique and followed by Lelio with Mallory Walker, tenor; Victor Braun, baritone; Michael Wager, narrator; and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, conductor.

On Saturday at 10:30 a.m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an open rehearsal of the works to be performed on Sunday.

Saturday evening at 8:30, James de Priest, associate conductor of the Washington National Symphony, will conduct the orchestra in Mussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovanshchina," Rachmaninov's Piano Concerto No. 3 in D Minor with Byron Janis as soloist, and Shoktakovich's Symphony No. 5.

On Sunday at 2:30 p.m., the final concert of the 1973 Tanglewood season, Seiji Ozawa will conduct the orchestra in Vergi's Manzoni Requiem with Lou Ann Wyckoff, soprano; Maureen Forrester, contralto; Guiseppe Giacomini, tenor; Stafford Dean, bass; the Tanglewood Choir and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, conductor.

JAMES DE PREIST, associate conductor of the Washington National Symphony, makes his debut with the Boston Symphony Saturday evening at Tanglewood. Mr. De Preist has conducted many of the world's major orchestras, including the New York Philharmonic, the Philadelphia and Chicago Symphonies, and the Stockholm and Rotterdam Symphony Orchestras.

RECORD
AMHERST, MASS.
AUG 22 1973
New England Newsclip

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 56,638
AUG 24 1973

Tanglewood Plans Final Weekend

The eighth and closing weekend at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., begins at 7 p.m. today, with pianist Peter Serkin and the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performing Brahms' Clarinet trio in A minor and Pavel's Piano trio.

Music director— Seiji Ozawa will conduct the orchestra in an all-Berlioz program, beginning with the "symphonie Fantastique" and followed by Lelio, with Mallory Walker, tenor, Victor Braun, baritone, Michael Wager as narrator and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus with John Oliver as conductor.

At 10:30 a.m. Saturday, as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an open rehearsal of works to be performed Sunday.

James de Priest, associate conductor of the Washington National Symphony, will conduct the orchestra in Mussorgskv's Prelude to "Khovanshchina", Rachmaninov's Piano Concerto No. 3 in D minor, with Byron Janis as soloist, and Shoktakovich's Symphony No. 5 at 8:30 p.m. Saturday.

At 2:30 p.m., Sunday in the final concert of the 1973 Tanglewood season, Seiji Ozawa will conduct the orchestra in Verdi's "Manzoni Requiem" with Lou Ann Wyckoff, soprano, Maureen Forrester, contralto, Giuseppe Giacomini, tenor, Stafford Dean, bass, and the Tanglewood Choir and Festival Chorus with John Oliver as conductor.

JAMES DePRIEST
At Tanglewood

BEACON, N. Y.
NEWS
DAILY 32,000
AUG 18 1973

Tanglewood In Finale

LENOX, Mass. — The eighth and closing weekend at Tanglewood here begins Aug. 24 at 7 p.m. with pianist Peter Serkin and the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performing Brahms' "Clarinet Trio in A Minor" and Pavel's "Piano Trio."

At 9 p.m., Music Director Seiji Ozawa conducts the orchestra in an all-Berlioz program, beginning with the "Symphonie Fantastique" and followed by Lelio with Mallory Walker, tenor, Victor Braun, baritone, Michael Wager as narrator and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus — John Oliver conducting.

On Aug. 25 at 10:30 a.m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an open rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday.

On Saturday at 8:30 p.m. James de Preist, associate conductor of the Washington National Symphony, conducts the orchestra in Mussorgskv's Prelude to "Khovanshchina." Rachmaninov's "Piano Concerto no. 3 in D Minor," with Byron Janis as soloist, and Shoktakovich's "Symphony No. 5."

SUN (E)
HUDSON, MASS.
D. 3,050
AUG 18 1973
New England Newsclip

AUG 18 1973
New England Newsclip

"Choral Finale At Tanglewood

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Massachusetts — The eighth and closing weekend at Tanglewood begins Friday, Aug. 24 (7 p.m.) with pianist Peter Serkin and the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performing Brahms' Clarinet trio in A minor and Pavel's Piano trio.

At 9 p.m., music director Seiji Ozawa conducts the orchestra in an all-Berlioz program, beginning with the Symphonie Fantastitique followed by Leelio with Mallory Walker, tenor; Victor Braun, baritone; Michael Wager, narrator, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus (John Oliver, conductor).

On Saturday, Aug. 25 (10:30 a.m.) as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed on the following day.

On Saturday evening (8:30 p.m.) James de Preist, associate conductor of the Symphony, conducts the orchestra in Mussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovanshchina," Rachmaninov's Piano Concerto No. 3 in D minor with Byron Janis as soloist, and Shostakovich's Symphony No. 5.

On Sunday, Aug. 26 (2:30 p.m.), the final concert of the 1973 Tanglewood season, Seiji Ozawa conducts the orchestra in Verdi's Manozni Requiem with Lou Ann Wyckoff, soprano; Maureen Forrestet, contralto; Giusepe Giacomini, tenor; Stafford Dean, bass; the Tanglewood Choir and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

catch it if you can

BOSTON DRAMA SEASON

The Boston theater season will include some of the following offerings: Kay Ballard in "Molly," a musical based on Gertrude Berg's "The Goldbergs"; Tony Curtis in a new comedy, "Turtlenecks" by Bruce Jay Friedman and Jacques Levy; Carol Channing in "Lorelei," the new musical version based on "Gentlemen Prefer Blondes;" Arthur Kennedy and Eileen Heckart in a mystery thriller — "Veronica's Room" by Ira ("Rosemary's Baby") Levin; a new musical based on Lorraine Hansberry's "A Raisin in the Sun" titled "Raisin."

Also scheduled are road companies of the musical "Two Gentlemen of Verona;" the drama "That Championship Season;" the Jean Kerr comedy "Finishing Touches" starring Barbara Bel Geddes; and Neil Simon's "The Prisoner of Second Avenue."

IN CONCERT

Black Oak Arkansas, John Sebastian, the Electric Light Orchestra, Lee Michaels and the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band will be in concert on ABC's Wide World of Entertainment "In

MARK ALMOND

Mark Almond and Barnstrom featuring Joe Walsh will perform in concert at Suffolk Downs in East Boston on Saturday, Aug. 25 as part of the annual Sunset Series of music concerts.

JACKSON FIVE

Jackson Five will perform in concert at Suffolk Downs in East Boston on Tuesday, Aug. 28 at 7 p.m. The five brothers — Michael, Marlon, Jermaine, Toriano and Sigmund make up the group which has sold more than 25 million records. Appearing with the group will be the 11-man "Tower of Power," a soul group.

URIAH HEEP

Uriah Heep, Rory Gallagher and Z.Z. Top will perform in concert at Suffolk Downs in East Boston on Monday, Aug. 20 as part of the annual Sunset Series of music concerts. The Sunset Series operates under a special license from Mayor Kevin White's Office of Cultural Affairs and proceeds from the concerts go to the support of Summerthing.

TANGLEWOOD SATURDAY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will offer an open rehearsal at 10:30 a.m. to be followed that night at 8:30 with selections from Mussorgsky, Rachmaninoff and Shostakovitch, conducted by James De Priest on Saturday, Aug. 25, at the Berkshire Festival in Lenox, Mass.

TANGLEWOOD SUNDAY

Seiji Ozawa will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a 2:30 p.m. concert with works of Franck, Liszt (with Andre Watts) and Tchaikovsky on Sunday, Aug. 19 at the Berkshire Festival in Lenox, Mass.

MILLERTON, N. Y.
NEWS
W. 1,500
AUG 23 1973

Tanglewood

Verdi's Requiem Set For Final Concert

The eighth and closing weekend at Tanglewood begins on Friday, August 24 at 7 p.m. with pianist Peter Serkin and the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performing Brahms' Clarinet trio in A minor and Pavel's Piano trio.

At 9 p.m., Music Director Seiji Ozawa conducts the orchestra in an all-Berlioz program, beginning with the Symphonie fantastique and followed by Lelio, with Mallory Walker, tenor, Victor Braun, baritone, Michael Wager, narrator, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus with John Oliver as conductor.

On Saturday, Aug. 25 at 10:30 a.m., there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday.

On Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m. James de Preist, associate conductor of the Washington National Symphony, conducts the orchestra in Mussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovanshchina," Rachmaninov's Piano concerto no. 3 in D minor with Byron Janis as soloist, and Shostakovich's Symphony no. 5.

On Sunday, Aug. 26 at 2:30 p.m., the final concert of the 1973 Tanglewood season, Seiji Ozawa conducts the orchestra in Verdi's Manzoni Requiem with Lou Ann Wyckoff, soprano, Maureen Forrester, contralto, Giuseppe Giacomini, tenor, Stafford Dean, bass, the Tanglewood Choir and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, conductor.

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 56,638
AUG 24 1973

Music

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform works by Berlioz under the direction of Seiji Ozawa at 9 p.m. today at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. At 8:30 p.m. Saturday, James De Preist will direct the orchestra in works by Rachmaninoff and Shostakovitch. On Sunday, at 2:30 p.m., Seiji Ozawa will direct the orchestra in works by Verdi.

James De Priest, associate conductor of the Washington National Symphony, makes his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood on Saturday evening, Aug. 25. He has conducted many of the world's major orchestras in this country and in Europe. — Photo contributed

AMERICAN (E)
WATERBURY, CONN.
D. 44,[illegible]
AUG 16 1973
New England Newsclip

Gala Climax Planned At Tanglewood

LENOX, Mass. — The eighth and closing weekend at Tanglewood begins on Aug. 24 at 7 p.m. with pianist Peter Serkin and the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performing Brahms' Clarinet trio in A minor and Pavel's Piano trio.

At 9 p.m., Music Director Seiji Ozawa conducts the orchestra in an all-Berlioz program, beginning with the Symphonie Fantastique and followed by Lelio with Mallory Walker tenor, Victor Braun baritone, Michael Wager narrator and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus John Oliver conductor.

On Aug. 25 at 10:30 a.m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an open rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday.

That evening at 8:30 James de Preist, associate conductor of the Washington National Symphony, conducts the orchestra in Mussorgskv's Prelude to "Khovanschina." Rachmaninov's Piano concerto No. 3 in D minor with Byron Janis as soloist, and Shoktakovich's Symphony No. 5.

On Aug. 26 at 2:30 p.m., the final concert of the season, Seiji Ozawa conducts the orchestra in Verdi's Manzoni Requiem with Lou Ann Wyckoff soprano, Maureen Forrester contralto, Giuseppe Giacomini tenor, Stafford Dean bass, the Tanglewood Choir and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor.

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 56,638
AUG 24 1973

Music

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform works by Berlioz under the direction of Seiji Ozawa at 9 p.m. today at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. At 8:30 p.m. Saturday, James De Preist will direct the orchestra in works by Rachmaninoff and Shostakovitch. On Sunday, at 2:30 p.m., Seiji Ozawa will direct the orchestra in works by Verdi.

The Lake George Opera Festival will perform "The Barber of Seville," at 8:30 p.m. today through Tuesday, Aug. 28 at the Center for Music, Drama and Art, Lake Placid.

Santana, John McLaughlin and The Mahavishnu Orchestra will be presented in concert at 8 p.m. Sunday, at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center, Saratoga Springs.

The Colonie Colisum Summer Theater, Latham will present "Serigio Franchi and Marty Brill" at 8:30 p.m. today, 7 and 10 p.m. Saturday and at 7:30 p.m. Sunday.

The Beach Boys will perform at 8 p.m. Monday, Aug. 27 at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center, Saratoga Springs.

Bonnie Raitt and John Prine will perform at 6 p.m. Saturday at the Music Barn, Lenox, Mass.

The Philadelphia Orchestra under the direction of Roberto Benzi will perform works by Mozart, and Franck at 8 p.m. today at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center, Saratoga Springs. On Saturday at 8 p.m., Eugene Ormandy will direct the orchestra in works by Smetana, Dvorak, Sibellius, DeFalls, and Weinberger.

A Marathon Concert with the New Riders of the Purple Sage, Star Spangled Washboard Band and John Lee Hooker, will take place at 8 p.m. today at the Lebanon Valley Speedway, West Lebanon.

Sonny and Cher will perform in concert at 8 p.m. Tuesday, Aug. 28 at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center, Saratoga Springs.

A mixed-media folk opera, "Frankie," will be presented at 8 p.m. today at the Harmanus Bleecker Library, 19 Dove Street, Albany.

The Saratoga Performing Arts Center, Saratoga Springs, will present "Don McLean," at 8 p.m. Wednesday, Aug. 29.

To Appear at Tanglewood

Byron Janis, pianist, top and James DePriest, Associate Conductor of the Washington National Symphony, will appear at Tanglewood on Saturday, August 25. Mr Janis will be soloist for Rachmaninov's Piano Concerto No. 3 in D Minor.

The eighth and closing weekend at Tanglewood begins on Friday, August 24 at 7 pm with pianist Peter Serkin and the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performing Brahms' Clarinet trio in A minor and Ravel's Piano trio.

At 9 pm, Music Director Seiji Ozawa conducts the Orchestra in an all-Berlioz program, beginning with the Symphonie fantastique and followed by Lelio with Mallory Walker tenor, Victor Braun baritone, Michael Wager narrator and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus John Oliver conductor.

On Saturday, August 25 at 10:30 am, as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday.

On Saturday evening at 8:30 pm James de Preist, Associate Conductor of the Washington National Symphony, conducts the Orchestra in Mussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovanshchina," Rachmaninov's Piano concerto no. 3 in D minor with Byron Janis as soloist, and Shoktakovich's Symphony no. 5.

On Sunday, August 26 at 2:30 pm, the final concert of the 1973 Tanglewood season, Seiji Ozawa conducts the Orchestra in Verdi's Manzoni Requiem with Lou Ann Wyckoff soprano, Maureeen Forrester contralto, Giuseppe Giacomini tenor, Stafford Dean bass, the Tanglewood Choir and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor.

BEE
NEWTOWN, CONN.
W. 14,765

AUG 17 1973

New England Newsclip

HERALD NEWS (E)
FALL RIVER, MASS.
D. 62,275

AUG 27 1973

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — Total attendance at Tanglewood showed a 23 per cent increase over 1972, and established an all time record, officials said Sunday.

Weekend attendance at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was 29,490 for the 1973 season.

That brought the total summer attendance for all musical events to 313,774.

EAGLE-TRIBUNE (M) (E)
LAWRENCE, MASS.
D. 43,093

AUG 18 1973

New England Newsclip

Last Tanglewood concerts scheduled

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, Mass. — The eighth and closing weekend at Tanglewood begins on Aug. 24 at 7 p.m. with pianist Peter Serkin and the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performing Brahms' Clarinet trio in A minor and Pavel's Piano trio.

At 9, Music Director Seeji Ozawa conducts the Orchestra in an all-Berlioz program, beginning with the Symphonie fantastique and followed by Lelio with Mallory Walker tenor, Victor Braun baritone, Michael Wager narrator and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus John Oliver conductor.

On Aug. 25 at 10:30, as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an open rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday.

On Saturday evening at 8:30, James de Preist, Associate Conductor of the Washington National Symphony, conducts the Orchestra in Mussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovanshchina," Rachmaninov's Piano concerto No. 3 in D minor with Byron Janis as soloist, and Shoktakovich's Symphony no. 5.

On Aug. 26 at 2:30 p.m., the final concert of the 1973 Tanglewood season, Seiji Ozawa conducts the Orchestra in Verdi's Manzoni Requiem with Lou Ann Wyckoff soprano, Maureen Forrester contralto, Giuseppe Giacomini tenor, Stafford Dean bass, the Tanglewood Choir and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor.

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
W. 6,013

AUG 22 1973

New England Newsclip

Final Week In Berkshires

The eighth and closing weekend at Tanglewood begins on Friday, August 24 at 7 p.m. with pianist Peter Serkin and the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performing Brahms' Clarinet trio in A minor and Pavel's Piano trio.

At 9 p.m., Music Director Seiji Ozawa conducts the Orchestra in an all-Berlioz program, beginning with the Symphonie fantastique and followed by Lelio with Mallory Walker tenor, Victor Braun baritone, Michael Wager narrator and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus John Oliver conductor.

On Saturday, August 25 at 10:30 a.m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday.

On Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m., James de Preist, Associate Conductor of the Washington National Symphony, conducts the Orchestra in Mussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovanshchina," Rachmaninov's Piano concerto no. 3 in D minor with Byron Janis as soloist, and Shoktakovich's Symphony no. 5.

On Sunday, August 26 at 2:30 p.m., the final concert of the 1973 Tanglewood season, Seiji Ozawa conducts the Orchestra in Verdi's Manzoni Requiem with Lou Ann Wyckoff soprano.

The Herald-News
PASSAIC, N. J.
D. 52,[illegible]

AUG 24 1973

Final Week at Tanglewood

Eighth and closing weekend at Tanglewood Lenox, Mass., begins tonight at 7 with pianist Peter Serkin and the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performing Brahms' Clarinet trio in A minor and Pavel's Piano trio.

At 9 p.m., music director Seiji Ozawa conducts the orchestra in an all-Berlioz program, beginning with the Symphonie fantastique and followed by Lelio with Mallory Walker, tenor; Victor Braun, baritone; Michael Wager, narrator and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus with John Oliver, conductor.

Tomorrow evening at 8:30 James de Preist, associate conductor of the Washington National Symphony, conducts the orchestra in Mussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovanshchina," Rachmaninov's Piano concerto no. 3 in D minor with Byron Janis as soloist and Shoktakovich's Symphony no. 5.

On Sunday at 2:30 p.m., the final concert of the 1973 Tanglewood Season, Seiji Ozawa conducts the orchestra in Verdi's Manzoni Requiem with Lou Ann Wyckoff soprano, Maureen Forrester, contralto, Giuseppe Giacomini, tenor, Stafford Dean, bass, the Tanglewood Choir and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus with John Oliver conducting.

SYRACUSE
Herald Journal
D. 129,555

AUG 21 1973

TWO FOR TANGLEWOOD. Byron Janis, right, will be guest artist and James DePreist will make his Tanglewood debut conducting Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 3 in D Minor Friday at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed at the Berkshire Music Festival at Lenox, Mass. Other works will be Mussorgsky's "Prelude to Khovanshchina" and Shostakovich's Symphony No. 5.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
W. 4,405

AUG 23 1973

New England Newsclip

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass. (413-637-1600).

Aug. 24: Weekend Prelude, Boston Symphony Chamber Players, 7 p.m.; Boston Symphony Orchestra, Seiji Ozawa, conductor; Berlioz program, with soloists and Tanglewood Festival Chorus, 9 p.m.

Aug. 25: Boston Symphony, Open Rehearsal, 10:30 a.m.; James De Priest, conductor; Byron Janis, piano; works by Rachmaninoff and Shostakovitch, 8:30 p.m.

Aug. 26: Boston Symphony, Seiji Ozawa, conductor; soloists and Tanglewood Festival Chorus, in Verdi's Requiem, 2:30 p.m.

TRANSCRIPT (E)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
D. 13,700

AUG 24 1973

New England Newsclip

James De Preist, Associate Conductor of the Washington National Symphony, makes his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood tomorrow evening at 9.

NEWS
WEST HARTFORD, CONN.
W. 8,076

AUG 23 1973

New England Newsclip

'Requiem' To Close Season At Tanglewood

Verdi's "Requiem" with Seiji Ozawa conducting will bring to a close the current season at Tanglewood on Sunday beginning at 2:30 in the shed. Soloists will be Lou Ann Wyckoff, soprano; Maureen Forrester, contralto; Giuseppe Giacomini, tenor and Stafford Dean, bass. Also taking part will be the Tanglewood choir and the Tanglewood Festival chorus with John Oliver, conductor.

On Friday at 7 Peter Serkin at the piano will join the Boston Symphony Chamber Players in Brahms "Clarinet trio in A minor" and Ravel's "Piano Trio". At 9 p. m. Seiji Ozawa will conduct a complete Berlios program including Symphonie Fantastique and "Lelio".

RAVENA, N. Y.
NEWS-HERALD
(ALBANY MARKET AREA)
W. 2,000

AUG 24 1973

Tanglewood ends Sunday.

TANGLEWOOD — The eighth and closing weekend at Tanglewood begins on Friday, August 24 at 7:00 p.m with pianist Peter Serkin and the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performing Brahms' Clarinet trio in A minor and Pavel's Piano trio.

At 9:00 p.m. Music Director Seiji Ozawa conducts the orchestra in an all-Berlioz program, beginning with the Symphonie fantastique and followed by Lelio with Mallory Walker-tenor, Victor Braun baritone, Michael Wager narrator and the Tanglewood Fetival Chorus John Oliver conductor.

On Saturday, August 25 at 10:30 a.m. as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Open Rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday.

On Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m. James de Preist, associate conductor of the Washington National Symphony, conducts the orchestra in Mussorgskv's - Prelude to "Khovanshchina," Rachmaninov's Piano concerto no. 3 in D minor with Byron Janis as soloist, and Shoktakovich's Symphony no. 5.

On Sunday, August 26 at 2:30 p.m.; the final concert of the 1973 Tanglewood season, Seiji Ozawa conducts the orchestra in Verdi's Manzoni Requiem with Lou Ann Wyckoff soprano, Maureen Forrester contralto, Giuseppe Giacomini tenor, Stafford Dean bass, the Tanglewood Choir and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, conductor.

MUSIC AND DANCE

BERKSHIRE QUARTET, Music Mountain: Guest artist, Walter Robert, Piano; Mozart, Quartet in E Flat, K. 171, Brahms, Sonata for Viola and Piano in F Minor; Martinu, Piano Quintet.

HARTFORD CITY PARKS SUMMER CONCERTS '73: 6p.m. tonight, Pope South, Volunteers; 5 p.m. Friday, Sigourney Square, Les Strangers; 2 p.m. Saturday, Elizabeth West, Volunteers; 3 p.m. Sunday, Elizabeth West, Governor's Footguard; 5 p.m. Tuesday, Stowe Village, Lou West Ensemble; 5 p.m. Wednesday, Bellevue Square, Lou West Ensemble; Noon Wednesday, Bushnell Park, Volunteers.

JACOB'S PILLOW, Lee, Mass., 8:40 p.m. Friday and Saturday, and 3 p.m. Saturday, Cynthia Gregory, Terry Orr and six members of American Ballet Theater; "Three Bach Dances," "Bayadere Pas de Deux," "Divertissement D'Auber," and Divertissement from "Napoli."

1973 PLUMB MEMORIAL CARILLON CONCERTS. 7:15 p.m. Wednesday, Trinity College Campus; guest carillonneur to be announced.

SUMMER CHAMBER MUSIC SERIES, Silvermine Guild of Artists, 8 p.m. Sunday, Gifford Hall, New Canaan. Piano trios by Mozart, Shostakovitch and Mendlessohn, with guest artists Ruth Alsop, cello, Francisco Aybar, piano, and Paul Wolfe, violin.

TANGLEWOOD — Berkshire Music Festival: 9 p.m. Friday, Ozawa, Berlioz Program; Symphonie Fantastique, "Lelio", Mallory Walker, Victor Braun, Colin Fox, Tanglewood Festival Chorus; 8:30 p.m. Saturday, De Preist; Rachmaninoff, Piano Concerto No. 3, Byron Janis, Shostakovitch, Symphony No. 5; 2:30 p.m. Sunday, Ozawa, Verdi, "Requiem," Lou Ann Wyckoff, Maureen Forrester, Stafford Dean, Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

WEST HARTFORD SUMMER CONCERTS: 7:30 - 9:30 tonight, Fernridge Park, Swing Era Jazz Band.

NEWS (E)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528
AUG 27 1973
New England Newsclip

Verdi's Powerful Drama Ends Magnificent Season

Springfield Daily News
The Arts
SPRINGFIELD, MASS., MONDAY, AUGUST 27, 1973

By RICHARD CONWAY

The powerful drama of Verdi's "Requiem Mass" ended a season of magnificent musical performance at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon. An audience of 11,641 found itself caught up in the unfolding sweep of Verdi's masterpiece.

Despite some brilliant orchestral writing, a new power of control that Verdi found in his later years, it is the voice that is ever the center of the master's highly personal expression of belief.

Verdi brought to the liturgical texts that which he knew best — the world of opera, the dramatic telling of conflict. Softly the cellos intone an A minor chord, and first the men's voices and then the women's plead for rest eternal. The second movement depicts in swirling, turbulent tones the terrors of the Day of Wrath. Ultimately the work ends with the triumphant hope of Deliverance.

As it has been all season long, the chorus work yesterday was stunning. The dynamic range of the singers has been enormously satisfying, their control and agility fined honed and executed. Their work in the Dies Irae section and in the final Libera Me movement was chilling, thrilling, and ultimately movingly triumphant.

Director John Oliver has prepared his singers with consummate craftsmanship, and conductors such as Colin Davis and, Sunday Seiji Ozawa have drawn from then the inspired interpretation of great music.

The Verdi Requiem calls for brilliant operatic solo work, and, with some reservations, there was a good deal of it Sunday. Of the four soloists, soprano Lou Ann Wyckoff, mezzo Maureen Forrester, tenor Seth McCoy, and bass Ezio Flagello, the men were the more successful. Sunday, Miss Forrester's voice was a constant disappointment. She was given to frequent snapping open of attacks, sliding into pitches, and singing her entrances ahead of the beat. She is a singer of enormous range and expression, but her voice Sunday had an unpleasant quality for me.

Metropolitan opera bass Ezio Flagello, substituting on short notice for Stafford Dean, infused his role with the greatest drama and vocal surety. Seth McCoy's tenor voice, although used with fine interpretive powers, is not quite strong enough for the Verdi work.

Seiji Ozawa, who is usually so careful about such things, let the orchestra get a bit too much for the singers on occasion. Part of this is due to the orchestral scoring itself, but there were frequent occasions when a better balance could have been maintained.

But the powerful expression of Verdi's genius was continually thrilling, and brought the Tanglewood season to a triumphant close.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
AUG 27 1973
New England Newsclip

UNION (M)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 64,000
AUG 25 1973
New England Newsclip

'Lelio' Presented At Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — 'Berlioz' "Symphonie Fantastique" has become a very popular staple on symphonic programs all by itself, so a Tanglewood audience Friday heard a rarity, the symphony's companion piece.

Ozawa Conducts

It is "Lelio," a work billed as a lyric monodrama. Seiji Ozawa conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra playing the symphony before intermission and the "Monodrama," which calls for a narrator, a couple of soloists, a chorus and orchestra, following intermission. It was composed a couple of years after the symphony.

The symphony is famous for its theatricality. The orchestration is colorful and dramatic abstract reproduction of the opium-induced hallucination of "the artist" about his "volcanic love," "deliricus anguish" and bizarre death.

It is a very popular work even though frequently played as if it were grotesque. Ozawa played it straight, which is really the only way to protect its essential seriousness.

The music is dramatic enough played straight because of the passionate story it reproduces, and under Ozawa's guidance it was unusually effective.

The tones were dry and bright, the strains separate and sinewy and the tension electric. The audience jumped up with shouts when it came to its crashing climax.

"Lelio" reproduces, with words this time as well as music, what is going on in "the artist's" imagination and emotions as he emerges from his drugged sleep.

The stage was empty and dark except for a couple of spotlights as the piece began.

"The artist" moved into view from the wings, played three or four notes on a piano from the melody symbolizing the object of his love and began his narration.

Soon appeared Horatio (tenor) who sang with only a piano accompaniment alternately with the narrated voice of "the artist." Suddenly the stage lights came on as the narrator continued his story and the orchestra and chorus filed on to fill the stage and bring the scope of "the artist's' story higher and wider.

It was a dramatic scene to fill Berlioz' heart with glee, but the listeners inside the great shed were, for the most part, deprived on the narration because of the muffled acoustics of the chest microphone worn by the speaker.

Out on the lawn, in the meantime, the narrator's words were being heard clearly from the speakers on top of the shed.

There were perhaps 4000 listeners in the great shed for the 7 p.m. prelude concert, a number which might surprise those who think the potential audience for chamber music is small. In fact, the prelude audiences haven't dropped below 2000 all summer.

The program offered two trios, the first for clarinet, piano and cello by Brahms (Opus 114) and the second for violin, piano and cello by Ravel, both nearly a half an hour long.

Peter Serkin played piano fpr both, and Jules Eskin cello. Harold Wright played clarinet and Joseph Silverstein violin.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 115,169
AUG 28 1973

Verdi's 'Requiem' Ends Concert Season

By RICHARD VINCENT
Music Critic

When one mentions the great composers of the late 19th century, the only composer of opera that is ever mentioned, (and he seldom), is Richard Wagner. There are sound musical reasons for this, but, in terms of achievement, Giuseppe Verdi should hold a position at least on a par with say, a Bruckner.

Verdi composed opera almost exclusively, and opera composers, unless they also compose orchestral and chamber music, like Mozart are held by most musicologists in ill musical repute, as if there is something slightly reprehensible or improper about such activity.

BUT IT IS a fact that, around the world in 1973, there is probably more music by Verdi being heard than anybody else, with the notable exceptions of Beethoven and Mozart.

Tanglewood ended a most successful season Sunday afternoon with a performance of Verdi's powerful and truly evocative, "Requiem" complete with a large chorus, four soloists, an extra-locum brass band, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, all under the increasingly effective direction of Seiji Ozawa.

Folks who should know better, always seem to patronize the work by calling it another Verdi opera, which position will scarcely bear scrutiny.

IT IS NOT operatic, not the way Rossini's "Stabat Mater" is, it is a noble and religious musical work, with no sense of the flamboyant in the theatrical manner. Dramatic, oh my goodness, yes, it is dramatic, but when one considers the stuff of The Last Judgment, such as the "Dies Irae," how could it be otherwise?

It was a good performance, made notable at times by the work of the soloists, particularly Maureen Forrester, that marvelous contralto, who probably doesn't know how good she is. There were two substitutions, Seth McCoy tenor, and Ezio Flagello, bass, for otherwise indisposed artists, and the soprano was Lou Ann Wykcoff.

Flagello, long one of my favorite basses, was his customary rich and sonorous self; McCoy, was singing better than I have heard him before, and that includes more than a few times in the past three or four years. Miss Wyckoff did her job too, but, although this is not fair, for one who has heard Martina Arroyo do the part, (last winter in Cleveland) there can be no other for this part for a while.

THE CHORUS, the Tanglewood Choir and the Tanglewood Festival Choir, came to the arena to sing as they have done so well in the past, and they were very good indeed. Without them of course, there is not much to do; they are the true soloists.

Ozawa, whose career, if the truth be noted, has been one stoke of good fortune after another, is getting to the point where he might be as good as many have claimed he was.

His journey to the top was launched by a series of fortuitous circumstances, being the right man in the right place at the right time again and again, and he has been learning at the top which is a better place than any other. He might be now at the point where his work overall can be taken seriously.

8
EIGHTH WEEKEND

AUGUST 24
7 pm Weekend Prelude
Boston Symphony Chamber Players
9 pm SEIJI OZAWA BERLIOZ PROGRAM
Symphonie fantastique
"Lelio"
Mallory Walker, Victor Braun, Colin Fox,
Tanglewood Festival Chorus,
John Oliver, Director

AUGUST 25
10:30 am Open Rehearsal
8:30 pm JAMES DE PREIST
Rachmaninoff: Piano Concerto No. 3
Byron Janis
Shostakovitch: Symphony No. 5

AUGUST 26
2:30 pm SEIJI OZAWA
Verdi: Requiem
Lou Ann Wyckoff, Maureen Forrester,
Stafford Dean, Tanglewood Festival Chorus,
John Oliver, Director

Tanglewood sets record for season

Although Tanglewood closed the season musically with a requiem yesterday afternoon, there were only hosannas as far as attendance was concerned. A record of 313,774 was set, 23 per cent more than last year's 253,426.

The return of the Popular Artist Series, which brought in a total of 47,826 on its four Tuesday nights, was responsible for the great upsurge. Total Berkshire Festival attendance without the folk and rock groups was 244,926, up approximately five per cent over last year. The second best year in Tanglewood history was 1970, when a total of 257,419 admissions were sold.

The eighth and final weekend of the season drew 29,490 people — 6,079 on Friday night; 3,350 for the open rehearsal on Saturday morning; 8,420 on Saturday night, and 11,641 on Sunday afternoon for the Verdi Requiem (review on Page 12). This was below last year's final weekend, which drew 32,012.

* * * *

The third weekend, which featured works by Beethoven, drew 42,604, the largest number for the season. The fourth weekend, when substitute conductors were used and the weather was rainy or humid, drew the lowest number, 24,333.

The Pops concert featuring Arthur Fiedler had an attendance of 14,040, as opposed to 13,235 last year, and Tanglewood on Parade, with 6,992, was down from last year's 7,756. Most popular of the popular artists this year were Seals and Crofts, who drew 15,251.

There had been predictions of a banner year for Tanglewood as early as last spring because three of the weekends were almost entirely sold out before the season started. Mail orders and Ticketron sales have been high all year.

Management was unable to come up with any specific reasons for this upsurge, since other music festivals did not report the same phenomena, being either the same or below last year. The Saratoga Performing Arts Center has not yet released its figures, but it is not expected to reveal growth similar to Tanglewood's.

HOUR (E)
NORWALK, CONN.
D. 23,000
AUG 22 1973
New England Newsclip

HANDEL'S MESSIAH THRILLS AUDIENCE AT TANGLEWOOD

Under threatening skies, but which gave promise of undiminished hope, Tanglewood's Sunday afternoon offering of Handel's Messiah, complete, was a a dream fulfilled. Whether the threat of showers heightened the tension and anticipation, or due to the rise in interest in the Jesus movements, it all added to aggregate joy when the glory of sunlight broke through the storm-clouded aperture just as the Hallelujah Chorus began. It may be the perfectness of the overall production that evoked such exuberance and praise and it was one of the highest spots in Tanglewood's entire attainments for splendor, excellency and inspiration.

Colin Davis, who conducted the Boston Symphony in this performance at the "summer symphony hall," moved the large chorus, (Tanglewood Festival Choir) the orchestral body and soloists through this "Grand Sacred Oratorio" as it was first termed in 1742, in a tempo which was both exciting and realistic. The heart of the Christian message from both Old and New Testaments, taken literally from the King James Version is thrilling whenever and wherever the words go forth; with the majesty of the Boston Symphony, plus an organ, a harpsichord, a trumpet, an excellent chorus and exceptionally able vocal quartet, there are no words that compare with the sound sent forth. Each soloist evoked a memory of soloists in times past, and revealing these were of the best.

More recent conductors have, like Davis, stressed the exuberant spirit as opposed to the solemn and the sanctimonious. Even more than in Beethoven's Ode to Joy, the great joy here is the uplift which comes with the envisioning of that perfect day that is to come of which Scripture has promised. With such a theme, whether one understands what he is telling forth or not, it is again like God's trumpet that "gives forth no uncertain sound" and participants are inspired by its very urgency to be channels of that very certain sound.

Soloists were Benita Valente, soprano, a Metropolitan audition winner in 1960 and a seasoned artist, both with the Boston Symphony, and in Washington.

Helen Watts, a leading British contralto of wide experience and acclaim, but a new-comer to Tanglewood; Ryland Davies, a native of Wales, another Tanglewood newcomer but a seasoned Salzburg Festival, Covent Garden and Welsh National Opera soloist, and Stafford Dean, also born in England, of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, and who will appear again at Tanglewood, Sunday August 26th, in the Verdi Requiem.

Instrumental soleists were Robert Levin, harpsichord, John Gibbons, organ, and Armando Chitalla, trumpeter.

It is gratifying that such a large crowd was so enthusiastic. When a little girl sitting outside the auditorium remarked "it looks like it's going to rain her grandmother remarked, "even if it does I am going to stand up when they sing the Hallelujah chorus.." It is great to know that people still care about great music, and about great ideals.

ROXIE E. HOUGHTON

Verdi's Powerful Drama Ends Magnificent Season

The Arts

'Lelio' Presented At Tanglewood

BY R. C. [illegible]

LENOX [illegible] Symphony [illegible] has become a [illegible] staple [illegible] programs all [illegible] Tanglewood and [illegible] heard [illegible] phony's [illegible]

Ozawa Conducts

It is "Lelio" [illegible] a lyric [illegible] Ozawa [illegible] Lenox [illegible] "Monodrama" [illegible] for a narrator [illegible] soloists, a chorus [illegible] chestra. It was [illegible] modern vision. It was [illegible] a couple of years [illegible] Symphony.

[illegible] indeed half-[illegible] reproduction of [illegible] indeed half-[illegible] angel [illegible] love [illegible] and bizarre [illegible]

It is a very [illegible] played [illegible] gestures. [illegible] straight, which [illegible] only way [illegible] essential [illegible]

The music [illegible] enough [illegible] because [illegible] story [illegible] under Ozawa's [illegible] was unusually [illegible]

The [illegible] were [illegible] bright, the [illegible] hard sinewy and the [illegible] electric. The [illegible] jumped up with [illegible] climax.

"Lelio" [illegible] wordless [illegible] music [illegible] and [illegible] from his [illegible] steps.

Harold Wright [illegible] Peter Serkin [illegible] Davis [illegible] Boston Symphony [illegible] Lenox [illegible] movement [illegible] to [illegible] of [illegible] storm-[illegible]

Verdi's 'Requiem' Ends Concert Season

BY RICHARD [illegible]

WASHINGTON

When one mentions the great composers of the late 19th century, the only composer of opera that is ever mentioned, (and he seldom), is Richard Wagner. There are sound musical reasons for this, but, in terms of achievement, Giuseppe Verdi should hold a position at least on a par with Sir [illegible] Bruckner.

Verdi composed operas [illegible] most [illegible] composers, [illegible] compose orchestral and chamber music. [illegible] are held by [illegible] gets in [illegible] there a way of [illegible] reprehensible [illegible] about [illegible]

[illegible] performance, [illegible] at times by the [illegible] particularly [illegible] Andrew Forrester, the [illegible] contralto, who probably doesn't know how good she is. There were two substitutions. Seth McCoy [illegible] and Ezio Flagello [illegible] for otherwise [illegible] good artists, and the soprano was Lou Ann Wyckoff.

Flagello, long one of my favorite basses, was his customary rich and sonorous self; McCoy was singing better than I have heard him before, and that includes more than a few times in the past three or four years. Miss Wyckoff did her job too, but, although this is not fair, for one who has heard Martina Arroyo do the part last winter in Cleveland, there can be no other for this part for a while.

[illegible] CHORUS, the Tanglewood Choir and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, [illegible] in song as they [illegible] done so well in the past, and they were [illegible] good [illegible] enough [illegible] to do; they are the true soloists.

Ozawa, whose career, if the truth be noted, has been one stroke of good fortune after another, is getting to the point where he might be as good as many have claimed he was.

His journey to the top was launched by a series of fortuitous circumstances, being the right man in the right place at the right time again and again, and he has been [illegible] in the [illegible] better place [illegible]

[illegible] where his work [illegible] be taken seriously.

Tanglewood sets record for season

[illegible]

Weekend Prelude
Boston Symphony Chamber Players
SEIJI OZAWA BERLIOZ PROGRAM
Symphonie fantastique
"Lelio"
Mallory Walker, Victor Braun, Colin Fox,
Tanglewood Festival Chorus,
John Oliver, Director

EIGHTH WEEKEND

Open Rehearsal
JAMES DE PREIST
Rachmaninoff: Piano Concerto No. 3
Byron Janis
Shostakovitch: Symphony No. 5

SEIJI OZAWA
Verdi: Requiem
Lou Ann Wyckoff, Maureen Forrester,
Stafford Dean, Tanglewood Festival Chorus,
John Oliver, Director

HANDEL'S MESSIAH THRILLS AUDIENCE AT TANGLEWOOD

[illegible] Old and New Testaments, taken literally from the King James Version, solemn and thrilling whenever and where. Even [illegible] ever the words so forceful, with [illegible] Ode to Joy, the grand [illegible] the majesty of the Boston Symphony [illegible] the uplift which comes [illegible] plays an organ, a [illegible] Tanglewood Festival [illegible] Tanglewood, Richard [illegible] Prince of Wales, [illegible] Saidum, festival [illegible] and Welsh National [illegible] soloist, and Stafford [illegible] England, [illegible] Horst, Oliver [illegible] will appear [illegible] Tanglewood, Sunday [illegible] 26th, in the Verdi Requiem [illegible] instrumental soloists [illegible] Gabriel Levin, harpsichord, John [illegible] and Armando [illegible]

Tanglewood's Best Year Yet

LENOX, Mass. (AP)— Total attendance at Tanglewood showed a 23 per cent increase over 1972, and established an all time record, officials said Sunday.

Weekend attendance at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was 29,490 for the 1973 season.

That brought the total summer attendance for all musical events to 313,774.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE (E)
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
D. 16,835
AUG 27 1973
New England Newsclip

GLOBE (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042
AUG 28 1973
New England Newsclip

MICHAEL STEINBERG

Requiem heard at Tanglewood

LENOX — Verdi's Requiem, with which Seiji Ozawa closed the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon, needs soloists of the front rank. An excellent Aida, Amneris, Radames, and King Philipp do nicely. But the Boston Symphony goes about it as casually as though it were a question of casting Ruiz and Inez for a "Trovatore" in Hopkinton. I cannot say whether it is mere ineptness, or ineptness allied to stinginess, but the outcome Sunday was mostly miserable.

There was, in fact, one admirable soloist, the tenor Seth McCoy, but we owed him to no one's planning, as he had been called in to replace a certain Giuseppe Giacomini whom Ozawa had to send home to Padua during rehearsals because of his affinity for pitches other than the ones Verdi wrote. McCoy has no velvet to his tone and little suggestion of the most precious metals, but his voice is strong, virile, and controlled. He sang ardently, communicatively, with intelligence and impeccable musical taste. "He sings with more than voice," was the comment at intermission of a woman in the audience, and that really says it all.

Maureen Forrester, the mezzo-soprano soloist, is one of the best of musicians among singers, and, for that matter, one of the best singers among them, too, but she was miscast here. She is not believable in Italian music: the drama, in spite of all the confidential hunching forward as she tells stories about the day of judgment, stays all on the outside, and the voice itself seems in costume.

Now when you put a quartet together, one thing to be considered is compatibility of voices, yet one of the most persistent factors here was the stubborn non-blend of Forrester's voice with that of the soprano, Luanne Wyckoff. It really undid the Recordare and the Agnus Dei. Wyckoff has a pleasant voice, though the low notes have no weight and the top ones no cutting edge, but she doesn't know how to sing. She looks uncomfortable, what with the lower half of her face vibrating like a road drill, and whatever she is doing there gives her no control over pitch, loudness, speed of production, or the color of the holds. With all stops out, she managed well enough; elsewhere she was, understandably, in a panic and performed accordingly.

Ezio Flagello, the bass, was another sort of cause for sadness. When he first came on the scene in the late Fifties, he offered an impressive combination of good voice and scrupulous musicianship, and he made distinguished contributions to Leinsdorf's Tanglewood performances of the Verdi Requiem in 1964 and 1967. Lately, though, he has turned into a rhythmless barker, and the rough, uneasy sound of him Sunday was no pleasure. He, too, was a replacement but not of such short notice as Mr. McCoy or as a program insert would have had us believe. In a remarkable moment of medical prescience, Stafford Dean, who sang "Messiah" here on Aug. 12, knew then that he would be "indisposed" a fortnight hence.

Seiji Ozawa helped hardly at all, and I think it is not overstating the case to say that he does not know the Requiem. He conducted it from memory and he didn't get lost, but that is not the level of knowing I have in mind. I mean that he does not know how the piece works. Specifically, he hasn't a clue about the tempi, regarding which Verdi's directions are explicit, helpful, and essential. Ozawa got them wrong, persistently, in themselves and in relation to each other, and the expression was therefore wrong, too, and structural cohesion was not in the picture at all. Ozawa phrases well, is energetic, and has feeling for the sonorous values of the work (the Boston Symphony and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus were in that sense effective). It was painfully insufficient, though, and the more painful for coming from so gifted a musician.

Ozawa's vital Verdi at Tanglewood

By Louis Snyder

Lenox, Mass.

There were 11,641 listeners in the Shed and on the lawns at Tanglewood

Music

on Sunday afternoon when Seiji Ozawa and the Boston Symphony brought the 1973 Berkshire Festival to a close. A grand total of 313,774 — 23 percent over 1972 — attended this summer's events, giving the lie to those who think that no one listens to "good music" any more.

Sunday's crowd was on hand to hear Verdi's Manzoni Requiem, which, in Tanglewood's 30-plus years, has had only two performances here. And a magnet for the general curiosity, no doubt, was to hear how Mr. Ozawa, whose success with large choral works has been prodigious in previous seasons, would treat this enormous, throbbing Verdian masterpiece..

Several approaches

In addition to the full orchestra, the Requiem requires four major soloists (soprano Lou Ann Wycoff, contralto Maureen Forrester, tenor Seth McCoy, bass Ezio Flagello), large choral forces (the Tanglewood Choir and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus), and two authoritative conducting hands to bring them all together in the context of a consistent interpretation, of which several are possible.

Last spring in Boston, William Steinberg revived the Requiem with the BSO at Symphony Hall, after many seasons' absence, in a concept of monumental dignity and solemnity.

Inner fire

On Sunday, Mr. Ozawa, whose past experience with the Requiem would understandably be less extensive, took a different approach. He sought out and clarified the strongly dramatic and soaringly melodic passages, so typical of Verdi's style and so paintakingly refined by the composer, in this instance, to build a perfect and reverent work.

It was this added emphasis (but by no means exaggeration) that brought to Mr. Ozawa's individualistic reading a sweeping, seething locomotion entirely fitting the Requiem's burning concern with Judgment Day. Contrasts were strong and their effects on the listener were wrenching. This was a concept that exemplified the inner fire of Verdi, rather than the overwhelming outward expression of his grief, and was, in its final impact, equally allowable and effective.

The singing by the choir and festival chorus was, as it has been all summer, magnificent — a tribute to the magic of its director, John Oliver. Of the soloists Miss Forrester and Mr. Flagello are mellifluous veterans of the Requiem — a fact made comfortably evident throughout the afternoon, while Mr. McCoy, deputizing on short notice, met the high ranging demands of the tenor part with great finesse and beauty.

Miss Wycoff, making her debut with the BSO, has many of the requirements, at this comparatively early stage in her career, of a true Verdian soprano — an ample voice of wide range and rich texture, particularly in the lower register, and a musicianly application toward performance. What the Requiem traditionally needs, however, along with everything else, are floating top notes, and these Miss Wycoff could seemingly supply only with some conscious effort. Obviously they'll be there, in time, to dazzle us all, but on Sunday, even after an impressive rendition of the "Libera me," the crowning top one came shorter than she would have wanted, and than it will with more expereience. Not a catastrophy, certainly, but food for thought for an intelligent, talented singer.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 187,897
AUG 29 1973
New England Newsclip

HERALD-AMERICAN (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 424,654
AUG 30 1973
New England Newsclip

GAZETTE (E)
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 92,743
AUG 27 1973
New England Newsclip

Attendance Record Set at Tanglewood

LENOX — Total attendance at Tanglewood showed a 23 percent increase over 1972, and established an all time record, officials said.

Weekend attendance at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was 29,490 for the 1973 season. That brought the total summer attendauce for all musical events to 313,774.

Tanglewood Attendance Record Set

LENOX (AP) — Total attendance at Tanglewood showed a 23 per cent increase over 1972, and established an all time record, officials said yesterday.

Weekend attendance at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was 29,490 for the 1973 season.

That brought the total summer attendance for all musical events to 313,774.

Attendance Rise For Tanglewood

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — Total attendance at Tanglewood showed a 23 per cent increase over 1972, and established an all time record, officials said Sunday.

Weekend attendance at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was 29,490 for the 1973 season.

That brought the total summer attendance for all musical events to 313,774.

MILLERTON, N. Y.
NEWS
W. 1,500
AUG 30 1973

SENTINEL (E)
FITCHBURG, MASS.
D. 24,001
AUG 27 1973
New England Newsclip

TELEGRAM (M)
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 60,219
AUG 27 1973
New England Newsclip

Verdi Requiem Ends Tanglewood Season

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — The 36th Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood came to an auspicious close yesterday afternoon with a dazzling performance of Verdi's Requiem, featuring the Boston Symphony with mixed chorus and soloists, conducted by Seiji Ozawa.

Perfect weather for all three concerts encouraged audiences of 29,490 to attend the eighth weekend.

Total attendance for the eight weeks of 24 concerts and eight open rehearsals was 313,774, an increase of 60,348 over the 1972 festival.

Yesterday the Verdi Requiem received a somewhat electic performance in spite of strong domination from Ozawa's baton.

The audience of 11,641 was completely enthralled and let this be known in no uncertain terms.

Ozawa faced its operatic dimension and style squarely, particularly in the orchestral and choral ensemble roles. Its spiritual significance was concentrated mainly in the text, sung clearly in Latin by the Tanglewood Choir and Festival Chorus.

Compelling Contrasts

It's hard to imagine more compelling contrasts than the Kyrie's appeal for mercy, overpowering oratory of the Dies Irae, and anguish of the Rex Tremendae.

John Oliver had thoroughly versed the chorus of 125 in mechanics and significance.

An outstanding moment of beauty was the soprano-mezzo duet, Recondare, sung by Lou Ann Wyckoff and Maureen Forrester. Elsewhere, the soprano's voice underwent its moments of pitch uncertainty. The mezzo's voice was opulent, even radiant.

Both male singers were last-minute substitutes. Giuseppe Giacomini, tenor, and Stafford Dean, bass, canceled because of illness.

Tenor Seth McCoy was especially impressive in the Kyrie. Ezio Flagello rought his portion of the Dies Irae and Confutatis to high points of drama.

Solo quartets were balanced and unified in spirit.

A Mixed Bag

Friday night's all-Berlioz program was a combination of magnificence and medicority. The plus was the "Fantastic" Symphony — the minus, "Lelio," for narrator, male soloists and chorus.

Briefly, in the "Fantastic" Berlioz vents his vengenance on his beloved who spurns him. "Lelio," or "Return to Life," tells his recovery from deliriums and contemp for his fellow human beings.

"Fantastic" can be heard as a superb piece of orchestration without getting involved with the composer's hysteria. Ozawa's performance was a marvel of detail, even in the third movement, where cues come in rapid profusion. The orchestra was at its level best. Drama ran over in all five movements; even the waltz had its own glitter and the ending wasn't fractured by Ozawa's breakneck speed.

Michael Wager narrated the text of "Lelio" in full accord with its purple prose, but amplification was poor. The performance would have been better off without tenor Mallory Walker's strain and unreliability in the title role.

Victor Braum's baritone was resonantly applied to the role of the brigand's captain.

The Tanglewood Festival Chorus and orchestra worked valiantly at a thankless role. But the narrator's bitter harangue, orchestra and chorus filing in the stage during the performance and the work itself were a pathetic anticlimax to the preceding "Fantastic."

Two strong personalities were witnessed at Saturday night's concert — conductor James de Preist, associate conductor of the Washington National Symphony in his Boston Symphony debut, and pianist Byron Janis in Rachmaninoff's Third.

De Preist is a giant of a man, who was stricken with polio about 10 years ago. He uses a cane and conducts seated.

Shostakovich's Fifth Symphony and the Prelude from Moussorgsky's "Khovanshchina" were admirable vehicles to display this remarkable conductor's unfettered style and clarity of thought. In the Moussorgsky, de Preist held melody in paramount position, beautifully voiced in woodwinds. Certainly not a splashy concert opener, the five variations were consistently absorbing for rich tonal clolor. This was just as vital in the fragile sections as vigorous interludes.

Not in Top Form

Compared to past performances, Janis was not in top form for the Rachmaninoff Third Piano Concerto.

De Preist and the orchestra gave him marvelous backing — far more than the usual accompaniment.

Underlying Janis' playing was a broad, structured concept of the work, and a degree of elan. But everything at the keyboard seemed to entail laborious effort and stress. We don't recall Janis having previously to raise himself six inches from the piano seat to achieve a fortissimo. Note playing was generally accurate. There was a frailty of tone in the first movement that grew to greater dynamic potency in the finale. But by then, it was too late.

NEWS (E)
GARDNER, MASS.
D. 8,062
AUG 27 1973
New England Newsclip

...wood ...ndance

...NOX, Mass. (AP) — Total ...endance at Tanglewood ...owed a 23 per cent increase over 1972, and established an all time record, officials said Sunday.

Weekend attendance at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was 29,490 for the 1973 season.

That brought the total summer attendance for all musical events to 313,774.

TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM (E)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
D. 30,000
AUG 27 1973
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Set All-Time Record

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — Total attendance at Tanglewood showed a 23 per cent increase over 1972, and established an all time record, officials said Sunday.

Weekend attendance at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was 29,490 for the 1973 season.

That brought the total summer attendance for all musical events to 313,774.

AUG 30 1973

Tanglewood

Final Concert Is Most Memorable

Sunday, Aug. 26

The last Sunday of the Tanglewood season is generally described with superlatives. From pre-concert traffic to closing ovation, and including the huge musical offering between, the day is bound to be the most memorable. Verdi's Requiem fitted the occasion and conductor Ozawa and his musical forces were at their best.

This was unquestionably one of the finest performances of Verdi's masterpiece one could hear. It is hard to imagine better teamwork than that shown by Mr. Ozawa and soloists, Lou Ann Wyckoff, soprano; Maureen Forrester, mezzo; Seth McCoy, tenor; and Ezio Flagello, basss. (Messrs. McCoy and Flagello were last-minute substitutes for Guiseppe Giacomini and Stafford Dean.)

The B.S.O. certainly has never played with more responsiveness and precision. The chorus, though occasionally top-heavy and, in the male sections, somewhat sluggish and harsh-toned, improved steadily throughout the afternoon, reaching near perfection in the "Libera me."

Mr. Ozawa's conception of the piece demonstrated a glorious blend of pure drama, musical subtlety, and religious mysticism. The antiphonal brass choirs in the "Dies irae" were overwhelming in dramatic force.

In the complex interplay between orchestra and soloists later in the same movement, Verdi, the pure musician, was evident. Unbearable tension was created by Miss Wyckoff and the orchestra in the "Tremens" section. The beautifully-woven grand design, with innumberable bright spots, was climaxed by a profoundly moving a cappella reprise of the initial "Requiem" and a towering fugue.

Judging by the orchestra's response this afternoon, Mr. Ozawa has settled in as captain of the sometimes cantankerous Boston Symphony. He seems to command its respect and certainly ours as well.

John Hinners

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
W. 4,405
AUG 30 1973
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood's Best Year Yet

LENOX, Mass. (AP)— Total attendance at Tanglewood showed a 23 per cent increase over 1972, and established an all time record, officials said Sunday.

Weekend attendance at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was 29,490 for the 1973 season.

That brought the total summer attendance for all musical events to 313,774.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE (E)
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
D. 15,595
AUG 27 1973
New England Newsclip

GLOBE (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042
AUG 28 1973
New England Newsclip

MICHAEL STEINBERG

Requiem heard at Tanglewood

LENOX — Verdi's Requiem, with which Seiji Ozawa closed the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon, needs soloists of the front rank. An excellent Aida, Amneris, Radames, and King Philipp do nicely. But the Boston Symphony goes about it as casually as though it were a question of casting Ruiz and Inez for a "Trovatore" in Hopkinton. I cannot say whether it is mere ineptness, or ineptness allied to stinginess, but the outcome Sunday was mostly miserable.

There was, in fact, one admirable soloist, the tenor Seth McCoy, but we owed him to no one's planning, as he had been called in to replace a certain Giuseppe Giacomini whom Ozawa had to send home to Padua during rehearsals because of his affinity for pitches other than the ones Verdi wrote. McCoy has no velvet to his tone and little suggestion of the most precious metals, but his voice is strong, virile, and controlled. He sang ardently, communicatively, with intelligence and impeccable musical taste. "He sings with more than voice," was the comment at intermission of a woman in the audience, and that really says it all.

Maureen Forrester, the mezzo-soprano soloist, is one of the best of musicians among singers, and, for that matter, one of the best singers among them, too, but she was miscast here. She is not believable in Italian music: the drama, in spite of all the confidential hunching forward as she tells stories about the day of judgment, stays all on the outside, and the voice itself seems in costume.

Now when you put a quartet together, one thing to be considered is compatibility of voices, yet one of the most persistent factors here was the stubborn non-blend of Forrester's voice with that of the soprano, Luanne Wyckoff. It really undid the Recordare and the Agnus Dei. Wyckoff has a pleasant voice, though the low notes have no weight and the top ones no cutting edge, but she doesn't know how to sing. She looks uncomfortable, what with the lower half of her face vibrating like a road drill, and whatever she is doing there gives her no control over pitch, loudness, speed of production, or the color of the holds. With all stops out, she managed well enough; elsewhere she was, understandably, in a panic and performed accordingly.

Ezio Flagello, the bass, was another sort of cause for sadness. When he first came on the scene in the late Fifties, he offered an impressive combination of good voice and scrupulous musicianship, and he made distinguished contributions to Leinsdorf's Tanglewood performances of the Verdi Requiem in 1964 and 1967. Lately, though, he has turned into a rhythmless barker, and the rough, uneasy sound of him Sunday was no pleasure. He, too, was a replacement but not of such short notice as Mr. McCoy or as a program insert would have had us believe. In a remarkable moment of medical prescience, Stafford Dean, who sang "Messiah" here on Aug. 12, knew then that he would be "indisposed" a fortnight hence.

Seiji Ozawa helped hardly at all, and I think it is not overstating the case to say that he does not know the Requiem. He conducted it from memory and he didn't get lost, but that is not the level of knowing I have in mind. I mean that he does not know how the piece works. Specifically, he hasn't a clue about the tempi, regarding which Verdi's directions are explicit, helpful, and essential. Ozawa got them wrong, persistently, in themselves and in relation to each other, and the expression was therefore wrong, too, and structural cohesion was not in the picture at all. Ozawa phrases well, is energetic, and has feeling for the sonorous values of the work (the Boston Symphony and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus were in that sense effective). It was painfully insufficient, though, and the more painful for coming from so gifted a musician.

Ozawa's vital Verdi at Tanglewood

By Louis Snyder

Lenox, Mass.

There were 11,641 listeners in the Shed and on the lawns at Tanglewood

Music

on Sunday afternoon when Seiji Ozawa and the Boston Symphony brought the 1973 Berkshire Festival to a close. A grand total of 313,774 — 23 percent over 1972 — attended this summer's events, giving the lie to those who think that no one listens to "good music" any more.

Sunday's crowd was on hand to hear Verdi's Manzoni Requiem, which, in Tanglewood's 30-plus years, has had only two performances here. And a magnet for the general curiosity, no doubt, was to hear how Mr. Ozawa, whose success with large choral works has been prodigious in previous seasons, would treat this enormous, throbbing Verdian masterpiece..

Several approaches

In addition to the full orchestra, the Requiem requires four major soloists (soprano Lou Ann Wycoff, contralto Maureen Forrester, tenor Seth McCoy, bass Ezio Flagello), large choral forces (the Tanglewood Choir and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus), and two authoritative conducting hands to bring them all together in the context of a consistent interpretation, of which several are possible.

Last spring in Boston, William Steinberg revived the Requiem with the BSO at Symphony Hall, after many seasons' absence, in a concept of monumental dignity and solemnity.

Inner fire

On Sunday, Mr. Ozawa, whose past experience with the Requiem would understandably be less extensive, took a different approach. He sought out and clarified the strongly dramatic and soaringly melodic passages, so typical of Verdi's style and so paintakingly refined by the composer, in this instance, to build a perfect and reverent work.

It was this added emphasis (but by no means exaggeration) that brought to Mr. Ozawa's individualistic reading a sweeping, seething locomotion entirely fitting the Requiem's burning concern with Judgment Day. Contrasts were strong and their effects on the listener were wrenching. This was a concept that exemplified the inner fire of Verdi, rather than the overwhelming outward expression of his grief, and was, in its final impact, equally allowable and effective.

The singing by the choir and festival chorus was, as it has been all summer, magnificent — a tribute to the magic of its director, John Oliver. Of the soloists Miss Forrester and Mr. Flagello are mellifluous veterans of the Requiem — a fact made comfortably evident throughout the afternoon, while Mr. McCoy, deputizing on short notice, met the high ranging demands of the tenor part with great finesse and beauty.

Miss Wycoff, making her debut with the BSO, has many of the requirements, at this comparatively early stage in her career, of a true Verdian soprano — an ample voice of wide range and rich texture, particularly in the lower register, and a musicianly application toward performance. What the Requiem traditionally needs, however, along with everything else, are floating top notes, and these Miss Wycoff could seemingly supply only with some conscious effort. Obviously they'll be there, in time, to dazzle us all, but on Sunday, even after an impressive rendition of the "Libera me," the crowning top one came shorter than she would have wanted, and than it will with more expereience. Not a catastrophy, certainly, but food for thought for an intelligent, talented singer.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 137,397
AUG 29 1973
New England Newsclip

HERALD-AMERICAN (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 424,554
AUG 30 1973
New England Newsclip

GAZETTE (E)
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 92,743
AUG 27 1973
New England Newsclip

Attendance Record Set at Tanglewood

LENOX — Total attendance at Tanglewood showed a 23 percent increase over 1972, and established an all time record, officials said.

Weekend attendance at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was 29,490 for the 1973 season.

That brought the total summer attendauce for all musical events to 313,774.

Attendance Rise For Tanglewood

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — Total attendance at Tanglewood showed a 23 per cent increase over 1972, and established an all time record, officials said Sunday.

Weekend attendance at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was 29,490 for the 1973 season.

That brought the total summer attendance for all musical events to 313,774.

MILLERTON, N. Y.
NEWS
W. 1,500
AUG 30 1973

Tanglewood Attendance Record Set

LENOX (AP) — Total attendance at Tanglewood showed a 23 per cent increase over 1972, and established an all time record, officials said yesterday.

Weekend attendance at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was 29,490 for the 1973 season.

That brought the total summer attendance for all musical events to 313,774.

SENTINEL (E)
FITCHBURG, MASS.
D. 24,091
AUG 27 1973
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood

Final Concert Is Most Memorable

Sunday, Aug. 26

The last Sunday of the Tanglewood season is generally described with superlatives. From pre-concert traffic to closing ovation, and including the huge musical offering between, the day is bound to be the most memorable. Verdi's Requiem fitted the occasion and conductor Ozawa and his musical forces were at their best.

This was unquestionably one of the finest performances of Verdi's masterpiece one could hear. It is hard to imagine better teamwork than that shown by Mr. Ozawa and soloists, Lou Ann Wyckoff, soprano; Maureen Forrester, mezzo; Seth McCoy, tenor; and Ezio Flagello, basss. (Messrs. McCoy and Flagello were last-minute substitutes for Guiseppe Giacomini and Stafford Dean.)

The B.S.O. certainly has never played with more responsiveness and precision. The chorus, though occasionally top-heavy and, in the male sections, somewhat sluggish and harsh-toned, improved steadily throughout the afternoon, reaching near perfection in the "Libera me."

Mr. Ozawa's conception of the piece demonstrated a glorious blend of pure drama, musical subtlety, and religious mysticism. The antiphonal brass choirs in the "Dies irae" were overwhelming in dramatic force.

In the complex interplay between orchestra and soloists later in the same movement, Verdi, the pure musician, was evident. Unbearable tension was created by Miss Wyckoff and the orchestra in the "Tremens" section. The beautifully woven grand design, with innumberable bright spots, was climaxed by a profoundly moving a cappella reprise of the initial "Requiem" and a towering fugue.

Judging by the orchestra's response this afternoon, Mr. Ozawa has settled in as captain of the sometimes cantankerous Boston Symphony. He seems to command its respect and certainly ours as well.

John Hinners

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
D. 4,405
AUG 30 1973
New England Newsclip

TELEGRAM (M)
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 60,219
AUG 27 1973
New England Newsclip

Verdi Requiem Ends Tanglewood Season

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — The 36th Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood came to an auspicious close yesterday afternoon with a dazzling performance of Verdi's Requiem, featuring the Boston Symphony with mixed chorus and soloists, conducted by Seiji Ozawa.

Perfect weather for all three concerts encouraged audiences of 29,490 to attend the eighth weekend.

Total attendance for the eight weeks of 24 concerts and eight open rehearsals was 313,774, an increase of 60,348 over the 1972 festival.

Yesterday the Verdi Requiem received a somewhat electic performance in spite of strong domination from Ozawa's baton.

The audience of 11,641 was completely enthralled and let this be known in no uncertain terms.

Ozawa faced its operatic dimension and style squarely, particularly in the orchestral and choral ensemble roles. Its spiritual significance was concentrated mainly in the text, sung clearly in Latin by the Tanglewood Choir and Festival Chorus.

Compelling Contrasts

It's hard to imagine more compelling contrasts than the Kyrie's appeal for mercy, overpowering oratory of the Dies Irae, and anguish of the Rex Tremendae.

John Oliver had thoroughly versed the chorus of 125 in mechanics and significance.

An outstanding moment of beauty was the soprano-mezzo duet, Recordare, sung by Lou Ann Wyckoff and Maureen Forrester. Elsewhere, the soprano's voice underwent its moments of pitch uncertainty. The mezzo's voice was opulent, even radiant.

Both male singers were last-minute substitutes. Giuseppe Giacomini, tenor, and Stafford Dean, bass, canceled because of illness.

Tenor Seth McCoy was especially impressive in the Kyrie. Ezio Flagello rought his portion of the Dies Irae and Confutatis to high points of drama.

Solo quartets were balanced and unified in spirit.

A Mixed Bag

Friday night's all-Berlioz program was a combination of magnificence and medicority. The plus was the "Fantastic" Symphony — the minus, "Lelio," for narrator, male soloists and chorus.

Briefly, in the "Fantastic" Berlioz vents his vengenance on his beloved who spurns him. "Lelio," or "Return to Life," tells his recovery from deliriums and contemp for his fellow human beings.

"Fantastic" can be heard as a superb piece of orchestration without getting involved with the composer's hysteria. Ozawa's performance was a marvel of detail, even in the third movement, where cues come in rapid profusion. The orchestra was at its level best. Drama ran over in all five movements; even the waltz had its own glitter and the ending wasn't fractured by Ozawa's breakneck speed.

Michael Wager narrated the text of "Lelio" in full accord with its purple prose, but amplification was poor. The performance would have been better off without tenor Mallory Walker's strain and unreliability in the title role.

Victor Braum's baritone was resonantly applied to the role of the brigand's captain.

The Tanglewood Festival Chorus and orchestra worked valiantly at a thankless role. But the narrator's bitter harangue, orchestra and chorus filing in the stage during the performance and the work itself were a pathetic anticlimax to the preceding "Fantastic."

Two strong personalities were witnessed at Saturday night's concert — conductor James de Preist, associate conductor of the Washington National Symphony in his Boston Symphony debut, and pianist Byron Janis in Rachmaninoff's Third.

De Preist is a giant of a man who was stricken with polio about 10 years ago. He uses a cane and conducts seated.

Shostakovich's Fifth Symphony and the Prelude from Moussorgsky's "Khovanshchina" were admirable vehicles to display this remarkable conductor's unfettered style and clarity of thought. In the Moussorgsky, de Preist held melody in paramount position, beautifully voiced in woodwinds. Certainly not a splashy concert opener, the five variations were consistently absorbing for rich tonal clolor. This was just as vital in the fragile sections as vigorous interludes.

Not in Top Form

Compared to past performances, Janis was not in top form for the Rachmaninoff Third Piano Concerto.

De Preist and the orchestra gave him marvelous backing — far more than the usual accompaniment.

Underlying Janis' playing was a broad, structured concept of the work, and a degree of elan. But everything at the keyboard seemed to entail laborious effort and stress. We don't recall Janis having previously to raise himself six inches from the piano seat to achieve a fortissimo. Note playing was generally accurate. There was a frailty of tone in the first movement that grew to greater dynamic potency in the finale. But by then, it was too late.

...wood Attendance

...NOX, Mass. (AP) — Total attendance at Tanglewood showed a 23 per cent increase over 1972, and established an all time record, officials said Sunday.

Weekend attendance at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was 29,490 for the 1973 season.

That brought the total summer attendance for all musical events to 313,774.

NEWS (E)
GARDNER, MASS.
D. 5,862
AUG 27 1973
New England Newsclip

TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM (E)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
D. 30,000
AUG 27 1973
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Set All-Time Record

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — Total attendance at Tanglewood showed a 23 per cent increase over 1972, and established an all time record, officials said Sunday.

Weekend attendance at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was 29,490 for the 1973 season.

That brought the total summer attendance for all musical events to 313,774.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 55,038

AUG 24 1973

Tanglewood Plans Final Weekend

The eighth and closing weekend at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., begins at 7 p.m. today, with pianist Peter Serkin and the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performing Brahms' Clarinet trio in A minor and Pavel's Piano trio.

Music director— Seiji Ozawa will conduct the orchestra in an all-Berlioz program, beginning with the "Symphonie Fantastique" and followed by Lelio, with Mallory Walker, tenor, Victor Braun, baritone, Michael Wager as narrator and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus with John Oliver as conductor.

At 10:30 a.m. Saturday, as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an open rehearsal of works to be performed Sunday.

James de Priest, associate conductor of the Washington National Symphony, will conduct the orchestra in Mussorgskv's Prelude to "Khovanshchina", Rachmaninov's Piano Concerto No. 3 in D minor, with Byron Janis as soloist, and Shoktakovich's Symphony No. 5 at 8:30 p.m. Saturday.

At 2:30 p.m., Sunday in the final concert of the 1973 Tanglewood season, Seiji Ozawa will conduct the orchestra in Verdi's "Manzoni Requiem" with Lou Ann Wyckoff, soprano, Maureen Forrester, contralto, Giuseppe Giacomini, tenor, Stafford Dean, bass, and the Tanglewood Choir and Festival Chorus with John Oliver as conductor.

JAMES DePRIEST
At Tanglewood

TRANSCRIPT (E)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
D. 13,700

AUG 24 1973 New England Newscip

Tanglewood

The eighth and closing weekend at Tanglewood begins tonight at 7 with pianist Peter Serkin and the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performing Brahms' Clarinet trio in A minor and Pavel's Piano trio. At 9 p.m., Music Director Seiji Ozawa conducts the orchestra in an all Berlioz program, beginning with the Symphonie Fantastique and followed by Lelio with Mallory Walker, tenor; Victor Braun, baritone; Michael Wagner, narrator and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus with John Oliver, conductor.

Tomorrow night at 8.30, James de Preist, Associate Conductor of the Washington National Symphony, conducts the Orchestra in Mussorgskv's Prelude to "Khovanshchina," Rachmaninov's Piano Concerto No. 3 in D minor with Byron Janis as soloist and Shoktakovich's Symphony No. 5.

Sunday afternoon at 2.30, Seiji Ozawa will conduct the final concert of the 1973 Tanglewood season. The Orchestra will play Verdi's Manzoni Requiem with Lou Ann Wyckoff soprano, Maureen Forrester, contralto; Giuseppe Gicamini, tenor; Stafford Dean, bass; and the Tanglewood Choir and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, with John Oliver, conductor.

Tanglewood Festival Comes to Close

By LOUIS SNYDER
Monitor News Service

LENOX — There were 11,641 listeners in the Shed and on the lawns at Tanglewood on Sunday afternoon when Seiji Ozawa and the Boston Symphony brought the 1973 Berkshire Festival to a close. A grand total of 313,774 — 23 per cent over 1972 -- attended this summer's events, giving the lie to those who think that no one listens to "good music" any more.

Sunday's crowd was on hand to hear Verdi's Manzoni Requiem, which, in Tanglewood's 30-plus years, has had only two performances here. And a magnet for the general curiosity, no doubt, was to hear how Ozawa, whose success with large choral works has been prodigious in previous seasons, would treat this enormous, throbbing Verdian masterpiece.

Several Approaches

In addition to the full orchestra, the Requiem requires four major soloists (soprano Lou Ann Wycoff, contralto Maureen Forrester, tenor Seth McCoy, bass Ezio Flagello), large choral forces (the Tanglewood Choir and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus), and two authoritative conducting hands to bring them all together in the context of a consistent interpretation, of which several are possible.

Last spring in Boston, William Steinberg revived the Requiem with the BSO at Symphony Hall, after many seasons' absence, in a concept of monumental dignity and solemnity.

On Sunday, Ozawa, whose past experience with the Requiem would understandably be less extensive, took a different approach. He sought out and clarified the strongly dramatic and soaringly melodic passages, so typical of Verdi's style and so paintakingly refined by the composer, in this instance, to build a perfect and reverent work.

It was this added emphasis (but by no means exaggeration) that brought to Ozawa's individualistic reading a sweeping, seething locomotion entirely fitting the Requiem's burning concern with Judgment Day. Contrasts were strong and their effects on the listener were wrenching. This was a concept that exemplified the inner fire of Verdi, rather than the overwhelming outward expression of his grief, and was, in its final impact, equally allowable and effective.

The singing by the choir and festival chorus was, as it has been all summer, magnificent — a tribute to the magic of its director, John Oliver. Of the soloists Miss Forrester and Flagello are mellifluous veterans of the Requiem — a fact made comfortably evident throughout the afternoon, while McCoy, deputizing on short notice, met the high ranging demands of the tenor part with great finesse and beauty.

Miss Wycoff, making her debut with the BSO, has many of the requirements, at this comparatively early stage in her career, of a true Verdian soprano — an ample voice of wide range and rich texture, particularly in the lower register, and a musicianly application toward performance.

What the Requiem traditionally needs, however, along with everything else, are floating top notes, and these Miss Wycoff could seemingly supply only with some conscious effort. Obviously they'll be there, in time, to dazzle us all, but on Sunday, even after an impressive rendition of the "Libera me," the crowning top one came shorter than she, would have wanted, and than it will with more experience.

Not a catastrophe, certainly, but food for thought for an intelligent, talented singer.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE (E)
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
D. 15,025

AUG 28 1973 New England Newscip

SUN CHRONICLE (E)
ATTLEBORO, MASS.
D. 19,030

AUG 30 1973 New England Newscip

NEWS (E)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,508

AUG 25 1973 New England Newscip

Ozawa Conducts Berlioz Excitingly at Tanglewood

By RICHARD CONWAY

Two towering musical intelligences united at Tanglewood Friday night, and the result was yet another incredible night of exciting and electrifying performance.

One of the intelligences was that of Hector Berlioz, one of the most original minds in all music history. The nineteenth century French romantic blazed the way for programmatic music, and lifted the art of orchestration to new heights.

The other intelligence is that of Seiji Ozawa, a conductor whose interpretive powers know few equals. His performances always seem to have the inevitable mark of definitiveness about them.

Two Berlioz Works

Friday night, Ozawa chose two of Berlioz' works, one very familiar to any regular concert-goer or to one who has taken any survey course in music history — the "Symphonic fantastique"; the other, the less well-known but highly dramatic sequel to it — "Lelio".

Since the "Symphonic fantastique" is rather well-known, we'll center our attention on the "Lelio". Although musically it is not of the stature of the "Fantastique", it is a highly dramatic work and was given a fascinating and powerful performance Friday night.

The work is scored for orchestra, chorus, narrator, two soloists, and, at places, four-hand piano. It was presented in a quasi-staged version Friday night.

The narrator is the hero of the "Symphonie" awakening from his opium-induced dreams. He tries to find his way back to creative life again and to forget the woman who caused his heartbreak and death wish. He seems to succeed in doing so, only to have the strains of the "Fantastique" sound in his mind once more, and he realizes that he will never be able to fully forget.

Simply Brilliant

Michael Wager was simply brilliant in the role of the narrator. Wager is a powerful actor of tremendous range, a marvelous interpreter of words, a master of gesture and nuance.

The Tanglewood Festival Chorus, directed by John Oliver, turned in another fine performance. They were particularly outstanding in the last movement "Fantasia", which represents the spirits of the air.

In this movement too is heard some of the remarkable scoring for which Berlioz is renowned. To match the airy, lightly-dancing choral work, Berlioz has high woodwinds and piano accompany in a flitting, fluttering way that wonderfully evokes the image of the spirits.

Vivid and Exciting

But if the Berlioz works were vivid and exciting, literally riveting one in his chair, so too, in their own way, were the two chamber works played on the Weekend Prelude concert.

Pianist Peter Serkin joined members of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players to perform the Brahms "Clarinet trio in A minor, op. 114", and the Ravel "Piano trio".

Of these works, special mention should be made of the cello playing of Jules Eskin. Eskin draws the kind of marvelous tone from his instrument that Joseph Silverstein does from his violin, free from raspiness, lyric and expressive.

One moment in the Brahms stands out in the memory. In the second movement Adagio, the cello is playing a solo line. Over this the clarinet builds a long crescendo. Harold Wright played it beautifully. It was music the way music ought be be played.

BERKSHIRE COURIER
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
W. 3,750

AUG 23 1973 New England Newscip

Final Weekend At Tanglewood Starts Tomorrow

LENOX — The eighth and closing weekend at Tanglewood begins tomorrow at 7:00 p.m. with pianist Peter Serkin and the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performing Brahms' Clarinet trio in A minor and Pavel's Piano trio.

At 9:00 p.m., Music Director Seiji Ozawa conducts the Orchestra in an all-Berlioz program, beginning with the Symphonie fantastique and followed by Lelio with Mallory Walker tenor, Victor Braun baritone, Michael Wager narrator and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor.

On Saturday, at 10:30 a.m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an Oper Rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday.

Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m. James de Preist, Associate Conductor of the Washington National Symphony, conducts the Orchestra in Mussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovanshchina", Rachmaninov's Piano concerto no. 3 in D minor with Byron Janis as soloist, and Shoktakovich's Symphony no. 5

On Sunday, at 2:30 p.m., the final concert of the 1973 Tanglewood season, Seiji Ozawa conducts the Orchestra in Verdi's Manzoni Requiem with Lou Ann Wyckoff soprano, Maureen Forrester contralto, Giuseppe Giacomini tenor, Stafford Dean bass, the Tanglewood Choir and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver conductor.

NEWBURGH, N. Y.
NEWS
D. 32,000

AUG 18 1973

Tanglewood In Finale

LENOX, Mass. — The eighth and closing weekend at Tanglewood here begins Aug. 24 at 7 p.m. with pianist Peter Serkin and the Boston Symphony Chamber Players performing Brahms' "Clarinet Trio in A Minor" and Pavel's "Piano Trio."

At 9 p.m., Music Director Seiji Ozawa conducts the orchestra in an all-Berloiz program, beginning with the "Symphonie Fantastique" and followed by Lelio with Mallory Walker tenor, Victor Braun baritone, Michael Wager as narrator and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus — John Oliver conducting.

On Aug. 25 at 10:30 a.m., as on every Saturday morning throughout the Tanglewood season, there will be an open rehearsal of works to be performed on Sunday.

On Saturday at 8:30 p.m James de Preist, associate conductor of the Washington National Symphony, conducts the orchestra in Mussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovanshchina," Rachmaninov's "Piano Concerto no. 3 in D Minor," with Byron Janis as soloist, and Shoktakovich's "Symphony No. 5."

Concert Review

11,000 Applaud Performance Of Verdi's 'Manzoni' Requiem

BY BERNARD A. DRABECK

More than 11,000 persons were on hand Sunday afternoon for the final performance at the Tanglewood Festival this year. Judging by the roar of approval they gave at the conclusion of the program, most were delighted and impressed by what they had heard.

And they had some very good reasons to be pleased. The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its music director Seiji Ozawa joined forces with the Tanglewood choir and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus (both expertly trained by John Oliver), plus four soloists, to present Guiseppe Verdi's immense "Manzoni" Requiem. And what a work it is!

Of course, some critics have expressed some uneasiness about the unabashed theatricality of the piece — but the Mass for the Dead after all involves man in his primal, ultimate conflict, and Verdi's treatment of this cataclysmic struggle has always impressed me as being exactly right — strong, brave, pure, and terribly exciting.

Let me be even more specific. It is, for me, with Otello and Falstaff, one of the greatest things Verdi ever wrote — which means, that it is one of the greatest things anybody ever created.

Also, among the positive aspects of the afternoon must be counted Ozawa himself. How this conductor has matured since his first appearance with the orchestra! True, he sometimes conducts with a beat that no man can find or follow.

I kept wondering, during the opening "requiem aeternam" how the chorus and orchestra knew where in the world he was — for he gave no discernible upbeat, downbeat, or rhythmic pulse of any kind. And sometimes he still tries so hard for an effect that for a moment control seems to be lost — as in the final moments of the "lacrymosa", where the momentum seemed to dwindle and die.

Generally, however, impulse and effect were strongly shaped, the care for beauty of individual phrases not diminishing a concern for the total arch of the piece. Particularly effective was the Offertorium. In fact, I cannot remember a more satisfying, more convincing reading of this section as a whole, some miscalculation of the tremolo strings on the "Hostias" notwithstanding.

Ozawa also had some interesting ideas about the "Kyrie", but here his attempts were aborted by the various inadequacies of his vocal quartet. What he sought was a slow, stately expansion of the theme as it appeared and reappeared: what he got was a disjointed, fragmentary kind of exercise — here a thrust, there a lunge, and sometimes nothing at all.

And here is where we come to my largest reason for feeling some disappointment in the performance: the Requiem requires four absolutely deluxe voices coupled with some sense of the Verdian style, and the quartet assembled for the afternoon simply were not up to their assignments.

Lou Ann Wyckoff, the soprano, was making her debut at the festival, and it is beyond me why she was engaged in the first place--for neither by temperment or talent is she equipped to sing the Requiem. What I heard, when I could hear her, was either a thin, soft sound, usually employed in the reaches above the staff, or a thin, loud, and absolutely nothing in the way of color or volume between them. Most of the time, she had to rely on the soft sounds--but her desperation and discomfort could not be disguised by a studied attempt to make her way around the music instead of singing it.

At least there was no reason to wonder why Maureen Forrester was selected--for Miss Forrester has been for many years an accomplished performer. And she, at least, could deliver her solos and participate in duets, trios, etc., with absolute stylistic authority, even if finally the large ripeness of sound requisite for the role is no longer hers to command.

It is unfair to say much more about Seth McCoy than that he stepped in at short notice to fill in for an indisposed colleague--and what he did Sunday was certainly respectable, no cause either for alarm or dismay. But Ezio Flagello cannot be so easily excused. He too was a last minute replacement, but he is a veteran performer (unlike Mr. McCoy, a relative newcomer to the operatic, concert scene.) In fact, he was the bass soloist in a performance of the requiem at Tanglewood not too many years ago. I remember that at that time, I found him and his singing somewhat detached in spirit from the rest of the proceedings. And this time, he seemed even more removed from what was going on. No shortage of voice there--and even a considerable acquaintance with the style, but what impressed most once more was a sense of somnolence, of indifference, not to the conductor (for he stared at Ozawa the entire afternoon) but to the music-drama unfolding around him.

But the chorus was good, even excellent at times, and the orchestra was wonderfully alive and responsive to Mr. Ozawa's demands. Unfortunately, a conductor, an orchestra, and a chorus do not a performance of the Verdi Requiem make; so for me, at any rate, there was considerable dross, and most of it vocal, applied to all that gold.

Tanglewood Has Great Season

SPRINGFIELD, MASS., DAILY NEWS, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 29, 1973

This is first item part of two-part article.

By RICHARD CONWAY

"Wasn't that something?" he remarked, as we settled in at the bar for a couple of cold ones at our favorite after - the - concert haunt.

"Yeah," I replied. "It's been some season up here at Tanglewood."

"You know," he said quietly. "I always feel that it's such a privilege to hear great music played the way these guys play it."

We took a long drink.

"You know," he said again, "I think this is the best the Boston Symphony has played in several years."

"I think so," I said. "It's certainly the best I've heard them play in my four years of covering Tanglewood. There have just been so many memorable moments this season."

"I think it's Ozawa. He's just a genius, that's all. He seems to have such rapport with the orchestra; they seem to enjoy playing for him."

"Yeah, I think they do. Not only is the man an impeccable musician, but he has that charisma about him that transforms everyone and everything around him.

"He really seems to enjoy every moment, every measure of the music. I know he's been accused of over - directing, of becoming unnecessarily theatrical, but, God!, the man gets results.

"I remember overhearing one young gal at intermission time saying, 'Gee, he really feels that music. And he makes you feel it too.' "

My friend thought for a moment.

"You know, mentioning that young gal makes me think that I've seen more young people up here than I remember seeing in recent years. Do you think that's due to Ozawa?"

"Partly, at least. He evidently is very popular with the young students up here. Each year at the opening exercises they go wild whenever he makes his little speech.

"But I think too that there is just a general return to traditional concert music. I think a lot of young people are realizing the limitations of popular music styles, and are looking for something with more depth, more staying power. Some are just broadening themselves, becoming more encompassing in their musical tastes. But it certainly is great to see them up here and obviously getting something out of it."

"I like Colin Davis, too," he said. "His performance of "Messiah" was a highlight of the season for me. The choral work in that was just excellent."

"The chorus work all season was outstanding. This guy John Oliver must be really good. The chorus seems to get better each year."

"But you know, Davis is an excellent choral man too. He knows what he wants. I was up to the Saturday morning rehearsal of 'Messiah.' The chorus would sing a passage and it would sound great to me. Then Davis would say, 'No, I'd like it like this,' and he would demonstrate. Then the chorus would sing again, and it would be even better."

"Besides 'Messiah,' what stands out in your mind about this season?"

"Let me think about that a minute. I'll buy us another beer."

(Next: Highlights of the Tanglewood season.)

NEWS (E)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
AUG 29 1973
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood's Sweet Sounds Stilled For Another Season

By Peter M. Knapp

The season is about to turn once more; summer starts to fade. In Lenox over the weekend there was a final flurry of parties and seasonal farewells with the final notes of the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood.

According to tradition, Tanglewood goes out with a major choral work, and so this year the Symphony's incoming music director, Seiji Ozawa, chose Giuseppe Verdi's mighty "Requiem." On the warm, hazy Sunday afternoon, 11,641 came to listen, and several thousand more audited the previous day's long rehearsal.

It was not quite a triumphant conclusion for the BSO, the four soloists, and the combined Tanglewood Choir and Tanglewood Festival Chorus directed by John Oliver. The Verdi "requiem" always leaves its impression — I have yet to hear a bad performance — and certainly much of its sublime vision and extraordinary power were again manifest on this occasion. But unhappily not everything gelled as it might have.

Ozawa relishes these big choral works, and once again he produced a vivid, rational reading. It was probably large in contour with plenty of dramatic flair not only in the awesome outbursts of the Dies Irae episodes (there is hardly any more frightening music than these passages — Tanglewood buffs still talk of the evening when Erich Leinsdorf let loose this tumult at the precise moment a Berkshire storm erupted in thunder and lightning) but also in the hushed moments of supplication.

In its over-all concept and scale — Ozawa is at his best in producing the big picture in theatrical primary colors more than in the scrupulous refinement of details — this was a moving, and at times high-voltage, performance. But there were deficits, the unaccompanied solo ensembles tended to veer off pitch, and even the chorus — for the most part so admirably articulate and lucid — had a rough time with the fugue of the Sanctus.

Since the role of the soprano, especially in the latter sections, is so crucial, Lou Ann Wyckoff's shaky control and variable accuracy, plus the disappearance of her low notes, were unfortunate deficiencies. Miss Wyckoff does have an attractive voice, but on this occasion lacked technical polish.

There was stalwart, radiant singing from tenor Seth McCoy, replacing the previously announced Giuseppe Giacomini, and bass Ezio Flagello (taking over for the indisposed Stafford Dean) contributed some resonant, authoritative solo passages. And while mezzo Maureen Forrester doesn't boom out those velvety tones with the power and ease of yore, she is an artist to admire for her musical point and smooth production.

James de Preist, associate conductor of the Washington National Symphony, made his debut with the orchestra in Saturday evening's enjoyable all-Russian program, heard by 8,420. A winner of the 1964 Dimitri Mitropoulos International Conductors Competition, De Preist is a large man with clear, expansive gestures and obviously a musician of sensitive instincts.

That was evident from the quiet, refined song he drew from the orchestra in the prelude to Mussorgsky's opera, "Khovanshchina" opening the program — music belying the notion of Mussorgsky as a "primitive." And there was an equally satisfying interpretation of Dmitri Shostakovich's Symphony No. 5 concluding the program — clear, expressive and vital.

De Preist obviously knows something about musical structures and building intense climaxes without exaggeration. A good sense of proportion was present throughout the evening.

In between came a virile performance of Rachmaninov's Piano Concerto No. 3 in d minor with Byron Janis as soloist Familiarity has not paled the majestic scope of this concerto with its triumphant themes and supermarket stock of harmonic and pianistic effects. Nor has it made the demands on the soloist seem any easier.

Janis played it nobly, with a dazzling technical command and no fussiness. His fingerwork was brilliant and clean, though I wish there had been more warmth to his tone (perhaps a characteristic of his intrument, whose sonority favored the passagework more than cantabile melody) and somewhat more grandeur of line — occasionally, the primary elements were lost in torrents of detail.

Berlioz was the bill of fare for Friday evening's concert, heard by 6,079. Ozawa, who confesses to be deeply "into" the French composer's music, led performances of the Symphonie Fantastique, Opus 14a and "Lelio, or the return to life," Opus 14b.

Ozawa is certainly "into" the Symphonie Fantastique — it is becoming his theme-work with the Boston Symphony, much as Charles Munch rarely let an oportunity go by to do Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe." And he conducts it superbly, relishing its aching soliloquies and vivid orchestral effects, and giving the Witches' Sabbath a throbbing, exciting ride.

Under Ozawa and with the orchestra's virtuosic playing (one has to mention again Laurence Thorstenberg's eloquent English horn solo in the "Scene in the Fields"), Symphonie Fantastique is a guaranteed crowd-pleaser, and the audience responded with a standing ovation.

"Lelio" is a different matter, a case of artistic inspiration degenerating into commercial potboiler. It's a sequel to the symphony — a kind of "son of Symphonie Fantastique" — composed two years later in which Berlioz has his drugged artist-protagonist recovering from his opium trip to emote about his experiences, the anguish of life and unrequited love, art, and so on — all this "lyric monodrama" crudely linking a series of songs, choruses and orchestral pieces.

The program notes say the pot-pourri was a success in Paris at the time but neither the concept (which reminds us of vaudeville or equally irreverently, Gilbert and Sullivan, when Lelio abruptly calls in a vision of a lusty life with "brigands") nor especially the heart-on-sleeve embarrassments of the romantic language are congenial to our day.

Most of "Lelio," frankly is a bore, and that includes the music which ranges from a pleasant song, "The Fisherman," for baritone and piano, to choruses and to the banalities of a Fantasia on Shakespeare's "The Tempest" — a piece probably better titled "Much Ado About Nothing."

The most interesting music is contained in the "Song of the Brigands" for baritone and chorus, which looks ahead to "The Trojans." Lelio did gain the composer continued recognition, and a wife, but once curosity is satisfied the piece ought to be returned to asterisk status.

The BSO made a stage production out of it, with the narrator entering a darkened, empty stage, the musicians later filing into Shakespearian verses. But narrator Michael Wager seemed uncertain whether to play it straight or exaggerate its excesses and lacked the flair to bring it off. Mallory Walker and Victor Braun were the baritone soloists.

From the sky, Tanglewood's grounds sweep out in a tidy mosaic toward Lake Mahkeenac. Photo from "Tanglewood," published by Barre Publishers in Barre, Mass.

Tallying Up

Tanglewood 1973 was a great box office success, with total attendance at all events hitting a record 313,774, more than 80,000 or approximately 23 per cent more than last year.

The 24 Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in the shed and the Saturday morning open rehearsals attracted 244,926 patrons during the eight-week festival, approximately five per cent more than last year, while the Popular Artist Series had 47,826 listeners and Pops-at-Tanglewood 14,040.

With the ending of the BSO's 1972-73 season, four musicians are leaving the orchestra, including the veteran trumpeter Roger Voisin, a stalwart of the brass section since 1935. Also leaving are violinist Yizhak Schotten, violinist Ayrton Pinto and cellist Stephen Geber.

PATRIOT LEDGER (E)
QUINCY, MASS.
C. 70,020
AUG 28 1973
New England Newsclip

'Verdi Requiem' at Tanglewood

BY ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

As earth and time were being shattered during Verdi's Day of Judgment at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon, it seemed that this must be the kind of music, with its stunning blow to the senses, that Berlioz and others had in mind when they dreamed of musical performances that produced great collective emotional experiences.

At intermission, of course, this euphoria - produced idea was immediately exploded by the nameless lady who complained that she never really liked choral music, that the Verdi Requiem "was not her favorite" and that her view of the "director" (Seiji Ozawa) was obscured which presumably robbed the performance of its remaining interest.

YET, AFTER the initial indignation wore off, one realized that perhaps she wasn't so far wrong, that, really, besides those few moments in the Dies Irae and Tuba mirum, there was not much in this Verdi Requiem performance that was terribly on-turning.

Ozawa had a fine chorus—the Tanglewood Festival ensemble which has proved to be consistently well-prepared, enthusiastic and musical—and, at least, two excellent soloists to work with, but his own basic conception of the work was extremely narrow, capitalizing on the cataclysmic moments and trodding upon the lyrical, supplicating ones.

• Concert Review

IT WAS, in fact, a coarse "gee whiz, listen to that" kind of performance which even Verdi's typically exaggerated dynamic markings (particularly in the quieter end of the scale where he may use pppp) could not soften.

The greatest problems, however, derived from the solo quartet which takes a very prominent part in the Requiem.

Maureen Forrester, whose voice is rather too diffuse and round-edged to penetrate the orchestral texture and whose contralto range does not quite encompass the high notes of this mezzo-soprano part, nevertheless, sang beautifully and with great warmth and dramatic sense.

LIKEWISE, Seth McCoy (a last-minute substitute) whose vocal quality (a different timbre for almost every note, it seems) is even more problematic and who must push to reach the high notes, sang with great feeling for word meanings.

On the other hand, there was Ezio Flagello, the substitute bass, who sings with burly tone and technical ease but who appears to have no idea what the words are that he is expressing.

If I were Lou Ann Wyckoff, the soprano making her BSO debut in the Requiem, I would run to the nearest good voice teacher for help. She is a newcomer with a potentially lovely voice and unbelievably erratic technique.

THE REQUIEM is something that she ought to have in her repertory, but her technique is so unreliable that she really cannot do it.

Although she occasionally can float one of those notes above the staff, most of the time she has to bark them out, loud and explosively. Singing throughout her range, however, is not much more comfortable, entailing as it does a chin pressed to throat, neck tight and strained, and much lifting of shoulders.

Singing ensemble, the soloists strayed so far off-pitch on occasion as to create musical pandemonium.

HERALD-AMERICAN (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 424,654
AUG 26 1973
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood

Final Concert Is Most Memorable

Sunday, Aug. 26

The last Sunday of the Tanglewood season is generally described with superlatives. From pre-concert traffic to closing ovation, and including the huge musical offering between, the day is bound to be the most memorable. Verdi's Requiem fitted the occasion and conductor Ozawa and his musical forces were at their best.

This was unquestionably one of the finest performances of Verdi's masterpiece one could hear. It is hard to imagine better teamwork than that shown by Mr. Ozawa and soloists, Lou Ann Wyckoff, soprano; Maureen Forrester, mezzo; Seth McCoy, tenor; and Ezio Flagello, basss. (Messrs. McCoy and Flagello were last-minute substitutes for Guiseppe Giacomini and Stafford Dean.)

The B.S.O. certainly has never played with more responsiveness and precision. The chorus, though occasionally top-heavy and, in the male sections, somewhat sluggish and harsh-toned, improved steadily throughout the afternoon, reaching near perfection in the "Libera me."

Mr. Ozawa's conception of the piece demonstrated a glorious blend of pure drama, musical subtlety, and religious mysticism. The antiphonal brass choirs in the "Dies irae" were overwhelming in dramatic force.

In the complex interplay between orchestra and soloists later in the same movement, Verdi, the pure musician, was evident. Unbearable tension was created by Miss Wyckoff and the orchestra in the "Tremens" section. The beautifully-woven grand design, with innumberable bright spots, was climaxed by a profoundly moving a cappella reprise of the initial "Requiem" and a towering fugue.

Judging by the orchestra's response this afternoon, Mr. Ozawa has settled in as captain of the sometimes cantankerous Boston Symphony. He seems to command its respect and certainly ours as well.

John Hinners

MILLERTON, N. Y.
NEWS
W. 1,500
AUG 30 1973

FROMM FESTIVAL OF CONTEMPORARY MUSIC

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 56,638
AUG 4 1973

Contemporary Music Listed for Festival

The 10th annual Festival of Contemporary Music, with programs of works for voice, chamber ensemble, orchestra and music theater, begins at 2:30 p.m. tomorrow at Tanglewood in Lenox.

Sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation at Harvard, the festival will present the works of 21 composers, eight of whom have either taught or studied at the Music Center.

Of these composers, Leslie Bassett, Peter Maxwell Davies, Gyorgy Ligeti and Donald Martino are on the composition faculty at the music center.

Five works will be given world premiere performances during the festival, and one a first U. S. performance. Of these works, three have been commissioned by the music center and from foundation for the festival which concludes August 9.

A VOCAL RECITAL, comprimising works of Luigi Nono, Charles Ives, John Cage, Charles Dodge and Peter Maxwell Davies, opens the festival. Two evenings of music theater works followon Aug. 5 and 6, when Bruno Maderna's "Satyricon" will be given its first U.S. performance under the direction of Gunther Schuller, artistic director of the music center.

The American stage premiere of Bo Lawergren's "Triptych," conducted by Tibor Puszati, will be given August 5; on August 6, "Wolfgangerl," a portrait of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, devised by IIan Strasfogel from Mozart's lesser-known music and correspondence, will be given its world premiere performance, conducted by Richard Stamp.

Two evenings of chamber music follow the music theater performances, August 7 and 8. On the former, works by Peter Farmer, Lester Trimble, Leslie Bassett, Donald Martino and Peter Leiberson, whose "concerto for Four Groups of Instruments," commissioned for the festival, will be given its world premieres.

THE SECOND evening of chamber music compromises works by John Cage, Alvin Etler, Brenton Pell Crane, Gyorgy Ligeti and John Heiss, whose "Inventions, Contours and Colors," also specially commissioned, will be given its world premiere.

A program by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra under the direction of Mr. Schuller will complete the festival, Aug. 9. The world premiere performances will be included: James Drew's "West Indian Lights," commissioned jointly by the music center and Fromm Foundation, and Primous Fountain's "Ritual Dances of the Amaks," commissioned by the Fromm Foundation. Robert Hall Lewis' Symphony No. 2 and Don Stewart's "The 200-Bar Passacaglia" complete the program.

NEWS (E)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528
AUG 4 1973
New England Newsclip

Contemporary Music Festival Set

The 10th annual Festival of Contemporary Music, comprising six programs of works for voice, chamber ensembles, orchestra and music theater, commences today at 2:30 p.m. at Tanglewood, Lenox.

Sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation at Harvard, the festival will present the works of 21 composers, eight of whom have either taught or studied at the Music Center. Of these composers, Leslie Bassett, Peter Maxwell Davies, Gyorgy Ligeti and Donald Martino are on the Composition Faculty at the current session of the Music Center.

Five works will be given world premiere performances during the festival, and one a first United States performance. Of these works, three have been specially commissioned by the Music Center and Fromm Foundation for the festival, which concludes Thursday evening, Aug. 9.

A vocal recital, comprising works of Luigi Nono, Charles Ives, John Cage, Charles Dodge and Peter Maxwell Davies, opens the festival Saturday. Two evenings of music theater works follow, Aug. 5 and 6, when Bruno Maderna's "Satyricon" will be given its first U.S. performances under the direction of Gunther Schuller, artistic director of the Music Center.

The American stage premiere of Bo Lawergren's "Triptych," conducted by Tibor Pusztai, will be given Aug. 5; and on Aug. 6, "Wolfgangerl," a portrait of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, devised by Ian Strasfogel from Mozart's lesser-known music and correspondence, will be given its world premiere performance, conducted by Richard Stamp.

Two evenings of chamber music follow the music theater performances, Aug. 7 and 8. On the former will be works by Peter Farmer, Lester Trimble, Leslie Bassett, Donald Martino and Peter Lieberson, whose "Concerto for Four Groups of Instruments," commissioned specially for the festival by the Music Center and Fromm Foundation, will be given its world premiere performance.

The second evening of chamber music comprises works by John Cage, Alvin Etler, Brenton Pell Crane, Gyorgy Ligeti and John Heiss, whose "Inventions, Contours and Colors" will also be given its world premiere performance, have been specially commissioned for the festival by the Music Center and Fromm Foundation.

A program by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra under the direction of Schuller completes the festival, Thursday evening, Aug. 9.

HOUR (E)
NORWALK, CONN.
D. 23,000
AUG 4 1973
New England Newsclip

Festival of Contemporary Music, presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood this week includes: Sunday, Aug. 5, in the West Barn at 8:30 P.M., a music theatre project including" Trphych," Bo Lawergen and "Satyricon," Bruno Manderna; Monday, Aug. 6, Wolfgangerl, A Portrait of W.A. Mozart," and "Satyricon," at 8:30 in the West Barn;Tuesday, Aug. 7, 8:30 P.M. in Theatre-Concert Hall, chamber music by Peter Farmer, Peter Lieberson, Lester Trimble and Leslie Bassett; Wednesday, Aug. 8, 8:30 P.M. Theatre - Concert Hall, chamber music by John Cage, John Heiss, Alvin Etler, Brenton Pell Crane and Gyorgy Ligeti. (413-637-1600).

Third concert of the Summer Chamber Music Series, Silvermine Guild, featuring guest artist Samuel Mayes, cellist. Works by Boccherini, Barber and Schubert at 8 P.M. Sunday, Aug. 12 (966-5617).

At Tangelwood next weekend: Friday, Aug. 10, Weekend Prelude, featuring Phyllis Curtin and Ryan Edwards with the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. 7 P.M.; Mozart Program, conducted by Colin Davis, featuring the "Corporation Mass" and "Prague Symphony" at 9 P.M. Saturday, Aug. 11, Open Rehearsal, 10:30 A.M.; CONCERT, Haydn "Symphony No. 84," Brahms "Symphony No. 2," and Berlioz "Overture to Beatrice and Benedict," 8:30 P.M. Sunday, Aug. 12, Handel's "Messiah," conducted by Colin Davis at 2:30 P.M. (413-637-1600)

MORNING ADVOCATE
BATON ROUGE, LA.
D. 54,562 SUN. 84,562
JUL 24 1973

NEWS
WILLIAMSTOWN, MASS.
W. 1,350
AUG 2 1973
New England Newsclip

Modern music at Tanglewood

Starting Saturday at 2:30 p.m. the 10th annual Festival of Contemporary Music comprising six programs for voice, chamber ensembles, orchestra, and music theatre opens at Tanglewood ~~sponsored by the Berk~~shire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation at Harvard.

Presented will be the works of 21 composers, eight of whom have either taught or studied at the Music Center. Four are on the composition faculty presently at the Music Center. Five works will receive world premieres during the festival, and one a U.S. first performance.

Of these, three have been commissioned by the Music Center and Fromm Foundation for the Festival which ends Aug. 9

At Tanglewood

Festival of Contemporary Music plans six days of concerts

The 10th annual Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood, comprising six programs of works for voice, chamber ensembles, orchestra and music theatre, will begin Saturday at 2:30 p.m.

21 composers

Sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation at Harvard, the festival will present the works of 21 composers, eight of whom have taught or studied at the BMC. Of these composers, Leslie Bassett, Peter Maxwell Davies, Gyorgy Ligeti and Donald Martino are on the composition faculty this season.

Five world premieres and a first U.S. performance of a music theatre project are included in the six-day festival. Of these, three were specifically commissioned by the Fromm Foundation and the BMC.

The program is as follows:

Aug. 4, 2:30 p.m., in the Chamber Music Hall, Berkshire Music Center vocal department, John Oliver, director; Dennis Helmrich, head vocal coach.

Luigi Nono: "Sara Dolce Tacere" (1960) for eight solo voices.

Milton Babbitt: "Vision and Prayer," Judith Nicosia, mezzo-soprano.

John Cage: Five songs for Contralto (1938), Nancy O'Brien, mezzo-soprano.

Charles Dodge: "Speech Songs (1973) for tape.

Peter Maxwell Davies: "Blind Man's Buff" (1972), Candace Natvig, soprano; Bruce Hangen, conductor.

Aug. 5, 8:30 p.m., West Barn. Music theatre project, Ian Strasfogel, director: Gustavo Motta, assistant.

Bo Lawergren: "Triptych" (libretto by Lawergren) American Stage Premiere, Gustavo Motta, producer; Tibor Pusztai, conductor.

Bruno Maderna: "Satyricon" (libretto by Maderna based on Petronius), Strasfogel, producer; Gunther Schuller, conductor. First U.S. performance.

Aug. 6, 8:30 p.m., West Barn.

"Wolfgangerl," a portrait of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, devised by Strasfogel from Mozart's music and correspondence; Strasfogel, producer; Richard Stamp, conductor. (World Premiere).

Bruno Maderna: "Satyricon."

Aug. 7, 8:30 p.m., Theatre-Concert Hall. Chamber Music.

Peter Farmer: Sonata for five Brass Instruments (1971), Pusztai, conductor.

Peter Lieberson: Concerto for Four Groups of Instruments (1973) (World Premiere).

Hangen, conductor. Commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation.

Lester Trimble: "Panels I" (1970), Schuller, conductor.

Leslie Bassett: "Time and Beyond" (1973), Larry Julian, baritone.

Donald Martino: "Notturno" (1973), Antoni Wit, conductor.

Aug 8, 8:30 p.m., Theatre-Concert Hall. Chamber music.

John Cage: "The Wonderful Widow of 18 Springs" (1942), Candace Natvig, soprano: Kim Patterson, piano.

John Cage: "Imaginary Landscape No. 1" (1939), Kazuhiro Koizumi, conductor.

John Heiss: "Inventions, Contours and Colors" (1973) (World Premiere), Tonu Kalam, conductor. Commissioned by the Center and Fromm Music Foundation.

Alvin Etler: Concerto for Clarinet with Chamber Ensemble (1962), Steve Owens, clarinet; Emil Chakarov, conductor.

Brenton Pell Crane: String Quartet Music (1971).

Gyorgy Ligeti: 10 Pieces for Woodwind Quintet (1968).

Aug 9, 8:30 p.m. Theatre-Concert Hall. Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, Schuller, conductor.

James Drew: "West Indian Lights" (1973) (World Premiere). Commissioned by the BMC and Fromm Foundation.

Robert Hall Lewis: Symphony No. 2 (1971).

Primous Fountain: "Ritual Dances of the Amaks" (World Premiere), commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation.

Don Stewart: "The 200-Bar Passacaglia" (1972).

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
JUL 31 1973
New England Newsclip

SUN (E)
LOWELL, MASS.
D. 54,500
AUG 3 1973
New England Newsclip

A Place in... THE SUN

By FRANCES BERG

IF YOU LIKE "discovering" musicians, this is the week.

Tomorrow, the annual week-long Tanglewood Festival of Contemporary Music begins, running Aug. 4 to 9 in that musical mecca near Lenox in the Berkshires. The works of a trio of young men who received 1973 commissions for new works from the Berkshire Music Center — which is the summer training institute for musicians at Tanglewood, operated by the Boston Symphony Orchestra — will be featured. Awarded in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation at Harvard, long a supporter of contemporary music activities at Tanglewood, the commissions were received earlier this year by composers James Drew, John Heiss and Peter Lieberson. Their commissioned works will be previewed during the festival week beginning tomorrow.

A little about the trio . . . James Drew, who chose the orchestral approach for the festival, is a graduate of Tulane and Washington Universities who's been teaching composition and Afro-American music at Yale . . . A commission for chamber music work for eleven players was received by composer John Heiss, who's been taught by Milton Babbit, Earl Kim, Otto Luening, Darius Milhaud and Peter Westergaard, and has most recently been playing flute with the Boston Musica Viva, meanwhile teaching at the New England Conservatory . . . Completing the new composer trio is Peter Lieberson. The first portion of his commissioned "Concerto for Four Groups of Instruments" was previewed in New York City earlier this season by Speculum Musicae. Studying to complete a graduate degree at Columbia, Lieberson studied with Charles Wuorinen and privately with Milton Babbitt. During the past year, he's been a musical assistant to the famed Leonard Bernstein.

MORNING ADVOCATE
BATON ROUGE, LA.
D. 54,562 SUN. 84,562
AUG 5 1973

CAPITALITES

By Anne Price

New Music Faculty

The LSU School of Music will have two additional members on the faculty this fall, both with distinguished background in their specialized fields.

And there will be some temporary faculty changes during the year as some professors are on sabbatical leave.

The new faculty members are composer James Drew and percussionist Donald Gilbert.

Gilbert, who comes from the Eastman School of Music, has his master's degree from Michigan State University and is working on his doctorate at the University of Michigan.

He will teach percussion at LSU, and his background includes a great deal of professional performance as well as teaching in public schools. While at Eastman, he toured Russia with the Eastman Orchestra.

Drew, who comes from Yale to be an assistant professor, teaching music theory, is a Tulane graduate who has been on the Yale faculty for six years. He is well known as an American composer, and originated the Yale Studio for Electronic Music and the first courses on Afro-American music and the music of Charles Ives at Yale.

He has been commissioned to compose numerous works, and his latest commission, "West Indain Light," was premiered this month at the Tanglewood Institute of the Berkshire Music Center in Massachusetts, performed by the Boston Symphony. The work was commissioned by the Fromm Foundation.

111

JAMES DREW

James Drew Joining LSU Music School

American composer James Drew is joining the LSU music faculty in a permanent position to teach music theory.

Drew is due on the campus Aug. 23. e will be an assistant professor of music.

A native of St. Paul, Minn., and a graduate of Tulane University, Drew has been on the Yale University music faculty for the past six years.

In addition to compositions, Drew made three major innovations in music instruction at Yale.

He originated the Yale Studio for Electronic Music and initiated Yale's first courses on Afro-American music and the music of Charles Ives.

His seven movement orchestral work, "West Indian Lights," will be given its world premiere Aug. 9 at the Tanglewood Institute of the Berkshire Music Center in Massachusetts, where Drew is a composer in residence for the summer.

Drew has written works for orchestra and chorus, tone poems, a ciola concerto, a chamber symphony and a double concerto for two cellos.

He is now writing a book on the history of Afro-American music.

"West Indian Lights," was commissioned by the Boston Symphony-Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation.

Drew has studied composition with Wallingford Riegger and Edgard Varese in New York and has taught at Washington University and Northwestern University.

He is a currently a Guggenheim Fellow and on leave from Yale.

AFTER DARK
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY - CIRC. N. AVAIL.
AUG 1973

The Classical Scene

At Tanglewood the Berkshire Music Center is offering four commissioned works by three young American composers between the 4th and 9th during the week-long Festival of Contemporary Music. The three men are James Drew, John Heiss, and Peter Lieberson.

FROMM FESTIVAL
OF CONTEMPORARY MUSIC

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 56,638
AUG 4 1973

Contemporary Music Listed for Festival

The 10th annual Festival of Contemporary Music, with six programs of works for voice, chamber ensemble, orchestra and music theater, begins at 2:30 p.m. tomorrow at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass.

Sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation at Harvard, the festival will present the works of 21 composers, eight of whom have either taught or studied at the Music Center.

Of these composers, Leslie Bassett, Peter Maxwell Davies, Gyorgy Ligeti and Donald Martino are on the composition faculty at the music center.

Five works will be given world premiere performances during the festival, and one a first U. S. performance. Of these works, three have been commissioned by the music center and from foundation for the festival which concludes August 9.

A VOCAL RECITAL, comprimising works of Luigi Nono, Charles Ives, John Cage, Charles Dodge and Peter Maxwell Davies, opens the festival. Two evenings of music theater works followon Aug. 5 and 6, when Bruno Maderna's "Satyricon" will be given its first U.S. performance under the direction of Gunther Schuller, artistic director of the music center.

The American stage premiere of Bo Lawergren's "Triptych," conducted by Tibor Puszati, will be given August 5; on August 6, "Wolfgangerl," a portrait of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, devised by Ilan Strasfogel from Mozart's lesser-known music and correspondence, will be given its world premiere performance, conducted by Richard Stamp.

Two evenings of chamber music follow the music theater performances, August 7 and 8. On the former, works by Peter Farmer, Lester Trimble, Leslie Bassett, Donald Martino and Peter Leiberson, whose "concerto for Four Groups of Instruments," commissioned for the festival, will be given its world premieres.

THE SECOND evening of chamber music compromises works by John Cage, Alvin Etler, Brenton Pell Crane, Gyorgy Ligeti and John Heiss, whose "Inventions, Contours and Colors," also specially commissioned, will be given its world premiere.

A program by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra under the direction of Mr. Schuller will complete the festival, Aug. 9. The world premiere performances will be included: James Drew's "West Indian Lights," commissioned jointly by the music center and Fromm Foundation, and Primous Fountain's "Ritual Dances of the Amaks," commissioned by the Fromm Foundation. Robert Hall Lewis' Symphony No. 2 and Don Stewart's "The 200-Bar Passacaglia" complete the program.

NEWS (E)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
AUG 4 1973
New England Newsclip

Contemporary Music Festival Set

The 10th annual Festival of Contemporary Music, comprising six programs of works for voice, chamber ensembles, orchestra and music theater, commences today at 2:30 p.m. at Tanglewood, Lenox.

Sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation at Harvard, the festival will present the works of 21 composers, eight of whom have either taught or studied at the Music Center. Of these composers, Leslie Bassett, Peter Maxwell Davies, Gyorgy Ligeti and Donald Martino are on the Composition Faculty at the current session of the Music Center.

Five works will be given world premiere performances during the festival, and one a first United States performance. Of these works, three have been specially commissioned by the Music Center and Fromm Foundation for the festival, which concludes Thursday evening, Aug. 9.

A vocal recital, comprising works of Luigi Nono, Charles Ives, John Cage, Charles Dodge and Peter Maxwell Davies, opens the festival Saturday. Two evenings of music theater works follow, Aug. 5 and 6, when Bruno Maderna's "Satyricon" will be given its first U.S. performances under the direction of Gunther Schuller, artistic director of the Music Center.

The American stage premiere of Bo Lawergren's "Triptych," conducted by Tibor Pusztai, will be given Aug. 5; and on Aug. 6, "Wolfgangerl," a portrait of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, devised by Ian Strasfogel from Mozart's lesser-known music and correspondence, will be given its world premiere performance, conducted by Richard Stamp.

Two evenings of chamber music follow the music theater performances, Aug. 7 and 8. On the former will be works by Peter Farmer, Lester Trimble, Leslie Bassett, Donald Martino and Peter Lieberson, whose "Concerto for Four Groups of Instruments," commissioned specially for the festival by the Music Center and Fromm Foundation, will be given its world premiere performance.

The second evening of chamber music comprises works by John Cage, Alvin Etler, Brenton Pell Crane, Gyorgy Ligeti and John Heiss, whose "Inventions, Contours and Colors" will also be given its world premiere performance, have been specially commissioned for the festival by the Music Center and Fromm Foundation.

A program by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra under the direction of Schuller completes the festival, Thursday evening, Aug. 9.

HOUR (E)
NORWALK, CONN.
AUG 4 1973
New England Newsclip

Festival of Contemporary Music, presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood this week includes: Sunday, Aug. 5, in the West Barn at 8:30 P.M., a music theatre project including" Trphych," Bo Lawergen and "Satyricon," Bruno Manderna; Monday, Aug. 6, Wolfgangerl, A Portrait of W.A. Mozart," and "Satyricon," at 8:30 in the West Barn;Tuesday, Aug. 7, 8:30 P.M. in Theatre-Concert Hall, chamber music by Peter Farmer, Peter Lieberson, Lester Trimble and Leslie Bassett; Wednesday, Aug. 8, 8:30 P.M. Theatre - Concert Hall, chamber music by John Cage, John Heiss, Alvin Etler, Brenton Pell Crane and Gyorgy Ligeti. (413-637-1600).

Third concert of the Summer Chamber Music Series, Silvermine Guild, featuring guest artist Samuel Mayes, cellist. Works by Boccherini, Barber and Schubert at 8 P.M. Sunday, Aug. 12. (966-5617).

At Tangelwood next weekend: Friday, Aug. 10, Weekend Prelude, featuring Phyllis Curtin and Ryan Edwards with the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. 7 P.M.; Mozart Program, conducted by Colin Davis, featuring the "Corporation Mass" and "Prague Symphony" at 9 P.M. Saturday, Aug. 11, Open Rehearsal, 10:30 A.M.; CONCERT, Haydn "Symphony No. 84," Brahms "Symphony No. 2," and Berlioz "Overture to Beatrice and Benedict," 8:30 P.M. Sunday, Aug. 12, Handel's "Messiah," conducted by Colin Davis at 2:30 P.M. (413-637-1600)

MORNING ADVOCATE
BATON ROUGE, LA.
D. 84,562 SUN. 84,562
JUL 24 1973

NEWS
WILLIAMSTOWN, MASS.
AUG 2 1973

Modern music at Tanglewood

Starting Saturday at 2:30 p.m. the 10th annual Festival of Contemporary Music comprising six programs for voice, chamber ensembles, orchestra, and music theatre opens at Tanglewood sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation at Harvard.

Presented will be the works of 21 composers, eight of whom have either taught or studied at the Music Center. Four are on the composition faculty presently at the Music Center. Five works will receive world premieres during the festival, and one a U.S. first performance.

Of these, three have been commissioned by the Music Center and Fromm Foundation for the Festival which ends Aug. 9

JAMES DREW

James Drew Joining LSU Music School

American composer James Drew is joining the LSU music faculty in a permanent position to teach music theory.

Drew is due on the campus Aug. 23. e will be an assistant professor of music.

A native of St. Paul, Minn., and a graduate of Tulane University, Drew has been on the Yale University music faculty for the past six years.

In addition to compositions, Drew made three major innovations in music instruction at Yale.

He originated the Yale Studio for Electronic Music and initiated Yale's first courses on Afro-American music and the music of Charles Ives.

His seven movement orchestral work, "West Indian Lights," will be given its world premiere Aug. 9 at the Tanglewood Institute of the Berkshire Music Center in Massachusetts, where Drew is a composer in residence for the summer.

Drew has written works for orchestra and chorus, tone poems, a ciola concerto, a chamber symphony and a double concerto for two cellos.

He is now writing a book on the history of Afro-American music.

"West Indian Lights," was commissioned by the Boston Symphony-Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation.

Drew has studied composition with Wallingford Riegger and Edgard Varese in New York and has taught at Washington University and Northwestern University.

He is a currently a Guggenheim Fellow and on leave from Yale.

At Tanglewood

Festival of Contemporary Music plans six days of concerts

The 10th annual Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood, comprising six programs of works for voice, chamber ensembles, orchestra and music theatre, will begin Saturday at 2:30 p.m.

21 composers

Sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation at Harvard, the festival will present the works of 21 composers, eight of whom have taught or studied at the BMC. Of these composers, Leslie Bassett, Peter Maxwell Davies, Gyorgy Ligeti and Donald Martino are on the composition faculty this season.

Five world premieres and a first U.S. performance of a music theatre project are included in the six-day festival. Of these, three were specifically commissioned by the Fromm Foundation and the BMC.

The program is as follows:

Aug. 4, 2:30 p.m., in the Chamber Music Hall, Berkshire Music Center vocal department, John Oliver, director; Dennis Helmrich, head vocal coach.

Luigi Nono: "Sara Dolce Tacere" (1960) for eight solo voices.

Milton Babbitt: "Vision and Prayer," Judith Nicosia, mezzo-soprano.

John Cage: Five songs for Contralto (1938), Nancy O'Brien, mezzo-soprano.

Charles Dodge: "Speech Songs (1973)" for tape.

Peter Maxwell Davies: "Blind Man's Buff" (1972), Candace Natvig, soprano; Bruce Hangen, conductor.

Aug. 5, 8:30 p.m., West Barn. Music theatre project, Ian Strasfogel, director; Gustavo Motta, assistant.

Bo Lawergren: "Triptych" (libretto by Lawergren) American Stage Premiere, Gustavo Motta, producer; Tibor Pusztai, conductor.

Bruno Maderna: "Satyricon" (libretto by Maderna based on Petronius), Strasfogel, producer; Gunther Schuller, conductor. First U.S. performance.

Aug. 6, 8:30 p.m., West Barn.

"Wolfgangerl," a portrait of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, devised by Strasfogel from Mozart's music and correspondence; Strasfogel, producer; Richard Stamp, conductor. (World Premiere).

Bruno Maderna: "Satyricon."

Aug. 7, 8:30 p.m., Theatre-Concert Hall. Chamber Music.

Peter Farmer: Sonata for five Brass Instruments (1971), Pusztai, conductor.

Peter Lieberson: Concerto for Four Groups of Instruments (1973) (World Premiere).

Hangen, conductor. Commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation.

Lester Trimble: "Panels I" (1970), Schuller, conductor.

Leslie Bassett: "Time and Beyond" (1973), Larry Julian, baritone.

Donald Martino: "Notturno" (1973), Antoni Wit, conductor.

Aug 8, 8:30 p.m., Theatre-Concert Hall. Chamber music.

John Cage: "The Wonderful Widow of 18 Springs" (1942), Candace Natvig, soprano; Kim Patterson, piano.

John Cage: "Imaginary Landscape No. 1" (1939), Kazuhiro Koizumi, conductor.

John Heiss: "Inventions, Contours and Colors" (1973) (World Premiere). Tonu Kalam, conductor. Commissioned by the Center and Fromm Music Foundation.

Alvin Etler: Concerto for Clarinet with Chamber Ensemble (1962), Steve Owens, clarinet; Emil Chakarov, conductor.

Brenton Pell Crane: String Quartet Music (1971).

Gyorgy Ligeti: 10 Pieces for Woodwind Quintet (1968).

Aug 9, 8:30 p.m. Theatre-Concert Hall. Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, Schuller, conductor.

James Drew: "West Indian Lights" (1973) (World Premiere). Commissioned by the BMC and Fromm Foundation.

Robert Hall Lewis: Symphony No. 2 (1971).

Primous Fountain: "Ritual Dances of the Amaks" (World Premiere), commissioned by the Fromm Music Foundation.

Don Stewart: "The 200-Bar Passacaglia" (1972).

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 35,000
JUL 31 1973
New England Newsclip

SUN (E)
LOWELL, MASS.
D. 54,500
AUG 2 1973
New England Newsclip

A Place in...
THE SUN

By FRANCES BERG

IF YOU LIKE "discovering" musicians, this is the week.

Tomorrow, the annual week-long Tanglewood Festival of Contemporary Music begins, running Aug. 4 to 9 in that musical mecca near Lenox in the Berkshires. The works of a trio of young men who received 1973 commissions for new works from the Berkshire Music Center — which is the summer training institute for musicians at Tanglewood, operated by the Boston Symphony Orchestra — will be featured. Awarded in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation at Harvard, long a supporter of contemporary music activities at Tanglewood, the commissions were received earlier this year by composers James Drew, John Heiss and Peter Lieberson. Their commissioned works will be previewed during the festival week beginning tomorrow.

A little about the trio ... James Drew, who chose the orchestral approach for the festival, is a graduate of Tulane and Washington Universities who's been teaching composition and Afro-American music at Yale ... A commission for chamber music work for eleven players was received by composer John Heiss, who's been taught by Milton Babbit, Earl Kim, Otto Luening, Darius Milhaud and Peter Westergaard, and has most recently been playing flute with the Boston Musica Viva, meanwhile teaching at the New England Conservatory ... Completing the new composer trio is Peter Lieberson. The first portion of his commissioned "Concerto for Four Groups of Instruments" was previewed in New York City earlier this season by Speculum Musicae. Studying to complete a graduate degree at Columbia, Lieberson studied with Charles Wuorinen and privately with Milton Babbitt. During the past year, he's been a musical assistant to the famed Leonard Bernstein.

MORNING ADVOCATE
BATON ROUGE, LA.
D. 84,562 SUN. 84,562
AUG 5 1973

CAPITALITES

By Anne Price

New Music Faculty

The LSU School of Music will have two additional members on the faculty this fall, both with distinguished background in their specialized fields.

And there will be some temporary faculty changes during the year as some professors are on sabbatical leave.

The new faculty members are composer James Drew and percussionist Donald Gilbert.

Gilbert, who comes from the Eastman School of Music, has his master's degree from Michigan State University and is working on his doctorate at the University of Michigan.

He will teach percussion at LSU, and his background includes a great deal of professional performance as well as teaching in public schools. While at Eastman, he toured Russia with the Eastman Orchestra.

Drew, who comes from Yale to be an assistant professor, teaching music theory, is a Tulane graduate who has been on the Yale faculty for six years. He is well known as an American composer, and originated the Yale Studio for Electronic Music and the first courses on Afro-American music and the music of Charles Ives at Yale.

He has been commissioned to compose numerous works, and his latest commission, "West Indain Light," was premiered this month at the Tanglewood Institute of the Berkshire Music Center in Massachusetts, performed by the Boston Symphony. The work was commissioned by the Fromm Foundation.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
AUG 1973

The Classical Scene

At Tanglewood the Berkshire Music Center is offering four commissioned works by three young American composers between the 4th and 9th during the week-long Festival of Contemporary Music. The three men are James Drew, John Heiss, and Peter Lieberson.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 846,132 S. 1,407,549

AUG 11 1973

Music: Fate of an Idea

Reaction to Webern Approach Shown in Closing Concert at Tanglewood

By DONAL HENAHAN
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 10— The 10th Festival of Contemporary Music at the Berkshire Music Center came to a close last night with an orchestral concert that demonstrated at length how little terseness has come to be valued in some influential composing circles. The haiku-like brevity of Webern, whose thin textures and constrained designs dominated the scene for a generation after his death in 1945, has suffered the fate of many a good idea. It has been parodized into extinction by mediocre artists.

And so, we have the reaction, which has been coming on for some years and is now at high tide. The one defect that the pieces on the final festival program at Tanglewood had in common was an inability to say good night when the party was over. To some extent, one's initial feelings of friendliness tended to dissipate even in so essentially ingratiating a work as James Drew's "West Indian Lights."

Mr. Drew writes beautifully—almost too beautifully at times — for the large orchestra, and his seven-section score fairly oozed voluptuous orchestral sonorities. Debussy and Ravel came to mind at first (those glittering harp glissandos) as well as Ives, Hovhaness and, ultimately, Mahler. But the work carried one along and established a definite personality as it slowly worked out its leisurely themes and variations. Now and then the exoticism seemed unnecessarily heavy, but Mr. Drew plainly enjoys making music, and with a bit of judicious editing "West Indian Lights" might be a real audience pleaser.

Primous Fountain's "Ritual Dances of the Amaks" (1973) came with portentous program notes concerning a tribe called the Amaks, who were "a proud and ancient people, and great warriors." Since the festival of the Amaks tended to last for 12 days or more, Mr. Fountain probably felt it necessary to reflect that in his three-movement piece. However, once again, might it not be possible to find some middle ground between Webern's economy and Wagner's "Ring"? Some delightful sounds and rhythms emanated from Mr. Fountain's piece (particularly striking was his ability to produce what sounded like a pride of lions in full roar). But the final movement, dominated by one unvaried and underlying rhythm, went on at purgatorial lengths.

●

Don Stewart's raucously swinging essay in symphonic jazz, "The 200-Bar Passacaglia" (1972), took considerably less time to explain itself, but a certain monotony of texture and manner set in long before the 200th bar made its appearance. However, Gunther Schuller, the conductor, and his superb band of students, the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, played the entire concert with gusto and dedication.

Three of the night's pieces were first performances: the Drew (commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation at Harvard), the Fountain (commissioned by the Fromm Foundation) and the Stewart.

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
846,132

AUG 5 1973

New England Newscip

Music: An Oddly Retrospective Air at Tanglewood

Headiest Ideas Are in Early Cage Works

By DONAL HENAHAN
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 9—An oddly retrospective and conservative air has been dominating the Festival of Contemporary Music this week at Tanglewood. Last night's concert did nothing to change that atmosphere. Once again the music offered in the Berkshire Music Center's Theater-Concert Hall echoed back to avant-garde ideas of the nineteen-fifties and even earlier. It may sum up the matter to report that the headiest ideas on display were to be found in two early works by John Cage, several of whose pieces are on this year's festival program in honor of Mr. Cage's 60th birthday, which was celebrated all last season.

Otherwise a determined holding action in behalf of mere respectability and competence seems to have been taken by those in charge of arranging the program. Not that imagination has been entirely outlawed. John Heiss's "Inventions, Contours and Colors" (1973), which was commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation at Harvard, adopted the stance of conservative serialism but broke out of the pattern into interludes of genuinely subtle expressivity. This first performance, expertly conducted by Tonu Kalam, sustained some degree of musical tension, even though the ultimate impression was that there was little behind the technical facade.

Brenton Pell Crane's "String Quartet Music" (1971), on the other hand, was an astonishingly drab exercise in Webernish textures that lacked even the fleeting appal of technical virtuosity. The seasons for its presence on a contemporary music program of this sort were not obvious to the ear.

A couple of pieces from the sixties, Gyorgy Ligeti's "Ten Pieces for Woodwind Quintet" (1968) and Alvin Etler's

Subtle Expressivity in Heiss's 'Inventions'

"Concerto for Clarinet with Chamber Orchestra" (1962), proved considerably more engrossing. Mr. Ligeti's score put one in mind of Elliott Carter's similarly imaginative and rigorous "Eight Etudes and a Fantasy" for woodwind quintet and probably will be useful to such groups as can hope to master its ensemble and soloistic demands.

The clarinet piece by Mr. Etler, who died last month employes what he called a 'quasi-big band instrumentation," and took off occasionally into jazzy regions that employs what he called a recalled the brassy flights of Stan Kenton. Outfitted with classical trappings that included a formal cadenza, the concerto was propelled by strong, simple rhythms and enlivened by the virtuosic solo work of W. Steve Owens.

●

The Cage pieces, both from the days before he became a red flag to the musical Establishment, were "The Wonderful Widow of 18 Springs" (1942) and "Imaginary Landscape No. 1" (1939). The bright idea in the former was to have the pianist drum out his accompaniment without raising the keyboard cover. "Imaginary Landscape" included two performers operating turntables on which records of engineering test patterns were placed. Both works contained the seeds of musical ideas and these days at Tanglewood one would be inclined to settle for such seeds, what with the scarcity of flourishing plants.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 846,132 S. 1,407,549

AUG 6 1973

Music: Modern Works at Tanglewood

Dodge's 'Speech Songs' Uses 4 Short Poems

By DONAL HENAHAN
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 5— The suspicion that something may be happening out there somewhere that we don't know about gnaws at the heart of every representative modern man. In this country we have even institutionalized that unease into an everyday greeting: "Hi, what's new?" And yet in serious music, audiences somehow manage to suppress this natural curiosity so thoroughly that new compositions have to be force-fed into them. Or better, introduced out of their range of hearing under isolation-ward conditions at modern-art fairs.

●

Perhaps the most significant such gathering in this country, the Festival of Contemporary Music at the Berkshire Music Center here at Tanglewood, opened over the weekend. Sponsored by the Fromm Music Foundation, now in its 21st year as an angel for living composers, the festival has tried with intermediate success to break through the larger music audience's wall of stony unconcern, but its most valuable function has long been the introduction of new or neglected 20th-century works to the small groups of professionals and connoisseurs who gather at these anual "Fromm weeks."

In the opening concert yesterday afternoon in the Chamber Music Hall, John Oliver's Berkshire Music Center vocal department presented some relatively elderly works of Ives, Cage and Nono as historical prelude, then got down to business with Charles Dodge's "Speech Songs" and Peter Maxwell Davies's "Blind Man's Buff," both written last year.

●

The Davies, a first American performance, suffered a great blow from being presented without any attempt at staging. This masque, as he calls it, desperately needs the dimension of theater to enhance its aura of fantasy. As performed under Bruce Hangen's baton, the musical workmanship of the score was clear, as was the typical Davis flair for odd instrumental colorations (the chamber orchestra included ukulele, guitar and banjo). But assigning the two vocal roles of the Boy King and the Jester to one soprano further robbed the performance of most of its dramatic impact.

Candace Natvig, the doubly burdened soprano, coped well with her assignments,

Peter Davies Offers 'Blind Man's Buff'

however, and the student orchestra also came through with honors.

●

Mr. Dodge's "Speech Songs" needed no visual or theatrical aid; in fact, when it was over the composer simply waved appreciation to the two loudspeakers on stage because no human musicians took part in this performance. The piece is a playful experiment with synthesizing speech carried out at the Bell Telephone Laboratories in Murray Hill, N.J., according to a program worked out by Joseph Olive.

Mr. Dodge uses four short poems of Mark Strand, and he toys with the syllables and words in ways that often set the audience giggling. Much of the time, in spite of the elaborate apparatus brought to bear, one sometimes had the feeling that similar results could have been achieved by an adept tape-recorder operator. Mr. Dodge is preoccupied with the computer's role in music, and experiments along that line may yet turn up valuable things. In "Speech Songs," however, the effect is still that of technical dabbling rather than musical composition.

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
846,132

AUG 8 1973

New England Newscip

Music: An Intricate Game

Lester Trimble Carries Off the Honors With 'Panels I' at Tanglewood

Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 8— Youth was well represented on last night's program in the Festival of Contemporary Music here at Tanglewood, but the most vigorous and most adventurous work came from a delegate of the middle-aged party.

Lester Trimble, who was whatever honors there were with his "Panels I" (1970), an engrossing game for 10 performers and two conductors. The piece called for interludes of controlled improvisation as well as a structural intricacy that kept both performers and listeners continually involved with the action. Mr. Trimble's score is composed in 10 modular sections or panels, each of which can be moved about like furniture at the whim of the performers.

Gunther Schuller, sat in front of him flashing cue cards to the players and directing the music's flow. Everyone was, in effect, helping to compose the piece; the point, however, was that it all sounded like an integrated composition, not a chaotic collage, and that is a credit to Mr. Trimble's skill in balancing the free and the rigid elements in his score.

●

This kind of music has been around for some years and is variously known as open-form" or "controlled-chance" composing. But if Mr. Trimble broke no new ground, he did plough familiar furrows adeptly and gave instructive demonstration in how the rules of the musical game may be bent to alow for the re-entry of such traditional concepts as melodic flexibility, body rhythms and performer fredom. Much bad music tries to achieve such goals by throwing out the techniques of serious compositeion, of course; Mr. Trimble's score plays by the rules, and that makes it far more interesting.

The two youngest composers on the program sem to bes til trying their wings as artists, though their scores showed the high levl of craftsmanship taken for granted at these annual contemporary concerts. Peter Lieberson's serialy organized Concerto for FourGroups of Instruments (1973) took no chances. It rarely broke out of the kind of featureless monotony that may give a composer a god name in academic circles but nowhere else. Its complexities were evident, but seemed too mechanically designed. Peter Farmer's Sonata for Five Brass Instruments (1971) built sound conlomerates and rotated them diligently, but beyond suggesting the composer's evpertise in handling the instruments and his careful listening to elders as Varès and Schuller, the piece lacked much sustained color.

●

Leslie Bassett's "Time and Beyond" (1973) held nterest tolerably with its austere and contemplative settings of poetry by Emerson, Tagore and Mark Van Doren. (Larry Julian was the vocally able but somewhat bland bass-baritone.) Donald Martina's "Notturno" (1973) tried to create "night moods" out of serial materials and did so only occasionally, chiefly in a Bartokian middle movement. Otherwise, Mr. Martino was pouring the same old formalistic wine into a new bottle.

As I Hear It

Contemporaries

Berk. Eagle
Aug 4.

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

A MAN doesn't have to be a scholar to understand what "contemporary" means. Most dictionaries construe contemporary as referring to persons contemporaneous with events.

This weekend at Tanglewood the programs will include music by Richard Strauss, Igor Stravinsky and Aaron Copland. It is difficult to calibrate the lives of eminent men. They persist in being born at inconvenient times, so far as comparative studies are concerned, and a computation of ages gets to be a bit macabre on occasion.

There have been precocious youngsters, such as Mozart and Mendelssohn, and others who did not reach their most fecund periods until well into middle age, such as Brahms and Cesar Franck.

* * * *

Stravinsky's "Firebird" was written in 1910. Two years ago, when the composer was still alive, could it validly have been said that "Firebird" was contemporary music or, to rephrase it, that it was written by a contemporary?

Strauss died in 1949. His "Till Eulenspiegel" dates from 1895, 15 years earlier than "Firebird." It is not a question here of derivation or comparative style. Many musicologists consider the musical 19th century as extending right up to World War I.

Copland, born in 1900, wrote his Third Symphony in 1946, and works have continued to be delivered from his pen right up to the present. But the overlapping of these three men's lives have had very little influence on one another.

In 1882, when Stravinsky was born, Verdi, Brahms and Tchaikovsky were not only alive, as Eric Salzmann has pointed out, but also in their most productive periods. As for Strauss, born in 1864, 18 years before Stravinsky, Wagner was still to complete "The Ring." A Watergate interrogator could make most witnesses stumble if the subject under discussion were "contemporaries."

* * * *

The same tests can be applied to literature and painting, but the problems there are not quite the same. In music a man may be either a composer or a performer. The performer's potential span of active participation tends to be reduced progressively to vanishing; the composer has no such limitations. Casals, for all practical purposes, has relinquished his cello but still at rare intervals takes up a baton. Pierre Monteux conducted a broad repertory up to his last years when he was in the late 80s, although he disclaimed expectancy to continue much longer and submitted that he feared he would soon have to retreat and become a critic.

The example of Picasso shows that an artist ~~can~~ continue actively so long as the functions of his head and hand avail. The lives of Stravinsky and Picasso ran parallel for many years. Possibly the oracle of Delphi or some other occult authority can foretell whether their work will continue to exert influence in their respective fields. But both continued to work creatively up to close to their last gasp and thus warrant being called contemporaries by even those who would deny them that right to be so called by reason of their work of 50 and more years ago.

Many of us can conjure up in our minds' eyes an image of a Picasso painting. We can do the same in our minds' ears with excerpts from Mozart's "Don Giovanni." I doubt if many do the same with the "Sacre du Printemps." That may not be a fair hypothesis, but I have never heard anyone hum the bassoon introduction to the "Sacre."

How far back does the term contemporary reach? From that aspect, where do the "Rhapsody in Blue" and "Porgy and Bess" stand? They date, of course, from before World War II. In the minds of the generation born since that milestone in time, are they placed in some hazy era alongside "Salome" and "Pelleas and Melisande"?

It is sad, and significant, to note that no contemporary music will be played at Tanglewood this season, except for Copland's symphony. The discouraging factor is that fewer and fewer composers think in terms of the orchestra as we envisage the Boston Symphony.

To be sure a revolution has taken place quietly in all the arts, and there is now plenty of music which is analogous to Calder's mobiles, no repetition a copy of a previous performance.

In literature, whether it be Shakespeare or Joyce, the same scaffolding serves. Boy meets girl, or patterns of intrigue, greed, dishonesty or violence continue to serve upon which structures are built, even though the language has changed. But in music and painting, the previous molds have been abandoned if not destroyed.

* * * *

To some who live, as it were, by discontent, the past appears as the sum of all that is good. But in this coming week at Tanglewood, the efforts of contemporary composers — contemporary in the sense of being physically present — will be exposed, thanks to the foresighted encouragement and meaningful philanthropy of the Paul Fromm Foundation in the Department of Music at Harvard University. It is heartening to notice how intelligent support and guidance is being applied to an acutely distressed area of art.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
AUG 8 1973
New England Newsclip

Music review

Contemporary festival draws to a close

By Jay C. Ros

THE FINAL con ne Festival of Contempo sic at Tanglewood, spon by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation at Harvard, was played last night in the Theatre - Concert Hall by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra with Gunther Schuller as conductor.

The program brought the cooperation of the two institutions to an exciting climax, and the two works which had been commissioned reflected great credit on the sponsors. "West Indian Lights" of James Drew was commissioned by the two sponsors; "Ritual Dances of the Amaks" by the Fromm Foundation alone.

* * *

Drew's "Lights" has an immediately translucent plan. Seven sections, which require about 35 minutes, go full circle, starting with a Vox Spiritus, proceeding through Slow Dance Music, Submerged City Music to Lux Magum Musicae, and then turning around over the previously trodden terrain. The whole composition is derivative of good Debussy. Starting with muted strings suggesting the shimmering waves of "La Mer" and producing effective tone colors, which include "La Cathedrale Engloutie," it culminates in a riotous steel band outbreak. The essential merit of the work was that the over-all result was rewarding listening. It was as well not to examine the innards, for the part-writing was meager and fragmentary.

* * *

Fountain's "Ritual Dances" was unceasingly magnetic and sometimes explosive. This was achieved by an aleatory process which gave each of the hundred-odd student musicians his own fantasy at times and effected a primitive spirit of unleashed exuberance. The "Dances" are written in three divisions, of which the second apparently had no metrical designations, for the conductor only seemed to serve as traffic officer at the busy intersections. The third section begins with a fine cadenza for clarinet before the entire company joins in, aided by a well-manned and plentiful battery, in unrestrained expressiveness.

* * *

If a generality may be applied to the evening, indeed to the whole festival, the writing reveals a reliance on instrumental effects rather than on substantial part-writing. There were far more isolated pizzicatos, harmonics, tremolos, trills — and all such extraneous devices — than good old utilization of the exercises on which students spend their years in conservatories. An example might be cited which occurred in Robert Hall Lewsis's "Symphony No. 2" where the string players tap their fingers on the fingerboard with added emphasis but without applying the bow. It can possibly be heard, if noticed, but its serious value reveals a poverty of ideas.

* * *

Schuller had a tremendous task which he executed with distinction. In the Lewis "Symphony" there was often indefinite rhythmic design, although timbre and texture were successfully fulfilled, and out of the busy confusion of instruments worthy segments often became discernible.

Don Stewart's "The 200-Bar Passacaglia" has a title which is deceiving. The entire orchestral personnel is consistently involved although the rhythmic pulse varies more than a strict passacaglia intimates. The conductor was indicating measures of four and five beats as often as of three. There was a forward impulse, however, which lent the work vitality.

The six programs of the festival have been an extremely concentrated endeavor and have required much invisible effort, but the results have brought credit on the sponsors and enjoyment, enlightenment and profit to music and musicians.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
AUG 10 1973
New England Newsclip

Music review

Conformity within the dissonance

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

LAST NIGHT'S program of contemporary music in the Tanglewood Theatre-Concert Hall affirmed a contention that has made itself progressively apparent as the festival, which is sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation at Harvard, has unfolded. Namely, that the training and background of the 20-odd composers whose works are being performed have little significance. They all have gone for sustenance to a common source, and it would be difficult to identify one from the other by his writing.

This, of course, excepts John Cage who deliberately avoids anything conventional. The lovely soprano, Candace Natvig, sang a poem of James Joyce, "The Wonderful Widow of Eighteen Springs," which Cage had set to a melody moving between La and Ti, two adjacent tones, while the "musician" (he was billed as a pianist) tapped the wood of the instrument with rhythmic whacks.

* * *

It is with reluctance that I devote space to a second piece of Cage in which two "players" perform on a turntable each, one percussionist on a Chinese cymbal, while two performers grovel inside the entrails of a piano to disturb the strings. All this "benefitted" by the service of a conductor! My old Shaker rocking chair's creaks are not unpleasant either.

As examples of uniformity, there were "String Quartet Music" by Brenton Pell Crane, and "Ten Pieces for Woodwind Quintet" of Gyorgy Ligeti. Each exploited the potential of his medium expertly and with insight of the limits of expressivity. Crane's quartet required, and was served by, four excellent performers, and the hazardous leaps and intermittent opportunities for resonant tones were negotiated faithfully. One might query whether manipulation of idioms alone is justification, but the fragmentary distribution of phrases was in the most grateful registers of the instruments, a factor not always observable during the evening.

* * *

Ligeti, too, had outstanding performers, and the oboeist, flutist and clarinetist each utilized a variety of his respective "family" with effect. The resultant kaleidoscope, with the bassoon and horn, flutters all around, barks and suggests swift glimpses into novel movement within propinquity and a distant freight train in distress.

John Heiss's "Inventions, Contours and Colors" is a commission of the Berkshire Center and the Fromm Foundation. It is for a three-choir ensemble of string, wind and brass. Again, construction is allotted importance as against inspiration, and the question persists whether one should consider and admire the steel frame or the facade of a building. But there is much more than mere validity to Heiss's writing.

The performance of Alvin Etler's Concerto for Clarinet with Chamber Ensemble was dedicated to the composer who died less than two months ago at Smith College where he had been on the faculty. The soloist was W. Steven Owens, and it was one of the happiest works of the evening. There was relaxation in the "Big band" aspect of the score — three trumpets, three trombones, two percussion and two double bass — which surged onward with a buoyant urgency at times quite out of character in this setting.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
AUG 6 1973
New England Newsclip

Music review

An evening of contemporary music

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

THE FESTIVAL of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood moved for last night's concert to the Theatre-Concert Hall where a larger auditorium accommodated an audience assembled to hear chamber music for various-sized groups and unorthodox combinations.

There was one first performance which had been commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation at Harvard, the two institutions which have cooperated to organize this festival, but there was nothing older than 1970 heard all the evening. The history of music demonstrates that it has an affinity in one sense with wine: that it is often more appreciated and palatable when aged, but that is by no means a rule. Many works in the past and now win early approval.

The evening's impression revealed a very serious approach by all five composers, a sense of earnest planning but scarcely a modicum of a sense of humor or spontaneity. For instance, "Time and Beyond" by Leslie Bassett, a setting for bass-baritone, clarinet, cello and piano of three texts by Emerson, Rabindranath Tagore and Mark Van Doren, reflects a concern with time and the unknown "beyond." A mood pervaded the lyrical means persuasively. But the relativity between the tone colors of the cello and clarinet were not stressed and the advantages of the perverse use of the cello and piano were not apparent.

The Sonata for five Brass Instruments by Peter Farmer required the services of a conductor, a possible immediate challenge. It seems that five participants should be sufficiently aware of the roles of their colleagues to sense when to enter into a dialogue, when to abstain and when to collaborate. Farmer submitted a rational plan, fortified by dissonant ejaculations, but without clear contrast in the three movements.

Peter Lieberson's Concerto for Four Groups of Instruments was commissioned by the Berkshire Center and the Fromm Foundation and is dedicated to Paul Fromm and Speculum Musicae. The 11-instrument ensemble is divided into four groups: reeds, strings, harp and piano. It was conducted by Bruce Hangen. Lieberson manipulates his voices confidently but fails to use the best registers of the instruments. Details are assigned the strings which are quite opaque and do not support his underlying synopsis. Sound per se is assigned a minor role.

* * *

Lester Trimble's "Panels I" utilized the services of Gunther Schuller as conductor. It is an improvisatory composition which, in this case, is a contradiction in terms, for a secondary conductor seemed to have the duty of choosing what, when, which and where the 10 musicians should play. It, thus, is admittedly a collage and montage and may be assayed on everyone's personal evaluation.

Donald Martino's "Notturno" purports to portray some 19 "night moods" which happily seemed more imaginative than calculated. Two percussionists with three strings, piano, flute and clarinet express a wide gamut of temper, starting with whispers on tympani and floating outward to far reaches of suggestive serial coloring.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
AUG 9 1973

Festival of Contemporary Music

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

THE FIRST PROGRAM of the Festival of Contemporary Music presented in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation at Harvard was fortunate to have the services of the Berkshire Music Center vocal department to ~~execute~~ the music of five composers chosen for the Saturday afternoon concert.

* * *

Larry Julian, baritone, and Philip Morehead seemed to be ideal executants for the Six Songs of Charles Ives which began the afternoon. The songs reveal the composer: half-time a man of pathos, half-time a poet, half-time a theorist; half-time a wit and half-time a realist. If that makes Ives 2½ men, that may well be right. Some of his songs were an enigma. But "In Flanders Field" on the text of John McCrae ends on an unresolved ascending progression, which, I could be convinced, had the basic significance Ives sought as a humanitarian.

Ives' songs date from the 1920s; five songs by John Cage are from 1938 when he was 25 years old. These two composers were undoubtedly represented under the aegis of Saturday's patronage to demonstrate how far ahead of their time they were, for they take their place without compromise with anything written now. Cage's texts are from e. e. cummings and the composer obviously found them sympathetic to his style. Contralto Nancy O'Brien and pianist James Gemmell deserve medals for giving them shape and inflection.

"Sara Dolce Tacere" was composed by Luigi Nono on commission of the late Pittsfield music patroness Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge. The text is from a collection of poetry by the Piedmontese poet Cesare Pavese and has to do with his preoccupation with "man's inability to communicate." It was sung by two mixed vocal quartets.

* * *

Charles Dodge's Speech Songs, composed last year, are for synthesized tape. The poems are by Mark Strand. Typical may be a verse:

"The days are ahead
1,926,346 to 1,926,345.
Later the nights will catch up."

(My own feeble computation brings 1,926,346 days to 5,275 years which is Jewish chronology??)

Does one sit, attentive and respectful, listening to tapes?

The program ended with a masque — "Blind Man's Buff" — written last year by Peter Maxwell Davies, the British composer who is one of the visiting teachers at Tanglewood this summer. The soprano was Candace Natvig and the conductor of a small ensemble of diverse instrumentation was Bruce Hangen. Miss Natvig assumed several roles alternately with abundant sophistication. She and the musicians evinced what seemed like a belief in the content of their vehicle.

Charles Dodge's 'Speech Songs' highlight festival opener

Bos Symphony

MICHAEL STEINBERG

TANGLEWOOD — Charles Dodge is a composer whose early music (he being now all of 31) I recall as rather on the solemn and academic side. These days he is having fun, and the performance of his recently completed four "Speech Songs" was the one moment, the one, when there was life in Saturday afternoon's concert. The concert opened the annual Berkshire Music Center-Fromm Foundation Festival of Contemporary Music, a marathon we, the faithful, attend in the spirit of renewing a pledge of allegiance. Masochism lives with hope.

Dodge is into something called speech synthesis. He records speech, encourages a computer at the Bell Telepione laboratories in Murray Hill, N. J., to analyze the sounds, vary them, and, as it were, comment on them; then, for the top layer, adding his own variations and comments on the computer's work. The result is totally contained on tape, no live speaker being involved in the performance (unsolved problem: how do you tell the audience that the work is about to begin).

The four "Speech Songs" take apart and reassemble poems by Mark Strand, the first three as one-part inventions, the last in dense polyphony. Perhaps you remember the passage in 'Stravinsky's "Threni" where the bass has a series of repeated low E flats and sounds suddenly like a bass clarinet that has learned to speak Latin. Dodge likes to explore that fine line between vocal noises and instrumental, and the border incidents he provokes are a recurring source of compositional energy and of humor in the "Speech Songs."

I was also reminded of the soliloquies of six-year-olds, the playing with a string of words, turning it over and over, sending it through various (often bizarre) pitch sequences, shifting accents, repeating of fragments within the phrase — the mind switched off perhaps, but the ear all there. Dodge does it with art, but using that art — his ear, fantasy, and humor — enchantingly to convey a sense of spontaneous play. They are play, the "Speech Songs," they delight more than they nourish, they are "musical" only within limits, they provoke and stimulate, they ask interesting questions about the sound of speech, they are fresh and full of vitality. Received with thanks.

But the rest of the afternoon, what misery! First, six poorly selected Ives songs, sadly sung. Then five early songs (1938) by that most naked of emperors, John Cage, demonstrating, as all the diggings up of his early work seem to, that he did well to give up conventional composition at an early (but insufficiently early) age — these, too, wretchedly sung, woolly and unfocused. Then eight competing vibratos piking tentatively at Luigi Nono's "Sara dolce tacere" (costuming accurately described by eminent choral conductor as "che sara sara"). Then, praise be, intermission and Dodge ("I like Fridays best," says the second-grader, "because we have gym and lunch"). To finish up, "Blind Man's Buff" by Peter Maxwell Davies, a masque whose musical emptiness is painfully exposed by unstaged performance. It does, however, offer the consolation of a good singer, or one with the promise of becoming very good: Candace Natvig, who has a lovely and warm soprano, clear pitch, projection and charm, but some disconcerting vowels (everything in the "e" to "ee" range tends to come out in the sound Southerners give the first syllable of "butter" — also, someone should tell her that "Ischia" is not a rhyme to "Mischa").

A friend, an honest man who paid for his ticket and his wife's, called it "consumer fraud." Legally, he doesn't have a leg to stand on. As a critic, he is not wrong.

GLOBE (E)
BOSTON, MASS.
AUG 10 1973
New England Newscip

Feelings following the festivity

Bos Symphony

MICHAEL STEINBERG

TANGLEWOOD — Thursday night, when the Tanglewood Festival of Contemporary Music came to an end, I felt less like a person who had just attended a festivity than like a Strasbourg goose. Stuffed and abused. The festival ended with an orchestral concert of four works, three in their first performances. Gunther Schuller, I say again, is an awfully impressive conductor in such a situation —clear, helpful, unruffled, and with an exceptional knack for clarifying the large outlines even when there isn't time to get all the details straight. There was in fact not enough time, and so there were rough edges; even so, the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra did nobly.

The most interesting, agreeable, and somehow genuine sounding piece was also the most unlikely and certainly the most naive. This was "West Indian Lights" by James Drew, who is now in his early 40s and teaches at Yale. It sounds like Ravel-plus, and it suggests a less thoroughly domesticated version of the musical exotica various composers like Respighi and Henry Eichheim interested themselves in during the 1920s.

Much of the second half of "West Indian Lights" consists of nearly unaltered reprises of material from the beginning, which makes it all seem to go on rather long, but it has atmosphere, and dance episodes have an appealingly lanquid sensuousness.

I enjoyed it, the simplicity and lushness of the sounds themselves, and also the idea of a man's responding to a Berkshire Music Center-Fromm Foundation commission with major triads.

Through most of the 19th Century, they tried to write another Beethoven's Ninth. Then it was "Tristan" and after that, "Rite of Spring." "Ritual Dances of the Amaks" by Primous Fountain III is a "Rite of Spring" replica, and astoundingly direct. Fountain has talent and an ear, but at this point (he was born in 1949) little discipline and discretion.

Robert Hall Lewis at more or less twice Fountain's age has both. In composing his Symphony Number Two (1971, first performed that year by Sergiu Commissiona and the Baltimore Symphony), he has asked interesting and important questions about what it means to write a symphonic work at this moment in musical history, particularly with respect to form and orchestral sonority.

He has made something considerably more colorful than the earlier symphony which Leinsdorf performed in Boston some years ago, but I found this a frustrating piece. Lewis' beginnings are better than his continuations, and I cannot tie the glittery surface to the strait-laced interior. His answers to his own questions are sober and considerate, but not compelling, and the work as a whole more readily commands a certain abstract respect than attention.

As for Don Stewart's classical - jazz - rock - mixed "200-Bar Passacaglia," I love the story that "while employed by a wealthy benefactress who suffered from delusions of musical composition," he came into possession of 25 blank pages of score paper, ruled eight bars to the page. But to the composer's hope also expressed in the program note, that his piece would be "perceived as an entity, and not as a collection of incongruous musical material" I can respond only with "sorry."

GLOBE (E)
BOSTON, MASS.
AUG 11 1973
New England Newscip

John Heiss work premieres

MICHAEL STEINBERG

TANGLEWOOD — Wednesday night's concert of the Tanglewood Festival of Contemporary Music brought another premiere of a work commissioned for the occasion by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation. This was "inventions, contours and colors" by John Heiss, a faculty member of the New England Conservatory and well known around Boston as a flutist.

Heiss has written his work for a trio of woodwinds plus a quartet each of brass and strings, and his scoring, indeed all of his compositional procedure, treats the three-choir idea as central.

Equally clearly, Heiss works with contrasts of, for example, speed (slow beginning and ending, agitated middle section), texture (a busy polyphony whose harmonic implications are explicitly brought up front in four solemnly acclaimed chords at the end), concentration of discourse (loose, cadenza-like passages linking chapters in quite a strict language).

There are no imitations or replications in any obvious sense, but in some details, particularly the spacing of chords, I do hear the voice of Stravinsky. And just once, in what I take to be a private reference, "Tristan" Act III moves sleetingly across the page.

"It is lucid music, coherent, clean, interesting to listen to, and, as a personal statement, perhaps just a little diffident. It is short, and, as one distinguished musician in the audience said, it feels short. The performance conducted by Tonu Kalam was intelligible though not yet vivid.

Self imitation (which after a while becomes self caricature) is perhaps the most dismaying response to success. Some good people have become its victims, Penderecki, for example, and distressingly, the infinitely more gifted Gyorgy Ligeti.

A performance Wednesday of Ligeti's Ten Pieces for Wind Quintet, which dates to 1968 and before he was mired, was a source of great pleasure. The pieces are tiny, some of them using the quintet as a block, others being mini-concertos of remarkable brilliance.

A bit like Elliott Carter's Wind Quartet Etudes, they state compositional and instrumental possibilities rather than use them fully ("He makes bricks but not a house," said a friend), but Ligeti accomplishes that with captivating ingenuity and charm.

This was the occasion as well of a truly accomplished, at times even brilliant performance (a rare pleasure at this Festival). The excellent players were J. Fenwick Smith, flute, Cheryl Wilhjelm, oboe, Colin Hemmingsen, bassoon, an George Sullivan, horn.

GLOBE (E)
BOSTON, MASS.
AUG 8 1973
New England Newscip

The good, the bad and the out-of-tune

TANGLEWOOD — I should have thought that after the shleppy start the Berkshire Music Center's Festival of Contemporary Music made Saturday afternoon, things could only have gone up. Not so. Sunday night we were served two operas, "triptych" by Bo Lawergren, who teaches nuclear physics at Hunter College, is about Captain Cook and native girls, the frivolity of that being tempered by a salubrious dose of Thomas Merton.

It is the kind of work in which it is assumed that the word "intercourse" is in and of itself funny. Worse, because longer, was Bruno Maderna's "Satyricon." During the telling of the tale of the widow of Ephesus, a muted trumpet plays Chopin's Funeral March with wrong notes: That fairly gives you the measure of the composer's wit and invention.

I should also have thought — moving now to the Tuesday evening concert of music for small ensembles — that the Festival could run to the luxury of a tuned piano, but never mind.

This concert offered, at the end of a long evening, a stunning new piece, "Notturno," by Donald Martino, composed for and first performed earlier this year by

MICHAEL STEINBERG

Speculum Musicae. No composer writing for that extraordinary group could resist furnishing them with a showcase for their virtuosity. Martino, himself a fine clarinetist and in touch with the realities of performance, anyhow has a special flair for that sort of thing: His "Parisonatina" for solo cello, played at the BMC-Fromm Festival in 1966, is one of the most dazzling bravura pieces of recent years. The first thing, then, you notice about "Notturno" is its sure and fantasical writing for the instruments (violin, viola, cello, flute, clarinet, piano, percussion). "He knows everything," said one admiring wind player.

Martino's program note says that "Notturno" portrays some 19 night moods. This happens in three quite terse and linked movements. Changes of atmosphere are mercurial, abrupt almost to the point of seeming manic-depressive. The changes are often rough and hard, a correlative in a way of the coruscating hardness and brilliance Martino's sonorities have even at their most quiet. I sensed in "Notturno" an uncommon dramatic imagination, but also an equally uncommon mastery in matters of pacing and transition wherewith to project this nocturnal theater of the soul. Under the direction of Antoni Wit, "Notturno" got a performance that was at least adequate to suggest content and character.

Another new piece, this one commissioned for the Festival, that interested me especially was the Concerto for Four Groups of Instruments by Peter Lieberson, a 27-year-old composer from New York. It is an intricate neo-Brandenburg Concerto whose gestures crackle with nervous energy, and Lieberson, too, enjoys virtuosity, though of a more conventional sort than Martino's. The performance, however, was too imprecise for me to get a clear impression of all the details.

The numbing effect of academic cliches in Peter Farmer's Sonata for Five Brass Instruments was slightly offset by its brilliant sonority and by the confident sounding performance which Tibor Pusztai conducted. Leslie Bassett's song cycle "Time and Beyond" (Emerson, Tagore, VanDoren), also subsisted on cliches, these from the bin labelled "sensitive." It makes Brahms's Four Serious Songs sound like a bacchanale, and the performance was amazingly dreary. Lester Trimble's "Panels I" is a cutie-pie, a type of creature whose welcome is quickly outstayed. This one hung around just forever.

Paul Fromm: Music patron with a purpose

By Deena Rosenberg
Globe correspondent

TANGLEWOOD (one morning during the Contemporary Music Festival, Aug. 4-11)—Paul Fromm, patron of contemporary music, pondered aloud about the composer's anomalous position in modern society: "If the musical creator is out of touch with the world around him, he may become like the artist in Balzac's story, 'The Unknown Masterwork,' who felt his art would remain pure only if no one saw it. He withdrew from the world more and more, to produce The Masterwork. Finally it was finished, but what he had made was the product of a schizophrenic mind. It could no longer be called art."

To be sure, Fromm acknowledges, the composer rarely chooses isolation; rather, it is thrust upon him. "Because of the deepening rift between artistic and commercial values, the creator is excluded from influencing and inspiring the direction of public taste. One wonders whether in this time of strident commercialism, the serious artist is becoming an anachronism."

Fromm thinks contemporary composers have it worse than other artists, because even society's few music lovers are mostly unresponsive to recent music. "Today's listener lacks familiarity with contemporary musical idiom and styles and feels alienated from the music that should be closest to him, that of his own time. Often he projects the expectations he has for an older master like Brahms onto a new one, like Carter. Naturally, he's disappointed."

How do you help create a healthy, vital musical culture, one in which there is sympathetic interaction between composer, performer and listener?

If you're Paul Fromm, you start a foundation. "Ever since I arrived in the US as an immigrant from Germany in 1937, I've been interested in the musical life of my adopted country. After thinking about the situation for years, I finally decided to do something, so in "52" the Fromm Music Foundation came into existence."

A witty, articulate European intellectual in his sixties, with a winning smile, Fromm is the head of two wine import concerns, and "my operating maxim has always been, 'earn in the business and spend in the Foundation.'" Though he's too self- critical to play piano as much as he did while still a youngster, he can't keep himself from hatching new plans for "restoring the contemporary composer to his rightful place in the center of musical life."

Over the years, Fromm, in consultation with eminent members of the musical community, has commissioned something like 100 composers, provided decent performances for their works, subsidized recordings and sponsored critic and composer seminars.

He considers the FMF's support of the ten-year-old Tanglewood Contemporary Music Festival its single most important contribution to date. That week-long gala not only provides a forum for new works, "but sets up a real musical community where young performers and composers get an inside look at each other's problems."

Last year, on its 20th anniversary, the Foundation moved its headquarters from Chicago where Fromm lives, to Harvard University. In Cambridge Fromm established the foundation as an autonomous entity independent of any one person. He likes Harvard because "the administration understands that musical ideas are as valuable as verbal ones." It also permits the Foundation to maintain artistic freedom. "We are not an adjunct of the music department. Twenty-five percent of our $160,000 operating budget goes into our Harvard contemporary concert series. The rest is distributed as we three directors see fit."

The new governing board consists of Fromm, Eliott Forbes, chairman of the Harvard Music Department, and Gunther Schuller, president of the New England Conservatory and director of the Contemporary Music program at the Berkshire Music Center. Fromm doesn't much care for rigid organizational structure. So the FMF bears little resemblance to most institutions supporting the arts. "We do think very informally and the foundation library consists of just a few file cabinets."

Besides the changed locale, Fromm, Forbes and Schuller have some new operating principles. "Right now, the credo is, don't over-populate the musical world with new music. We plan to put more emphasis on repeat performances of already existing scores."

How must a composer feel, if his piece is played once and then disappears into oblivion? "Also, if a piece isn't played enough to become familiar, how can audiences possibly grow comfortable with it? How will it ever get integrated into the standard repertory? How many contemporary works can you recognize?"

In accordance with the new policp, this year's Tanglewood Program, put together by Schuller, consisted of one-third premiers and two-thirds existing music. Was Fromm satisfied with them?

"As Stravinsky once said, 'I'm pleased but never satisfied.' We should be a little more careful next time about the older works we select, so audiences realize there are 20th century pieces as vital and viable as the music they know and love."

Does it bother him that audiences for the Tanglewood week don't seem to be growing? "No, because though the performances may not be definitive, the intrinsic musical value of the pieces is transmitted not only to paying visitors, but to the several hundred students at the Berkshire Music Center, who will take the contemporary listening experience home with them to all parts of the country."

True to form, Fromm is still updating his thoughts about widening the contemporary music public. He's been contemplating a yearly publication in which "I might write a report on the FMF's activities, translating statistics into a broader vision of the current musical scene, and invite three people to contribute essays on the musical avante-garde. After a few years we'd have a book addressed to a broad audience."

The big project he's planning would be sponsored by the FMF, the National Endowment for the Arts, and the New York Philharmonic. It may begin by the '74-75 concert season. "The New York Philharmonic, under Pierre Boulez, will insert a contemporary week into its subscription series. It will include three concerts, one for full orchestra, one for chamber orchestra, and one for small chamber groups. All kinds of musicians — young conductors, community orchestra leaders, members of chamber ensembles, will attend not only rehearsals and public concerts, but workshops on how to perform new music.

After removing the bugs in New York, we will rotate the whole business to different parts of the country. Orchestras selected by the National Endowment must integrate the new works into their regular concert series."

The Festival of Contemporary Music

MICHAEL STEINBERG

LENOX — This year, the Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood was bad. Sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation (now at Harvard), the Festival has been an annual event since 1963. For 1972, the 10th Festival and the 20th anniversary of the Fromm Foundation's existence, a special effort was made, and it seemed that recovery from a long, slow slump was here. Not so. 1973 was the worst.

Running August 4-9, it consisted of an evening of stage works (offered twice) and of four concerts. Twenty-two works were given, 17 of them American. There were seven premieres (James Drew, Peter Farmer, Primous Fountain III, John Heiss, Peter Lieberson, Don Stewart, Lester Trimble), two American premieres (Peter Maxwell Davies, Bruno Maderna), seven works from within the last five years, and six (from Ives to Nono) that are more or less classics. Drew, Heiss, and Lieberson were commissioned by the Festival; Fountain's work was a Fromm commission.

So much for numbers. Paul Fromm, Director of the Fromm Music Foundation at Harvard, has for more than 20 years been an enlightened patron as well as a generous one, and Gunther Schuller, Artistic co-Director of Tanglewood and Director of Contemporary Music Activities at the Berkshire Music Center, has, for as long, been a generous, energetic colleague to his fellow-composers. But the Festival at Tanglewood, for which they set the tone, is derailed.

Too much of the music is bad, and so are too many of the performances. Feeble early Cage, inept Lawergren, Maderna's lazy claptrap, dessicated Crane, immature Fountain, amateurish Stewart, the works, weak in various other ways, by Bassett, Etler, and Trimble — that is too many mistakes for just one Festival. More interesting music is available. I don't know to what extent bad luck was involved (always a hazard with commissions), or failures of taste, or log-rolling (during Trimble's "Panels I," I found myself hoping that something other than Schuller's belief in the value of such glib inanity was behind its inclusion).

Of course good compositions were done, too, but the strongest of them, Donald Martino's "Notturno," got a performance that just barely projected its qualities. Another good piece, Heiss's "Inventions, Contours and Colors," fared no better, and Lieberson's exceptionally interesting Concerto for Four Groups of Instruments was massacred. Davies and Nono were among the more established composers badly misrepresented in performance.

When the Festival first began, a specially chosen group of "Fromm players" took on most of the new music. Many of them were superb, but they were insanely overworked and absolutely punchy by the end of the Festival (true also of Schuller, who did virtually all the conducting), and the performances showed it. For some years now, the work of the Festival has been parceled out among the Berkshire Music Center students. From the humanitarian point of view, this is an advance (though some students are still desperately over-extended), but it makes new problems. Quality diminishes the deeper you reach into the pot (the students are generally good but there are few virtuosos like the old Fromm players among them). Then these musicians have other obligations as Music Center students, which limits their availability for preparing Festival works.

The conductor of Lieberson's Concerto is probably the best here this Summer and he is experienced with new music, but with the amount of rehearsal time he had for so difficult a piece (and, not to forget, with gifted but relatively unseasoned players), he didn't have a chance. Moreover, the situation is aggrivated by administrative absurdities. A piece with a low C for double-bass was assigned to a player whose bass had no low-C extension. Rehearsals for three pieces all requiring the Center's one vibraphone were scheduled for the same time. Many without complete personnel present, again because without complete presonnel present ,again because of schedule conflicts.

Few works were properly done. It is an old story. Arnold Schoenberg said, "My music isn't modern, it's just badly performed." But nobody has learned the lesson. When Beethoven gets mangled, we know it is the performance that makes it sound awful. When a new piece is murdered, it is the composer who gets blamed.

Good performances are essential. It is exceedingly difficult for an experienced, sympathetic professional to perceive the quality of a new work through the mess of the kind of performance to which Lieberson, or even Martino, were subjected. For the lay listener it must be impossible, and the Festival is after all addressed to him also ("... one of the most important annual events in the vital task of keeping the lines of communication open between composer and public"—Schuller).

And Fromm, rightly concerned that the careers of pieces not stop with their premieres, might consider that if a new work makes a bad impression at its premiere because of a bad performance, it is less likely to be picked up by other performers, less likely to be on its way to a continuing existence through further performances, recordings, publication, and so on (the Fromm Foundation's hope is "to channel the music of our time into the mainstream of musical life"—Fromm).

What good was done Peter Lieberson on August 7? He can list a Tanglewood performance in his cirriculum vitae; he can paste a friendly but necessarily tentative review from The Boston Globe into his scrapbook (next to a nasty one from The New York Times). The "performance" won him no golden opinions with the public, nor did it provide him with the opportunity — so important for a young composer — to hear and empirically to assess his own writing. Lieberson's was an extreme case, but it was not just an unhappy accident. The system here makes such disasters overwhelmingly likely.

Besides, it's immoral. At that concert, I thought of the contrast between what was going on here and the work of Speculum Musicae, the ensemble which had played the premieres of Martino's work and of the first part of Lieberson's earlier this year. The players of Speculum Musicae are super-virtuosos, but they are also extraordinary musicians and extraordinary people. Their dedication, their sense of what it means to treat music and its composers responsibly, is the right model to offer the Berkshire Music Center students. Instead, the students are offered as model the "professional" way of jobbers who rehearse to just beyond the point where you can be fairly sure the performance won't actually break down, that whole world of "don't worry" and "nobody will know the difference." Playing the Lieberson was an educational experience for the students involved only in so far as it showed them what you can get away with. It is perpetuating the worst habits rather than the best, sanctifying them not only by custom, but also by attaching to them the prestige-burdened names of Fromm, Schuller, Harvard, Tanglewood, Berkshire Music Center, Boston Symphony Orchestra. That, as something for a school to do, is immoral.

The Festival should be a Festival, an exciting event (and it was exciting in its early years) no one interested in new music would think of missing. That means less improvisation. The Festival program must be decided long before Summer (and commissions given out earlier). The person now making up the rehearsal schedules should be put t owork mowing the Tanglewood lawns. And it would be useful again to have something like the Fromm players — and ad hoc group, or an established one like Speculum Musicae, Arthur Weisberg's Contemporary Chamber Ensemble, or the group from Iowa University — who, without being worked to death, could perform and teach.

If that can't be done, the sadder alternative — preferable, though, to what we have now, which is unfair to everyone — is to cut the Festival back to two concerts, or if necessary to one, consisting only of good, carefully chosen works, adequately prepared and well performed. The ground rule is to do no more than is compatible with excellence. Right now, the gap between propaganda and reality is too wide.

Keeping the lid on things

The August 8 concert in Tanglewood's annual Festival of Contemporary Music began with two pieces drawn from a large, fascinating, and relatively little known area of contemporary music—early Cage. Both pieces are now more than 30 years old, but like most concertgoers, I had never heard either one.

"The Wonderful Widow of 18 Springs" is basically an art song, but like everything Cage has written, it has an unusual twist. In this case the unique factor is the piano accompaniment, which is played with the lid down over the keyboard. The pianist sits on the bench in the normal fashion, but he taps out little rhythms with his palms, fingers, and knuckles, drawing on a variety of resonances offered by the different wooden surfaces. Kim Patterson played this odd piano part with more delicacy and finesse than one might think possible, and soprano Candace Natvig was appealing in the innocent vocal line, set to poems of James Joyce.

"Imaginary Landscape" No. 1, composed in 1939, is one of Cage's early experiments with electronic sound. Of course, even the most basic sound synthesizing equipment was difficult for composers to obtain in those days, but this did not stop the 27-year-old Cage from doing what he could with a recording of a sine wave. The record was intended for testing equipment, but Cage used it to make primitive electronic music—fading the sound in and out, changing the speed of the turntable, and raising and lowering the needle.

The dancer Bonnie Bird, who collaborated with Cage in Seattle around this time, once told me an anecdote which has helped me to appreciate the historical context of this music. It seems that some of the local musicians had come to one of their concerts and, when confronted with this strange and pure sound, became fascinated in figuring out what kind of instrument it was. One thought it was some sort of flute. Another thought it must be a string harmonic. When told that it was neither a wind nor a string, but that the sound had been created purely by electronic means, they found the whole idea utterly incomprehensible.

Works by John Cage, Gyorgy Ligeti, and others at Tanglewood (Johnson)
Bruno Maderna's "Satyricon" at Tanglewood; brass and percussion music in Washington Square Park; highlights of the "Mostly Mozart" concerts (Kerner)
Indian music by Shakuntala Srinivasan (Kaplin)

In "Imaginary Landscape" No. 1, two of these recorded sine waves wail up and down, while three other players play a cymbal and make sounds on the piano strings. Of course, the original shock value of the electronic sound has worn away with the years, but this short piece is still fascinating and memorable in its own slightly crazy way.

Gyorgy Ligeti's 10 Pieces for Woodwind Quintet are condensed little pieces, rich in material. There are many of those Ligeti textures where a bunch of fast melodies get all snarled up, and a number of Ligeti's sustained textures, where notes keep fading in and out. But there is also a great deal of plain old rhythmic and melodic invention, and at least a couple of solo passages for each instrument. The first three pieces seemed especially fine, although the whole series is quite engaging, both to the ear and to the brain.

The last piece on the program was Alvin Etler's Concerto for Clarinet with Chamber Ensemble. This energetic four-movement piece is one of Etler's strongest works, and a beautiful example of his wonderful craftsmanship. The brass chords are always tinted just the right shade. Just the right drum always appears at just the right time. And the sleight of hand in the orchestration frequently tricks you into thinking you are hearing one instrument, only to discover that the sound is actually coming from somebody else. Against this constantly shifting background, the solo clarinet part, excellently played by W. Steve Owens, glides all over the place in gratifying virtuosic lines.

Etler, who died on June 13, will be sorely missed by the whole musical community, and especially by performers, who always get so much enjoyment from his unusually idiomatic instrumental parts.

Also on the program were Brenton Pell Crane's String Quartet Music and John Heiss's "Inventions, Contours, and Colors," for 11 instruments. I can't remember either piece well enough to make any specific remarks, though I do recall that they were rather conventional atonal works and that neither one held my interest for very long. Perhaps it was unfair to sandwich them into a program where the other works were so striking.

Judging from the fine performances on this program, the many young musicians participating in the Berkshire Music Center Fellowship Program are as capable as in previous years. Gunther Schuller, as director of the 11-year-old festival, deserves much credit for bringing it all together each year, as does the Fromm Foundation, which pays for so much of it.

—Tom Johnson

BRUNO MADERNA'S "Satyricon" brings to the world of opera something it seems to have lacked—the intentionally funny orgy. In this case, the orgy, besides the expected stage mock-ups of social life during the waning years of the Ancient Roman Empire, provides a riotous feast of musical styles and quotations.

This one-act opera is laid out (the expression seems unavoidable in the context) for optional arrangement of taped-sound and live-music sequences, with those in charge of a particular production deciding how things are to be ordered. Those in charge of its first American performances, August 5 and 6 at Tanglewood, were conductor Gunther Schuller and director Ian Strasfogel, and their use of all of Maderna's live score and a small fraction of his tapes provided a show of about an hour. (As Strasfogel tells it, the composer dumped four hours' worth of tapes in his lap and said, "Is all beautiful. Use what you want.")

The situation in Maderna's mostly English libretto, based on the William Arrowsmith translation of Petronius Arbiter's "Satyricon," is that Trimalchio, pansexually lecherous and mincing under yards of lame and layers of sequinned cosmetics, is giving a party attended by his equally gross wife, Fortunata, and assorted friends, hangers-on who hang on to the damnedest things, and a rather melancholy slave. In Strasfogel's staging, tenor William Neill, as Trimalchio, grabs for all the bodies in sight but gets very angry on catching Fortunata in someone else's panting clutches—angry enough to reduce her to a weeping heap by promising to remove her statue from his tomb. "That's right," says he in his best grapefruit-in-the-kisser style, "no statue, baby!" Neill is hilarious at that moment.

Mezzo- soprano Sandra Walker, who has shown evidence before this that she's on the threshold of an important vocal career, was the violently restless Fortunata who threw her roly-poly figure into a remarkably energetic fantasia of bump-and-grind. Also very active in several entanglements on the floor, as well as a clever realization of the story of the woman of Ephesus, were Janet Kenney, Emelia Simone, C. Evans Clough, Ronald Corrado, Ad Rijsdijk, and John Aler, the last-named of these being a lyric tenor who may soon be filling the Mozartean gap left several years ago by the sudden death of Fritz Wunderlich.

These singing actors, members of this summer's Music Theatre Project of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, dealt handily with a score that not only kidded some of the low-brow waltzes of Poulenc and Satie, ripped off the Valhalla motif and Musetta's song (this last a panic as played by Mark Mordue on coloratura tuba), and splashed a Charles Ives stew of Sousa all over the stage, but also, since Maderna is still one of the more talented composers around, drew some vocal lines of genuine, fresh, modern-sounding lyricism and orchestral music having some of the kind of delicacy found in the best of Berg.

Schuller conducted it all with spirit and evident joy. Strasfogel's staging kidded the erotica with no apologies. John Wright Stevens's scenery was a baleful mosaic of giant skulls behind twisting, slanting platforms, and Jeanne Button's costumes glittered and were gay.

At the August 6 performance in Tanglewood's small, jam-packed West Barn, there were two curtain raisers. The first was "Wolfgaengerl," a well intentioned, sympathetically staged but too often limply performed biography of Mozart in which songs, canons, and orchestral interludes mingle with quotes from very familiar letters to tell the story. The "Luise" songs, for instance, were somehow, and almost successfully, made to become part of Mozart's own experience. But the English translations often were too flat and plain for the music, particularly for such a great song as "Abendempfindung," and the albeit authentic scatology would have been more effective had it been spread out a bit, as Thornton Wilder's Dolly Levi wisely advises. The Satyriconites were all in this one, too, and Miss Walker and Aler were especially fine.

The other curtain raiser was a short, drab "Triptych," with slight, silly music by Bo Lawergren and words from Captain

Continued from preceding page
James Cook's diary and from Thomas Merton's "First Lesson About Man." The theme was degradation of the noble savage through civilization, and I doubt that this feeble charade added anything to it. However, Miss Kenney did look pretty dressed in cocnnut shells.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
VILLAGE VOICE
W. 115,500

AUG 16 1973

music

SINCE THIS SUMMER marks the 20th anniversary of the Washington Square Association's sponsorship of free high-quality, well rehearsed concerts in Washington Square Park, and since the renovation in that area has provided a handsome bandstand for such events, every encouragement should be given to continuing the project for years to come. But judging from this year's opener on August 7, there may be a question of conflict between the right of concertgoers to listen and the right of parkgoers to walk and talk after a hard day of earning the money to pay taxes.

The conflict was unresolved the other night, even in the face of a brightly played program of brass-and-percussion music. After a brutal amplification, through WNYC speakers, of Dukas's "La Peri" Fanfare, the plug was mercifully pulled, and all the sound was natural, but the softer parts of the music were inaudible toward the back of the seating area. The New York premiere of Gunther Schuller's "Five Moods," scored for four tubas, overcame most of the environmental difficulties, however, and proved to be a fluent journey through various and interesting thematic lines, rhythms, and textures, including staccato notes pitched through valves on the impact of the hand slapped on the mouthpiece. Schuller's early, familiar Symphony for Brass and Percussion was conducted for all its abundant brilliance by Henry Schuman, and his musicians did themselves proud. The program also included a peppery Riegger Nonet for Brass, an ethereal Gabrieli Sonata, and an overextended Villa-Lobos Choros No. 3, not to mention "Fanfares liturgiques," an unmentionably junky piece of cheap religiosity by Henri Tomasi.

ALL THE ACTIVITY these Monday through Saturday evenings at Philharmonic Hall through August 25 is, as advertised, mostly Mozart, with generous help from basic Bach and healthy Handel. This report is written at the halfway point in the four-week jamboree produced by Lincoln Center with money from the Herman Goldman Foundation and guidance from George Schutz and William Lockwood. The first half of this summer's annual festival ended with last Friday and Saturday nights' duplicate program of three of Mozart's most beautiful piano concerti, which is to say three of the most beautiful by anyone. Philippe Entremont was both soloist and conductor, and if the double duty got in the way of his achieving a full measure of the musical rewards of these pieces, the mere attempt to do all three masterpieces justice in one program was worth anybody's attention.

I think the most nagging defect of Friday evening's concert, which is the one I heard, was the failure to project the deep, sweet anguish in the Andante of Concerto No. 23. Entremont made it sound, of all things, pretty! However, some of Mozart's half-concealed romanticism in the G-Major Concerto No. 17 came through, and the Festival Orchestra did much to set the slow movement of K. 467 floating as serenely as it must.

This year's festival began July 30, with an orchestral concert featuring Alexander Schneider as conductor and Peter Serkin as piano soloist, but preceded by a no-extra-charge recital in which these two musicians offered tensile, gleaming performances of Mozart's Sonata No. 11 in G for Violin and Piano and the first version of Bach's Sixth Sonata in the same key. Schneider brought his usual zest and commitment to the first of Handel's Opus 6 Concerti Grossi and the Third Orchestral Suite of Bach, the Air in the latter sounding with near-perfect delicacy. Serkin played a brave, dashing account of the 14th Piano Concerto and a ripping, but not quite "engaged" reading of the 15th.

On August 2, the festival came up with a revelation. Elly Ameling, a lyric soprano from Holland, had appeared in New York recitals several times before and had shown off what had seemed to me a beautiful, clear voice but not much in the way of temperament or interpretive insight. She is now a different artist, the voice just as splendid as before but at last the proper means to the greater ends of realizing the emotions behind the notes. In 14 Mozart songs, with Norman Shetler as a very musical piano accompanist, "Trennungslied" and "Als Luise die Briefe" were joined as a piteous mini-cycle, which is only right, since they have consecutive Koechel catalog numbers; "Komm, lieber Zither" floated with great poise over Shetler's swift, light accompaniment; "Dans un bois solitaire" was projected masterfully in terms of its slowly increasing intensity, and the radiant, blooming vocal texture, combined with emotional light-and-shade, in both "Sehnsucht nach dem Fruehlinge" and "An die Einsamkeit" brought back thoughts of the Elisabeth Schwarzkopf of 20 years ago, minus hoots. Miss Ameling shared her program with the sometimes adequate, sometimes out-of-tune New York Philomusica Chamber Ensemble, which was generous of her.

—Leighton Kerner

SERIOUS MUSIC in a restaurant? Why not? I've always disliked the phony formalities of concert halls, with their separation of artists and audience (and members of the audience from each other) and their careful delineation of spotlight and shadow: they structure events in such a way that any sense of organic unfolding is destroyed and programs are just that—programed away from reciprocity.

John McLaughlin (Mahavishnu), in the service of his guru, Sri Chinmoy, has opened an Indian style vegetarian restaurant in Jamaica—Annam Brahma, where the decor is light and simple and the food relatively inexpensive and served before and after but, happily, not during the music. Anyone who can eat and listen to music at the same time is probably not paying much attention to either.

Shakuntala Srinivasan plays the Saraswati vina, the vina of South India; carved and painted and gilded and embellished, a very old instrument out of a still vivid mythology, its appearance should satisfy the most demanding fancy. Saraswati, the partner of Brahma (the creative principle in the Hindu trinity) and the goddess of wisdom, music, and learning, is credited with the invention of music and is always pictured playing (or at least holding) this instrument. It is to Saraswati that the musicians of India do reverence, keeping her image before them, lighting incense and offering garlands of jasmine and roses. On Saraswati Puja Day, in early spring, you must either perform or attend a concert and if you can do both so much the better. In Delhi I had a copybook to write my lessons in and on its cover was an image of Saraswati ji to spur me on . . . in the picture, as usual, the hand positions were incorrect. But she had a dreamy expression on her face and in her lower left hand (she has four) her book was open to the Sanskrit sign for Aum.

I can remember quite clearly that once, not so long ago really, I couldn't tell the difference between Northern (Hindustani) and Southern (Karnatic) music and was even naive enough to imagine that the differences were "exaggerated" by adherents to one or the other branch. These days I know what I'm listening to immediately with the first phrase, the first note even, and the adherents are still lined up on their chosen sides (or the sides they were born to, more likely) and not many lines of communications are open. It is not usual to meet an Indian who enjoys both Hindustani and Karnatic music. And yet they spring from a common mother: the stretch of time across the blazing plain. Technically, they both use the same basic form: Raga, termed Raagam in Karnatic nomenclature. They both begin with an alap in free time in which the melodic possibilities are investigated and embroidered, followed by a section in measured time called jor and jhala in Hindustani music and taanam in the Karnatic system. All of this is solo and largely improvisational, following the peculiarities of the particular Raga.

For all these similarities of form, the first striking difference between Hindustani and Karnatic is already apparent in the beginning of the alap, in the character of the meend or sliding tones. The main playing string of the sitar, a Northern instrument, may be pulled a full fifth, giving the note at the fret as well as many combinations, the elaborateness of the curving note pattern being limited only by your imagination (training) and the sustaining power of your instrument. With the Saraswati vina there are no long pulls and great attention is paid to the srutis (microtones), creating the characteristic quavering gamaka sound. Coming to the rhythmic section, with drum, Mridangam, a one-piece two-ended drum held in the lap. The entire rhythmic part of the Raagam is a fixed composition, unlike the Hindustani Raga in which the gat, although of great importance, is quite short and used as a skeleton around which to build.

Shakuntala Srinivasan is a Madrasi, has played since childhood, and has had several gurus, the principal one being Anantharam Dikshitar, the great-great-grandson of Muttuswami Dikshitar who was one of the three greatest Karnatic composers. Her earlier gurus were Rajamani Ayer and Vaidyamatha Ayar and she learned vocal music from T. M. Tyagarajan.

About the program on August 4 at Annam Brahma: it was very fine and I was held from beginning to end. I had the impression that my attention span was growing as I listened, and as she played a door to a treasure garden opened. Shakuntala Srinivasan has virtuoso technique and her style is chaste and abstract. The major Raagam was Shankarabharanan, using all the notes of the major scale in both ascent and descent, with a long, exciting, and satisfying alap. She moved through the octaves with precision and sometimes startling speed. During the rhythmic section the tempo was generally relaxed, as Karnatic music does not accelerate as the Hindustani style does: the time may be doubled or quadrupled but not speeded up.

Ramand V. Raghavan's playing of Mridangam was admirable: attentive, supportive, and fully integrated with the vina, making right-on moments of kinetic excitement. In all there were six items, among them a Tillana and a seven-beat devotional piece with Lord Krishna as the subject. After the concert I stuffed myself with a little bit of everything in the kitchen, "Taster's Choice," and left feeling as if I'd really heard something.

—Rose Kaplin

Music Festival Opens Saturday

Special to The Times

LENOX — The 10th annual Festival of Contemporary Music, comprising six programs of works for voice, chamber ensembles, orchestra, and music theater, commences Saturday, Aug. 10 (2:30 p.m.) at Tanglewood.

Music: New 'Satyricon' at Tanglewood

B Sym

By DONAL HENAHAN

Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 6—Most contemporary artists, it sometimes seems, have become convinced that the world ends not with a bang or awhimper, but a snicker. That might help explain the recent rush being given to Petronius Arbiter, whose "Satyricon" is known to every college sophomore as the ultimate statement about late Roman decadence. The latest to put Petronius to use is Bruno Maderna, whose one-act opera "Satyricon"—he wrote the libretto as well as the music—had its first American performance last night at Tanglewood, as part of the Berkshire Music Center's Music Theater Project at the annual Festival of Contemporary Music here.

Musically, Mr. Maderna something for everybody. The score is a skillful melange in which electronic tape sequences augment and comment upon a traditional orchestra and voices. So, when the foppish sybarite Trimalchio and his slaves are tearing into their dinner with noisy gusto, the tape contributes piggish squeals and grunts. That too-obvious sort of thing is a bit overdone, but on the while Mr. Maderna's score fills the available time effectively, tossing a salad of parodistic scraps from Mozart, Wagner, Strauss, Sousa and many, many more.

At times the older music is wittily apropos, as when Trimalchio indulges in an orgy of boasting to the strains of "The Stars and Stripes Forever," looking and sounding exactly like any self-made, oil-depleting tycoon. Bits of Leharish camp, Elgarish pomp, tangos, strip-tease numbers, chansonettes and the blues also drift in and out of the musical pictue.

Amusing? Yes, much of the time. And perhaps even susceptible to interpretation as a moral fable for our times. Mr. Maderna's pastiche has things on its mind, and some of them filtered through in this student performance. William Neill (Trimalchio) and John Aler (Habinnas) stood out vocally in the generally excellent cast, and a tuba player named Mark Mordue made the most of a juicy part ("Satyricon" is, at the very least, the only opera in one's experience that offers a starring role to a tuba player).

The staging, by Ian Strasfogel (who also provided the scenario in this English-language production), had its inspiration, though it relied far too heavily on the mock-sensual pawing and leering that even Fellini can no longer offer as persuasive evidence of decadence. Mr. Strasfogel, of course, is kidding, but the serious question remains: how Petronius, the classicist of camp, can be trumped in this respect. The struggle to parodize a parody soon becomes tiresome.

Gunther Schuller's alert conducting helped mightily to keep this performance moving purposefully, though Mr. Maderna's score might well be trimmed by 10 minutes with no crippling result.

The other half of the night's double bill was a rather feeble staging of Bo Lawergren's "Triptych," in which weak jokes and thin musical ideas complemented one another all too well. The less said the better about this one.

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
846,132

AUG 7. 1973

New England Newsclip

SCULPTURE at Tanglewood includes this piece by George Rickey of East Chatham, N.Y., which is one of 19 works loaned by sculptors in the Berkshire area. Mrs. T. D. Perry, center, is art show coordinator. With her are artists Alex Markoff, left, and Peter Homestead.

(B, Sym)

Music Theatre Project schedules three productions at Tanglewood

The Music Theatre Project at Tanglewood will present Mozart's "Wolfgangerl," Bo Lawergren's "Triptych" and the American premiere of Bruno Maderna's "Satyricon" next month. Ian Strasfogel is the director and John Wright Stevens is the designer.

Dates set

The schedule of 8:30 performances in the West Barn is as follows: "Wolfgangerl" and "Triptych," Aug. 2; "Triptych" and "Satyricon," Aug. 5; "Wolfgangerl" and Satyricon," Aug. 6.

"Wolfgangerl" is a portrait of Mozart using narration derived from texts and contemporary observations and various instrumental and vocal music. Excerpts, translated by Gustavo Mata, include many of Mozart's comic ensembles based on personal events in his life.

"Triptych" is a surrealistic presentation of Capt. Cook's first voyage to the Tahitian Islands for soprano, baritone, actor, mime and four instruments. It will be staged by Mata and conducted by Tibor Pusztai.

"Satyricon," an avant-garde operetta, is a series of fragments based on episodes from the Petronius poem. It will be conducted by Gunther Schuller.

Strasfogel is also the general manager of the Opera Society of Washington, D.C., and chairman of the New England Conservatory's opera department. Before directing the Music Theatre Project, he was artistic director and cofounder of the Augusta Opera Company and artistic administrator of the Trunau Opera Company.

Reservations for the performances must be made with the Friends office at Tanglewood.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 39,400

1973

New England Newsclip

'Satyricon' Observes Longer Run

LENOX — It would be a shame if the Tanglewood production of Bruno Maderna's "Satyricon" were to receive only two performances in America.

It's not really an opera, but there's a lot of singing in it. Nor is it musical comedy, or operetta, or a comedy, or a drama, or a melodrama, or a sophisticated satire, or burlesque.

But it has material from all of those styles and, like other productions offered by the music theater project at the Berkshire Music Center of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, it is billed informally as music-drama. (But that's what Wagner called his operas.)

Maderna, in Italian conductor and early member of the serialistic group of composers, wrote the libretto as well as the music, and Sunday night the first performance in America was a big success with the small audience crowded into Tanglewood's West Barn. The second was scheduled Monday.

"Satyricon" was written for orchestra and sound-effects tape and five performers who recreate characters drawn from the original "satyricon," a first-hand report of the dissolute life in a community of Nero's Rome.

Maderna's rewrite is hilarious. He causes the characters sometimes to become comic caricatures; he makes them into momentary burlesque comedians, and hootchie-kootchie dancers.

They make speeches and sing exhortations, tell jokes, make love in wildly exaggerated fashion, quote bits of song and melody from all manner of sources (jazz, hymns, Puccini) and writher and glide and leap and slink about the stage at varying speeds according to the mood of the idea being lampooned.

The 65-minute work opens and closes in super-slow motion (the circular idea of ending at the beginning is not the only cliche in the show), and there are sections that seem to speed up or slow down arbitrarily in the abstract fashion of music.

Fundamentally, the material, when it can be clearly understood, seems to be a faithful reflection of Petronius' intent. . .a report of the breaking down of Roman society. . .commercial exploitation, greed, infidelity, sexual freedom, slavery and arrogant pride.

The costumes are lavish examples of a Busbee Berkley dream of a Roman orgy (gold is the dominant color), and the set consists of eight or 10 pillows and an overhead rope net (where the slave sleeps.)

The stage is made up of six platforms, overlapping, cantilevered, tilting and, incongruously, level. It works very well, indeed.

And the young performers, advanced students on the edge of professionalism, are uncommonly talented.

R. C. Hammerich

UNION (M)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 84,000

AUG 6 1973

New England Newsclip

The Avant-Garde Looks Backward

By DONAL HENAHAN

UNLIKE Senator Ervin's famous firefly, which carries its illumination behind, the curious creature known as the avant-gardist is expected to shine its light out front. Hindsight is all very well for a trapped politician, but if the avant-garde is not able to show us where we are headed can it reasonably claim that name? And yet, during the recent Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood, an annual gathering where hints to the future might be expected to turn up, a decided air of looking backward dominated the programs. On the surface, at least, the festival would seem to be letting down the avant-garde side.

But that assumes, of course, that the primary mission of such a festival is to unearth novelties and to explore the outer limits of experimentation. That assumption was denied plainly in the programs arranged by Gunther Schuller, who directs the festival for the Berkshire Music Center. The trappings of recent avant-gardism were conspicuously absent from Tanglewood last week. There was nothing electronic in these concerts except for Charles Dodge's witty experiment in synthesizing the human voice in his "Speech Songs." Aleatory or chance-influenced music made an appearance only in modest snippets during such pieces as John Heiss's "Inventions, Contours and Colors" and substantially only in Lester Trimble's partly improvisational game, "Panels I." Several promising ideas of recent years, such as the merging of music and theater in concert pieces and the mixing of media in general, would seem to have been quietly dropped, at least for this festival's one-week run.

Two illustrations may be enough to point up the festival's re-embrace of yesterday. As a tribute to John Cage, in his 60th anniversary year, three of his earlier pieces were chosen: "Five Songs for Contralto" (1938), "The Wonderful Widow of 18 Springs" (1942), and "Imaginary Landscape No. 1" (1939). Schuller's program notes for the last-named piece made a point of the fact that although Cage was anticipating history here by producing "a kind of embryonic pre-electronic music" some 13 years before the emergence of actual electronic music, his piece is "completely notated." One felt that the listener was expected to value the piece more highly because of this bow to traditional craftsmanship.

*

The other tell-tale sign of what this festival apparently tried to emphasize came with the first American performance of Peter Maxwell Davies's "Blind Man's Buff," a piece of music drama that he calls a masque. It fell entirely flat, partly at least because it was performed as an essay in absolute music, with one soprano singing the roles of the two characters, the Boy King and the Jester, and with the interludes of mime and dance not even suggested. The Davies piece made a feeble impression therefore and based on its notes alone one would not give it a second thought. But is that a fair trial of musical theater?

On the whole, then, the festival came down on the side of the definitely tried and possibly true. The characteristic piece may have been Peter Lieberson's Concerto for Four Groups of Instruments, an amazingly sober reprise of all the post-Webern clichés in the textbooks. To see a composer who was born in 1946 immersing himself in such scholastic stuff made one realize just how conservative many young composers are nowadays.

The composer whose work took the most plausibly modern stance was the 53-year-old Bruno Maderna, whose opera, "Satyricon," sounded like a thesaurus of recently fashionable ideas. It made points by a collage of quotations and distortions drawn from Strauss, Mozart, Sousa, and a dozen others. Helped by Ian Strasfogel's broad staging, Mr. Maderna's opera trafficked heavily in the put-on, the parody, the mock-sensual and the tongue-in-chic degeneracy of Petronius Arbiter. It had electronic tape interludes to comment on the stage activities and it had a lot of humor of the sort that used to be called sophomoric but is now offered everywhere on stages as evidence that artists are not sophisticated snobs.

So then, you might protest, if that is what the certified avant-garde has been up to, perhaps the Festival of Contemporary Music was on a reasonable track in heading the other way. At any rate, these annual Tanglewood weeks sponsored by the Fromm Music Foundation have traditionally been far less obsessed with the outrageous and the bizarre than the important European orgies of avant-gardism such as Darmstadt and Donaueschingen. And right now, with indications all about that composers are thinking in more conservative terms, it is not out of the question to interpret this year's "Fromm Week" as a signpost to a future in which music will again concentrate on definite pitch relations, exact notation, unamplified and undistorted instruments, and . . .

And traditional tonality? That did not seem outlandish as one listened here to the most enthusiastically applauded piece of the week, James Drew's "West Indian Lights."

Drew, a 44-year-old member of the composition faculty at Yale, is apparently a throwback in many ways. From his place in the bastion of the Academy, he produced a work that thumbed its nose at most of the dogmas of contemporary music. Lushly scored with the obvious intent of pleasing the ear, Drew's music flirted with exoticism and invoked traditional tonality to a degree that would have been laughable to the avant-garde not long ago. The Fromm-Week audience of musicians and new-music connoisseurs greeted the piece, however, with shameless enthusiasm. In fact, only a tendency to carry on his good ideas a bit too long diluted the success of Mr. Drew's work.

What if, then, (Continued on Page 20)

Avant-Garde

Continued from Page 13

this 10th annual Festival of Contemporary Music were actually, in spite of superficial indications, showing us what lies ahead for music? The possibility should not be quickly dismissed, however much one might resist the idea of a future in which the chief function of composers and other musicians would be to move forward while facing backward, like the kiwi bird of legend which wanted to know only where it had been, not where it was going.

*

To a great extent, of course, any such festival as this is shaped by the prejudices as well as the program decisions of its director. Schuller's choices this year were largely a reflection of his career as a brass player, an academician, a jazz performer and a conductor for whom the most intricate scores present few insurmountable problems. Bill Schuller is a representative modern composer as well, and his current predelictions unquestionably are shared by many of his more influential colleagues. This, then, may be remembered as the year of lightning-bug avant-gardism at Tanglewood.

Music: New 'Satyricon' at Tanglewood

B Eyn

By DONAL HENAHAN

Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 6—Most contemporary artists, it sometimes seems, have become convinced that the world ends not with a bang or awhimper, but a snicker. That might help explain the recent rush being given to Petronius Arbiter, whose "Satyricon" is known to every college sophomore as the ultimate statement about late Roman decadence. The latest to put Petronius to use is Bruno Maderna, whose one-act opera "Satyricon"—he wrote the libretto as well as the music—had its first American performance last night at Tanglewood, as part of the Berkshire Music Center's Music Theater Project at the annual Festival of Contemporary Music here.

Musically, Mr. Maderna something for everybody. The score is a skillful melange in which electronic tape sequences augment and comment upon a traditional orchestra and voices. So, when the foppish sybarite Trimalchio and his slaves are tearing into their dinner with noisy gusto, the tape contributes piggish squeals and grunts. That too-obvious sort of thing is a bit overdone, but on the while Mr. Maderna's score fills the available time effectively, tossing a salad of parodistic scraps from Mozart, Wagner, Strauss, Sousa and many, many more.

At times the older music is wittily apropos, as when Trimalchio indulges in an orgy of boasting to the strains of "The Stars and Stripes Forever," looking and sounding exactly like any self-made, oil-depleting tycoon. Bits of Leharish camp, Elgarish pomp, tangos, strip-tease numbers, chansonettes and the blues also drift in and out of the musical pictue.

Amusing? Yes, much of the time. And perhaps even susceptible to interpretation as a moral fable for our times. Mr. Maderna's pastiche has things on its mind, and some of them filtered through in this student performance. William Neill (Trimalchio) and John Aler (Habinnas) stood out vocally in the generally excellent cast, and a tuba player named Mark Mordue made the most of a juicy part ("Satyricon" is, at the very least, the only opera in one's experience that offers a starring role to a tuba player).

The staging, by Ian Strasfogel (who also provided the scenario in this English-language production), had its inspiration, though it relied far too heavily on the mock-sensual pawing and leering that even Fellini can no longer offer as persuasive evidence of decadence. Mr. Strasfogel, of course, is kidding, but the serious question remains: how Petronius, the classicist of camp, can be trumped in this respect. The struggle to parodize a parody soon becomes tiresome.

Gunther Schuller's alert conducting helped mightily to keep this performance moving purposefully, though Mr. Maderna's score might well be trimmed by 10 minutes with no crippling result.

The other half of the night's double bill was a rather feeble staging of Bo Lawergren's "Triptych," in which weak jokes and thin musical ideas complemented one another all too well. The less said the better about this one.

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
846,132

AUG 7 1973

New England Newsclip

SCULPTURE at Tanglewood includes this piece by George Rickey of East Chatham, N.Y., which is one of 19 works loaned by sculptors in the Berkshire area. Mrs. T. D. Perry, center, is art show coordinator. With her are artists Alex Markoff, left, and Peter Homestead.

(B. Eyn)

Music Theatre Project schedules three productions at Tanglewood

The Music Theatre Project at Tanglewood will present Mozart's "Wolfgangerl," Bo Lawergren's "Triptych" and the American premiere of Bruno Maderna's "Satyricon" next month. Ian Strasfogel is the director and John Wright Stevens is the designer.

Dates set

The schedule of 8:30 performances in the West Barn is as follows: "Wolfgangerl" and "Triptych," Aug. 2; "Triptych" and "Satyricon," Aug. 5; "Wolfgangerl" and Satyricon," Aug. 6.

"Wolfgangerl" is a portrait of Mozart using narration derived from texts and contemporary observations and various instrumental and vocal music. Excerpts, translated by Gustavo Mata, include many of Mozart's comic ensembles based on personal events in his life.

"Triptych" is a surrealistic presentation of Capt. Cook's first voyage to the Tahitian Islands for soprano, baritone, actor, mime and four instruments. It will be staged by Mata and conducted by Tibor Pusztai.

"Satyricon," an avant-garde operetta, is a series of fragments based on episodes from the Petronius poem. It will be conducted by Gunther Schuller.

Strasfogel is also the general manager of the Opera Society of Washington, D.C., and chairman of the New England Conservatory's opera department. Before directing the Music Theatre Project, he was artistic director and cofounder of the Augusta Opera Company and artistic administrator of the Trunau Opera Company.

Reservations for the performances must be made with the Friends office at Tanglewood.

1973

New England Newsclip

'Satyricon' Observes Longer Run

LENOX — It would be a shame if the Tanglewood production of Bruno Maderna's "Satyricon" were to receive only two performances in America.

It's not really an opera, but there's a lot of singing in it. Nor is it musical comedy, or operetta, or a comedy, or a drama, or a melodrama, or a sophisticated satire, or burlesque.

But it has material from all of those styles and, like other productions offered by the music theater project at the Berkshire Music Center of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, it is billed informally as music-drama. (But that's what Wagner called his operas.)

Maderna, in Italian conductor and early member of the serialistic group of composers, wrote the libretto as well as the music, and Sunday night the first performance in America was a big success with the small audience crowded into Tanglewood's West Barn. The second was scheduled Monday.

"Satyricon" was written for orchestra and sound-effects tape and five performers who recreate characters drawn from the original "satyricon," a first-hand report of the dissolute life in a community of Nero's Rome.

Maderna's rewrite is hilarious. He causes the characters sometimes to become comic caricatures; he makes them into momentary burlesque comedians and hootchie-kootchie dancers.

They make speeches and sing exhortations, tell jokes, make love in wildly exaggerated fashion, quote bits of song and melody from all manner of sources (jazz, hymns, Puccini) and writher and glide and leap and slink about the stage at varying speeds according to the mood of the idea being lampooned.

The 65-minute work opens and closes in super-slow motion (the circular idea of ending at the beginning is not the only cliche in the show), and there are sections that seem to speed up or slow down arbitrarily in the abstract fashion of music.

Fundamentally, the material, when it can be clearly understood, seems to be a faithful reflection of Petronius' intent. . .a report of the breaking down of Roman society. . .commercial exploitation, greed, infidelity, sexual freedom, slavery and arrogant pride.

The costumes are lavish examples of a Busbee Berkley dream of a Roman orgy (gold is the dominant color), and the set consists of eight or 10 pillows and an overhead rope net (where the slave sleeps.)

The stage is made up of six platforms, overlapping, cantilevered, tilting and, incongruously, level. It works very well, indeed.

And the young performers, advanced students on the edge of professionalism, are uncommonly talented.

R. C. Hammerich

BOSTON (M)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
[illegible]

AUG 6 1973

New England Newsclip

The Avant-Garde Looks Backward

By DONAL HENAHAN

UNLIKE Senator Ervin's famous firefly, which carries its illumination behind, the curious creature known as the avant-gardist is expected to shine its light out front. Hindsight is all very well for a trapped politician, but if the avant-garde is not able to show us where we are headed can it reasonably claim that name? And yet, during the recent Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood, an annual gathering where hints to the future might be expected to turn up, a decided air of looking backward dominated the programs. On the surface, at least, the festival would seem to be letting down the avant-garde side.

But that assumes, of course, that the primary mission of such a festival is to unearth novelties and to explore the outer limits of experimentation. That assumption was denied plainly in the programs arranged by Gunther Schuller, who directs the festival for the Berkshire Music Center. The trappings of recent avant-gardism were conspicuously absent from Tanglewood last week. There was nothing electronic in these concerts except for Charles Dodge's witty experiment in synthesizing the human voice in his "Speech Songs." Aleatory or chance-influenced music made an appearance only in modest snippets during such pieces as John Heiss's "Inventions, Contours and Colors" and substantially only in Lester Trimble's partly improvisational game, "Panels I." Several promising ideas of recent years, such as the merging of music and theater in concert pieces and the mixing of media in general, would seem to have been quietly dropped, at least for this festival's one-week run.

Two illustrations may be enough to point up the festival's re-embrace of yesterday. As a tribute to John Cage, in his 60th anniversary year, three of his earlier pieces were chosen: "Five Songs for Contralto" (1938), "The Wonderful Widow of 18 Springs" (1942), and "Imaginary Landscape No. 1" (1939). Schuller's program notes for the last-named piece made a point of the fact that although Cage was anticipating history here by producing "a kind of embryonic pre-electronic music" some 13 years before the emergence of actual electronic music, his piece is "completely notated." One felt that the listener was expected to value the piece more highly because of this bow to traditional craftsmanship.

*

The other tell-tale sign of what this festival apparently tried to emphasize came with the first American performance of Peter Maxwell Davies's "Blind Man's Buff," a piece of music drama that he calls a masque. It fell entirely flat, partly at least because it was performed as an essay in absolute music, with one soprano singing the roles of the two characters, the Boy King and the Jester, and with the interludes of mime and dance not even suggested. The Davies piece made a feeble impression therefore and based on its notes alone one would not give it a second thought. But is that a fair trial of musical theater?

On the whole, then, the festival came down on the side of the definitely tried and possibly true. The characteristic piece may have been Peter Lieberson's Concerto for Four Groups of Instruments, an amazingly sober reprise of all the post-Webern clichés in the textbooks. To see a composer who was born in 1946 immersing himself in such scholastic stuff made one realize just how conservative many young composers are nowadays.

The composer whose work took the most plausibly modern stance was the 53-year-old Bruno Maderna, whose opera, "Satyricon," sounded like a thesaurus of recently fashionable ideas. It made points by a collage of quotations and distortions drawn from Strauss, Mozart, Sousa, and a dozen others. Helped by Ian Strasfogel's broad staging, Mr. Maderna's opera trafficked heavily in the put-on, the parody, the mock-sensual and the tongue-in-chic degeneracy of Petronius Arbiter. It had electronic tape interludes to comment on the stage activities and it had a lot of humor of the sort that used to be called sophomoric but is now offered everywhere on stages as evidence that artists are not sophisticated snobs.

So then, you might protest, if that is what the certified avant-garde has been up to, perhaps the Festival of Contemporary Music was on a reasonable track in heading the other way. At any rate, these annual Tanglewood weeks sponsored by the Fromm Music Foundation have traditionally been far less obsessed with the outrageous and the bizarre than the important European orgies of avant-gardism such as Darmstadt and Donaueschingen. And right now, with indications all about that composers are thinking in more conservative terms, it is not out of the question to interpret this year's "Fromm Week" as a signpost to a future in which music will again concentrate on definite pitch relations, exact notation, unamplified and undistorted instruments, and . . .

And traditional tonality? That did not seem outlandish as one listened here to the most enthusiastically applauded piece of the week, James Drew's "West Indian Lights."

Drew, a 44-year-old member of the composition faculty at Yale, is apparently a throwback in many ways. From his place in the bastion of the Academy, he produced a work that thumbed its nose at most of the dogmas of contemporary music. Lushly scored with the obvious intent of pleasing the ear, Drew's music flirted with exoticism and invoked traditional tonality to a degree that would have been laughable to the avant-garde not long ago. The Fromm-Week audience of musicians and new-music connoisseurs greeted the piece, however, with shameless enthusiasm. In fact, only a tendency to carry on his good ideas a bit too long diluted the success of Mr. Drew's work.

What if, then, (Continued on Page 20)

Avant-Garde

Continued from Page 13

this 10th annual Festival of Contemporary Music were actually, in spite of superficial indications, showing us what lies ahead for music? The possibility should not be quickly dismissed, however much one might resist the idea of a future in which the chief function of composers and other musicians would be to move forward while facing backward, like the kind bird of legend which wanted to know only where it had been, not where it was going.

*

To a great extent, of course, any such festival as this is shaped by the prejudices as well as the program decisions of its director. Schuller's choices this year were largely a reflection of his career as a brass player, an academician, a jazz performer and a conductor for whom the most intricate scores present few insurmountable problems. Mr. Schuller is a representative modern composer as well, and his current predelictions unquestionably are shared by many of his more influential colleagues. This, then, may be remembered as the year of lightning-bug avant-gardism at Tanglewood.

TELEGRAPH (E)
NASHUA, N. H.
D. 23,694

AUG 4 1973 New England Newsclip

Music Theatre Performances Presented at Tanglewood

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Massachusetts — Ian Strasfogel, Director of the Music Theatre Project at Tanglewood, today announced detailed outlines of the works to be performed this season in the West Barn. The Music Theatre Project will present workshop performances on July 22 and 23 in the West Barn. These are strictly progress rehearals, with no real lighting or staging. The public may attend these performances, but reservations must be made with the Friends Office at Tanglewood.

The actual performances of the works run on August 2nd, 5th and 6th, each at 8:30 p.m. in the West Barn. Reservations must be made with the Friends Office.

The three works to be performed this season are Mozart's "Wolfgangerl, Bo Lawergren's Triptych and the American premiere of Bruno Maderna's Satyricon.

Wolfgangerl is a portrait of Mozart, using narration derived from texts of letters and contemporary observations. It has been devised by Ian Strasfogel using various instrumental and vocal music, all of which is rarely performed. Excerpts are translated by Gustavo Mata and include many of Mozart's comic ensembles based on personal events in his life as well as an unexpurgated presentation of some of his canons. Mr. Strasfogel will conduct.

This summer's performance of Bo Lawergren's Triptych marks the first staged performance. Triptych was composed by the Swedish composer in 1969 while he was living in America. It was performed in 1971 at the Composers Forum in New York. Triptych is a surrealistic presentation of Captain Cook's first voyage to the Tahitian Islands, for soprano, baritone, actor, mime and four instruments. The work is staged by Gustavo Mata and is conducted by Tibor Pusztai.

Bruno Maderna's Satyricon premiered at the Netherlands Opera in March of 1973 with Ian Strasfogel conducting. Satyricon is a series of fragments based on episodes from the Petronius poem. The work is so designed that pieces can be reordered for each performance and use can be made of electronic interludes between episodes. Satyricon met with tremendous success in Holland and was taped for television presentation by Netherlands television. It will be presentedin November by La Scala in Milan. This American premiere at Tanglewood will be staged by Ian Strasfogel and conducted by Gunther Schuller and will differ in approach from the world premiere production. Satyricon is a light-hearted avant-garde operetta and its American premiere is certainly an event of note. John Wright Stevens designed all three works for the Music Theatre Project.

Ian Strasfogel, Director of the Music Theatre Project at Tanglewood, is the General Manager of the Opera Society of Washington, D.C. and made his European debut staging Satyricon. He has been Director of the Music Theatre Project at Tanglewood since 1971.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 29,047

AUG 4 1973 New England Newsclip

Music review

Music Theatre Project at Tanglewood

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

THE FESTIVAL of Contemporary Music sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation at Harvard presented an evening of the Music Theatre Project last night in the West Barn.

* * *

"Wolfgangerl," a portrait of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, devised by Ian Strasvogel from Mozart's music and correspondence was an excessive dose. Mozart's music sung by very superior youthful voices for an hour and 40 minutes without respite is beyond the digestive capacity of some music-lovers. A narrator read letters the youthful, and then not so youthful, "W. A. Mozart" wrote to intimate friends and members of his family which had a tincture of mild scatology and were mainly posted from Asolo, a village later associated with Browning.

"Triptych," a mercifully short sketch derived from the 1770 diary of Capt. James Cook in the South Pacific and from Thomas Merton's poem "First Lesson About Man" was an elaborate trifle involving a large complement of workers and a small cast of explorers and explored.

Cook went to the South Pacific for the English Admiralty to observe the impending transit of Venus. He reached Tahiti in 1769 but for the purposes of the production, for which Bo Lawergren wrote the inconsequential music, the captain's sights were focused much more on a present and terrestrial Venus than on one in the distant and celestial galaxy.

* * *

"Satyricon," a single act operetta with both the music and the libretto by Bruno Maderna, based on Petronius Arbiter's Satyricon and translated into English by William Arrowsmith, was given its first American performance. Gunther Schuller conducted an orchestra which gave way alternately to tape-recorded sounds, both musical and articulated.

The plot involves a cast of eight excellent vocalists. They are costumed and scenery is devised to represent what once served Zero Mostel in a geographical displacement in "The Forum." The company is infected with satyriasis and nymphomania and some part of the action reflected a "Last Tango" emphasis. Maderna is as keen a wit with his music as with his libretto and references to familiar phrases of the entire orchestral repertory spark the long and repetitious recital hilariously, but by midnight the edge of wit had dulled and in its excess became boring.

* * *

The stage at West Barn is constructed on several planes, interesting visually, permitting all sorts of action and traffic which prevents static inertia. It seems that all the worthy institutions concerned and the talented personalities implicated might have found material more worthy of the concentration the evening patently revealed and something with prospects of longer endurance.

Broad humor has a definite place in art and standards of vulgarity have changed. Shakespeare provides anyone in search of bawdy examples a plethora of material but last night's succession of plays went out of its way to concentrate on what the Bard used only as spice. It was a pity. The capabilities of the performers, on stage and in the orchestral pit, seemed poised for more worthy material.

Whitestone

TRIMALCHIO, played by William Neill, is surrounded by cast members in a scene from the operetta, "Satyricon."

Music Theater Now in Progress at Tanglewood

By RICHARD CONWAY

One of the most vital parts of the summer season at Tanglewood is the Music Theatre Project, which has staged some remarkable and highly successful chamber opera works in the West Barn, on the Tanglewood estate grounds.

The project stages unfamiliar or little performed works by the great masters and also leads the way in trying out new works of chamber theatre dimensions.

Sunday night, as part of the week-long Festival of Contemporary Music now in progress, the theatre project presented the first staged performance of Bo Lawergren's "Triptych" and the American premiere of Bruno Maderna's "Satyricon."

Based on Petronius Arbiter's writings, the play is a satirical look into the mores of the upper class in Rome in the decadent period that ultimately led to its downfall. The hedonistic life-style, the bi-sexuality of the times, the bored indifference, the shallowness are all vividly depicted in Petronius' text, and find equally vivid visual expression in director Ian Strasfogel's staging and the performances of an excellent cast.

Maderna's music is a melange of many things, ranging from electronic manipulations to wonderfully satirical quotes from such things as "The Stars and Stripes Forever," "Til Eulenspiegel," and "Carmen."

There are two absolutely marvelous tuba solo passages that are played with just the right touch by Mark Mordue, attired in the garb of a centurian and wearing dark glasses. A wonderfully funny touch.

Of the fine performances in this production, the outstanding one has to be that of Sandra Walker, as Fortunata. The hefty young lady first comes on doing a surprisingly agile and very devastating bump and grind. Later, she displays an absolutely delicious mezzo voice as she signs seductive song highly reminiscent of Carmen's famous aria which, by the way, Maderna uses as a sort of counter-melody to it. Miss Walker is a very talented actress with beautiful control of her face and body. She would make a stunning Carmen.

"Triptych" is a very visual work. Its relation to music theatre is I think, strained. The music is by Bo Lawergren, a professor of Nuclear Physics at Hunter College in New York City. It is very contemporary in idiom, and is mostly distinguished by a difficult horn solo passage, which was performed brilliantly by John Pierce.

The work was originally presented in a non-staged version, and the composer's suggestions for the staging are vague, to say the least. Sunday night's staging was done by Gustavo Motta, assistant director of the music theatre project.

There are a few spoken lines, taken from the two texts on which the libretto is based — Captain James Cook's diary of 1770 and Thomas Merton's poem "First Lesson About Man."

The singing is a duet between the native girl and Captain Cook and is all on an "Ah" sound, which at times becomes the word "Hot," at least, I think so. The first scene is done in mime.

There are some funny moments and, as would be expected from Merton's poem, some reflective ones in the final scene, but on the whole I found the work to be really rather inane and pointless.

The works will be repeated again tonight, with the curtain at 8:30. "Wolfgangerl," a musical portrait of Mozart, will also be given its first performance.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS
S. 130,000

AUG 5 1973 New England Newsclip

Lighter Moments At Tanglewood

By R.C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Evidence that serious composers may be taking themselves a bit less seriously is encouraging. But further evidence that their technical attitude are changing slowly, if at all, is disconcerting.

Both evidences were noticeable Saturday afternoon during the first of six programs planned for the 10th annual Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood.

The program offered vocal music by some of the biggest names in the world of new music — Charles Ives, John Cage, Luigi Nono, Charles Dodge and Peter Maxwell Davies.

The relaxation of seriousness was mostly seen in the ridiculous, whimsical little collection of four speech songs for synthesized tape composed (or constructed) this year by Charles Dodge.

And it was evident all through the 20-minute "masque" called "Blind Man's Buff" written by Davies last year.

Dodge's speech-songs may be described as a solo male voice reciting funny little poems which are fragmented and distorted into musical structures by mechanical and electronic means on tape.

The funniest and shortest was spread out in (somewhat) fugal patterns for about two minutes and consisted entirely of the following three lines:

The days are ahead:
1,926,346 to 1,926,345.
Later the nights will catch up.

The Davies masque consisted of a scenario for two singers, a dancer, a mime and an orchestra of 13 plus a conductor. (Saturday a soprano sang both roles, and there was no dancer nor mime.)

The script has to do with a boy king and a jester and a lot of non-silly nonsense rhyming dialogue.

The music, in keeping with the words, was musically (perhaps serially) logical but traditionally unreasonable.

As such it was diverting.

The other (older) pieces on the program were:

Six songs by Ives (1894 and 1920): evidence once more of Ives' genius to be simultaneously of his age and of the future.

Five songs for contralto by Cage (1938): low, soft, blurry, soothing, disturbing, odd, non-memorable.

Sara Dolce Tacere (1960) by Luigi Nono, a well-known serialist: a poem fragmented into one-note, atonal syllables sung one at a time without instrumental accompaniment in eccentric succession by members of a double quartet.

The poem is about man's inability to communicate, and that is exactly what the music proved.

The following five programs in the Contemporary Festival consist of music-theatre tonight and Monday at 8.30 in the West Barn, two small-ensemble programs in the Theater-Concert Hall at 8.30 Tuesday and Wednesday and an orchestral program Thursday in the Theatre-Concert Hall at 8.30

Included in the programs are eight world premieres, three of which were commissioned by the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation at Harvard, sponsors of the festival.

NEWS (E)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,[illegible]

AUG 6 1973 New England Newsclip

FADED TEXT

Popular Artists Series

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169

JUL 29 1973

It's America At Tanglewood

Folk-rock group America will appear at Tanglewood with Jackson Browne at 7:30 p.m. Tuesday in the last of a series of 1973 Popular Artists Concerts at the Lenox summer home of the Boston Symphony.

America's three members, Dan Peek, Jerry Beckley, and Dewey Bunnel are all sons of U.S. Air Force officers, and met in an American school in Great Britain.

THE TIMES RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 42,181

JUL 30 1973

America Group At Tanglewood Tuesday Night

Folk-rock stars America will appear with Jackson Browne in a special one-night event at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., at 8 p.m. Tuesday.

The America group, known for their albums "A Horse with No Name" and "Homecoming," consists of Dan Peek, Jerry Beckley and Dewey Bunnell.

Browne, a contemporary composer, began just recently to perform his own music. He is known for his recording of his own "Doctor, My Eyes."

GLOBE (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042

JUL 27 1973 New England Newsclip

Popular Artist Series — At Tanglewood in Lenox, four Tuesdays in July at 7:30 p.m. America with special guest star Jackson Brown (July 31). Ticket prices are $4.50, $5.50, and $6.50, and $3.50 for seating on the lawn.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400

JUL 25 1973 New England Newscli

Music review

Seals and Crofts are what Taylor ordered

By Mark V. Donovan

THEY WERE dancin' in the aisles at Tanglewood last night. A crowd of 15,251 gave Livingston Taylor and Seals and Crofts a tremendously enthusiastic reception during the course of their three-hour concert.

* * *

It was unfortunate to see Taylor in the role of the back-up artist, because he turned out some fine music. A very personable performer, he had trouble getting the attention of the restless audience during his opening numbers. Fine renditions of "Six Days on the Road" and "Somewhere Over the Rainbow" went largely unnoticed by the crowd.

The turning point came when Taylor whipped out a banjo and started to play some country and western music. This was real toe-tappin' and hand-clappin' music, and the performer seemed to be enjoying himself immensely.

He boasts a rich and resonant voice with an exceptional range, and his music proved to be easy listening. Craning his neck like an ostrich preening his feathers, Taylor closed with his most famous song, "Carolina Days." Enthusiastic applause produced an encore, a fine interpretation of the Everly Brothers' "Bye Bye, Love."

* * *

But it was clear that the majority of the crowd had come to hear Seals and Crofts, who turn out a strange blend of music that seems to appeal to both teeny-boppers and serious music fans alike.

They opened the concert with one of their three golden singles, "Hummingbird." Their music possesses a quiet, Oriental quality that is both mysterious and soothing. Crofts played a beautiful mandolin for most of the concert, while Seals concentrated on lead guitar and vocals.

Again, the noisy audience paid little attention to the fine instrumentation of the band, especially an extended jam featuring Seals on the saxophone and Crofts on the organ. The fans had come to hear the Top 40 Hits, and they had ears for little else.

And they were not disappointed, as both "Summer Breeze" and "Diamond Girl" were played by the end of the concert.

At this point, the crowd went absolutely wild, and Seals and Crofts returned to play an incredible encore with Seals proving his versatility on the fiddle.

* * *

There are still some problems to be ironed out at the Popular Artist Series at Tanglewood. Conditions on the lawn were almost intolerable, as it was practically impossible to see and hear. And the traffic is in a class by itself.

Nevertheless, it was worth it to hear the likes of Livingston Taylor and Seals and Crofts. And I have high expectations for next Tuesday's concert, featuring America and Jackson Browne.

BERKSHIRE COURIER
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
W. 3,750

JUL 26 1973 New England Newsclip

Dewey Bunnell of "America" will appear in concert next Tuesday as part of a special popular artist series at the summer grounds of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in Lenox.

UNION (M)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 84,000

JUL 30 1973 New England Newsclip

Jackson Browne, 'America' Combine

LENOX — Folk - rock stars America will appear at Tanglewood with Jackson Browne tomorrow in the last of a series of 1973 Popular Artists Concerts at the Lenox summer home of the Boston Symphony.

RICHIE HAYWARD

At Lenox [illegible] The Lenox Area [illegible] will begin the second half of its 6 p. m. twilight series Saturday with Richie Hayward at the Music Inn, Hawthorne Street. [illegible] a singer - guitarist who has performed [illegible] the world.

The series, produced by the Symphony in association with Don Law, has drawn large Tuesday night audiences to hear Roberta Flack, John Denver, and Seals & Crofts.

America's three members Dan Peek, Jerry Beckley, and Dewey Bunnel are all sons of U. S. Air Force officers, and met in an American school in Great Britain.

Their first album and the hit single "A Horse With No Name" brought them to the attention of American and English fans.

Since then, America has found a home in California, and the migration to the States has brought about a second [illegible] album, "Homecoming," released in November 1972 and including [illegible] "Ventura Highway."

Tuesday's [illegible] appearance will be America's first performance on a new U. S. tour.

Jackson Browne will open the concert at 7.30. His music has been recorded by other artists for several years.

Only recently, however, did Browne begin a recording and performing career of his own, breaking into prominence with "Doctor My Eyes." Since then, Browne has made several concert tours.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
S. 130,000

JUL 29 1973 New England Newsclip

At Tanglewood Tuesday

A group called America, above, with guest artist Jackson Browne will give a concert at 7:30 Tuesday evening in the great Shed at Tanglewood, Lenox. Some of America's fame rests on their albums, "America" and "Homecoming," and the hit single, "A Horse With No Name." The concert will be the last of the folk-rock series at Tanglewood.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
S. 135,000

JUL 29 1973 New England Newsc

'America' Appears In Concert

LENOX, Mass. — Folk-rock stars America will appear at Tanglewood with Jackson Browne Tuesday in the last of a series of 1973 Popular Artists Concerts at the summer home of the Boston Symphony.

Since the success of their first album and the hit single "A Horse With No Name", America has found a home in California, and the migration to the States has brought about a second album, "Homecoming", released in November 1972 and including the single "Ventura Highway". Tuesday's Tanglewood appearance will be America's first performance on a new U.S. tour.

Jackson Browne will open the concert at 7:30. One of this country's most respected contemporary composers, Browne's music has been recorded by other artists for several years. Only recently, however, did Browne begin a recording and performing career of his own, breaking into prominence with "Doctor My Eeys".

FADED TEXT

119

Popular Artists Series

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169

JUL 29 1973

It's America At Tanglewood

Folk-rock group America will appear at Tanglewood with Jackson Browne at 7:30 p.m. Tuesday in the last of a series of 1973 Popular Artists Concerts at the Lenox summer home of the Boston Symphony.

America's three members, Dan Peek, Jerry Beckley, and Dewey Bunnel are all sons of U.S. Air Force officers, and met in an American school in Great Britain.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,000

JUL 26 1973 New England Newscli

THE TIMES RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 42,181

JUL 30 1973

America Group At Tanglewood Tuesday Night

Folk-rock stars America will appear with Jackson Browne in a special one-night event at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., at 8 p.m. Tuesday.

The America group, known for their albums "A Horse with No Name" and "Homecoming," consists of Dan Peek, Jerry Beckley and Dewey Bunnell.

Browne, a contemporary composer, began just recently to perform his own music. He is known for his recording of his own "Doctor, My Eyes."

GLOBE (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 251,042

JUL 27 1973 New England Newsclip

Popular Artist Series — At Tanglewood in Lenox, four Tuesdays in July at 7:30 p.m. America with special guest star Jackson Brown (July 31). Ticket prices are $4.50, $5.50, and $6.50, and $3.50 for seating on the lawn.

BERKSHIRE COURIER
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
W. 3,750

JUL 26 1973 New England Newsclip

Music review

Seals and Crofts are what Taylor ordered

By Mark V. Donovan

THEY WERE dancin' in the aisles at Tanglewood last night. A crowd of 15,251 gave Livingston Taylor and Seals and Crofts a tremendously enthusiastic reception during the course of their three-hour concert.

* * *

It was unfortunate to see Taylor in the role of the back-up artist, because he turned out some fine music. A very personable performer, he had trouble getting the attention of the restless audience during his opening numbers. Fine renditions of "Six Days on the Road" and "Somewhere Over the Rainbow" went largely unnoticed by the crowd.

The turning point came when Taylor whipped out a banjo and started to play some country and western music. This was real toe-tappin' and hand-clappin' music, and the performer seemed to be enjoying himself immensely.

He boasts a rich and resonant voice with an exceptional range, and his music proved to be easy listening. Craning his neck like an ostrich preening his feathers, Taylor closed with his most famous song, "Carolina Days." Enthusiastic applause produced an encore, a fine interpretation of the Everly Brothers' "Bye Bye, Love."

* * *

But it was clear that the majority of the crowd had come to hear Seals and Crofts, who turn out a strange blend of music that seems to appeal to both teeny-boppers and serious music fans alike.

They opened the concert with one of their three golden singles, "Hummingbird." Their music possesses a quiet, Oriental quality that is both mysterious and soothing. Crofts played a beautiful mandolin for most of the concert, while Seals concentrated on lead guitar and vocals.

Again, the noisy audience paid little attention to the fine instrumentation of the band, especially an extended jam featuring Seals on the saxophone and Crofts on the organ. The fans had come to hear the Top 40 Hits, and they had ears for little else.

And they were not disappointed, as both "Summer Breeze" and "Diamond Girl" were played by the end of the concert.

At this point, the crowd went absolutely wild, and Seals and Crofts returned to play an incredible encore with Seals proving his versatility on the fiddle.

* * *

There are still some problems to be ironed out at the Popular Artist Series at Tanglewood. Conditions on the lawn were almost intolerable, as it was practically impossible to see and hear. And the traffic is in a class by itself.

Nevertheless, it was worth it to hear the likes of Livingston Taylor and Seals and Crofts. And I have high expectations for next Tuesday's concert, featuring America and Jackson Browne.

Dewey Bunnell of "America" will appear in concert next Tuesday as part of a special popular artist series at the summer grounds of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in Lenox.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
S. 130,000

JUL 29 1973 New England Newsclip

At Tanglewood Tuesday

A group called America, above, with guest artist Jackson Browne will give a concert at 7:30 Tuesday evening in the great Shed at Tanglewood, Lenox. Some of America's fame rests on their albums, "America" and "Homecoming," and the hit single, "A Horse With No Name." The concert will be the last of the folk-rock series at Tanglewood.

UNION (M)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 84,000

JUL 30 1973 New England Newsclip

Jackson Browne, 'America' Combine

LENOX — Folk - rock stars America will appear at Tanglewood with Jackson Browne tomorrow in the last of a series of 1973 Popular Artists Concerts at the Lenox summer home of the Boston Symphony.

[illegible]

The series, produced by the Symphony in association with Don Law, has drawn large Tuesday night audiences to hear Roberta Flack, John Denver, and Seals & Crofts.

America's three members Dan Peek, Jerry Beckley, and Dewey Bunnel are all sons of U. S. Air Force officers, and met in an American school in Great Britain.

Their first album and the hit single "A Horse With No Name" brought them to the attention of American and English fans.

Since then, America has found a home in California, and the migration to the States has brought about a second album, "Homecoming," [illegible]

Tuesday's [illegible] appearance will be America's first performance on a new U. S. tour.

Jackson Browne will open the concert at 7.30. His music has been recorded by other artists for several years.

Only recently, however, did Browne begin a recording and performing career of his own, breaking into prominence with "Doctor My Eyes." Since then, Browne has made several concert tours.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
S. 135,000

JUL 29 1973 New England Newsc

'America' Appears In Concert

LENOX, Mass. — Folk-rock stars America will appear at Tanglewood with Jackson Browne Tuesday in the last of a series of 1973 Popular Artists Concerts at the summer home of the Boston Symphony.

Since the success of their first album and the hit single "A Horse With No Name", America has found a home in California, and the migration to the States has brought about a second album, "Homecoming", released in November 1972 and including the single "Ventura Highway". Tuesday's Tanglewood appearance will be America's first performance on a new U.S. tour.

Jackson Browne will open the concert at 7:30. One of this country's most respected contemporary composers, Browne's music has been recorded by other artists for several years. Only recently, however, did Browne begin a recording and performing career of his own, breaking into prominence with "Doctor My Eeys".

Music review

America and Jackson Browne

By Mark V. Donovan

A CROWD of 10,390 was treated to some excellent music last night at Tanglewood. Jackson Browne and America were featured in the fourth and final concert in the Popular Artists Series.

* * *

Jackson Browne set an unusual precedent for the evening by opening his set with his golden single, "Doctor My Eyes." Browne, who hails from Southern California, is one of the country's finest contemporary songwriters. He relies heavily on the piano, and as a result, his music is lively and rich without the use of excess amplification.

He played several other selections from his first album, "Saturate Before Using." Among them was a fine version of the beautiful ballad, "Jamaica Say You Will." He also treated the audience to a beautiful rendition of "Rock Me on the Water," a song commonly (and erroneously) attributed to Brewer and Shipley.

It was unfortunate that Browne had only 50 minutes to display his musical wares, but he had to make way for the feature presentation, America.

Jackson Browne

* * *

I had not expected to like America, and I can lay part of the blame on the policies of AM radio. When "A Horse With No Name" was first released last year, I found it haunting and beautiful. But endless repetition over the airwaves produced a distinct aversion to the song and the group.

America opened its set with this very number, and I experienced the same feeling that I had when I first heard it. Dewey Bunnell, the lead singer, possesses a beautiful falsetto more than a little reminiscent of Neil Young.

The group rapidly dispensed with its other two hit singles, "I Need You" and "Ventura Highway," and moved on to selections from its soon-to-be-released third album, "Hat Trick." This is a practice I heartily applaud, because it allows the audience to get involved in the new material instead of anticipating past hits.

And America's new material is impressive. If this concert is any indication, the third album should be a blockbuster.

* * *

The group played two rousing encores in response to thunderous applause both in the Shed and on the lawn. The second encore was played after the house lights had been turned on, a rarity indeed on the rock circuit.

It is unfortunate that there are no more concerts in the Popular Artists Series this summer, because Tanglewood seems to have licked most of the problems connected with them. The traffic in and out moved remarkably well, the sound system was vastly improved, and the audience seemed much more attentive. Bravo, Tanglewood.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
W. 4,405
JUL 26 1973
New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
AUG 1 1973
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood's '73 rock series said a success by promoters

By Joy Allen

LENOX — This season's final concert of the Popular Artists Series at Tanglewood last night drew a crowd of 10,390 people, a little less than this summer's average and much less than the average attendance at the Contemporary Trends Concerts offered during 1968-71.

However, officials are heralding the Popular Artists Series as a big success, compared with the earlier series of rock concerts.

This summer's average attendance was about 12,000 people. The average attendance at the Contemporary Trends Concerts was considerably more, according to Tom Morris, business manager for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The BSO and Boston entrepreneur Don Law produced the Popular Artist Series.

"The over-all experience compared with the Contemporary Trends is better," Morris said. "We did better from every point of view," he said, "on production, crowds and financially."

He said he did not know yet how much more money was made this summer.

The Contemporary Trends Concert series, which featured hard rock performers, were criticized by local officials for drawing raucous, unruly crowds. The Trends audiences were generally larger than those which attended the Popular Artist Series but the BSO and Law had "targeted for about 12,000 people per concert this summer," Morris said.

To offset deficit

The popular music events were originally started to offset the deficit which the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert program at Tanglewood faces, Morris said.

Roger Katz, assistant to Don Law, said last night that everything went as expected this summer.

"We could have gotten Jefferson Airplane or Santana," he said, referring to hard rock groups. "They would have drawn bigger crowds, but that's not what we wanted."

This summer's performers, such as Roberta Flack and John Denver, appealed to quieter audiences, Katz said. He said the producers wanted longevity, not quick profits.

Last night's crowd was not much different from the other four audiences, but Jackson Browne and America seemed to hold the lawn crowd's attention more than performers of past weeks.

Amplification system

The sound system both inside and outside the music shed was noticeably improved over past weeks. Katz said "We've finally perfected the system," there had been complaints in past on past Tuesday nights about the sound amplification.

James F. Kiley Tanglewood operations manager said this season's series was "a "great improvement over two years ago." He added that litter left by last night's audience, as well as last week's was worse than that left by the first two audiences.

ENTERPRISE-SUN (E)
MARLBORO, MASS.
D. 10,150
JUL 12 1973
New England Newsclip

****

AMERICA SINGS

The singing group, America, will present the final concert of Tanglewood's Popular Artist Series on Tuesday night, July 31, at 7:30. Also featured in the concert is Jackson Browne. America's Lenox, Mass. appearance will be their first stop on their second U.S.tour, Their hit single "A Horse with no Name" brought them to the U.S. charts.

REGISTER (E)
TORRINGTON, CONN.
D. 12,000
JUL 6 1973
New England Newsclip

America will present the final concert of the Popular Artist Series at Tanglewood Tuesday, July 31 at 7:30 p.m. This is the first stop on the second U.S. tour for the London-based trio although two of the musicians are American by birth. Jackson Browne will open the concert. — Photo contributed

Tanglewood

"America" Winds Up Series July 31

America, the group that brings the Popular Artist Series at Tanglewood to a close Tuesday, July 31, at 7:30 p.m., live in England, though America are decidedly American. At least, they used to be. The three expatriate youths emigrated to England (London, actually) where they were later discovered by the ever-watchful Warner Bros. in London.

America are Dan Peek (the eldest; [illegible] 20) from Florida; Gerry Beckley (18) from Texas; and Dewey Bunnell (19) who was born in Yorkshire, England, but defected to the States at an even younger age. They didn't get to know each other until they all attended an "American school" in Bushey, Hertfordshire, though how they got there is so far unrevealed.

Sometime in 1968 they spent the obligatory three months in a country cottage, which must have made them friends and strengthened their musical bonds, because they're still together playing music. But they abandoned the cottage for the quiet peace of London.

Their first album, America, was released in England in mid-1971 and met with cries of "Eureka!" by the normally staid BBC and English press. Though the music on said album is primarily acoustic, the trio is planning to add that harbinger of rock and roll, a drummer. They've already taken the first step by adding an electric bass player.

"We wouldn't mind having a few idiot dancers at our gigs," muses Dan.

Even without the idiot dancers, America's personal appearances have been impressing audiences everywhere.

In Brief . . .

Beagle - July 12 -

Although Pittsfield's school - transportation bill is rising because an additional 500 students are to be bused as a result of the parochial - school merger, there appears to be no sound or fair alternative. Under state law, students at private schools have the same claim to bus service as those at public schools. Nor is there any constitutional question; the U.S. Supreme Court long ago recognized transportation of students as a safety measure. For the immediate future, the city's increased annual tab for busing is about $28,000 after state reimbursement — modest enough despite the fact that it puts the total yearly outlay well over $500,000. With reimbursements currently at 71 per cent, the bill is bearable, although it may be a different story if the state continues whittling down its share.

*

The Popular Artists Series audience at Tanglewood, along with the music festival's management, is entitled to take a bow and civic ovations for Tuesday night's smooth operation. For whatever reasons, it was a heartening difference from the recent disorderly and trash-leaving performance that afflicted the Saratoga Performing Arts Center. The 14,000 at Tanglewood on Tuesday night set a good pattern for the ensuing weeks in the popular-music series.

*

With go-getting Bertha Clark plugging for county funds to finance a key part of the cost of establishing a detoxification center for alcoholics, it's not surprising that the County Commissioners have given their assent. With her backing, the appropriation bill to be filed by Representative Duffin stands a good chance in Boston. Legislators have learned that she won't readily take a no from them.

*

A logical, pioneering step is being considered by the Stockbridge Planning Board as it revises its subdivision rules and regulations. The proposal would add a requirement that developers of tracts with 10 or more building lots submit an environmental - impact statement. The information sought represents nothing radical — and, in fact, is the kind of data on road traffic, drainage and ecology which most well-run boards gather informally by interviewing developers. But it's a good idea for all boards to put such questions into formal written form in the rules; that lets developers know what to expect and helps assure equal treatment.

Berkshire Eagle July 12th

THE TIMES RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 42,181
JUL 30 1973

America Group At Tanglewood Tuesday Night

Folk-rock stars America will appear with Jackson Browne in a special one-night event at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., at 8 p.m. Tuesday.

The America group, known for their albums "A Horse with No Name" and "Homecoming," consists of Dan Peek, Jerry Beckley and Dewey Bunnell.

Browne, a contemporary composer, began just recently to perform his own music. He is known for his recording of his own "Doctor, My Eyes."

the lively world

by Milton R. Bass

WHEN YOU ARE in the presence of madness, you can't help but feel a little on edge. That's why Tanglewood has always been so nervous about running the Contemporary Trends concerts on Tuesday nights even though they draw the biggest crowds of the season and add to the credit side of the ledger.

There are among the pop music stars of the world some who lead trustworthy, loyal, clean, obedient and cheerful lives, but there are also many who are wild young yazoos, risen from poverty to luxuries they never dreamed of and so heavy into the drug scene that their feet never quite touch the ground.

—o—

I KNEW a former assistant manager of the Boston Symphony who spent what he considered too much of his life attending rock concerts to see which performers showed up on time and which were not zonked when they did appear. The last thing Tanglewood wanted at a Tuesday night Contemporary Trends concert was a group that would keep 18,000 people waiting three hours or one that could fly in without an airplane. Of course, many members of the audience couldn't care less one way or another, what with their jugs of wine, their loaves of tea and WOW!

When Janis Joplin sang at Tanglewood at the height of her fame, all of the local teenyboppers were amazed and somewhat mystified by this physically unattractive, raucous female who literally kept yelling "Gimme a pigfoot and a bottle of beer, and, man, I'll sing all night.

The shouts were merely to drown out the whimpers, and three years ago Janis Joplin died of a heroin overdose in a lonely motel room down south. All of the people who worked with her knew about her drug habit, but nobody wanted to rock the money boat.

THAT MONEY BOAT sails through all the aspects of the present scandal in the pop music business. Last year, record in this country alone totaled $2 billion. A hot rock star can gross from $3 million to $5 million in a single year. They work hard for their money, on the road nearly every night of the year and cutting records in three- or four-day sessions with no sleep. There have been times at Tanglewood when a pop star has played or sung here for a $5,000 fee and then hopped a chartered plane to Boston, where he played for another $5,000 on the same night.

The record companies have become just as obsessed in the fight for dollars as any drugged individual. They make tremendous investments in artists they consider of star potential, paying out huge amounts for buildup tours and engagements and then thousands of dollars for press promotions that will bring the group's name and records before the public. They can have as much as $100,000 invested in an unknown group of young musicians who might or might not make it. The rewards are great, but so are the risks.

—o—

THE REWARDS have been so great in the past five years that everybody concerned seems to have lost all sight of proportion and perhaps legality. The government investigators are in the process of sorting that out. Things will become quite cool for a while as large corporations like the Columbia Broadcasting System do some soul searching in the boardrooms. They want to make money, of course, but they don't want to go to jail and they don't even want their names in the newspapers.

So play it cool yourself at the Tuesday night concerts this year. That crazy cat whooping it up next to you might be from the FBI.

Music review

America and Jackson Browne

By Mark V. Donovan

A CROWD of 10,390 was treated to some excellent music last night at Tanglewood. Jackson Browne and America were featured in the fourth and final concert in the Popular Artists Series.

* * *

Jackson Browne set an unusual precedent for the evening by opening his set with his golden single, "Doctor My Eyes." Browne, who hails from Southern California, is one of the country's finest contemporary songwriters. He relies heavily on the piano, and as a result, his music is lively and rich without the use of excess amplification.

He played several other selections from his first album, "Saturate Before Using." Among them was a fine version of the beautiful ballad, "Jamaica Say You Will." He also treated the audience to a beautiful rendition of "Rock Me on the Water," a song commonly (and erroneously) attributed to Brewer and Shipley.

It was unfortunate that Browne had only 50 minutes to display his musical wares, but he had to make way for the feature presentation, America.

Jackson Browne

* * *

I had not expected to like America, and I can lay part of the blame on the policies of AM radio. When "A Horse With No Name" was first released last year, I found it haunting and beautiful. But endless repetition over the airwaves produced a distinct aversion to the song and the group.

America opened its set with this very number, and I experienced the same feeling that I had when I first heard it. Dewey Bunnell, the lead singer, possesses a beautiful falsetto more than a little reminiscent of Neil Young.

The group rapidly dispensed with its other two hit singles, "I Need You" and "Ventura Highway," and moved on to selections from its soon-to-be-released third album, "Hat Trick." This is a practice I heartily applaud, because it allows the audience to get involved in the new material instead of anticipating past hits.

And America's new material is impressive. If this concert is any indication, the third album should be a blockbuster.

* * *

The group played two rousing encores in response to thunderous applause both in the Shed and on the lawn. The second encore was played after the house lights had been turned on, a rarity indeed on the rock circuit.

It is unfortunate that there are no more concerts in the Popular Artists Series this summer, because Tanglewood seems to have licked most of the problems connected with them. The traffic in and out moved remarkably well, the sound system was vastly improved, and the audience seemed much more attentive. Bravo, Tanglewood.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
W 4,405

JUL 26 1973

New England Newsclip

America will present the final concert of the Popular Artist Series at Tanglewood Tuesday, July 31 at 7:30 p.m. This is the first stop on the second U.S. tour for the London-based trio although two of the musicians are American by birth. Jackson Browne will open the concert. — Photo contributed

Tanglewood

"America" Winds Up Series July 31

America, the group that brings the Popular Artist Series at Tanglewood to a close Tuesday, July 31, at 7:30 p.m., live in England, though America are decidedly American. At least, they used to be. The three ex-patriate youths migrated to England (London, actually) where they were later discovered by the ever-watchful Warner Bros. in London.

America are Dan Peek (the eldest; [illegible] 20) from Florida; Gerry Beckley (18) from Texas; and Dewey Bunnell (19) who was born in Yorkshire, England, but defected to the States at an even younger age. They didn't get to know each other until they all attended an "American school" in Bushey, Hertfordshire, though how they got there is so far unrevealed.

Sometime in 1968 they spent the obligatory three months in a country cottage, which must have made them friends and strengthened their musical bonds, because they're still together playing music. But they abandoned the cottage for the quiet peace of London.

Their first album, America, was released in England in mid-1971 and met with cries of "Eureka!" by the normally staid BBC and English press. Though the music on said album is primarily acoustic, the trio is planning to add that harbinger of rock and roll, a drummer. They've already taken the first step by adding an electric bass player.

"We wouldn't mind having a few idiot dancers at our gigs," muses Dan.

Even without the idiot dancers, America's personal appearances have been impressing audiences everywhere.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.

AUG 1 1973

Tanglewood's '73 rock series said a success by promoters

By Joy Allen

LENOX — This season's final concert of the Popular Artists Series at Tanglewood last night drew a crowd of 10,390 people, a little less than this summer's average and much less than the average attendance at the Contemporary Trends Concerts offered during 1968-71.

However, officials are heralding the Popular Artists Series as a big success, compared with the earlier series of rock concerts.

This summer's average attendance was about 12,000 people. The average attendance at the Contemporary Trends Concerts was considerably more, according to Tom Morris, business manager for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The BSO and Boston entrepreneur Don Law produced the Popular Artist Series.

"The over-all experience compared with the Contemporary Trends is better," Morris said. "We did better from every point of view," he said, "on production, crowds and financially." He said he did not know yet how much more money was made this summer.

The Contemporary Trends Concert series, which featured hard rock performers, were criticized by local officials for drawing raucous, unruly crowds. The Trends audiences were generally larger than those which attended the Popular Artist Series but the BSO and Law had "targeted for about 12,000 people per concert this summer," Morris said.

To offset deficit

The popular music events were originally started to offset the deficit which the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert program at Tanglewood faces, Morris said.

Roger Katz, assistant to Don Law, said last night that everything went as expected this summer.

"We could have gotten Jefferson Airplane or Santana," he said, referring to hard rock groups. "They would have drawn bigger crowds, but that's not what we wanted."

This summer's performers, such as Roberta Flack and John Denver, appealed to quieter audiences, Katz said. He said the producers wanted longevity, not quick profits.

Last night's crowd was not much different from the other four audiences, but Jackson Browne and America seemed to hold the lawn crowd's attention more than performers of past weeks.

Amplification system

The sound system both inside and outside the music shed was noticeably improved over past weeks. Katz said "We've finally perfected the system," there had been complaints in past on past Tuesday nights about the sound amplification.

James F. Kiley Tanglewood operations manager said this season's series was "a "great improvement over two years ago." He added that litter left by last night's audience, as well as last week's was worse than that left by the first two audiences.

JUL 19 1973

New England Newsclip

****

AMERICA SINGS

The singing group, America, will present the final concert of Tanglewood's Popular Artist Series on Tuesday night, July 31, at 7:30. Also featured in the concert is Jackson Browne. America's Lenox, Mass. appearance will be their first stop on their second U.S. tour. Their hit single "A Horse with no Name" brought them to the U.S. charts.

REPORTER (E)
LITCHFIELD, CONN.

JUL 6 1973

New England Newsclip

In Brief . . .

Beagle - July 12 -

Although Pittsfield's schoo' - transportation bill is rising because an additional 500 students are to be bused as a result of the parochial - school merger, there appears to be no sound or fair alternative. Under state law, students at private schools have the same claim to bus service as those at public schools. Nor is there any constitutional question; the U.S. Supreme Court long ago recognized transportation of students as a safety measure. For the immediate future, the city's increased annual tab for busing is about $28,000 after state reimbursement — modest enough despite the fact that it puts the total yearly outlay well over $500,000. With reimbursements currently at 71 per cent, the bill is bearable, although it may be a different story if the state continues whittling down its share.

*

The Popular Artists Series audience at Tanglewood, along with the music festival's management, is entitled to take a bow and civic ovations for Tuesday night's smooth operation. For whatever reasons, it was a heartening difference from the recent disorderly and trash-leaving performance that afflicted the Saratoga Performing Arts Center. The 14,000 at Tanglewood on Tuesday night set a good pattern for the ensuing weeks in the popular-music series.

*

With go-getting Bertha Clark plugging for county funds to finance a key part of the cost of establishing a detoxification center for alcoholics, it's not surprising that the County Commissioners have given their assent. With her backing, the appropriation bill to be filed by Representative Duffin stands a good chance in Boston. Legislators have learned that she won't readily take a no from them.

*

A logical, pioneering step is being considered by the Stockbridge Planning Board as it revises its subdivision rules and regulations. The proposal would add a requirement that developers of tracts with 10 or more building lots submit an environmental - impact statement. The information sought represents nothing radical — and, in fact, is the kind of data on road traffic, drainage and ecology which most well-run boards gather informally by interviewing developers. But it's a good idea for all boards to put such questions into formal written form in the rules; that lets developers know what to expect and helps assure equal treatment.

Berkshire Eagle July 12th

THE TIMES RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 42,181

JUL 30 1973

America Group At Tanglewood Tuesday Night

Folk-rock stars America will appear with Jackson Browne in a special one-night event at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., at 8 p.m. Tuesday.

The America group, known for their albums "A Horse with No Name" and "Homecoming," consists of Dan Peek, Jerry Beckley and Dewey Bunnell.

Browne, a contemporary composer, began just recently to perform his own music. He is known for his recording of his own "Doctor, My Eyes."

the lively world

by Milton R. Bass

WHEN YOU ARE in the presence of madness, you can't help but feel a little on edge. That's why Tanglewood has always been so nervous about running the Contemporary Trends concerts on Tuesday nights even though they draw the biggest crowds of the season and add to the credit side of the ledger.

There are among the pop music stars of the world some who lead trustworthy, loyal, clean, obedient and cheerful lives, but there are also many who are wild young yazoos, risen from poverty to luxuries they never dreamed of and so heavy into the drug scene that their feet never quite touch the ground.

— o —

I KNEW a former assistant manager of the Boston Symphony who spent what he considered too much of his life attending rock concerts to see which performers showed up on time and which were not zonked when they did appear. The last thing Tanglewood wanted at a Tuesday night Contemporary Trends concert was a group that would keep 18,000 people waiting three hours or one that could fly in without an airplane. Of course, many members of the audience couldn't care less one way or another, what with their jugs of wine, their loaves of tea and WOW!

When Janis Joplin sang at Tanglewood at the height of her fame, all of the local teenyboppers were amazed and somewhat mystified by this physically unattractive, raucous female who literally kept yelling "Gimme a pigfoot and a bottle of beer, and, man, I'll sing all night.

The shouts were merely to drown out the whimpers, and three years ago Janis Joplin died of a heroin overdose in a lonely motel room down south. All of the people who worked with her knew about her drug habit, but nobody wanted to rock the money boat.

THAT MONEY BOAT sails through all the aspects of the present scandal in the pop music business. Last year, record in this country alone totaled $2 billion. A hot rock star can gross from $3 million to $5 million in a single year. They work hard for their money, on the road nearly every night of the year and cutting records in three- or four-day sessions with no sleep. There have been times at Tanglewood when a pop star has played or sung here for a $5,000 fee and then hopped a chartered plane to Boston, where he played for another $5,000 on the same night.

The record companies have become just as obsessed in the fight for dollars as any drugged individual. They make tremendous investments in artists they consider of star potential, paying out huge amounts for buildup tours and engagements and then thousands of dollars for press promotions that will bring the group's name and records before the public. They can have as much as $100,000 invested in an unknown group of young musicians who might or might not make it. The rewards are great, but so are the risks.

— o —

THE REWARDS have been so great in the past five years that everybody concerned seems to have lost all sight of proportion and perhaps legality. The government investigators are in the process of sorting that out. Things will become quite cool for a while as large corporations like the Columbia Broadcasting System do some soul searching in the boardrooms. They want to make money, of course, but they don't want to go to jail and they don't even want their names in the newspapers.

So play it cool yourself at the Tuesday night concerts this year. That crazy cat whooping it up next to you might be from the FBI.

John Denver Schedules Two Area Appearances

Debbi Snook

The Sound Tunnel

John Denver will make appearances at two summer festivals, Tanglewood at Lenox, Mass. on July 17 and at SPAC on June 30.

The folksinger by no means draws a capacity crowd at concerts, but does manage to lure enough fans to make house managers happy.

His latest work, "Rocky Mountain High" went practically unnoticed except for the title song whose grooves were worn to the wax on the radio.

FOR A PERFORMER with such a refreshing repertoire, music that picturesquely shows his love for nature in it's pure state, John Denver is greatly underrated.

But Denver's a little too pop to generate a following of avid folkies; a little too ugly to be a millionaire superstar.

What Denver does have is the ability to appeal to those hot and tired city folk. He exudes a feeling of release, a back to nature, green trees and blue skies feeling that makes one think of sitting on a rocking chair on the front porch of a country home on a cool early evening.

"ROCKY MOUNTAIN HIGH" contains work of his own on the title song, "For Bobbie," "Prisoners," "Goodbye Again," and a most effective, "Season Suite," containing a piece written for each. It also includes a fine instrumental piece written for "Late Winter, Early Spring, (When Everybody Goes to Mexico)."

I wouldn't call Denver innovative in the folk-pop field, his voice even draws parallels to Phil Ochs. But the music Denver plays and writes is extremely enjoyable even if only in it's melody and he carries his talent into a live concert without a flaw.

Denver has previously been booked at SPAC with Mary Travers. The schedule shows him soloing this year. Yet at Tanglewood, he's booked with the superb sonstress Linda Rondstadt. No contest there, I'll take the Tanglewood show.

Some of the better concerts anticipated at SPAC should be B.B. King with Weather Report on June 27. The report on Weather Report is that they are a fine jazz group.

NEXT, from an entertainment angle including visual effects, Dr. John and Sha-NaNa should provide a good showing on August 5. There have been inklings that Dr. John has a talent for the blues in addition to his hit single, "Right Place, Wrong Time."

The Beach Boys are always a joy to see and will be at SPAC on August 27. And the Kris Kristofferson and Rita Collidge show should not be missed. Kristofferson will most likely try to make up for this beeble acting in "Pat Garrett and Billy the Kid." The show is booked for Sept. 9.

Other than the Denver-Ronstadt show at Tanglewood, Roberta Flack and B, S, and T, look like a fine gamble. Flack is a sure bet for excellence and, well, the good always comes with the bad.

* * *

The Star Spangled Washboard Band will be making the rounds at fifteen bluegrass festivals this summer, and fans can see them locally at: The Fort William Henry Hotel July 6, 7, Aug. 24-25; Washington Park in Albany on July 8; Fox Hollow Folk Festival, Aug. 3-4; Cobleskill Sunshine Fair, Aug. 21-22 and 26; and Glens Falls on Sept. 14.

JOHN DENVER

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169
JUN 24 1973

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
JUL 15 1973
New England Newsclip

THE TIMES RECORD
TROY, N. Y.
D. 42,181
JUL 16 1973

AT TANGLEWOOD TOMORROW — Songwriter, guitarist and vocalist John Denver will appear in concert at 7:30 p.m. tomorrow as the second in a series of popular artists concerts this summer at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Originally a member of the Chad Mitchell trio, Denver has made five albums, including his recordings of "Leaving On a Jet Plane." "Take Me Home, Country Roads," and "Colorado Rocky Mountain High." He has appeared frequently on television, including a recent stint as guest host of the Tonight Show. Tickets are still available for the concert from the Tanglewood box office. Lawn tickets go on sale at noon tomorrow.

John Denver next at Tanglewood

John Denver will appear at Tanglewood Tuesday in the second of a special four concert Popular Artist Series at the Lenox summer grounds of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The series is presented by the symphony in conjunction with Don Law, and will run on consecutive Tuesday evenings in July. Denver will be followed on July 24 by Seals and Crofts and special guest Livingston Taylor. The final concert on July 31 will feature America and Jackson Browne. All concerts will begin at 7:30 p.m.

The series was arranged in an effort to present popular contemporary artists at Tanglewood who would bring diversity to the symphony's summer program and whose music is particularly appropriate in the beautiful Berkshire setting.

Tickets are on sale at the Tanglewood Box Office and all Ticketron outlets. For information, call the Tanglewood Box Office after June 18 at (413)

Denver, an accomplished guitarist and songwriter, began his career as a member of the Chad Mitchell Trio. Since then, he has made five albums for RCA, recording such songs of his as "Leaving on a Jet Plane," "Take Me Home, Country Roads," and "Colorado Rocky Mountain High." Beside his concert performances, Denver has also made frequent TV appearances.

Concerning Seals and Crofts, a New York Times review said: "Their songs . . . have a curious oriental flavor yet go through a multitude of tempo and mood shifts, experimenting with textures not found in most contemporary folk music." Seals and Crofts have recorded five albums, including "Summer Breeze" (with "Summer Breeze" and "Hummingbird") and the current best-seller "Diamond Girl."

The success of America's first album, "America," and the hit single "A Horse with No Name," which brought them to the attention of American and English audiences in an unbelievably short time, is now record business history. America has recorded another successful album, "Homecoming," and played major concert dates throughout the country. America's Tanglewood appearance will be their first stop on their second US tour. Jackson Browne will open the concert.

CITIZEN
MILFORD, CONN.
JUL 16 1973
New England Newsclip

TANGLEWOOD:
Popular Artists Series: July 17, John Denver and Linda Ronstadt; July 24, Seals and Croft and Livingston Taylor; July 31, America and Jackson Browne; All concerts begin at 7:30 p.m., tickets on sale at Tanglewood box office and at Ticketron, Tanglewood, Massachusetts.

ENTERPRISE
MARLBORO, MASS.
JUL 12 1973
New England Newsclip

DENVER AND RONSTADT
Singers John Denver and Linda Ronstadt will be featured in concert at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Lenox, Mass., as part of the Popular Artist Series Tuesday night at 7:30.

JOURNAL
LEWISTON, MAINE
JUL 26 1973
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood

John Denver Pleasant But Unexciting

At his best he's cheerful, simple, direct, full of joy, somewhat topical — a pleasant performer on a pleasant summer evening.

At his worst he's simple-minded to the point of dopiness, cloying, condescending, boring, entirely predictable and downright hokey.

He's John Denver, who delighted a large audience at Tanglewood on Tuesday, July 17.

At first it was refreshing to me to see a performer who uses a simple two-person back-up group, plays without mind-numbing volume and does a long show (23 songs).

He invited his audience to sing along with him — another nice touch — but only on the choruses. "I'll sing the verses. It's my show," he quickly added.

As the concert continued, I had the irritating feeling that I had been tricked into attending a children's concert: Denver introduced each song in a dumb, wordy manner; no song lasted more than about 2 minutes, 8 seconds; the songs contained no imagery, only literal descriptions ("I am the eagle," "friends around the campfire," "sittin' and a-pickin' and a-singin'.")

We learned, in a concert that had no emotional highs or lows, that Mr. Denver opposes war, favors children, enjoys the simple life, likes his women braless and beautiful and even "passes the pipe" around the campfire on occasion.

But most of all, we learned that Denver is glad he moved out of L.A. to Aspen, Colo., where the mountains are lovely and his mind is at peace ("Colorado Rocky Mountain High.")

Six songs repeated this theme, all saying pretty much the same thing in the same way. I believed him, but I got tired of hearing it.

I wondered if he was still trying to convince himself. I wondered if the Aspen Tourist Bureau could use another shill. Mostly I wondered if the concert would ever end.

Mark Weinberg

Tanglewood Talk

Armando Ghitalla, the principal trumpet of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the featured speaker at the second Tanglewood Talks and Walks program of the summer today.

Music review

John Denver at Tanglewood

By Mark Donovan

HENRY JOHN Deutschendorf did a pretty mean juggling act before an appreciative audience of 8,231 at Tanglewood last night. Deutschendorf (also known as John Denver) magically produced three fluorescent spheres in the middle of his concert and displayed his juggling talents.

Wedged in with the juggling was quite a bit of singing. For almost 2½ hours, Denver sang sweetly about the fresh air, the blue sky and the majestic Rocky Mountains.

Yes, there can be no denying that John Denver is relevant. Departing from his normal ecology theme, he even squeezed in a quick antiwar statement with a song called "Get up, Jimmy Newman."

* * *

Unfortunately: Denver has a tendency to make all of his songs sound strikingly similar, no matter what the theme. Even when he attempted a country and western ditty called "Please, Daddy, Don't get Drunk This Christmas," the difference was negligible.

Don't let anyone tell you that John Denver isn't charming. From the minute he stepped on stage, he was chatting away in an attempt to win over the audience. And these efforts did not go unrewarded as the Shed crowd was both attentive and enthusiastic. It was another story on the lawn, however, where the inadequate sound system and the chill in the air proved to be too much competition for the soft-singing Denver.

Clearly, he is a performer who needs to be seen, not just heard, but he didn't disappoint his fans by leaving out any of his golden records. A medley of "Follow Me" and "Leaving on a Jet Plane" had the audience swaying and singing along. He closed the concert with fine renditions of "Rocky Mountain High" and "Take Me Home, Country Roads," his two most popular songs. Mildly enthusiastic applause resulted in one encore, "He'd Rather be in Colorado."

* * *

Who would think that one man could write so many songs about exactly the same thing? Denver may well be witty and charming on-stage, but his material could do with a little variation. His neatly combed hair and bright-eyed smile was just a little too much for me. I, for one, would have liked to see more juggling.

The Tanglewood promoters have chosen to walk the thin line between hard rock and quiet folk in their Tuesday night Popular Artist Series, and there can be no better example of this policy than a concert by John Denver. Like his music, the choice of John Denver was a safe one, but hardly an exciting one.

Paul Rocheleau

EVENING AT TANGLEWOOD used to mean a performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, or parts thereof, but nowadays it can just as well mean "popular artists." This is part of the audience attending performance last night by John Denver.

Vernon L. Smith from Scope

John Denver, who brings his "Rocky Mountain High" to Tanglewood Tuesday
"I don't want anything that takes away from who ~~and what~~ I am"

He Sings the Joy He Has in Living

By CHRISTOPHER WREN

Welcome to my morning,
Welcome to my day,
Oh yes, I'm the one responsible,
I make it just this way.
—"Farewell Andromeda"

HE is no singer of sullen songs. As John Denver recently confided his philosophy to some 20,000 friends in Madison Square Garden, "The music that I do is an effort to communicate the joy I have in living."

With his seventh album, "Farewell Andromeda," just released, Denver has found an eager audience for his glad tidings. His previous LP, "Rocky Mountain High," which celebrated clean air, clear water and other ecological visions, sold well over a million copies, earning a rare platinum album award.

What Denver offers is certainly not rock, probably not country, though he appeals to fans of both. He might best be catalogued as contemporary—an ill-defined catch-all that has taken in so many other survivors of the folk boom of the 1960's.

But the fresh attention engendered by "Rocky Mountain High" may let Denver transcend the labels. He is already tiptoeing into television. This summer, he has become a hot property on the outdoor concert circuit, including Saratoga, N.Y., two weeks ago and Tanglewood, at Lenox, Mass., Tuesday night.

At 29, Denver has shown that he can draw not merely his peers but also their mothers, fathers, aunts and uncles. But because he comes across as such a nice young man, the impression has lingered in the shaggier realms of pop music that John Denver may be a little too saccharine to be taken seriously. Certainly his professionalism has not been questioned. Denver sings in a clear and compelling tenor. He has mastered his 12-string guitar, a notoriously sloppy instrument, as precisely as if it were a classical harpsichord. In Madison Square Garden, he dismissed one heckler with a polite, "Listen, we know just what we're doing up here, thank you."

*

The criticism, then, is more of his philosophy. Denver's well-scrubbed manner runs against the grain of the flamboyant decadence exploited so profitably by rock stars like David Bowie and Alice Cooper.

Doesn't John Denver suffer enough? "To be or not to be is hardly the question for John," explained his producer, Milt Okun. "He already is." Having let his lank blond hair spill down over his collar, John Denver still looks more like Peter Pan in granny glasses than any part of the Grateful Dead.

"Here is my special problem," said Denver, sitting down to lunch during a break in a recent recording session. "A whole lot of people have deemed to cast me as an all-American boy or as an innocent, and they are a little bit surprised when something gritty shows up." He singled out as "gritty" Tom Paxton's stark, anti-war ballad, "Jimmy Newman," which has become a standard of Denver's repertoire.

While his companions drank beer, Denver sipped on a glass of milk. The medallion around his neck proclaimed what most of his generation had already taken for granted—that war was not healthy for children and other living things. "I think my definition of myself is broader than what people think of me," Denver went on, seemingly weary of the Pollyanna image. "I do Jacques Brel's 'Amsterdam' for instance, and I make it all work."

It may not immediately show, but John Denver has traveled far since the mid-1960's, when he first replaced Chad Mitchell in the Mitchell Trio, a folk group that has since disbanded. Folk music had lured Denver away from his architectural studies at Texas Tech "because I felt I might as well get it out of my system." (Actually, he was born Henry John Deutchendorf, the son of an Air Force career pilot. He reportedly changed his name because it wouldn't fit on the record labels.)

Since he turned solo in 1969, Denver has imperceptibly matured. The coyness of his earlier performances has given way to a more assured familiarity. His voice, like his material, has taken on more breadth. "I remember when I wrote 'Leaving On A Jet Plane,'" Denver said. "People told me, 'What are you gonna do next, kid?' I didn't worry about it."

That song, which was picked up by virtually everyone from Peter, Paul and Mary to Liza Minnelli and United Airlines, established Denver. He crossed over into country music when he co-authored and cut "Take Me Home, Country Roads," another million record seller. "I don't consider myself a songwriter," Denver insisted. "But I like to sing and I think I'm a great entertainer. I'm trying to be an honest expression of who and what I am and I think I've been somewhat successful."

*

Because he has logged so much time on the road, Denver has become adept at penning—and subsequently recording—songs of farewell. But his most poignant, "Follow Me," was recorded with greater success by Mary Travers and, most recently, June Carter Cash. Denver said that he wrote "Follow Me" shortly after he was married, in June, 1967, to Ann Martell, a quiet, dark-haired girl he had met six months before while he was on tour in Minnesota.

"I couldn't afford to take Annie with me," Denver said, "and I had been on the road for two and a half months. I wrote the chorus somewhere in Iowa, but I couldn't do anything with it. Then one afternoon in Washington, D.C., I wrote the rest of it. Paul Stookey [late of Peter, Paul and Mary] told me once that you're not so much the writer of a song as you are the instrument of what wants to be written."

Denver seemed proudest of his "Rocky Mountain High." "Nobody else in the world has recorded it," he bragged in a fortissimo that all but erupted into a yodel. "It's a hard song to sing and a hard song to play." The song has been trafficked nonetheless. Last spring, Denver discovered that a land developer in Colorado Springs was dubbing "Rocky Mountain High" into television commercials. "We informed them they had best desist while we assessed damages," said Denver. "Here we are trying to save the land and they were using it for a land development company."

His sensitivity stems, in part at least, from the unabashedly autobiographical lyrics of "Rocky Mountain High": "He was born in the summer of his 27th year. Comin' home to a place he'd never been before."*

When success gave them the option, John and Annie Denver chose to sink their roots in Aspen, Colo. From their three-bedroom house, it is a short trip across the valley to the Aspen airport. "You can make going on the road a hassle or not," said Denver. "I have a road manager, a bass player and myself. We buy tickets to carry our instruments on board. Now we can afford to rent a sound system at the show. None of it is a hassle, because I love being up onstage and singing to people, even more than living in the Rocky Mountains, be- (Continued on Page 27)

30

*All Lyrics quoted copyright Cherry Lane Music Co.

BERKSHIRE COURIER
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
W. 3,750
JUL 19 1973 New England Newsclip

Seals and Crofts will appear in concert next Tuesday as part of a special Popular artist series at the summer grounds of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in Lenox.

A New York Times review said of them "Their songs,. . have a curious oriental flavor yet go through a multitude of tempo and mood shifts, experimenting with textures not found in most contemporary folk music." Seals and Crofts have recorded five albums, including "Summer Breeze" (with "Summer Breeze" and "Hummingbird") and the current best-seller "Diamond Girl." Livingston Taylor will be a special guest artist.

TIMES (SUNDAY)
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
1,407,549
JUL 15 1973 New England Newsclip

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
S. 130,000
JUL 22 1973 New England Newsclip

At Tanglewood Tuesday

Seals and Crofts, a singing duet which has recorded five albums ("Summer Breeze"), will be at Tanglewood, Lenox, Tuesday evening at 7:30. With them will be Livingston Taylor.

Hubbard

Livingston Taylor, younger brother of folk rock hero James Taylor, played before a packed audience at Tanglewood Tuesday night. The concert was the third event in the area's popular artist series. Seals and Croft also performed.

BANNER (E)
BENNINGTON, VT.
D. 6,500
JUL 26 1973 New England Newsclip

UNION (M)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 84,000
JUL 25 1973 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Crowd Noise Almost Wins

By JOHN BARTLETT
Union Staff

A loud sellout crowd battled the Tanglewood music last night at the Livingston Taylor, Seals and Crofts concert.

The noisy audience of 17,000 thronged the seated areas and the lawn, and many did not seem to notice the fine music of the performers.

Tanglewood's facilities are best suited to the styles of Taylor and Seals and Crofts. Their soft rock does not produce the painful distortions and strains on the equipment caused by some hard rock groups in previous concerts.

Livingston Taylor performed, unlike his first appearance, with a small band consisting of piano, string bass and drums. He sings with a carefully modulated voice that is sensitive in mood, but does not vary his guitar style and uses repetitive rhythms.

Seals and Crofts received the larger acclaim from the audience, inspiring a standing ovation even for their stage assistants and backup musicians.

The duo centered its performance on blended instruments and voices. They play mandolin and guitar in a style that can best be described as Everly Brothers without the nasal tones.

Among crowd - pleasing songs last night were "A Little Help From My Friends' and "Carolina Day" by Taylor, and "Hummingbird' and "Summer Breeze' by Seals and Crofts.

The Everly Brothers were brought to mind again in the concert by Taylor's "Bye Bye Love," performed as an encore before Seals and Crofts, the main attraction, came on.

Traffic on access roads to Tanglewood was jammed. State troopers and police from Lenox and Lee rode past the halted motorists, informing them over loudspeakers that the concert was sold out.

The last concert in the Tanglewood Tuesday night popular music series will be next Tuesday when America and special guest star Jackson Browne will appear.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
JUL 25 1973 New England News

15,251 hear rock at Tanglewood

LENOX — Last night's third concert of the Popular Artists Series at Tanglewood drew a paid attendance 15,251, thus setting a record for this year's Tuesday-night performances of "soft rock."

The performers were Seales and Crofts and Livingston Taylor.

An informal poll of police and other officials on the grounds before the box office figures were announced drew estimates that ranged up to 18,000.

A spokesman for Tanglewood said the difference between paid and actual attendance might have been as high as 1,000 people because of complimentary tickets.

More fence jumpers

Also, James F. Kiley, operations manager for Tanglewood, observed that there were more fence jumpers last night, despite the 40 deputy sheriffs on duty.

Some people left the concert complaining that they could not hear the music inside the Shed. Kiley said the sound equipment belonged to the performers. If the sound was inadequate inside the Shed, the outside speakers appeared to be an improvement over those of last week, when Tanglewood equipment was used outside.

Vehicular traffic in the area was heavy last night, but congestion was no worse than at similar concerts in the past.

In regard to litter left behind by the crowd, Kiley said it was "one heck of a mess." Lawn and Shed audiences at the two previous concerts in the series had left behind comparatively little litter.

Vernon L. Smith from Scope

John Denver, who brings his "Rocky Mountain High" to Tanglewood Tuesday

"I don't want anything that takes away from who and what I am"

He Sings the Joy He Has in Living

By CHRISTOPHER WREN

Welcome to my morning,
Welcome to my day,
Oh yes, I'm the one responsible,
I made it just this way.
—"Farewell Andromeda"

HE is no singer of sullen songs. As John Denver recently confided his philosophy to some 20,000 friends in Madison Square Garden, "The music that I do is an effort to communicate the joy I have in living."

With his seventh album, "Farewell Andromeda," just released, Denver has found an eager audience for his glad tidings. His previous LP, "Rocky Mountain High," which celebrated clean air, clear water and other ecological visions, sold well over a million copies, earning a rare platinum album award.

What Denver offers is certainly not rock, probably not country, though he appeals to fans of both. He might best be catalogued as contemporary—an ill-defined catch-all that has taken in so many other survivors of the folk boom of the 1960's.

But the fresh attention engendered by "Rocky Mountain High" may let Denver transcend the labels. He is already tiptoeing into television. This summer, he has become a hot property on the outdoor concert circuit, including Saratoga, N.Y., two weeks ago and Tanglewood, at Lenox, Mass., Tuesday night.

At 29, Denver has shown that he can draw not merely his peers but also their mothers, fathers, aunts and uncles. But because he comes across as such a nice young man, the impression has lingered in the shaggier realms of pop music that John Denver may be a little too saccharine to be taken seriously. Certainly his professionalism has not been questioned. Denver sings in a clear and compelling tenor. He has mastered his 12-string guitar, a notoriously sloppy instrument, as precisely as if it were a classical harpsichord. In Madison Square Garden, he dismissed one heckler with a polite, "Listen, we know just what we're doing up here, thank you."

*

The criticism, then, is more of his philosophy. Denver's well-scrubbed manner runs against the grain of the flamboyant decadence exploited so profitably by rock stars like David Bowie and Alice Cooper.

Doesn't John Denver suffer enough? "To be or not to be is hardly the question for John," explained his producer, Milt Okun. "He already is." Having let his lank blond hair spill down over his collar, John Denver still looks more like Peter Pan in granny glasses than any part of the Grateful Dead.

"Here is my special problem," said Denver, sitting down to lunch during a break in a recent recording session. "A whole lot of people have deemed to cast me as an all-American boy or as an innocent, and they are a little bit surprised when something gritty shows up." He singled out as "gritty" Tom Paxton's stark, anti-war ballad, "Jimmy Newman," which has become a standard of Denver's repertoire.

While his companions drank beer, Denver sipped on a glass of milk. The medallion around his neck proclaimed what most of his generation had already taken for granted—that war was not healthy for children and other living things. "I think my definition of myself is broader than what people think of me," Denver went on, seemingly weary of the Pollyanna image. "I do Jacques Brel's 'Amsterdam' for instance, and I make it all work."

It may not immediately show, but John Denver has traveled far since the mid-1960's, when he first replaced Chad Mitchell in the Mitchell Trio, a folk group that has since disbanded. Folk music had lured Denver away from his architectural studies at Texas Tech "because I felt I might as well get it out of my system." (Actually, he was born Henry John Deutchendorf, the son of an Air Force career pilot. He reportedly changed his name because it wouldn't fit on the record labels.)

Since he turned solo in 1969, Denver has imperceptibly matured. The coyness of his earlier performances has given way to a more assured familiarity. His voice, like his material, has taken on more breadth. "I remember when I wrote 'Leaving On A Jet Plane,'" Denver said. "People told me, 'What are you gonna do next, kid?' I didn't worry about it."

That song, which was picked up by virtually everyone from Peter, Paul and Mary to Liza Minnelli and United Airlines, established Denver. He crossed over into country music when he co-authored and cut "Take Me Home, Country Roads," another million record seller. "I don't consider myself a songwriter," Denver insisted. "But I like to sing and I think I'm a great entertainer. I'm trying to be an honest expression of who and what I am and I think I've been somewhat successful."

*

Because he has logged so much time on the road, Denver has become adept at penning—and subsequently recording—songs of farewell. But his most poignant, "Follow Me," was recorded with greater success by Mary Travers and, most recently, June Carter Cash. Denver said that he wrote "Follow Me" shortly after he was married, in June, 1967, to Ann Martell, a quiet, dark-haired girl he had met six months before while he was on tour in Minnesota.

"I couldn't afford to take Annie with me," Denver said, "and I had been on the road for two and a half months. I wrote the chorus somewhere in Iowa, but I couldn't do anything with it. Then one afternoon in Washington, D.C., I wrote the rest of it. Paul Stookey [late of Peter, Paul and Mary] told me once that you're not so much the writer of a song as you are the instrument of what wants to be written."

Denver seemed proudest of his "Rocky Mountain High." "Nobody else in the world has recorded it," he bragged in a fortissimo that all but erupted into a yodel. "It's a hard song to sing and a hard song to play." The song has been trafficked nonetheless. Last spring, Denver discovered that a land developer in Colorado Springs was dubbing "Rocky Mountain High" into television commercials. "We informed them they had best desist while we assessed damages," said Denver. "Here we are trying to save the land and they were using it for a land development company."

His sensitivity stems, in part at least, from the unabashedly autobiographical lyrics of "Rocky Mountain High": "He was born in the summer of his 27th year. Comin' home to a place he'd never been before."*

When success gave them the option, John and Annie Denver chose to sink their roots in Aspen, Colo. From their three-bedroom house, it is a short trip across the valley to the Aspen airport. "You can make going on the road a hassle or not," said Denver. "I have a road manager, a bass player and myself. We buy tickets to carry our instruments on board. Now we can afford to rent a sound system at the show. None of it is a hassle, because I love being up onstage and singing to people, even more than living in the Rocky Mountains, be- (Continued on Page 27)

30

*All Lyrics quoted copyright Cherry Lane Music Co.

BERKSHIRE COURIER
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
W. 3,750
JUL 19 1973
New England Newsclip

Seals and Crofts will appear in concert next Tuesday as part of a special Popular artist series at the summer grounds of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in Lenox.

A New York Times review said of them "Their songs,. . have a curious oriental flavor yet go through a multitude of tempo and mood shifts, experimenting with textures not found in most contemporary folk music." Seals and Crofts have recorded five albums, including "Summer Breeze" (with "Summer Breeze" and "Hummingbird") and the current best-seller "Diamond Girl." Livingston Taylor will be a special guest artist.

NEWS (SUNDAY)
NEW YORK CITY, N.Y.
JUL 22 1973
New England Newsclip

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
S. 224,000
JUL 22 1973
New England Newsclip

At Tanglewood Tuesday

Seals and Crofts, a singing duet which has recorded five albums ("Summer Breeze"), will be at Tanglewood, Lenox, Tuesday evening at 7:30. With them will be Livingston Taylor.

Hubbard

Livingston Taylor, younger brother of folk rock hero James Taylor, played before a packed audience at Tanglewood Tuesday night. The concert was the third event in the area's popular artist series. Seals and Croft also performed.

BANNER (E)
BENNINGTON, VT.
JUL 26 1973
New England Newsclip

UNION (M)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
JUL 26 1973
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Crowd Noise Almost Wins

By JOHN BARTLETT
Union Staff

A loud sellout crowd battled the Tanglewood music last night at the Livingston Taylor, Seals and Crofts concert.

The noisy audience of 17,000 thronged the seated areas and the lawn, and many did not seem to notice the fine music of the performers.

Tanglewood's facilities are best suited to the styles of Taylor and Seals and Crofts. Their soft rock does not produce the painful distortions and strains on the equipment caused by some hard rock groups in previous concerts.

Livingston Taylor performed, unlike his first appearance, with a small band consisting of piano, string bass and drums. He sings with a carefully modulated voice that is sensitive in mood, but does not vary his guitar style and uses repetitive rhythms.

Seals and Crofts received the larger acclaim from the audience, inspiring a standing ovation even for their stage assistants and backup musicians.

The duo centered its performance on blended instruments and voices. They play mandolin and guitar in a style that can best be described as Everly Brothers without the nasal tones.

Among crowd - pleasing songs last night were "A Little Help From My Friends' and "Carolina Day'' by Taylor, and "Hummingbird' and "Summer Breeze' by Seals and Crofts.

The Everly Brothers were brought to mind again in the concert by Taylor's "Bye Bye Love," performed as an encore before Seals and Crofts, the main attraction, came on.

Traffic on access roads to Tanglewood was jammed. State troopers and police from Lenox and Lee rode past the halted motorists, informing them over loudspeakers that the concert was sold out.

The last concert in the Tanglewood Tuesday night popular music series will be next Tuesday when America and special guest star Jackson Browne will appear.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
JUL 26 1973
New England News

15,251 hear rock at Tanglewood

LENOX — Last night's third concert of the Popular Artists Series at Tanglewood drew a paid attendance 15,251, thus setting a record for this year's Tuesday-night performances of "soft rock."

The performers were Seales and Crofts and Livingston Taylor.

An informal poll of police and other officials on the grounds before the box office figures were announced drew estimates that ranged up to 18,000.

A spokesman for Tanglewood said the difference between paid and actual attendance might have been as high as 1,000 people because of complimentary tickets.

More fence jumpers

Also, James F. Kiley, operations manager for Tanglewood, observed that there were more fence jumpers last night, despite the 40 deputy sheriffs on duty.

Some people left the concert complaining that they could not hear the music inside the Shed. Kiley said the sound equipment belonged to the performers. If the sound was inadequate inside the Shed, the outside speakers appeared to be an improvement over those of last week, when Tanglewood equipment was used outside.

Vehicular traffic in the area was heavy last night, but congestion was no worse than at similar concerts in the past.

In regard to litter left behind by the crowd, Kiley said it was "one heck of a mess." Lawn and Shed audiences at the two previous concerts in the series had left behind comparatively little litter.

Roberta Flack to appear in Popular Artist Series at Tanglewood

BOSTON—Roberta Flack will appear in concert with Blood, Sweat and Tears at Tanglewood on July 10 to open a special four concert Popular Artists Series at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The series is presented by the symphony in conjunction with Don Law, and will run for four consecutive Tuesday evenings in July. July 17, John Denver and Linda Ronstadt will appear, followed on July 24 by Seals and Crofts and special guest Livingston Taylor. The final concert on July 31 will feature America and Jackson Browne. All concerts will begin at 7:30 p.m.

The series was arranged in an effort to present popular contemporary artists at Tanglewood who will bring diversity to the symphony's summer program and whose music is particularly appropriate in the beautiful Berkshire setting.

Tickets will go on sale June 18 at the Tanglewood Box Office and at all Ticketron outlets. For information, call the Tanglewood Box Office after June 18 at (413) 637-1600.

Singer-pianist Roberta Flack will open the series on July 10. Miss Flack is a celebrated jazz singer and folksinger who is also at home in a rhythm and blues context. Her albums include "First Take," (with "The First Time Ever I Saw Your Face") "Chapter Two," "Quiet Fire," "Roberta Flack and Donny Hathaway" (including "Where is the Love") and a soon-to-be released album "Killing Me Softly".

John Denver will present the second concert in the series on July 17. An accomplished guitarist and songwriter, John began his career as a member of the Chad Mitchell Trio. Since then, Denver has made five albums for RCA, recording such songs of his as "Leaving on a Jet Plane," "Take Me Home, Country Roads," and "Colorade Rocky Mountain High". Beside his concert performances, Denver has also made frequent TV appearances. Linda Ronstadt will open the concert.

Flack to Open Popular Series At Tanglewood

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
W. 5,043
JUL 2 1973
New England Newsclip

Roberta Flack will appear in concert with Blood, Sweat and Tears at Tanglewood on July 10 to open a special four - concert Popular Artists Series at the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Lenox.

The series is presented by the Symphony in conjunction with Don Low, and will run for four consecutive Tuesday evenings in July. July 17, John Denver and Linda Ronstadt will appear, followed on July 24 by Seals and Crofts and special guest Livingston Taylor. The final concert on July 31 will feature America and Jackson Browne. All concerts will begin at 7:30 p.m.

The series was arranged in an effort to present popular contemporary artists at Tanglewood who will bring diversity to the Symphony's summer program and whose music is particularly appropriate in the beautiful Berkshire setting.

Tickets will go on sale today at the Tanglewood Box Office and at all Ticketron outlets. For information, call the Tanglewood Box Office.

Singer - pianist Roberta Flack will open the series on July 10. Miss Flack is a celebrated jazz singer and folksinger who is also at home in a rhythm and blues context. Her albums include "First Take," (with "The First Time Ever I Saw Your Face") "Chapter Two," "Quiet Fire," "Roberta Flack and Donny Hathaway" (including "Where Is the Love?") and a soon - to be released album "Killing Me Softly."

John Denver will present the second concert in the series on July 17. An accomplished guitarist and songwriter, John began his career as a member of the Chad Mitchell Trio. Since then, Denver has made five albums for RCA, recording such songs of his as "Leaving on a Jet Plane," "Take Me Home, Country Roads," and "Colorado Rocky Mountain High." Linda Ronstadt will open the concert.

Seals and Crofts will appear on July 24. Seals and Crofts have recorded five albums, including "Summer Breeze" (with "Summer Breeze" and "Hummingbird") and the current best - seller "Diamond Girl." Livingston Taylor will be a special guest artist.

America will present the final concert of the series on July 31. The success of their first album "America" and the hit single "A Horse With No Name" which brought them to the attention of American and English audiences in an unbelievably short time is now record business history. Since then, American has recorded another successful album, "Homecoming" and played major concert dates throughout the country. Jackson Browne will open the concert.

TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
JUN 18 1973
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood to present popular contemporary artists during summer

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
S. 135,000
JUL 15 1973
New England Newsclip

Roberta Flack will appear in concert with Blood, Sweat and Tears at Tanglewood on July 10 to open a special four concert Popular Artists Series at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The series is presented by the Symphony in conjunction with Don Law, and will run for four consecutive Tuesday evenings in July. July 17, John Denver and Linda Ronstadt will appear, followed on July 24 by Seals and Crofts and special guest Livingston Taylor. The final concert on July 31 will feature America and Jackson Browne. All concerts will begin at 7:30 p.m.

The series was arranged in an effort to present popular contemporary artists at Tanglewood who will bring diversity ot the Symphony's summer program and whose music is particularly appropriate in the beautiful Berkshire setting.

Tickets will go on sale June 18 at the Tanglewood Box office and at all Ticketron outlets. For information, call the Tanglewood Box Office after June 18 at (413) 637-1600.

Singer-pianist Roberta Flack will open the series on July 10. Miss Flack is a celebrated jazz singer and folksinger who is also at home in a rhythm and blues context. Her album include "First Take," (with "The First Time Ever I Saw Your Face") "Chapter Two," "Quiet Fire," "Roberta Flack and Donny Hathaway" (including "Where is the Love") and a soon-to-be released album "Killing Me Softly."

John Denver will present the second concert in the series on July 17. An accomplished guitarist and songwriter, John began his career as a member of the Chad Mitchell Trio. Since then, Denver has made five albums for RCA recording such songs of his as "Leaving on a Jet Plane," "Take Me Home, Country Roads," and "Colorado Rocky Mountain High." Beside his concert performances, Denver has also made frequent TV appearances. Linda Ronstadt will open the concert.

Seals and Crofts will appear on July 24. A New York Times review said of them "Their songs . . . have a curious oriental flavor or yet go through a multitude of tempo and mood shifts, experimenting with textures not found in most contemporary folk music." Seals and Crofts have recorded five albums, including "Summer Breeze" (wtih "Summer Breeze" and "Hummingbird") and the current best-seller "Diamond Girl. Livingston Taylor will be a special guest artist.

America will present the final concert of the series on July 31. The success of their first album "America" and the hit single "A Horse with No Name" which brought them to the attention of American and English audiences in an unbelievably short time is now record business history. Since then, American has recorded another successful album, "Homecoming" and played major concert dates throughout the country. America's Tanglewood appearance will be their first stop on their second U. S. tour. Jackson Browne will open the concert.

Pop Artists Play Tanglewood Dates

A Popular Artist Concert Series is under way at the Lenox, Mass. summer grounds of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The series, presented by the Symphony in conjunction with Don Law, is being presented on Tuesday evenings.

John Denver will appear July 18, to be followed on July 24 by Seals and Crafts and special guest Livingston Taylor.

The final concert on July 31 will feature America and Jackson Browne.

All concerts begin at 7:30 p.m.

Tickets are available at 413-637-1600.

Denver, an accomplished guitarist and songwriter, began his career as a member of the Chad Mitchell Trio.

Seals and Crofts, appears on July 24, have recorded five albums, including "Summer Breeze" (with "Summer Breeze" and "Hummingbird") and the current best-seller "Diamond Girl".

America will appear in the final concert on July 31.

The success of their first album, "America", and the hit single, "A Horse with No Name", which brought them to the attention of American and English audiences in an unbelievably short time is now record business history.

America's Tanglewood appearance is their first stop on their second U.S. tour.

Jackson Browne will open the concert.

CITIZEN
WINSTED, CONN
D. 4,600
JUN 28 1973
New England Newsclip

TANGLEWOOD:

Popular Artists Series: July 10, Roberta Flack and Blood, Sweat and Tears; July 17, John Denver and Linda Ronstadt; July 24, Seals and Croft and Livingston Taylor; July 31, America and Jackson Browne; All concerts begin at 7:30 p.m., tickets on sale at Tanglewood box office and Ticketron, Tanglewood, Mass.

Roberta Flack, BS&T At Tanglewood July 10

LENOX, Mass. — Roberta Flack will appear in concert with Blood, Sweat and Tears at Tanglewood on Tuesday July 10 to open a special four concert Popular Artists Series at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The series is presented by the Symphony in conjunction with Don Law, and will run for four consecutive Tuesday evenings in July. July 17, John Denver and Linda Ronstadt will appear followed on July 24 by Seals and Crofts and special guest Livingston Taylor. The final concert on July 31 will feature America and Jackson Browne. All concerts will begin at 7:30 p.m.

Tickets are on sale at the Tanglewood Box Office.

Singer-pianist Roberta Flack will open the series on July 10. Miss Flack is a celebrated jazz singer and folksinger who is also at home in a rhythm and blues context.

John Denver will present the second concert in the series on July 17. An accomplished guitarist and songwriter, John began his career as a member of the Chad Mitchell Trio. Beside his concert performances, Denver has also made frequent TV appearances. Linda Ronstadt will open the concert.

Seals and Crofts will appear on July 24. A New York Times review said of them "Their songs . . . have a curious oriental flavor yet go through a multitude of tempo and mood shifts, experimenting with textures not found in most contemporary folk music." Livingston Taylor will be a special guest artist.

America's Tanglewood appearance will be their first stop on their second U. S tour. Jackson Browne will open the concert.

UNION (M)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS
JUN 20 1973
New England Newsclip

Roberta Flack in Concert At Tanglewood Tuesday

BOSTON — Roberta Flack will appear in concert with Blood Sweat and Tears at Tanglewood Tuesday to open a special four concert Popular Artist Series at the Lenox summer grounds of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The series is presented by the symphony in conjunction with Don Law, and will run for four consecutive Tuesday evenings in July. July 17, John Denver will appear, followed on July 24 by Seals and Crofts and special guest Livingston Taylor. The final concert on July 31 will feature America and Jackson Browne. All concerts will begin at 7:30 p.m.

ROBERTA FLACK

The series was arranged in an effort to present popular contemporary artists at Tanglewood who would bring diversity to the symphony's summer program and whose music is particularly appropriate in the beautiful Berkshire setting.

Singer - pianist Roberta Flack is a celebrated jazz singer and folksinger who is also at home in a rhythm and blues context. Her albums include "First Take," (with "The First Time Ever I Saw Your Face") "Chapter Two," "Quiet Fire", "Roberta Flack and Donny Hathaway" (including "Where is the Love") and a soon-to-be released album "Killing Me Softly."

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
S. 130,000
JUL 8 1973
New England Newsclip

Roberta Flack at Tanglewood

LENOX — Roberta Flack will appear in concert with Blood, Sweat and Tears at Tanglewood on July 10 to open a special four-concert Popular Artists Series at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

4 Tuesday Evenings

The series is presented by the orchestra in conjunction with Don Law, and will run for four consecutive Tuesday evenings in July.

July 17, John Denver and Linda Ronstadt will appear, Linda Ronstadt will appearr, followed on July 24 by Seals and Crofts and special guest Livingston Taylor.

The final concert on July 31 will feature America and Jackson Browne. All concerts will begin at 7.30 p.m.

The series was arranged in an effort to present popular contemporary artists at Tanglewood who will bring diversity to the orchestra's summer program and whose music is particularly appropriate in the Berkshire setting.

Tickets are on sale at the Tanglewood Box Office and at all Ticketron outlets. For information, call the Tanglewood Box Office at (413) 637-1600.

Will Open July 10

Singer-pianist Roberta Flack will open the series on July 10. Miss Flack is a celebrated jazz singer and folksinger who is also at home in a rhythm and blues context.

THE SPRINGFIELD UNION
AMUSEMENTS
16 Springfield, Mass., Wednesday, June 20, 1973

Her albums include "First Take," (with "The First Time Ever I Saw Your Face") "Chapter Two," "Quiet Fire," "Roberta Flack and Donny Hathaway" (including "Where is the Love") and a soon-to-be released album "Killing Me Softly".

John Denver will present the second concert in the series on July 17. An accomplished guitarist and songwriter, John began his career as a member of the Chad Mitchell Trio.

Since then, Denver has made five albums for RCA, recording such songs of his as "Leaving on a Jet Plane," "Take Me Home, Country Roads," and "Colorado Rocky Mountain High". Besides his concert performances, Denver has also made frequent TV appearances. Linda Ronstadt will open the concert.

Seals and Crofts will appear on July 24. They have recorded five albums, including "Summer Breeze" (with "Summer Breeze" and "Hummingbird") and the current best-seller "Diamond Girl". Livingston Taylor will be a special guest artist.

Final Concert July 31

America will present the final concert of the series on July 31. The success of their first album "America" and the hit single "A Horse with No Name" which brought them to the attention of American and English audiences in an unbelievably short time is now record business history.

Since then, America has recorded another successful album, "Homecoming" and played major concert dates throughout the country.

America's Tanglewood appearance will be their first stop on their second U.S. tour. Jackson Browne will open the concert.

NEWS TIMES
DANBURY, CONN (E)
JUL 5 1973
New England Newsclip

Singer at Tanglewood

Roberta Flack will appear in concert with Blood, Sweat and Tears Tuesday to open a special four-concert Popular Artists Series at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Miss Flack is a jazz-folksinger who is also at home in a rhythm and blues context.

The series will run for four consecutive Tuesday evenings in July July 17. John Denver and Linda Ronstadt will appear, followed on July 24 by Seals and Crofts and special guest Livingston Taylor. The final concert on July 31 will feature America and Jackson Browne. All concerts will begin at 7:30 p.m.

Tickets are on sale at the Tanglewood box office and at all Ticketron outlets.

13,954 cause no blood, sweat or tears at first of Tanglewood popular series

BEagle July 12, '73

Whitestone

QUIET CROWD relaxes on Tanglewood lawns before Roberta Flack concert last night.

By Joy Allen

LENOX — One of a group of policemen who made drug arrests at a Contemporary Trends concert at Tanglewood two years ago called last night's crowd of 13,954 "beautiful" at the first of the 1973 Popular Artists Series.

Stockbridge Police Chief William J. Obanhein said there was "no comparison" between last night's gathering to hear Roberta Flack and Blood, Sweat & Tears and the crowd that came to hear hard rock during the 1971 Contemporary Trends concerts, as they were called then.

No litter problem

James F. Kiley, Tanglewood operations manager, said last night that there were few traffic problems, no injuries and no litter problem. "It was a very nice crowd tonight, very orderly," he reported after the concert.

Mark Stockton, a karate teacher at Lenox Memorial High School, reflected during the performance on why the audience was so peaceful. "I've been going to popular concerts since I was 14," he said. "When The Who came (two years ago), people came to congregate, not to listen. Also, the drug scene has cooled out since then. Tonight everybody definitely came to listen to Roberta," he said.

Boston entrepreneur Donald Law, who with the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) is coproducer of the series, said that when it was negotiated, BSO officials specified they wanted performers that would draw less rowdy crowds than in previous years.

Seemed older

One policeman, who had been on duty at several concerts two years ago, said last night's audience seemed older.

There were many couples with young children and babies picnicking on the lawns near the music shed. Mrs. John Curtis, wife of the public relations director at Tanglewood, was observed sitting on the lawn with her baby, William, on her lap. "I couldn't get a sitter," said the British-born woman. "You can see that all the sitters are here."

Mr. and Mrs. Robert Daniels of Sunderland said they brought their 9- and 12-year-old children to introduce them to Roberta Flack's music.

Ham sandwiches

Some middle-aged fans attended the concert without their children. Mrs. Cynthia Nordeen of Pittsfield said her four grown children had exposed her to Miss Flack's music, but they were unable to attend the concert. She brought a friend, Mrs. Barbara Nichols, a teacher at Berkshire Community College, to hear the performance.

News Index

Calendar	31
County	16,27,31,32,33
Editorial pages	24-25
Entertainment	10
Foreign	2
Hospital list	7
Local	7,8,9,15,18,20,21,23
Name in the News	27
National	31
Obituaries	21
Social	11
Sports	34-37
Statehouse	4
TV, movies	41

As in the past, there were many groups of young people, wearing T-shirts with names of camps and colleges, picnicking on the grounds. Some ate ham sandwiches and potato chips and drank cold beer. Cold chicken, liver pate and wine were also popular.

Security was tight, with 40 Berkshire county sheriffs guarding gates and fences, but there was no restraint in audience reaction to Miss Flack's performance of "rock-pop-folk-jazz," as she described it.

Near the end of the show, conductor Seiji Ozawa, artistic director of the Berkshire Music Festival, was seen going backstage, presumably to greet the singer.

About that time, part of the lawn audience moved in with the Shed audience, and all stood softly swaying to the rhythm of Miss Flack's encore, "Reverend Lee."

After ovations, the crowd filed out slowly, almost meditatively, to the parking lots. One long-haired young man patted a policeman on the back and said, "Hey, you didn't come over to our picnic blanket for that daiquiri."

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
W. 4,805
JUL 5 1973
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood

Roberta Flack To Open Series

Roberta Flack will appear in concert with Blood Sweat and Tears at Tanglewood on July 10 to open a special four concert Popular Artist Series at the Lenox summer grounds of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The series is presented by the Symphony in conjunction with Don Law, and will run for four consecutive Tuesday evenings in July.

John Denver will appear July 17, followed on July 24 by Seals and Crofts and special guest Livingston Taylor. The final concert on July 31 will feature America and Jackson Browne.

All concerts will begin at 7:30 p.m.

Roberta Flack is a celebrated jazz singer, pianist and folksinger who is also at home in a rhythm and blues context. Her albums include "First Take" (with "The First Time Ever I Saw Your Face") "Chapter Two," "Quiet Fire," "Roberta Flack and Donny Hathaway" (including "Where is the Love").

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
JUL 11 1973
New Engl. Newsc.

Music review

No blood (sweat, tears) for Roberta

By Mark V. Donovan

FROM THE MOMENT Roberta Flack walked on stage last night and told the waiting crowd, "You are the sunshine of my life," until the last echoes of applause from "Reverend Lee" faded away into the warm Berkshire night, she was in complete control of her audience. A crowd of 14,000 gathered to see the first of four popular music concerts to be presented at Tanglewood this summer.

* * *

Miss Flack was preceded by the somewhat disappointing Blood, Sweat & Tears. There was a time when Roberta Flack would have played backup to that group, but sadly for BS&T, those times are gone. BS&T has tried to change its image, and the title of its most recent album, "New Blood," is indicative of the great turnover in personnel that has taken place. Most notably, David Clayton-Thomas, the lively lead singer, has gone his own way.

Jerry Fisher, who now wails away in the place of Clayton-Thomas, does a creditable job of imitating his predecessor and even manages to contort himself like Joe Cocker at times. But the new BS&T faces an apparently insoluble dilemma: Concert audiences are unfamiliar with the group's new material, and golden hits like "You've Made Me So Very Happy" and "God Bless the Child" just don't sound the same anymore. As a result, the band played for less than an hour and there were no cries for more when the musicians left the stage.

* * *

The audience warmed to Miss Flack immediately as she opened with the Stevie Wonder number. In fact, her act is not unlike that of Wonder; she is backed by six able musicians and accompanied by an excellent trio of soul singers.

Roberta looked splendid in a gigantic African robe, and as she strutted about the stage, she looked completely at home. Her training as a classical soprano is evident; singing seems to come as naturally as breathing to her.

Whitestone

Roberta Flack

The audience was relatively restrained until she broke into a version of her hit single, "Killing Me Softly." Barely under way, her microphone went completely dead. Unruffled, Miss Flack started over, commenting, "I don't want to mess up my hit."

She was not so busy, however, that she couldn't introduce a member of the band, one Wayne Davis, who played what she called "some Chinese rock 'n' roll." I don't know what that means, but it sounded mighty fine.

Roberta saved her biggest hit, "The First Time Ever I Saw Your Face," for the end, and it was well worth waiting for. Sprawled on the lawn or in the Shed, everyone sang the well-known lyrics along with her. She responded to demands for an encore with a rollicking version of "Reverend Lee." The same audience that had remained politely seated during the whole of the BS&T set was dancing in the aisles before she was through.

The Popular Artists Series continues next Tuesday with John Denver and Linda Ronstadt. It is like a breath of fresh air to have popular music back at Tanglewood.

UNION (E)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 54,503
JUL 11 1973
New England Newsclip

12,000 Loudly Applaud Roberta Flack At Tanglewood Concert Tuesday

By CHRISTOPHER BROOKS
Union Staff

LENOX — "You Are The Sunshine of My Life", singer - pianist Roberta Flack said, as she made her entrance to a standing ovation Tuesday night in the Tanglewood shed.

An extimated crowd of 12,000 packed the shed and the lawn. People had lined up at the Tanglewood box office as early as 3 p. m. to insure a good spot on the lawn for the double bill of Miss Flack and Blood, Sweat & Tears.

The 5000-seat shed was sold out by late last week.

The audience was in sharp contrast to the crowds attracted during Tanglewood's Contemporary Trends Series which was cancelled after the 1971 summer season. A more mature and more restrained group, sporting six-packs of beer instead of marijuana, they listened intently to the Tuesday night concert, warmly greeting both acts.

Backed by three women vocalists, guitars and a drum, Roberta captured the audience quickly with her smooth but gusty projection. Opening with the popular song by the same name as her opening line, "You Are the Sunshine of My Life," Miss Flack demonstrated her versatility in "Mr. Magic," a moving song written in a contemporary West Indian style, and "River," a plaintive Gene McDaniels product. Only her accomplished piano playing was sometimes lost.

Born in Asheville, N. C., Miss Flack found her niche in Washington, D. C. But it was 10 years from her first appearance in Washington's Mr. Henry's Downtairs to her acclaim as an accomplished contemporary artist with the nationwide popularity of "The First Time I Ever Saw Your Face" and "Killing Me Softly."

Her immense popularity was suitably demonstrated by the age of her audience. Young, pre - teens joined some over-the-hillers in their 30s, 40s and 50s in warm applause after every number.

Blood, Sweat and Tears, a jazz-rock group that reached its peak several years ago, drew the crowd's endorsement as well with strong use of their trademark, a four-piece brass section.

While coordination of the horns was loose as the group opened the concert, it soon tightened up, lending itself to several well - played instrumentals. The group, plagued by personnel problems in the last two years that have left only two of the nine original members, drew the biggest applause for its hit recordings, "You've Made Me So Very Happy" and "And When I Die."

The lawn dwellers were treated to the best of BS&T: the shed distorted the highly amplified sounds for reserved ticket holders.

The Roberta Flack — BS&T concert was the first of four Tuesday night popular artists series. On July 17, Tanglewood will feature "An Evening with John Denver."

BERKSHIRE GAZETTE (E)
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
D. 15,8[illegible]
JUL 11 1973
New England News

Mini-Review

Tanglewood Turns On For Roberta, BS&T

BY CINDY WEISS

LENOX — Roberta Flack opened the Tanglewood popular concert series last night with a program mixing rock, West Indian and blues beats for the sold-out shell and crowded lawn.

The lawn started filling late in the afternoon for the 7:30 p.m. concert, and by Miss Flack's 9 p.m. appearance, following a performance by the rock and jazz group Blood Sweat and Tears, several standing rows had formed behind the shell.

"You are the Sunshine of My Life" led off Miss Flack's program, followed by the West Indian "Mr. Magic" with hits heavy-two-four beat, similar to calypso and used more and more heavily by rock composers.

The crowd responded enthusiastically when the southern-born singer and pianist slipped into a long blues number, "River," punctuated by her drawling exclamation, "In case you didn't know it, this is the blues."

Prefacing some numbers with a piano introduction, Miss Flack went from blues to rock to Caribbean beats with little pause.

Her appearance followed an hour-long concert by Blood, Sweat and Tears, with its heavy emphasis on brass.

The most popular part of the BS&T program were the group's early hits such as "When I Die," first recorded before the group re-formed. The rock selections of BS&T brought portions of the lawn audience to their feet, dancing.

The BS&T selections, unlike Miss Flack's program, were marred by over-amplification that muddied the effect of the group's famous brass section.

The popular concert series will be held on Tuesdays during the Tanglewood season, with John Denver heading up next week's bill.

CHANGES

UNION (M)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 84,000
AUG 13 1973
New England Newsclip

Raeburn Leaves Boston Symphony

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced that Andrew Raeburn is leaving his post as program editor to take up a research project.

Raeburn joined the Boston Symphony in 1964 as musical assistant to Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director at that time. In 1967 he assumed his current post as Program Editor. Additionally, he has been musical assistant to William Steinberg.

Harry Neville

The orchestra also announced the appointment of Harry Neville as the new Program Editor. He will formally take over the post on September 1st.

During the past five years Neville has been closely associated with Boston musical life, first as a music critic of the Boston Globe and then as music editor of the Boston Herald Traveler.

Neville also has served as correspondent of Opera News and has written jacket notes for recordings on the Angel and Columbia labels.

Neville received his musical education at Ohio University where he studied composition with Karl Ahrendt and piano with Ernst von Dohnanyi. He, his wife and daughter, make their home in Cambridge.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
AUG 13 1973
New England Newsclip

BSO appoints Neville new program editor

Harry Neville has been appointed program editor for the Boston Symphony Orchestra to replace Andrew Raeburn, who is leaving to work on a research project. Neville will assume the post officially on Sept. 1.

He was formerly a music critic of the Boston Globe and music editor of the Boston Herald Traveler. He has also served as correspondent of Opera News and has written several jacket notes for recordings on the Angel and Columbia labels. He lives in Cambridge.

Raeburn was program editor for six years. He was also musical assistant to William Steinberg.

AUG 23 1973
New England Newsclip

New Program Editor Named

It is the great regret that the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that Andrew Raeburn is leaving his post as Program Editor to take up a research project.

Mr. Raeburn joined the Boston Symphony in 1964 as musical assistant to Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director at that time. In 1967 Mr. Raeburn assumed his current post as Program Editor. He has since served in that position with great distinction, maintaining the program as one of the outstanding in the country. His personal additions to the library of program notes will form a part of future programs just as the notes by Mr. John N. Burk, Mr. Raeburn's predecessor, continue to do. Additionally, Andrew Raeburn has been musical assistant to William Steinberg.

The Orchestra announces the appointment of Harry Neville as the new Program Editor. He will formally take over the post on September 1st.

During the past five years Mr. Neville has been closely associated with Boston musical life, first as a music critic of the Boston Globe and then as music editor of the Boston Herald Traveler. Mr. Neville has also served as correspondent of Opera News and has written numerous jacket notes for recordings on the Angel and Columbia labels.

Mr. Neville received his musical education at Ohio University where he studied composition with Karl Ahrendt and piano with Ernst von Dohnanyi. He, his wife and daughter, make their home in Cambridge.

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 56,638
AUG 10 1973

Raeburn Leaves Symphony Post

The Boston Symphony has announced that Andrew Raeburn is leaving his post as program editor for a position of a research project position.

Raeburn joined the Boston Symphony in 1964 as musical assistant to Erich Leinsdorf, musical director at that time.

He assumed his current post as program editor for the Symphony in 1967. In addition, Raeburn served as musical assistant to William Steinberg. Harry Neville will replace Raeburn Sept. 1.

During the past 5 years, Neville has been closely associated with Boston musical life, first as a music critic of the Boston Globe newspaper, and as music editor of the Boston Herald Traveler.

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 56,638
JUL 13 1973

Boston Symphony Names Curtis

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced the appointment of John Howard Curtis to the position of director of public relations.

MR. CURTIS, who was born in Ithaca, received a B.A. degree from Yale University in 1951 with a major in music. He began his career in public relations in 1953 with the major television networks in New York City.

UNION (M)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 84,000
JUL 21 1973
New England Newsclip

John H. Curtis Named Boston Symphony PR

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced the appointment of John Howard Curtis to the position of director of public relations. He joined the orchestra at Tanglewood July 2.

Curtis, who was born in Ithaca, New York, received a B. A. from Yale University in 1951 with a major in music. In 1953 he began his career in public relations and promotion working for the major television networks in New York City.

In his last position there, from 1958 through 1960, he was with the National Broadcasting Corporation where he was in charge of Client Presentations for the television network.

In 1961 he took a sabbatical year during which he studied music composition in Munich with Harold Genzmer at the Hochschule fuer Musik.

Upon his return to the United States, he joined Time - Life International and spent most of the following years on assignment in London.

His positions with them have included International Advertising Promotion Director and most recently U. K. Advertising Director.

Mr. and Mrs. Curtis, with their seven month old son William, will live in Needham.

PATRIOT LEDGER (E)
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 71,020
AUG 17 1973
New England Newsclip

Neville Named

Harry Neville, former music critic for the old Boston Herald Traveler and the Boston Globe, has been named program editor for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He replaces Andrew Raeburn, who is leaving the post to take up a research project.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 24,500
JUL 12 1973
New England Newsclip

HEADS BSO PR

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox — The Boston Symphony Orchestra annouces the appointment of John Howard Curtis as Director of Public Relations, as of July 2.

Mr. Curtis received a B.A. from Yale in 1951 with a major in music. In 1953 he began his career in public relations and promotion working for major television networks in New York City. In 1961 he took a sabbatical year during which he studied music composition with Harold Genzmer at the Hochschule fuer Musik, Munich.

EDITOR & PUBLISHER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 28,000
SEP 1 1973

HARRY NEVILLE, former music critic of the Boston Globe and the Boston Herald-Traveler—appointed program editor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
JUL 9 1973
New England Newsclip

BSO names John Curtis PR director

John Curtis, 44, has been named director of public relations of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, according to an announcement today. The post has not been filled for the past two years.

Curtis has been living in London for the past 10 years, most recently as United Kingdom advertising director for Time, Inc., and before that as promotional director for Time-Life, Inc.

A native of Ithaca, N.Y., he attended elementary school in West Bridgewater and graduated from Andover in 1947 and Yale University in 1951 with a major in music. He worked in network television advertising for several years before going with Time.

He lives with his wife and child in Needham.

GLOBE (E)
BOSTON, MASS.
AUG 10 1973
New England Newsclip

BSO appoints Neville

Harry Neville, former music critic of "The Boston Globe" and "Boston Herald-Traveler," has been appointed Program Editor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He succeeds Andrew Raeburn, who is leaving Symphony Hall to take up a research project.

Neville received his music education at Ohio University, where he studied composition with Karl Ahrendt and piano with Ernst von Dohnanyi. He came to the "Globe" in 1968, left to assume the post of music editor at the "Herald-Traveler," and after the demise of that paper contributed to the "Globe's" music columns.

He has also been Boston correspondent of "Opera News" and is the author of numerous jacket notes for recordings on the Columbia and Angel labels.

Andrew Raeburn joined the Boston Symphony in 1964 as assistant to Erich Leinsdorf. In 1967 he assumed the post of Program Editor, succeeding John N. Burk.

NEWS (E)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 95,528
JUL 14 1973
New England Newsclip

BSO Appoints Curtis As Director of PR

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced the appointment of John Howard Curtis to the position of director of public relations. Curtis has joined the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood.

Curtis, who was born in Ithaca, N.Y., received a B.A. from Yale University in 1951 with a major in music. In 1953 he began his career in public relations and promotion working for the major television networks in New York City. In his last position there, from 1958 through 1960, he was with the National Broadcasting Corporation where he was in charge of Client Presentations for the television network.

In 1961 he took a sabbatical year during which he studied music composition in Munich with Harold Genzmer at the Hochschule fuer Musik.

Upon his return to the United States, he joined Time-Life International and spent most of the following years on assignment in London. His positions with them have included international advertising promotion director and most recently U.K. advertising director.

Mr. and Mrs. Curtis, with their seven month old son William, will live in Needham.

CHANGES

UNION (M)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 56,000
AUG 13 1973 New England Newsclip

Raeburn Leaves Boston Symphony

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced that Andrew Raeburn is leaving his post as program editor to take up a research project.

Raeburn joined the Boston Symphony in 1964 as musical assistant to Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director at that time. In 1967 he assumed his current post as Program Editor. Additionally, he has been musical assistant to William Steinberg.

Harry Neville

The orchestra also announced the appointment of Harry Neville as the new Program Editor. He will formally take over the post on September 1st.

During the past five years Neville has been closely associated with Boston musical life, first as a music critic of the Boston Globe and then as music editor of the Boston Herald Traveler. Neville also has served as correspondent of Opera News and has written jacket notes for recordings on the Angel and Columbia labels.

Neville received his musical education at Ohio University where he studied composition with Karl Ahrendt and piano with Ernst von Dohnanyi. He, his wife and daughter, make their home in Cambridge.

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 56,638
AUG 10 1973

Raeburn Leaves Symphony Post

The Boston Symphony has announced that Andrew Raeburn is leaving his post as program editor for a position of a research project position.

Raeburn joined the Boston Symphony in 1964 as musical assistant to Erich Leinsdorf, musical director at that time.

He assumed his current post as program editor for the Symphony in 1967. In addition, Raeburn served as musical assistant to William Steinberg. Harry Neville will replace Raeburn Sept. 1.

During the past 5 years, Neville has been closely associated with Boston musical life, first as a music critic of the Boston Globe newspaper, and as music editor of the Boston Herald Traveler.

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 56,638
JUL 13 1973

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 24,500
JUL 12 1973 New England Newsclip

HEADS BSO PR

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox — The Boston Symphony Orchestra annouces the appointment of John Howard Curtis as Director of Public Relations, as of July 2.

Mr. Curtis received a B.A. from Yale in 1951 with a major in music. In 1953 he began his career in public relations and promotion working for major television networks in New York City. In 1961 he took a sabbatical year during which he studied music composition with Harold Genzmer at the Hochschule fuer Musik, Munich.

EDITOR & PUBLISHER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 24,000
SEP 1 1973

HARRY NEVILLE, former music critic of the Boston Globe and the Boston Herald-Traveler—appointed program editor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

AUG 23 1973

New Program Editor Named

It is the great regret that the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that Andrew Raeburn is leaving his post as Program Editor to take up a research project.

Mr. Raeburn joined the Boston Symphony in 1964 as musical assistant to Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director at that time. In 1967 Mr. Raeburn assumed his current post as Program Editor. He has since served in that position with great distinction, maintaining the program as one of the outstanding in the country. His personal additions to the library of program notes will form a part of future programs just as the notes by Mr. John N. Burk, Mr. Raeburn's predecessor, continue to do. Additionally, Andrew Raeburn has been musical assistant to William Steinberg.

The Orchestra announces the appointment of Harry Neville as the new Program Editor. He will formally take over the post on September 1st.

During the past five years Mr. Neville has been closely associated with Boston musical life, first as a music critic of the Boston Globe and then as music editor of the Boston Herald Traveler. Mr. Neville has also served as correspondent of Opera News and has written numerous jacket notes for recordings on the Angel and Columbia labels.

Mr. Neville received his musical education at Ohio University where he studied composition with Karl Ahrendt and piano with Ernst von Dohnanyi. He, his wife and daughter, make their home in Cambridge.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
AUG 13 1973 New England Newsclip

BSO appoints Neville new program editor

Harry Neville has been appointed program editor for the Boston Symphony Orchestra to replace Andrew Raeburn, who is leaving to work on a research project. Neville will assume the post officially on Sept. 1.

He was formerly a music critic of the Boston Globe and music editor of the Boston Herald Traveler. He has also served as correspondent of Opera News and has written several jacket notes for recordings on the Angel and Columbia labels. He lives in Cambridge.

Raeburn was program editor for six years. He was also musical assistant to William Steinberg.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
JUL 9 1973 New England Newsclip

BSO names John Curtis PR director

John Curtis, 44, has been named director of public relations of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, according to an announcement today. The post has not been filled for the past two years.

Curtis has been living in London for the past 10 years, most recently as United Kingdom advertising director for Time, Inc., and before that as promotional director for Time-Life, Inc.

A native of Ithaca, N.Y., he attended elementary school in West Bridgewater and graduated from Andover in 1947 and Yale University in 1951 with a major in music. He worked in network television advertising for several years before going with Time.

He lives with his wife and child in Needham.

NEWS (E)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
JUL 14 1973 New England Newsclip

BSO Appoints Curtis As Director of PR

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced the appointment of John Howard Curtis to the position of director of public relations. Curtis has joined the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood.

Curtis, who was born in Ithaca, N.Y., received a B.A. from Yale University in 1951 with a major in music. In 1953 he began his career in public relations and promotion working for the major television networks in New York City. In his last position there, from 1958 through 1960, he was with the National Broadcasting Corporation where he was in charge of Client Presentations for the television network.

In 1961 he took a sabbatical year during which he studied music composition in Munich with Harold Genzmer at the Hochschule fuer Musik.

Upon his return to the United States, he joined Time-Life International and spent most of the following years on assignment in London. His positions with them have included international advertising promotion director and most recently U.K. advertising director.

Mr. and Mrs. Curtis, with their seven month old son William, will live in Needham.

JUL 31 1973 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Names Curtis

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced the appointment of John Howard Curtis to the position of director of public relations.

MR. CURTIS, who was born in Ithaca, received a B.A. degree from Yale University in 1951 with a major in music. He began his career in public relations in 1953 with the major television networks in New York City.

John H. Curtis Named Boston Symphony PR

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced the appointment of John Howard Curtis to the position of director of public relations. He joined the orchestra at Tanglewood July 2.

Curtis, who was born in Ithaca, New York, received a B. A. from Yale University in 1951 with a major in music. In 1953 he began his career in public relations and promotion working for the major television networks in New York City.

In his last position there, from 1958 through 1960, he was with the National Broadcasting Corporation where he was in charge of Client Presentations for the television network.

In 1961 he took a sabbatical year during which he studied music composition in Munich with Harold Genzmer at the Hochschule fuer Musik.

Upon his return to the United States, he joined Time - Life International and spent most of the following years on assignment in London.

His positions with them have included International Advertising Promotion Director and most recently U. K. Advertising Director.

Mr. and Mrs. Curtis, with their seven month old son William, will live in Needham.

GLOBE (E)
BOSTON, MASS.
AUG 10 1973

BSO appoints Neville

Harry Neville, former music critic of "The Boston Globe" and "Boston Herald-Traveler," has been appointed Program Editor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He succeeds Andrew Raeburn, who is leaving Symphony Hall to take up a research project.

Neville received his music education at Ohio University, where he studied composition with Karl Ahrendt and piano with Ernst von Dohnanyi. He came to the "Globe" in 1968, left to assume the post of music editor at the "Herald-Traveler," and after the demise of that paper contributed to the "Globe's" music columns.

He has also been Boston correspondent of "Opera News" and is the author of numerous jacket notes for recordings on the Columbia and Angel labels.

Andrew Raeburn joined the Boston Symphony in 1964 as assistant to Erich Leinsdorf. In 1967 he assumed the post of Program Editor, succeeding John N. Burk.

PATRIOT LEDGER (E)
QUINCY, MASS.
AUG 17 1973 New England Newsclip

Neville Named

Harry Neville, former music critic for the old Boston Herald Traveler and the Boston Globe, has been named program editor for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He replaces Andrew Raeburn, who is leaving the post to take up a research project.

TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM (E)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
D. 30,000
AUG 10 1973 New England Newscip

Tax Lien Filed Against Seiji Ozawa

PITTSFIELD, Mass. (AP) — The Internal Revenue Service filed a tax lien Thursday charging conductor Seiji Ozawa and his wife, Vera, with failure to pay $14,661 in personal income taxes.

The document alleges that Ozawa owes $1,839.70 in federal income taxes for 1964 and $12,821.69 for 1969.

Ozawa, 38, is a music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the San Francisco Symphony.

The lien, recorded in the Middle Berkshire Registry of Deeds here, lists addresses in Lenox, Mass., and San Francisco.

IRS Agent Bruce R. McLeod of Pittsfield said the papers were prepared in New York and filed here because Ozawa is currently living in Lenox and recently bought land in West Stockbridge.

NEWS (E)
GARDNER, MASS.
AUG 10 1973 New England Newscip

IRS Claims The Ozawas Owe $14,661

PITTSFIELD, Mass. (AP) — The Internal Revenue Service filed a tax lien Thursday charging conductor Seiji Ozawa and his wife, Vera, with failure to pay $14,661 in personal income taxes.

The document alleges that Ozawa owes $1,839.70 in federal income taxes for 1964 and $12,821.69 for 1969.

Ozawa, 38, is a music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the San Francisco Symphony.

The lien, recorded in the Middle Berkshire Registry of Deeds here, lists addresses in Lenox, Mass., and San Francisco.

IRS Agent Bruce R. McLeod of Pittsfield said the papers were prepared in New York and filed here because Ozawa is currently living in Lenox and recently bought land in West Stockbridge.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
AUG 10 1973 New England Newscip

IRS hits Ozawa with tax lien

The Internal Revenue Service has filed a tax lien for $14,661 against Seiji Ozawa, director-designate of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his wife, Vera, according to papers in the Middle District Registry of Deeds.

The lien, filed by IRS agent Bruce McLeod, claims Ozawa owes $1,839 in federal income taxes for the year ending Dec. 31, 1964, and $12,821 for the year ending Dec. 31, 1969.

The lien lists the Ozawas' residences as San Francisco, Calif., and Lenox, and an IRS agent in the Pittsfield office said it is probable that a similar lien has been filed in the California city.

Tax liens are filed in deeds registries as a means of placing claims against any property that may be owned by the persons named in the liens.

Buys Berkshire land

The Ozawas last December purchased a 7.5-acre parcel of land in West Stockbridge, but that sale is recorded in the Southern Berkshire Registry of Deeds in Great Barrington. The IRS spokesman this morning said a lien may be filed in that registry as well.

The Ozawas are in Europe and are not expected back until next week.

Ozawa is slated to become music director of the BSO in September. At present, he is music adviser and has appeared as conductor at BSO concerts at Tanglewood in this and previous years. He is also conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra under a contract that runs through 1976.

The seasons of the two orchestras do not coincide.

Ozawa's income from his orchestra contracts and guest appearances is not publicly known.

PITTSFIELD (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
AUG 11 1973 New England Newscip

IRS files tax lien against Ozawa

PITTSFIELD — A tax lien for $14,661.38 has been filed against Seiji Ozawa, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his wife, Vera, by the Internal Revenue Service.

The lien was filed Thursday in the Registry of Deeds in Pittsfield. It indicates that Ozawa owes $1839.70 in personal income taxes for 1964 and $12,821.68 for 1969. San Francisco and Lenox addresses are on the lien.

The Ozawas are vacationing in Europe. He is due back for a concert at Tanglewood on Tuesday.

HERALD-AMERICAN (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 221,654
AUG 11 1973 New England Newscip

Ozawa Hit By Tax Lien

PITTSFIELD (AP)—The Internal Revenue Service filed a tax lien charging conductor Seiji Ozawa and his wife, Vera, with failure to pay $14,661 in personal income taxes.

The document alleges that Ozawa owes $1839.70 in federal income taxes for 1964 and $12,821.69 for 1969.

Ozawa, 38, is a music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the San Franciso Symphony.

The lien, recorded in the Middle Berkshire Registry of Deeds here, lists addresses in Lenox, Mass., and San Francisco.

IRS Agent Bruce R. McLeod of Pittsfield said the papers were prepared in New York and filed here because Ozawa is currently living in Lenox and recently bought land in West Stockbridge.

Tax Lien Filed Against Ozawa

By CHRISTOPHER BROOKS
Union Staff

The Internal Revenue Service filed a tax lien Thursday against Boston Symphony Orchestra Music Director Seiji Ozawa and his wife, Vera, charging that the couple had failed to pay $14,661 in personal income taxes.

The lien, recorded in the Middle Berkshire Registry of Deeds, alleges that the noted conductor owes $1839.70 in federal income taxes for the year ending Dec. 31, 1964 and an additional $12,821.69 for 1969.

IRS agent Bruce McLeod of Pittsfield, who filed the document, said the papers were prepared in the agency's New York City office and forwarded here because Ozawa is living in Lenox and recently bought land in West Stockbridge.

SEIJI OZAWA

Both Lenox and San Francisco addresses were listed for the Ozawas in the lien.

Ozawa was appointed BSO music director in February, 1972, succeeding William Steinberg. Previously, he had made several appearances as a guest conductor and served as codirector of the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood's teaching arm.

The 38-year-old Ozawa also serves as music director of the San Francisco Symphony during the winter.

While Ozawa's income from the two orchestras and guest appearances throughout the world is, like that of other big-name conductors, a tightly guarded secret, it is estimated to be between $200,000 and $300,000 a year.

The Ozawas are vacationing in Europe and are expected back next week. Seiji Ozawa is scheduled to conduct the BSO during the next to last Tanglewood weekend, Aug. 17-19.

UNION (M)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 84,000
AUG 10 1973 New England Newscip

LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
KASHU MAINICHI
CALIFORNIA NEWS
D. 5,500
AUG 13 1973

Ozawa owes Uncle Sam?

SAN FRANCISCO — Seiji Ozawa, internationally acclaimed conductor of the San Francisco and Boston Symphony Orchestras apparently has struck a sour note with the Internal Revenue Service, the San Francisco Chronicle reported last week.

The 37-year-old maestro is accused by the IRS of having failed to pay $14,661 in personal income taxes.

The tax lien was filed against Ozawa in the Middle Berkshire Registry of Deeds in Pittsfield, Mass., because, agents said, the conductor recently acquired property in West Stockbridge, near the Boston Symphony's summer home and the Tanglewood Music Festival, which he directs.

Ozawa also has a home in San Francisco.

The document recorded alleges that Ozawa owes $1,839.70 in federal income taxes for 1964 and $12,821.69 for 1969.

Ozawa has been in Austria conducting at the Salzburg Festival, and is not expected to arrive at Tanglewood until early this week.

The maestro's business and professional affairs are handled by Columbia Artists Management in New York. His personal manager, Ronald Wilford, president of the firm, is on vacation until September 4 and could not be reached for comment.

However, Marvin Shofer, Wilford's assistant, said Ozawa's business saffairs, including his tax returns, are "absolutely in order."

"There is no basis for this," Shofer said. "We are mystified."

FOSTER'S DEMOCRAT (E)
DOVER, N. H.
D. 17,000
AUG 10 1973 New England Newscip

Tax Lien Filed On Conductor

PITTSFIELD, Mass. (AP) — The Internal Revenue Service filed a tax lien Thursday charging conductor Seiji Ozawa and his wife, Vera, with failure to pay $14,661 in personal income taxes.

The document alleges that Ozawa owes $1,839.70 in federal income taxes for 1964 and $12,821.69 for 1969.

Ozawa, 38, is a music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the San Francisco Symphony.

The lien, recorded in the Middle Berkshire Registry of Deeds here, lists addresses in Lenox, Mass., and San Francisco.

IRS Agent Bruce R. McLeod of Pittsfield said the papers were prepared in New York and filed here because Ozawa is currently living in Lenox and recently bought land in West Stockbridge.

TRANSCRIPT (E)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
AUG 11 1973 New England Newscip

Tax lien filed against conductor

PITTSFIELD, Mass. (AP) — The Internal Revenue Service filed a tax lien Thursday charging conductor Seiji Ozawa and his wife, Vera, with failure to pay $14,661 in personal income taxes.

The document alleges that Ozawa owes $1,839.70 in federal income taxes for 1964 and $12,821.69 for 1969.

Ozawa has been music advisor to the Boston Symphony Orchestra since February, 1972, and is scheduled to become music director of the BSO next month. He is also music director of the San Francisco Symphony.

The lien, recorded in the Middle Berkshire Registry of Deeds here, lists addresses in Lenox, and San Francisco.

IRS Agent Bruce R. McLeod of Pittsfield said the papers were prepared in New York and filed here because Ozawa is living in Lenox and recently bought land in West Stockbridge.

CALL (E)
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
D. 32,000
AUG 10 1973 New England Newscip

Ozawa Charged With Failure To Pay Taxes

PITTSFIELD, Mass. (AP) — The Internal Revenue Service filed a tax lien Thursday charging conductor Seiji Ozawa and his wife, Vera, with failure to pay $14,661 in personal income taxes.

The document alleges that Ozawa owes $1,839.70 in federal income taxes for 1964 and $12,821.69 for 1969.

Ozawa, 38, is a music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the San Francisco Symphony.

The lien, recorded in the Middle Berkshire Registry of Deeds here, lists addresses in Lenox, Mass., and San Francisco.

EXPRESS (E)
NEWPORT, VT.
D. 2,024
AUG 13 1973 New England Newscip

Tax Lien Filed Against Music Conductor

PITTSFIELD, Mass. (AP) — The Internal Revenue Service filed a tax lien Thursday charging conductor Seiji Ozawa and his wife, Vera, with failure to pay $14,661 in personal income taxes.

The document alleges that Ozawa owes $1,839.70 in federal income taxes for 1964 and $12,821.69 for 1969.

Ozawa, 38, is a music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the San Francisco Symphony.

The lien, recorded in the Middle Berkshire Registry of Deeds here, lists addresses in Lenox, Mass., and San Francisco.

IRS Agent Bruce R. McLeod of Pittsfield said the papers were prepared in New York and filed here because Ozawa is currently living in Lenox and recently bought land in West Stockbridge.

TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM (E)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
D. 30,000
AUG 10 1973 New England Newsclip

Tax Lien Filed Against Seiji Ozawa

PITTSFIELD, Mass. (AP) — The Internal Revenue Service filed a tax lien Thursday charging conductor Seiji Ozawa and his wife, Vera, with failure to pay $14,661 in personal income taxes.

The document alleges that Ozawa owes $1,839.70 in federal income taxes for 1964 and $12,821.69 for 1969.

Ozawa, 38, is a music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the San Francisco Symphony.

The lien, recorded in the Middle Berkshire Registry of Deeds here, lists addresses in Lenox, Mass., and San Francisco.

IRS Agent Bruce R. McLeod of Pittsfield said the papers were prepared in New York and filed here because Ozawa is currently living in Lenox and recently bought land in West Stockbridge.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
D. 30,400
AUG 10 1973 New England Newsclip

IRS hits Ozawa with tax lien

The Internal Revenue Service has filed a tax lien for $14,661 against Seiji Ozawa, director-designate of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his wife, Vera, according to papers in the Middle District Registry of Deeds.

The lien, filed by IRS agent Bruce McLeod, claims Ozawa owes $1,839 in federal income taxes for the year ending Dec. 31, 1964, and $12,821 for the year ending Dec. 31, 1969.

The lien lists the Ozawas' residences as San Francisco, Calif., and Lenox, and an IRS agent in the Pittsfield office said it is probable that a similar lien has been filed in the California city.

Tax liens are filed in deeds registries as a means of placing claims against any property that may be owned by the persons named in the liens.

Buys Berkshire land

The Ozawas last December purchased a 7.5-acre parcel of land in West Stockbridge but that sale is recorded in the Southern Berkshire Registry of Deeds in Great Barrington. The IRS spokesman this morning said a lien may be filed in that registry as well.

The Ozawas are in Europe and are not expected back until next week.

Ozawa is slated to become music director of the BSO in September. At present, he is music adviser and has appeared as conductor at BSO concerts at Tanglewood in this and previous years. He is also conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra under a contract that runs through 1976.

The seasons of the two orchestras do not coincide.

Ozawa's income from his orchestra contracts and guest appearances is not publicly known.

NEWS (E)
GARDNER, MASS.
AUG 10 1973 New England Newsclip

IRS Claims The Ozawas Owe $14,661

PITTSFIELD, Mass. (AP) — The Internal Revenue Service filed a tax lien Thursday charging conductor Seiji Ozawa and his wife, Vera, with failure to pay $14,661 in personal income taxes.

The document alleges that Ozawa owes $1,839.70 in federal income taxes for 1964 and $12,821.69 for 1969.

Ozawa, 38, is a music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the San Francisco Symphony.

The lien, recorded in the Middle Berkshire Registry of Deeds here, lists addresses in Lenox, Mass., and San Francisco.

IRS Agent Bruce R. McLeod of Pittsfield said the papers were prepared in New York and filed here because Ozawa is currently living in Lenox and recently bought land in West Stockbridge.

GLOBE (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
AUG 11 1973 New England Newsclip

IRS files tax lien against Ozawa

PITTSFIELD — A tax lien for $14,661.38 has been filed against Seiji Ozawa, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his wife, Vera, by the Internal Revenue Service.

The lien was filed Thursday in the Registry of Deeds in Pittsfield. It indicates that Ozawa owes $1839.70 in personal income taxes for 1964 and $12,821.68 for 1969. San Francisco and Lenox addresses are on the lien.

The Ozawas are vacationing in Europe. He is due back for a concert at Tanglewood on Tuesday.

HERALD-AMERICAN (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 124,654
AUG 11 1973 New England Newsclip

Ozawa Hit By Tax Lien

PITTSFIELD (AP)—The Internal Revenue Service filed a tax lien charging conductor Seiji Ozawa and his wife, Vera, with failure to pay $14,661 in personal income taxes.

The document alleges that Ozawa owes $1839.70 in federal income taxes for 1964 and $12,821.69 for 1969.

Ozawa, 38, is a music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the San Francisco Symphony.

The lien, recorded in the Middle Berkshire Registry of Deeds here, lists addresses in Lenox, Mass., and San Francisco.

IRS Agent Bruce R. McLeod of Pittsfield said the papers were prepared in New York and filed here because Ozawa is currently living in Lenox and recently bought land in West Stockbridge.

Tax Lien Filed Against Ozawa

By CHRISTOPHER BROOKS
Union Staff

The Internal Revenue Service filed a tax lien Thursday against Boston Symphony Orchestra Music Director Seiji Ozawa and his wife, Vera, charging that the couple had failed to pay $14,661 in personal income taxes.

The lien, recorded in the Middle Berkshire Registry of Deeds, alleges that the noted conductor owes $1839.70 in federal income taxes for the year ending Dec. 31, 1964 and an additional $12,821.69 for 1969.

IRS agent Bruce McLeod of Pittsfield, who filed the document, said the papers were prepared in the agency's New York City office and forwarded here because Ozawa is living in Lenox and recently bought land in West Stockbridge.

SEIJI OZAWA

Both Lenox and San Francisco addresses were listed for the Ozawas in the lien.

Ozawa was appointed BSO music director in February, 1972, succeeding William Steinberg. Previously, he had made several appearances as a guest conductor and served as codirector of the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood's teaching arm.

The 38-year-old Ozawa also serves as music director of the San Francisco Symphony during the winter.

While Ozawa's income from the two orchestras and guest appearances throughout the world is, like that of other big-name conductors, a tightly guarded secret, it is estimated to be between $200,000 and $300,000 a year.

The Ozawas are vacationing in Europe and are expected back next week. Seiji Ozawa is scheduled to conduct the BSO during the next to last Tanglewood weekend, Aug. 17-19.

UNION (M)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
D. 84,000
Springfield Aug 10.
10 1973 New England Newsclip

LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
KASHU MAINICHI
CALIFORNIA NEWS
D. 5,500
AUG 13 1973

Ozawa owes Uncle Sam?

SAN FRANCISCO — Seiji Ozawa, internationally acclaimed conductor of the San Francisco and Boston Symphony Orchestras apparently has struck a sour note with the Internal Revenue Service, the San Francisco Chronicle reported last week.

The 37-year-old maestro is accused by the IRS of having failed to pay $14,661 in personal income taxes.

The tax lien was filed against Ozawa in the Middle Berkshire Registry of Deeds in Pittsfield, Mass., because, agents said, the conductor recently acquired property in West Stockbridge, near the Boston Symphony's summer home and the Tanglewood Music Festival, which he directs.

Ozawa also has a home in San Francisco.

The document recorded alleges that Ozawa owes $1,839.70 in federal income taxes for 1964 and $12,821.69 for 1969.

Ozawa has been in Austria conducting at the Salzburg Festival, and is not expected to arrive at Tanglewood until early this week.

The maestro's business and professional affairs are handled by Columbia Artists Management in New York. His personal manager, Ronald Wilford, president of the firm, is on vacation until September 4 and could not be reached for comment.

However, Marvin Shofer, Wilford's assistant, said Ozawa's business saffairs, including his tax returns, are "absolutely in order."

"There is no basis for this," Shofer said. "We are mystified."

FOSTER'S DEMOCRAT (E)
DOVER, N. H.
D. 15,455
AUG 10 1973 New England Newsclip

Tax Lien Filed On Conductor

PITTSFIELD, Mass. (AP) — The Internal Revenue Service filed a tax lien Thursday charging conductor Seiji Ozawa and his wife, Vera, with failure to pay $14,661 in personal income taxes.

The document alleges that Ozawa owes $1,839.70 in federal income taxes for 1964 and $12,821.69 for 1969.

Ozawa, 38, is a music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the San Francisco Symphony.

The lien, recorded in the Middle Berkshire Registry of Deeds here, lists addresses in Lenox, Mass., and San Francisco.

IRS Agent Bruce R. McLeod of Pittsfield said the papers were prepared in New York and filed here because Ozawa is currently living in Lenox and recently bought land in West Stockbridge.

TRANSCRIPT (E)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
AUG 11 1973 New England Newsclip

Tax lien filed against conductor

PITTSFIELD, Mass. (AP) — The Internal Revenue Service filed a tax lien Thursday charging conductor Seiji Ozawa and his wife, Vera, with failure to pay $14,661 in personal income taxes.

The document alleges that Ozawa owes $1,839.70 in federal income taxes for 1964 and $12,821.69 for 1969.

Ozawa has been music advisor to the Boston Symphony Orchestra since February, 1972, and is scheduled to become music director of the BSO next month. He is also music director of the San Francisco Symphony.

The lien, recorded in the Middle Berkshire Registry of Deeds here, lists addresses in Lenox, and San Francisco.

IRS Agent Bruce R. McLeod of Pittsfield said the papers were prepared in New York and filed here because Ozawa is living in Lenox and recently bought land in West Stockbridge.

CALL (E)
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
D. 32,270
AUG 10 1973 New England Newsclip

Ozawa Charged With Failure To Pay Taxes

PITTSFIELD, Mass. (AP) — The Internal Revenue Service filed a tax lien Thursday charging conductor Seiji Ozawa and his wife, Vera, with failure to pay $14,661 in personal income taxes.

The document alleges that Ozawa owes $1,839.70 in federal income taxes for 1964 and $12,821.69 for 1969.

Ozawa, 38, is a music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the San Francisco Symphony.

The lien, recorded in the Middle Berkshire Registry of Deeds here, lists addresses in Lenox, Mass., and San Francisco.

EXPRESS (E)
NEWPORT, VT.
AUG 13 1973 New England Newsclip

Tax Lien Filed Against Music Conductor

PITTSFIELD, Mass. (AP) — The Internal Revenue Service filed a tax lien Thursday charging conductor Seiji Ozawa and his wife, Vera, with failure to pay $14,661 in personal income taxes.

The document alleges that Ozawa owes $1,839.70 in federal income taxes for 1964 and $12,821.69 for 1969.

Ozawa, 38, is a music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the San Francisco Symphony.

The lien, recorded in the Middle Berkshire Registry of Deeds here, lists addresses in Lenox, Mass., and San Francisco.

IRS Agent Bruce R. McLeod of Pittsfield said the papers were prepared in New York and filed here because Ozawa is currently living in Lenox and recently bought land in West Stockbridge.

Music center has a strong staff

By MARJORIE BARRETT
News Staff

One of Colorado's many summer musical opportunities for young people is Rocky Ridge Music Center located just south of the resort town of Estes Park.

Founded by Beth Miller Harrod in the early 1940s after she came out to spend a summer teaching a couple of youngsters music, it is still being run by the gifted pianist.

She has gathered about her a strong staff with an educational emphasis on chamber music.

"Music in the Mountains," as the summer concert series is called, is planned in cooperation with the Music in the Mountains Association Committee made up of business and private individuals in the area, the Colorado Council of the Arts and the Humanities and by the Music Center.

Concerts are given either at the center or at the Stanley Hotel.

The concert season begins June 24 with an afternoon of music by Beethoven, Hindemith and Mendelssohn. Members of the faculty quartet, Mrs. Harrod and Inta Jozeps, pianist, will perform.

For further information and tickets contact Rocky Ridge Music Center, Estes Park 80517 or call 586-4031.

HERE AND THERE: A most interesting seminar open to performers, educators, students and musically oriented laymen will be offered at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., in two four-week sessions: July 1 through 28 and July 39 through Aug. 26.

One can participate in either or both sessions.

Called the "Listening and Analysis Seminar" the program will feature daily classes intended to broaden and deepen the musical horizons of participants through musical analysis, theory and history.

The basis for the discussions will be the repertoire of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts at Tanglewood and members of the seminar will be expected to attend many rehearsals and concerts by the orchestra—all of which will be free.

Two distinguished music educators will handle the seminar—one of whom was a major spark plug in the stimulating musical programs offered in addition to the operas at Central City last summer.

Leonard Altman, professor of music at Queens College and president of the Concert Artist Guild of New York, will be remembered for his myriad contributions last season at Central City where he was in charge of the young artists concerts and a wide range of other activities.

He will be joined in the seminar by Peter Gram Swing, chairman of the department of music at Swarthmore College in Pennsylvania. Guest teachers will include many artists appearing with the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood.

Additional information and application materials are available from the Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston 02115.

SPEAKING OF Tanglewood brings up the New England Conservatory of Music which, along with the Composers String Quartet, has announced its second annual String Quartet Competition.

All living composers are invited to submit their work to the competition. Works must be unpublished and unrecorded string quartets, (Electro-acoustical devices are permitted.)

Deadline for the submission of works will be Sept. 15, 1973. For further information write Composers String Quartet Competition in care of the New England Conservatory of Music, 290 Huntington Avenue, Boston, Mass. 02115.

Rocky Mountain News
DENVER, COLO.
D. 192,279 SUN. 209,887
JUN 18 1973

The Cleveland Press
D. 375,653
JUL 18 1973

Frank Hruby

Chicago gives its support to summer music series

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169
AUG 5 1973

I had a chance to check out one of the Cleveland Orchestra's opposite numbers over the weekend, namely the Chicago Symphony, hard at work at its Ravinia summer home, north of Chicago.

There were several reasons for my being there beyond merely hearing another orchestra at its sylvan outdoor summertime pursuits. James Levine, former assistant conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra under George Szell and later head of the orchestral department at the Institute of Music, is now in his first season as music director at Ravinia.

Saturday night's concert, which happened to be Levine's last for the current season, consisted of a concert version of Bellini's "Norma" which starred former Cleveland soprano Beverly Sills.

Cleveland music lovers will recall that for several years during Levine's stay here he conducted, in Severance Hall, a series of five concert operas under the aegis of the Cleveland Concert Associates, unfortunately now disbanded.

Interest in the concert opera format has increased noticeably in the past few years and seems to be growing in acceptance among symphony organizations across the country, they being the logical ones to use the idea.

(Lorin Maazel has scheduled two non-subscription performances of Strauss' "Elektra" in concert form with the Cleveland Orchestra next Jan. 31 and Feb. 2, and said in a recent interview that he plans to do at least one concert version of an opera each season.)

It was as an advocate of the concert opera idea that I was invited to lecture to the Music Critics' Association Summer Institute at Ravinia, the talk on Saturday coinciding with the Levine-Sills "Norma."

I gathered from my colleagues that in the first performance last Thursday night things went only moderately well, in which case it served as a dress rehearsal as for the Saturday performance, which was absolutely splendid, as musically exciting as any staged version could be.

Sills was in her best form as Norma, and with Tatiana Troyanos (who sang a concert version of Bartok's "Bluebeard's Castle" here a year ago) as Adalgisa, the famous duet was a showstopper which demanded and got an encore.

* * *

Let us turn now from concert opera to Ravinia itself.

As has been said by others before, Ravinia as a visual and acoustical experience cannot compare with Blossom Music Center.

The pavilion looks as though it were designed by a construction engineer with no feel for architecture. Its lack of handsomeness could be excused if the acoustics made up for it, but such is not the case. There are plastic clouds and baffles, but those improvements do not bring it up to perfection by any means.

The lawn area is very popular and picnickers were lined up at 5:30 to dash to their favorite spots. However, as at Tanglewood in Massachusetts, those on the lawn cannot see the stage and must rely on sound from speakers alone.

The railroad train that goes past the frontgate (about 100 yards from the pavilion) makes great noise and naturally is cued in to the pianissimo passages. The train, however, was what made Ravinia in the first place — a country resort and amusement area established in the 1890's.

Ravinia is in its 38th year in its association with the orchestra, and so is more of a cultural habit than Blossom is here. It is somewhat smaller and thus easier to fill. But tickets are higher — and still sell well. "Norma" was sold out for both performances.

Levine and general manager Ed Gordon have eliminated rock performances this season but not pop concerts or jazz. The Chicago Symphony performs three nights a week. The Joffrey Ballet will perform for a week. Chamber music fits in between to fill each week with music.

Our Blossom Center has the potential to do as much and more. All it needs to catch up is community enthusiasm. Chicago has it.

Chautauqua Instition: 'Unique'

POST (SUNDAY)
WASHINGTON, DC.
JUN 3 1973
New England Newsclip

Of all organizations in the United States with similar aims, Chautauqua Institution, which celebrates its 100th birthday next year, deserves the adjective "unique."

Situated on beautiful Lake Chautauqua, about 70 miles southwest of Buffalo and 20 miles north of Jamestown, Chautauqua is, literally, a "walled city," separated physically from the rest of the world but very much a part of the world of art and ideas.

I came here for the first time almost 50 years ago to conduct one of my compositions with the Chautauqua Symphony, which at that time was composed primarily of members of the old New York Symphony Orchestra. My wife Peggie is an even "older" resident having come here each year with her parents since her childhood.

We are frequently asked how Chautauqua compares with cultural institutions such as Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony, and Saratoga Springs, summer home of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

There is really no comparison. Tanglewood and Saratoga Springs are dedicated to music in its many forms, but primarily to symphonic music. Chautauqua embraces with equal emphasis the broad areas of religion, philosophy, education, world affairs, the creative and performing arts and recreation.

Here one can observe, or participate in, everything from sailboat racing to performances of Wagner's "Die Walkuere." Here the young student may study musical creation or performance, ballet, the graphic arts, opera, symphony, psychology, education — a list too long to be described here.

Here the listener may hear symphony concerts, solo recitals, chamber music, operas, ballets, plays and lectures on almost every phase of human experience from politics to religion. On Sundays one can take part in congregational singing (more impressive than anything I have heard outside of the Mormon Tabernacle in Salt Lake City) and hear superlative sermons from divines of geratly varied backgrounds and philosophies.

Rochester musicians have for many years had an important part in Chauttauqua's musical development. The Chautauqau Symphony, an excellent ensemble assembled from many orchestras, has as its concert-master the distinguished violinist, Millard Taylor, for many years concert-master of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, and now head of the string department of the Eastman School of Music. He also serves as the first violinist of the Chautauqua String Quartet.

The Rochester Philharmonic also supplies the trombone and percussion sections, the English Horn, and the solo flute in the person of the Rochester Philharmonic's very talented Bonita Boyd.

Rochester Times-Union
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
D. 145,808
AUG 29 1973

Woes at Wolf Trap: Some Sound Advice

By Paul Hume

The Chicago Symphony Orchestra numbers among its formidable assets one of the most individual, superbly produced ensemble sounds in the world of symphony orchestras. So do the Philadelphia Orchestra and the Cleveland. The characteristic textures and weights of these orchestras make it easy to distinguish the sounds of the Philadelphia's cellos and basses from those of the Chicago.

But a problem regularly arises when these and other ensembles turn up at Wolf Trap where their seasonal appearances are a great part of the programming. The problem is that symphony orchestras do not sound right from that stage.

At least that's the case from many places inside the shed. And for other reasons, though the sound is carried on an excellent amplification system, it's often true from outside, too.

The Chicago Symphony's visit last month made it easy to check the situation, present ever since the opening concert two seasons ago. On both nights, listening to two different programs, my colleague, Alan M. Kriegsman, and I, without consulting about the matter, were again disturbed by deficiencies in the sound. This is not true of opera or ballet when the orchestra is in the pit. It applies only to symphony concerts.

At such times there is a serious imbalance in which the principle defect is the lack of bass tone. (This is precisely the trouble that has afflicted Philharmonic Hall at Lincoln Center since it opened. More than $15 million has been spent over 10 years trying to rectify it.)

Fortunately, the origin of the problem is different at Wolf Trap and can be rectified for perhaps one-sixtieth of what has been spent in New York City. Wolf Trap needs a proper shell onstage for orchestra concerts. The one now in use was not the one intended by Paul Veneklasen, the acoustical expert in charge of the original planning. And there should be a canopy extending out into the house for some distance, as there is, for example, at the Saratoga Center.

A look at some other summer music centers helps put Wolf Trap's problem into perspective. If you go to Tanglewood where the Boston Symphony plays, you see one of the oldest and best sheds in the business. It, too, needed improvements after it was

See MUSIC, F10, Col. 3

Which Orchestra Is Better, Boston or Philadelphia?

By RICHARD VINCENT
Music Critic

One of the continuing questions that I am asked year in and year out is which orchestra I feel is the better, the Boston or the Philadelphia.

There is really no answer to a question like this, being essentially one that calls for a subjective answer, but in fact there are differences between the two that are evident to the concert goer who can remain objective. And the reasons for the differences are part of the nature of all the great orchestras, in fact pertinent to what makes the great in the first place.

It must be noted on the go that they are both without question among the very great orchestras in the world, made up of some of the finest orchestral musicians available. Perhaps one should beg the question because both of these great ensembles are available to us so, in fact one does not have to make an either-or choice.

TO BEGIN, what is an symphony orchestra, what is its nature?

It is primarily an ensemble, made up of instrumentalists that, at one time or another, play virtually all of the traditional instruments, and these players are as varied in temperament and ego as any group of professionals in any field. There are differences in motivation, life styles, politics, morals, and talent. So, if one assumes that the abilities are more or less equal, obviously the trick is to take this disparate troupe of talented people and mold them into what is in effect, one intrument, homogenous and suave, to make it a triumph of group-think and group-do.

It really is meaningless to compare the first chair players, (is concertmaster Silverstein better than concertmaster Carroll) and we shall proceed upon the legitimate assumption that the players are essentially equal in talent.

QUITE APPARENTLY the next step and the vital ingredient then, is the conductor.

There have been theories and are, that the players are so good that they don't need a conductor but this concept simply will not wash.

BY ALL the same postulations, the BSO has had during the same length of time as conductors, Koussevitsky, Munch, Monteux, Leinsdorf, Steinberg, and, now Ozawa. When the BSO had Koussevitsky for all those years they were generally considered the premier ensemble in the business, and under some of the others little if anything was lost. But the continual state of flux on the podium over the past few years has not helped the BSO, they are still looking for an identity, and that identity is inevitably provided by one strong man with tenure creating an ensemble entirely through his exceptional musical concepts and ideas.

There are some today who are chiding Ormandy for being conservative and out of touch, but that is not under discussion here. What is, is whether or not a musical organization performs as a complete and homogenous ensemble, whether or not it plays a Rossini overture as seriously and well as Beethoven's Ninth or Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring." And, over the years, for consistency and quality in the traditional repertory, the Philadelphia under Ormandy indisputably has an outstanding track record.

ALL GREAT conductors of the past, Furtwangler, Mengelberg, Walter, Klemperer, Szell and Toscanini, all had one thing in common. Whether or not the players liked the man personally (and often they didn't) they always played their best for him. No individualities were permitted, it was a dictatorship, complete and functional and it worked. And all of these men had one orchestra for an extended period of time, they put their unique stamp on the orchestras and, above all, there was only one way and that was the Maestro's way.

To be a musical director is a difficult proposition, it is a complex and time consuming job, particuarly these days.

With the 52-week season and all the sheerly social and fund-raising demands on the director's time, it takes someone with great dedication and stamina and many men find the job too physically and psychicly debilitating.

ORMANDY is the last of the severe and autocratic father figures directing a major orchestra, and given the nature of the modern musical organizations there may not be others.

Perhaps the Big Daddy concept is an unworkable concept today, but, in terms of the great ensembles, it is certainly making a difference.

Philadelphia Orchestra Opens Wednesday

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169

JUL 29 1973

Had the Philadelphia Orchestra programming for the Saratoga Performing Arts Center been arranged in the usual fashion, one might observe that the stars would be music director and conductor Eugene Ormandy and soloists who include Van Cliburn, Rudolf Serkin and Isaac Sterns.

One could never dispute the box office punch of these performers. Their draw is particularly obvious when considering that last weekend's concerts at Tanglewood were dominated by Ormandy conducting the Bosto Symphony Orchestra and total attendance hit a record 44,000.

But the Tanglewood concerts and the August schedule at SPAC show that the men who arrange such programs are placing their reliance on some names at least as well if not more established—Beethoven, Wagner, Brahms, Tchaikovsky and an American newcomer, George Gershwin.

TRUE, ORMANDY will conduct six of the orchestra's scheduled 16 evening concerts. Van Cliburn will play Tchaikovsky. And the very special program in which Benny Goodman's Original Quartet, including Teddy Wilson, Lionel Hampton and Gene Krupa, will perform with the orchestra has been sold out long ago.

But still, the opening week at SPAC has the orchestra playing All—Brahms, Wagner, and Gershwin programs on three of four nights. Then consider that All—Rachmaninoff Tchaikowsky, and Beethoven programs follow.

The music makes the difference and top billing this season seems to have been accorded to the composers who made it all possible.

AN INTERESTING sidelight to this, the eighth season of The Philadelphia Orchestra at SPAC is that maestro Ormandy will be preparing his musicians for their upcoming trip to Red China.

Last year, the New York City Ballet went from Saratoga to Russia. This year, the orchestra will go to Communist China. It appears Saratoga is getting to be the Cape Kennedy of the internation relations set.

Yet uncertain is whether the orchestra will allow public rehearsals on works planned for the Chinese tour. Some new works by Chinese composers are expected to be part of the orchestra's repertory.

THE LAST hope for including a new oriental work in the Saratoga schedule appeared to fade when it was announced that Seiji Ozawa will conduct a selection of "Romeo and Julie" on the Aug. 16 program Prokofieff and Berlioz works are included in the program that also features Beethoven's Symphony No. 7.

As in the past, the closing performance of the orchestra will be Ormandy "Those Fabulous Philadelphians" in familiar melodies from the classic works of Smetna, Dvorak, Sibelius, De Falla, Rimsky-Korsakov and Weinberger.

Dallas Times Herald
D. 232,064 SUN. 275,535

AUG 12 1973

EUGENE ORMANDY

OLIN CHISM

Informal summer festivals

One of the nice things about the American music festivals—which are growing by leaps and bounds—is the almost complete informality of most of them. Generally the music is taken seriously, but not solemnly, and there are plenty of people attracted by this atmosphere who do not grace the music halls for formal concerts.

Vacation time this year found me in New England, able to take in a couple of the most noted festivals. Both of them—Tanglewood and Marlboro—are heavily attended, in the case of Marlboro selling out well in advance since it does not have the capacity that Tanglewood does. The latter, a more than 200-acre estate in the Berkshire hills, never really sells out since it can contain monstrous crowds in its ample area.

TANGLEWOOD, WHICH HAS been a tradition nearly forever, it seems, almost carries informality to extremes (or rather, I should say that the audiences do). Champagne corks fly, some couples make mad passionate love, babies cry. Yet everything is remarkably orderly considering that easily 10,000 people may be hearing the program. And there are no big airports nearby, so jet patterns are no problem.

I heard an all-Beethoven concert, with Eugene Ormandy conducting the Boston Symphony in a very tried-and-true program consisting of the "Leonore" No. 3, the "Emperor" with Philippe Entremont as soloist and the eternal "Fifth." Tanglewood has a very nice feature, a pre-concert "warmup" recital, in this case with none other than Andre Watts discussing and playing rarely performed piano music by Beethoven.

Very nice, and the monster traffic jam afterward was the only fly in the ointment.

MARLBORO IS A MUCH less gargantuan affair. Located in lower Vermont (which must be the most beautiful state in the Union), the festival takes place at a tiny college in a rustic setting. Due to limited seating the festival sells out before it opens, but generally there are a few ticket returns and the perservering music-lover can get a seat some way or another.

The scheduling is so informal that no one knows who is going to play or what until two or three days before the event. So my family and I were happily surprised to find we were there for back-to-back programs by Pablo Casals (conducting) and Rudolf Serkin (playing).

Casals, somewhat feeble when he walks but magnificently alert when he conducts, directed Beethoven's fourth symphony. Serkin—one of the best pianists in the world, of course—played the piano part in Dvorak's great A major piano quintet. Who could have asked for more?

* * *

ANOTHER FINE FESTIVAL is nearing an end this week. Out Santa Fe way the opera company has an unusual five-day lineup, presenting most of its summer's wares in one hunk. On tap are "Boheme" Tuesday, "Flying Dutchman" Wednesday, "Merry Widow" Thursday, Benjamin Britten's new opera "Owen Wingrave" Friday and a double bill of Stravinsky's "Nightingale" and Ravel's "L'Enfant et les Sortileges" Saturday.

Summer ain't what it used to be.

SUNDAY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
SUN. 2,978,270

AUG 19 1973

The Summer Festival Fad and How It Grew

By RON EYER

SUMMER MUSIC is a multi-million-dollar business in the United States today. More than 100 festivals take place from June through September in all 50 states; attendance figures run to uncounted millions and box-office receipts are "fantastic," according to Richard Leach, veteran man-about-music and recently retired director of the Saratoga Festival at Saratoga Springs, N.Y.

The festivals range widely through so-called "serious" music, ballet and theater to pop and rock music and give work to thousands of musicians, dancers, actors and technicians who used to be on involuntary "leisure" at this time of year.

A granddaddy of the festival circuit is the Berkshire Music Festival dating back to 1934, at Tanglewood, Mass., which is the summer home of the Boston Symphony and a major supplier of summer fare for the Northeastern section of the country, along with the Saratoga Festival that took root 30 years later.

Like Salzburg, Bayreuth and other European centers long before them, American towns have discovered the hard cash value of a performing arts operation in their midst. Unless you have the Grand Canyon or Niagara Falls in your backyard, an arts festival is just about unbeatable as a tourist attraction. About 300,000 people probably will visit the more than 100 events scheduled at Saratoga this summer. People bring money, and they spend it lavishly for lodging, food and all kinds of local services while they are in town. Whatever the cost of the festival, the town is likely to get it back many times over, in one way or another.

Saratoga Springs, of course, was a famous spa and racing citadel for generations before anybody ever thought of a festival. But spas with their mineral baths and whatnot are not as big with the public as they used to be. And even the race track, with its Vanderbilts, Whitneys and other horsey greats, is not quite the glamorous attraction it once was.

In fact, the town, which no longer is served by a railroad, was on the down-grade for some years. The fabulous old hotels that used to line Main Street were torn down (including the famed Grand Union, once touted as the world's biggest hotel—a new motel on the outskirts now bears its name), and things generally were beginning to look seedy.

But then came the beautiful and luxurious amphitheater embedded in a wooded hillside with a rippling stream, wide esplanades and vast, carefully tended lawns. Came also the New York City Ballet and then the Philadelphia Orchestra in search of permanent summer homes.

They, in turn, developed such satellites as the City Center Acting Company, the School of Orchestral Studies and the Saratoga-Potsdam Choral Institute that attract their own sets of followers, and the place has become a beehive of activity morning, noon and night all summer long.

Some festivals are devoted entirely to opera, others to jazz and still others to various manifestations of folk, country and other popular music. None of the lighter types of music have taken a firm hold at either Tanglewood or Saratoga as yet, but there are signs that a flirtation is going on.

Tanglewood, for example, had a concert last Tuesday at its day-long Tanglewood-on-Parade event that was devoted to music by Scott Joplin, Jelly Roll Morton and Duke Ellington played by members of the Berkshire Music Center under the direction of Gunther Schuller.

And, at Saratoga, a new wrinkle this year will be the first American Song Festival, Aug. 30 to Sept. 2, at which American pop composers, professional and amateur, from all over the country, will compete for substantial prizes and will get to hear their entries performed by top musicians in the pop field. The big jamboree (the first song festival of its type to be held in the United States) is expected to attract a crowd of 100,000.

In physical layout and surroundings, both Tanglewood and Saratoga are considerably more attractive than their counterparts in Europe, with the exception of the Baths of Caracalla in Rome, the Arena in Verona and maybe one or two others.

The result is that in this country, the summer people have found a golden lure that is attracting more big game with every passing season.

Melissa Hayden, with an unlikely audience in the background at Saratoga.

Music

BY IRWIN SHAINMAN

SARATOGA SPRINGS, N.Y.

The Saratoga Performing Arts Center has to be considered one of the most attractive and well-planned summer cultural complexes to be found anywhere. It offers a variety of activities and performances that range all the way from well-trained horses going around a ring accompanied by Johann Strauss waltzes to the matchless beauty of the classic ballet dancer. Somewhere in between one might find "Blood Sweat and Tears" and a W.C. Fields film festival.

On Wednesday, Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra, sometimes known as "Those Fabulous Philadelphians," begin their month as one of the three major continuing attractions at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center, hereafter often affectionately cited as "SPAC." Following the New York City Ballet, the Orchestra joins the newly named City Center Acting Company — which is doing a season of three weeks each during July and August in a smaller auditorium — numerous educational offerings such as schools for orchestral studies, choral singing, modern dance, and 35 so-called "Specials" put on by top TV and recording personalities, fill the calendar.

This is the eighth season of operation plus many more years since a group in the Saratoga and Tri-City area, against many odds, started the process that resulted in creating this magnificent center and making it work. It wasn't a case of the Philadelphia Orchestra and the New York City Ballet looking for a summer home, but the organization of a beautiful environment that attracted constituents. In fact, one of the original rumors that contributed to starting the whole thing suggested that the New York Philharmonic was looking for a rural location and thinking of setting up a summer home in Stowe, Vermont. Once local support was lined up and substantive discussions held, it became apparant that the Philharmonic had no intentions of going to the country and wanted to stay in New York City, which they have done.

With the acquisition of so important an orchestra as the Philadelphia, plus George Ballanchine and the New York City Ballet, the two main pillars on which the entire enterprise was subsequently built, were in place.

After the first year's excitement and support, attendance took a dip, but has clearly been on the upswing ever since, reaching 65 per cent of capacity last year, (it would take close to 85 per cent to break even) and for this season, subscriptions and advance sale for the orchestra concerts are already 20 per cent of 1972. All in all, about 300,000 people are expected to attend over 100 separate events in an amazingly crowded calendar, which incidentally has five separate and diverse events scheduled for tomorrow.

When one talks about Saratoga — particuarly in New England areas — inevitable comparisons are made with Tanglewood. With the exception of the facts that they both attract major orchestras for the summer, have good acoustics and offer many educational opportunities to young people, there are more differences than similarities. Physically, because of its location and youthful modern design Saratoga has solved most of the obvious problems such as slope of the ground, comfort of the seats and audience proximity to the performers. They have created a double-decked shed, thereby shortening the distance from the back rows to the stage, that has over 5,000 seats and the angle of the ground outside allows up to 15,000 more people on the lawns with a better passable view of the performers.

Tanglewood offers major concerts only on weekends while SPAC has seven ballet performances each week in July and the Philadelphia Orchestra offers four weekly concerts in August. The more-or-less isolation of the Saratoga shed from the neighboring communities and the fact that the area is already well-attuned to an influx of racing fans during August turns out to be both an advantage and a handicap. While there are few problems with local residents complaining about hordes of young people swarming over lawns to a rock concert, Saratoga still lacks the sense of community that has been built up around Tanglewood.

This cannot be achieved quickly. Tanglewood has been around a very long time, is as much a part of the Boston Orchestra as Symphony Hall, and has always had a very clear sense of where it was going artistically. SPAC is still young, is carefully listening to the public, gauging the results of various combinations of ideas, and trying to put together a concept that will eventually result in what the management likes to call "a Saratoga Experience." Considering that the area has been attracting summer residents since 1863, (remember the Edna Ferber novel and subsequent film "Saratoga Trunk" with Gary Cooper and Ingrid Bergman) when the first flat racing track was constructed and the natural mineral springs became the basis of a health craze, a performing arts center, with deficits down to manageable levels, surely ought to succeed. Besides having the full and active support of the Governor, the Rockefeller family and the State Arts Council, can be very handy assets for any cultural institution.

What of the 18 concerts and 8 conductors that we now look forward to? By most standards the fare is varied, popular and certainly on the conservative side, but I don't suppose anyone knows this better than Eugene Ormandy, who was making up programs when I was still on roller skates. He has always been a musician concerned with public taste, and as the dean of America's major conductors also well aware of the economic realities of full houses.

Besides heavy doses of standard Mozart, Weber, Beethoven, Brahms and Tschaikowsky, a brush with Richard Strauss, Shostakovitch and Sibelius, we have a few novelties and some programs of unusal interest. An all-Wagner evening and a concert performance of Manuel De Falla's "La Vida Breve," both conducted by Fruhbeck de Brugos, Seiji Ozawa concentrating on "Romeo and Juliet" as seen by four different composers, and a Verdi-Bruckner concert conducted by Aldo Ceccato. Except for the "popular classics" — and I would put the All-Gershwin Night in that catagory — the 20th century is avoided and there is not a single work even close to what might be called a serious contemporary idiom. With the exception of a 35-year-old ballet suite by Walter Piston, a current score by a living composer is nowhere to be found.

As I have said earlier this summer, the answers to this kind of problem are not simple and do not come easily. Statistics and studies seem to show that summer audiences respond to the familiar, and although not presently in debt, Saratoga has regularly been faced with annual deficits that "pop" concerts have helped to reduce. The Philadelphians, and other major orchestras, must face up to doing more to expand the repertoire and the listening habits of audiences or face the possibility that their own recordings will eventually put them out of business.

The whole SPAC cultural operation is under the guidance of Craig Hankenson, a 39-year-old Eastman School voice graduate, with past experience in the management of the San Francisco Opera and the Brevard, N.C., Music Center, who has been around Saratoga long enough to know the problems. He seems to be a person willing to confront them with frankness, work and imagination. These combinations augur well for the rest of the 1973 season and the future.

* * *

One of the most talked-about groups in chamber music, The Tokyo String Quartet, will appear today at South Mountain in Pittsfield. They will play the Quartet No. 1 "From My Life", by Bedrich Smetana, which they will record in Europe later this summer.

Incidentally, this is the composition that Willem Willeke played at South Mountain in 1935, and the Tokyo performers have borrowed Mr. Willeke's 1643 Amati cello for the performance. It is now in the possession of the Juilliard Quartet.

Philadelphia Orchestra Opens Wednesday

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169

JUL 29 1973

Had the Philadelphia Orchestra programming for its stay at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center been arranged in the usual fashion, one might observe that the stars would be music director and conductor Eugene Ormandy and soloists who include Van Cliburn, Rudolf Serkin and Isaac Sterns.

One could never dispute the box office punch of these performers. Their draw is particularly obvious when considering that last weekend's concerts at Tanglewood were dominated by Ormandy conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra and their attendance hit a record 44,000.

But the Tanglewood concerts and the August schedule at SPAC show that the men who arrange such programs are placing their reliance on some names at least as well if not more established—Beethoven, Wagner, Brahms, Tchaikovsky and an American newcomer, George Gershwin.

TRUE, ORMANDY will conduct six of the orchestra's scheduled 16 evening concerts. Van Cliburn will play Tchaikovsky. And the very special program in which Benny Goodman's Original Quartet, including Teddy Wilson, Lionel Hampton and Gene Krupa, will perform with the orchestra has been sold out long ago.

But still, the opening week at SPAC has the orchestra playing All—Brahms, Wagner, and Gershwin programs on three of four nights. Then consider that All—Rachmaninoff Tchaikowsky, and Beethoven programs follow.

The music makes the difference and top billing this season seems to have been accorded to the composers who made it all possible.

AN INTERESTING sidelight to this, the eighth season of The Philadelphia Orchestra at SPAC is that maestro Ormandy will be preparing his musicians for their upcoming trip to Red China.

Last year, the New York City Ballet went from Saratoga to Russia. This year, the orchestra will go to Communist China. It appears Saratoga is getting to be the Cape Kennedy of the internation relations set.

Yet uncertain is whether the orchestra will allow public rehearsals on works planned for the Chinese tour. Some new works by Chinese composers are expected to be part of the orchestra's repertory.

THE LAST hope for including a new oriental work in the Saratoga schedule appeared to fade when it was announced that Seiji Ozawa will conduct a selection of "Romeo and Julie" on the Aug. 16 program Prokofieff and Berlioz works are included in the program that also features Beethoven's Symphony No. 7.

As in the past, the closing performance of the orchestra will be Ormandy "Those Fabulous Philadelphians" in familiar melodies from the classic works of Smetna, Dvorak, Sibelius, De Falla, Rimsky-Korsakov and Weinberger.

Dallas Times Herald
D. 232,064 SUN. 275,535

AUG 12 1973

EUGENE ORMANDY

OLIN CHISM

Informal summer festivals

One of the nice things about the American music festivals—which are growing by leaps and bounds—is the almost complete informality of most of them. Generally the music is taken seriously, but not solemnly, and there are plenty of people attracted by this atmosphere who do not grace the music halls for formal concerts.

Vacation time this year found me in New England, able to take in a couple of the most noted festivals. Both of them—Tanglewood and Marlboro—are heavily attended, in the case of Marlboro selling out well in advance since it does not have the capacity that Tanglewood does. The latter, a more than 200-acre estate in the Berkshire hills, never really sells out since it can contain monstrous crowds in its ample area.

TANGLEWOOD, WHICH HAS been a tradition nearly forever, it seems, almost carries informality to extremes (or rather, I should say that the audiences do). Champagne corks fly, some couples make mad passionate love, babies cry. Yet everything is remarkably orderly considering that easily 10,000 people may be hearing the program. And there are no big airports nearby, so jet patterns are no problem.

I heard an all-Beethoven concert, with Eugene Ormandy conducting the Boston Symphony in a very tried-and-true program consisting of the "Leonore" No. 3, the "Emperor" with Philippe Entremont as soloist and the eternal "Fifth." Tanglewood has a very nice feature, a pre-concert "warmup" recital, in this case with none other than Andre Watts discussing and playing rarely performed piano music by Beethoven.

Very nice, and the monster traffic jam afterward was the only fly in the ointment.

MARLBORO IS A MUCH less gargantuan affair. Located in lower Vermont (which must be the most beautiful state in the Union), the festival takes place at a tiny college in a rustic setting. Due to limited seating the festival sells out before it opens, but generally there are a few ticket returns and the persevering music-lover can get a seat some way or another.

The scheduling is so informal that no one knows who is going to play or what until two or three days before the event. So my family and I were happily surprised to find we were there for back-to-back programs by Pablo Casals (conducting) and Rudolf Serkin (playing).

Casals, somewhat feeble when he walks but magnificently alert when he conducts, directed Beethoven's fourth symphony. Serkin—one of the best pianists in the world, of course—played the piano part in Dvorak's great A major piano quintet. Who could have asked for more?

* * *

ANOTHER FINE FESTIVAL is nearing an end this week. Out Santa Fe way the opera company has an unusual five-day lineup, presenting most of its summer's wares in one hunk. On tap are "Boheme" Tuesday, "Flying Dutchman" Wednesday, "Merry Widow" Thursday, Benjamin Britten's new opera "Owen Wingrave" Friday and a double bill of Stravinsky's "Nightingale" and Ravel's "L"Enfant et les Sortileges" Saturday.

Summer ain't what it used to be.

SUNDAY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
SUN. 2,978,270

AUG 19 1973

The Summer Festival Fad and How It Grew

By RON EYER

SUMMER MUSIC is a multi-million-dollar business in the United States today. More than 100 festivals take place from June through September in all 50 states; attendance figures run to uncounted millions and box-office receipts are "fantastic," according to Richard Leach, veteran man-about-music and recently retired director of the Saratoga Festival at Saratoga Springs, N.Y.

The festivals range widely through so-called "serious" music, ballet and theater to pop and rock music and give work to thousands of musicians, dancers, actors and technicians who used to be on involuntary "leisure" at this time of year.

A granddaddy of the festival circuit is the Berkshire Music Festival dating back to 1934, at Tanglewood, Mass., which is the summer home of the Boston Symphony and a major supplier of summer fare for the Northeastern section of the country, along with the Saratoga Festival that took root 30 years later.

Like Salzburg, Bayreuth and other European centers long before them, American towns have discovered the hard cash value of a performing arts operation in their midst. Unless you have the Grand Canyon or Niagara Falls in your backyard, an arts festival is just about unbeatable as a tourist attraction. About 300,000 people probably will visit the more than 100 events scheduled at Saratoga this summer. People bring money, and they spend it lavishly for lodging, food and all kinds of local services while they are in town. Whatever the cost of the festival, the town is likely to get it back many times over, in one way or another.

Saratoga Springs, of course, was a famous spa and racing citadel for generations before anybody ever thought of a festival. But spas with their mineral baths and whatnot are not as big with the public as they used to be. And even the race track, with its Vanderbilts, Whitneys and other horsey greats, is not quite the glamorous attraction it once was.

In fact, the town, which no longer is served by a railroad, was on the down-grade for some years. The fabulous old hotels that used to line Main Street were torn down (including the famed Grand Union, once touted as the world's biggest hotel—a new motel on the outskirts now bears its name), and things generally were beginning to look seedy.

But then came the beautiful and luxurious amphitheater embedded in a wooded hillside with a rippling stream, wide esplanades and vast, carefully tended lawns. Came also the New York City Ballet and then the Philadelphia Orchestra in search of permanent summer homes.

They, in turn, developed such satellites as the City Center Acting Company, the School of Orchestral Studies and the Saratoga-Potsdam Choral Institute that attract their own sets of followers, and the place has become a beehive of activity morning, noon and night all summer long.

Some festivals are devoted entirely to opera, others to jazz and still others to various manifestations of folk, country and other popular music. None of the lighter types of music have taken a firm hold at either Tanglewood or Saratoga as yet, but there are signs that a flirtation is going on.

Tanglewood, for example, had a concert last Tuesday at its day-long Tanglewood-on-Parade event that was devoted to music by Scott Joplin, Jelly Roll Morton and Duke Ellington played by members of the Berkshire Music Center under the direction of Gunther Schuller.

And, at Saratoga, a new wrinkle this year will be the first American Song Festival, Aug. 30 to Sept. 2, at which American pop composers, professional and amateur, from all over the country, will compete for substantial prizes and will get to hear their entries performed by top musicians in the pop field. The big jamboree (the first song festival of its type to be held in the United States) is expected to attract a crowd of 100,000.

In physical layout and surroundings, both Tanglewood and Saratoga are considerably more attractive than their counterparts in Europe, with the exception of the Baths of Caracalla in Rome, the Arena in Verona and maybe one or two others.

The result is that in this country, the summer people have found a golden lure that is attracting more big game with every passing season.

Melissa Hayden, with an unlikely audience in the background at Saratoga.

Music

BY IRWIN SHAINMAN

SARATOGA SPRINGS, N.Y.

The Saratoga Performing Arts Center has to be considered one of the most attractive and well-planned summer cultural complexes to be found anywhere. It offers a variety of activities and performances that range all the way from well-trained horses going around a ring accompanied by Johann Strauss waltzes to the matchless beauty of the classic ballet dancer. Somewhere in between one might find "Blood Sweat and Tears" and a W.C. Fields film festival.

On Wednesday, Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra, sometimes known as "Those Fabulous Philadelphians," begin their month as one of the three major continuing attractions at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center, hereafter often affectionately cited as "SPAC." Following the New York City Ballet, the Orchestra joins the newly named City Center Acting Company — which is doing a season of three weeks each during July and August in a smaller auditorium — numerous educational offerings such as schools for orchestral studies, choral singing, modern dance, and 35 so-called "Specials" put on by top TV and recording personalities, fill the calendar.

This is the eighth season of operation plus many more years since a group in the Saratoga and Tri-City area, against many odds, started the process that resulted in creating this magnificent center and making it work. It wasn't a case of the Philadelphia Orchestra and the New York City Ballet looking for a summer home, but the organization of a beautiful environment that attracted constituents. In fact, one of the original rumors that contributed to starting the whole thing suggested that the New York Philharmonic was looking for a rural location and thinking of setting up a summer home in Stowe, Vermont. Once local support was lined up and substantive discussions held, it became apparant that the Philharmonic had no intentions of going to the country and wanted to stay in New York City, which they have done.

With the acquisition of so important an orchestra as the Philadelphia, plus George Ballanchine and the New York City Ballet, the two main pillars on which the entire enterprise was subsequently built, were in place.

After the first year's excitement and support, attendance took a dip, but has clearly been on the upswing ever since, reaching 65 per cent of capacity last year, (it would take close to 85 per cent to break even) and for this season, subscriptions and advance sale for the orchestra concerts are already 20 per cent of 1972. All in all, about 300,000 people are expected to attend over 100 separate events in an amazingly crowded calendar, which incidentally has five separate and diverse events scheduled for tomorrow.

When one talks about Saratoga — particularly in New England areas — inevitable comparisons are made with Tanglewood. With the exception of the facts that they both attract major orchestras for the summer, have good acoustics and offer many educational opportunities to young people, there are more differences than similarities. Physically, because of its location and youthful modern design Saratoga has solved most of the obvious problems such as slope of the ground, comfort of the seats and audience proximity to the performers. They have created a double-decked shed, thereby shortening the distance from the back rows to the stage, that has over 5,000 seats and the angle of the ground outside allows up to 15,000 more people on the lawns with a better passable view of the performers.

Tanglewood offers major concerts only on weekends while SPAC has seven ballet performances each week in July and the Philadelphia Orchestra offers four weekly concerts in August. The more-or-less isolation of the Saratoga shed from the neighboring communities and the fact that the area is already well-attuned to an influx of racing fans during August turns out to be both an advantage and a handicap. While there are few problems with local residents complaining about hordes of young people swarming over lawns to a rock concert, Saratoga still lacks the sense of community that has been built up around Tanglewood.

This cannot be achieved quickly. Tanglewood has been around a very long time, is as much a part of the Boston Orchestra as Symphony Hall, and has always had a very clear sense of where it was going artistically. SPAC is still young, is carefully listening to the public, gauging the results of various combinations of ideas, and trying to put together a concept that will eventually result in what the management likes to call "a Saratoga Experience." Considering that the area has been attracting summer residents since 1863, (remember the Edna Ferber novel and subsequent film "Saratoga Trunk" with Gary Cooper and Ingrid Bergman) when the first flat racing track was constructed and the natural mineral springs became the basis of a health craze, a performing arts center, with deficits down to manageable levels, surely ought to succeed. Besides having the full and active support of the Governor, the Rockefeller family and the State Arts Council, can be very handy assets for any cultural institution.

What of the 18 concerts and 8 conductors that we now look forward to? By most standards the fare is varied, popular and certainly on the conservative side, but I don't suppose anyone knows this better than Eugene Ormandy, who was making up programs when I was still on roller skates. He has always been a musician concerned with public taste, and as the dean of America's major conductors also well aware of the economic realities of full houses.

Besides heavy doses of standard Mozart, Weber, Beethoven, Brahms and Tschaikowsky, a brush with Richard Strauss, Shostakovitch and Sibelius, we have a few novelties and some programs of unusal interest. An all-Wagner evening and a concert performance of Manuel De Falla's "La Vida Breve," both conducted by Fruhbeck de Brugos, Seiji Ozawa concentrating on "Romeo and Juliet" as seen by four different composers, and a Verdi-Bruckner concert conducted by Aldo Ceccato. Except for the "popular classics" — and I would put the All-Gershwin Night in that catagory — the 20th century is avoided and there is not a single work even close to what might be called a serious contemporary idiom. With the exception of a 35-year-old ballet suite by Walter Piston, a current score by a living composer is nowhere to be found.

As I have said earlier this summer, the answers to this kind of problem are not simple and do not come easily. Statistics and studies seem to show that summer audiences respond to the familiar, and although not presently in debt, Saratoga has regularly been faced with annual deficits that "pop" concerts have helped to reduce. The Philadelphians, and other major orchestras, must face up to doing more to expand the repertoire and the listening habits of audiences or face the possibility that their own recordings will eventually put them out of business.

The whole SPAC cultural operation is under the guidance of Craig Hankenson, a 39-year-old Eastman School voice graduate, with past experience in the management of the San Francisco Opera and the Brevard, N.C., Music Center, who has been around Saratoga long enough to know the problems. He seems to be a person willing to confront them with frankness, work and imagination. These combinations augur well for the rest of the 1973 season and the future.

* * *

One of the most talked-about groups in chamber music, The Tokyo String Quartet, will appear today at South Mountain in Pittsfield. They will play the Quartet No. 1 "From My Life", by Bedrich Smetana, which they will record in Europe later this summer.

Incidentally, this is the composition that Willem Willeke played at South Mountain in 1935, and the Tokyo performers have borrowed Mr. Willeke's 1643 Amati cello for the performance. It is now in the possession of the Juilliard Quartet.

Philadelphia Orchestra Opens Wednesday

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169

JUL 29 1973

Had the Philadelphia Orchestra programming for the Saratoga Performing Arts Center been arranged in the usual fashion, one might observe that the stars would be music director and conductor Eugene Ormandy and soloists who include Van Cliburn, Rudolf Serkin and Isaac Sterns.

One could never dispute the box office punch of these performers. Their draw is particularly obvious when considering that last weekend's concerts at Tanglewood were dominated by Ormandy conducting the Bosto Symphony Orchestra and the attendance hit a record 44,000.

But the Tanglewood concerts and the August schedule at SPAC show that the men who arrange such programs are placing their reliance on some names at least as well if not more established—Beethoven, Wagner, Brahms, Tchaikovsky and an American newcomer, George Gershwin.

TRUE, ORMANDY will conduct six of the orchestra's scheduled 16 evening concerts. Van Cliburn will play Tchaikovsky. And the very special program in which Benny Goodman's Original Quartet, including Teddy Wilson, Lionel Hampton and Gene Krupa, will perform with the orchestra has been sold out long ago.

But still, the opening week at SPAC has the orchestra playing All—Brahms, Wagner, and Gershwin programs on three of four nights. Then consider that All—Rachmaninoff Tchaikowsky, and Beethoven programs follow.

The music makes the difference and top billing this season seems to have been accorded to the composers who made it all possible.

AN INTERESTING sidelight to this, the eighth season of The Philadelphia Orchestra at SPAC is that maestro Ormandy will be preparing his musicians for their upcoming trip to Red China.

Last year, the New York City Ballet went from Saratoga to Russia. This year, the orchestra will go to Communist China. It appears Saratoga is getting to be the Cape Kennedy of the internation relations set.

Yet uncertain is whether the orchestra will allow public rehearsals on works planned for the Chinese tour. Some new works by Chinese composers are expected to be part of the orchestra's repertory.

THE LAST hope for including a new oriental work in the Saratoga schedule appeared to fade when it was announced that Seiji Ozawa will conduct a selection of "Romeo and Julie" on the Aug. 16 program Prokofieff and Berlioz works are included in the program that also features Beethoven's Symphony No. 7.

As in the past, the closing performance of the orchestra will be Ormandy "Those Fabulous Philadelphians" in familiar melodies from the classic works of Smetna, Dvorak, Sibeliius, De Falla, Rimsky-Korsakov and Weinberger.

Dallas Times Herald
D. 232,064 SUN. 275,535

AUG 12 1973

EUGENE ORMANDY

OLIN CHISM

Informal summer festivals

One of the nice things about the American music festivals—which are growing by leaps and bounds—is the almost complete informality of most of them. Generally the music is taken seriously, but not solemnly, and there are plenty of people attracted by this atmosphere who do not grace the music halls for formal concerts.

Vacation time this year found me in New England, able to take in a couple of the most noted festivals. Both of them—Tanglewood and Marlboro—are heavily attended, in the case of Marlboro selling out well in advance since it does not have the capacity that Tanglewood does. The latter, a more than 200-acre estate in the Berkshire hills, never really sells out since it can contain monstrous crowds in its ample area.

TANGLEWOOD, WHICH HAS been a tradition nearly forever, it seems, almost carries informality to extremes (or rather, I should say that the audiences do). Champagne corks fly, some couples make mad passionate love, babies cry. Yet everything is remarkably orderly considering that easily 10,000 people may be hearing the program. And there are no big airports nearby, so jet patterns are no problem.

I heard an all-Beethoven concert, with Eugene Ormandy conducting the Boston Symphony in a very tried-and-true program consisting of the "Leonore" No. 3, the "Emperor" with Philippe Entremont as soloist and the eternal "Fifth." Tanglewood has a very nice feature, a pre-concert "warmup" recital, in this case with none other than Andre Watts discussing and playing rarely performed piano music by Beethoven.

Very nice, and the monster traffic jam afterward was the only fly in the ointment.

MARLBORO IS A MUCH less gargantuan affair. Located in lower Vermont (which must be the most beautiful state in the Union), the festival takes place at a tiny college in a rustic setting. Due to limited seating the festival sells out before it opens, but generally there are a few ticket returns and the perservering music-lover can get a seat some way or another.

The scheduling is so informal that no one knows who is going to play or what until two or three days before the event. So my family and I were happily surprised to find we were there for back-to-back programs by Pablo Casals (conducting) and Rudolf Serkin (playing).

Casals, somewhat feeble when he walks but magnificently alert when he conducts, directed Beethoven's fourth symphony. Serkin—one of the best pianists in the world, of course—played the piano part in Dvorak's great A major piano quintet. Who could have asked for more?

* * *

ANOTHER FINE FESTIVAL is nearing an end this week. Out Santa Fe way the opera company has an unusual five-day lineup, presenting most of its summer's wares in one hunk. On tap are "Boheme" Tuesday, "Flying Dutchman" Wednesday, "Merry Widow" Thursday, Benjamin Britten's new opera "Owen Wingrave" Friday and a double bill of Stravinsky's "Nightingale" and Ravel's "L"Enfant et les Sortileges" Saturday.

Summer ain't what it used to be.

SARATOGA SPRINGS, N.Y.

The Saratoga Performing Arts Center has to be considered one of the most attractive and well-planned summer cultural complexes to be found anywhere. It offers a variety of activities and performances that range all the way from well-trained horses going around a ring accompanied by Johann Strauss waltzes to the matchless beauty of the classic ballet dancer. Somewhere in between one might find "Blood Sweat and Tears" and a W.C. Fields film festival.

On Wednesday, Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra, sometimes known as "Those Fabulous Philadelphians," begin their month as one of the three major continuing attractions at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center, hereafter often affectionately cited as "SPAC." Following the New York City Ballet, the Orchestra joins the newly named City Center Acting Company — which is doing a season of three weeks each during July and August in a smaller auditorium — numerous educational offerings such as schools for orchestral studies, choral singing, modern dance, and 35 so-called "Specials" put on by top TV and recording personalities, fill the calendar.

This is the eighth season of operation plus many more years since a group in the Saratoga and Tri-City area, against many odds, started the process that resulted in creating this magnificent center and making it work. It wasn't a case of the Philadelphia Orchestra and the New York City Ballet looking for a summer home, but the organization of a beautiful environment that attracted constituents. In fact, one of the original rumors that contributed to starting the whole thing suggested that the New York Philharmonic was looking for a rural location and thinking of setting up a summer home in Stowe, Vermont. Once local support was lined up and substantive discussions held, it became apparant that the Philharmonic had no intentions of going to the country and wanted to stay in New York City, which they have done.

With the acquisition of so important an orchestra as the Philadelphia, plus George Ballanchine and the New York City Ballet, the two main pillars on which the entire enterprise was subsequently built, were in place.

After the first year's excitement and support, attendance took a dip, but has clearly been on the upswing ever since, reaching 65 per cent of capacity last year, (it would take close to 85 per cent to break even) and for this season, subscriptions and advance sale for the orchestra concerts are already 20 per cent of 1972. All in all, about 300,000 people are expected to attend over 100 separate events in an amazingly crowded calendar, which incidentally has five separate and diverse events scheduled for tomorrow.

When one talks about Saratoga — particularly in New England areas — inevitable comparisons are made with Tanglewood. With the exception of the facts that they both attract major orchestras for the summer, have good acoustics and offer many educational opportunities to young people, there are more differences than similarities. Physically, because of its location and youthful modern design Saratoga has solved most of the obvious problems such as slope of the ground, comfort of the seats and audience proximity to the performers. They have created a double-decked shed, thereby shortening the distance from the back rows to the stage, that has over 5,000 seats and the angle of the ground outside allows up to 15,000 more people on the lawns with a better passable view of the performers.

Tanglewood offers major concerts only on weekends while SPAC has seven ballet performances each week in July and the Philadelphia Orchestra offers four weekly concerts in August. The more-or-less isolation of the Saratoga shed from the neighboring communities and the fact that the area is already well-attuned to an influx of racing fans during August turns out to be both an advantage and a handicap. While there are few problems with local residents complaining about hordes of young people swarming over lawns to a rock concert, Saratoga still lacks the sense of community that has been built up around Tanglewood.

This cannot be achieved quickly. Tanglewood has been around a very long time, is as much a part of the Boston Orchestra as Symphony Hall, and has always had a very clear sense of where it was going artistically. SPAC is still young, is carefully listening to the public, gauging the results of various combinations of ideas, and trying to put together a concept that will eventually result in what the management likes to call "a Saratoga Experience." Considering that the area has been attracting summer residents since 1863, (remember the Edna Ferber novel and subsequent film "Saratoga Trunk" with Gary Cooper and Ingrid Bergman) when the first flat racing track was constructed and the natural mineral springs became the basis of a health craze, a performing arts center, with deficits down to manageable levels, surely ought to succeed. Besides having the full and active support of the Governor, the Rockefeller family and the State Arts Council, can be very handy assets for any cultural institution.

What of the 18 concerts and 8 conductors that we now look forward to? By most standards the fare is varied, popular and certainly on the conservative side, but I don't suppose anyone knows this better than Eugene Ormandy, who was making up programs when I was still on roller skates. He has always been a musician concerned with public taste, and as the dean of America's major conductors also well aware of the economic realities of full houses.

Besides heavy doses of standard Mozart, Weber, Beethoven, Brahms and Tschaikowsky, a brush with Richard Strauss, Shostakovitch and Sibelius, we have a few novelties and some programs of unusal interest. An all-Wagner evening and a concert performance of Manuel De Falla's "La Vida Breve," both conducted by Fruhbeck de Brugos, Seiji Ozawa concentrating on "Romeo and Juliet" as seen by four different composers, and a Verdi-Bruckner concert conducted by Aldo Ceccato. Except for the "popular classics" — and I would put the All-Gershwin Night in that catagory — the 20th century is avoided and there is not a single work even close to what might be called a serious contemporary idiom. With the exception of a 35-year-old ballet suite by Walter Piston, a current score by a living composer is nowhere to be found.

As I have said earlier this summer, the answers to this kind of problem are not simple and do not come easily. Statistics and studies seem to show that summer audiences respond to the familiar, and although not presently in debt, Saratoga has regularly been faced with annual deficits that "pop" concerts have helped to reduce. The Philadelphians, and other major orchestras, must face up to doing more to expand the repertoire and the listening habits of audiences or face the possibility that their own recordings will eventually put them out of business.

The whole SPAC cultural operation is under the guidance of Craig Hankenson, a 39-year-old Eastman School voice graduate, with past experience in the management of the San Francisco Opera and the Brevard, N.C., Music Center, who has been around Saratoga long enough to know the problems. He seems to be a person willing to confront them with frankness, work and imagination. These combinations augur well for the rest of the 1973 season and the future.

* * *

One of the most talked-about groups in chamber music, The Tokyo String Quartet, will appear today at South Mountain in Pittsfield. They will play the Quartet No. 1 "From My Life", by Bedrich Smetana, which they will record in Europe later this summer.

Incidentally, this is the composition that Willem Willeke played at South Mountain in 1935, and the Tokyo performers have borrowed Mr. Willeke's 1643 Amati cello for the performance. It is now in the possession of the Juilliard Quartet.

SUNDAY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
SUN. 2,978,270

AUG 19 1973

The Summer Festival Fad and How It Grew

By RON EYER

SUMMER MUSIC is a multi-million-dollar business in the United States today. More than 100 festivals take place from June through September in all 50 states; attendance figures run to uncounted millions and box-office receipts are "fantastic," according to Richard Leach, veteran man-about-music and recently retired director of the Saratoga Festival at Saratoga Springs, N.Y.

The festivals range widely through so-called "serious" music, ballet and theater to pop and rock music and give work to thousands of musicians, dancers, actors and technicians who used to be on involuntary "leisure" at this time of year.

A granddaddy of the festival circuit is the Berkshire Music Festival dating back to 1934, at Tanglewood, Mass., which is the summer home of the Boston Symphony and a major supplier of summer fare for the Northeastern section of the country, along with the Saratoga Festival that took root 30 years later.

Like Salzburg, Bayreuth and other European centers long before them, American towns have discovered the hard cash value of a performing arts operation in their midst. Unless you have the Grand Canyon or Niagara Falls in your backyard, an arts festival is just about unbeatable as a tourist attraction. About 300,000 people probably will visit the more than 100 events scheduled at Saratoga this summer. People bring money, and they spend it lavishly for lodging, food and all kinds of local services while they are in town. Whatever the cost of the festival, the town is likely to get it back many times over, in one way or another.

Saratoga Springs, of course, was a famous spa and racing citadel for generations before anybody ever thought of a festival. But spas with their mineral baths and whatnot are not as big with the public as they used to be. And even the race track, with its Vanderbilts, Whitneys and other horsey greats, is not quite the glamorous attraction it once was.

In fact, the town, which no longer is served by a railroad, was on the down-grade for some years. The fabulous old hotels that used to line Main Street were torn down (including the famed Grand Union, once touted as the world's biggest hotel—a new motel on the outskirts now bears its name), and things generally were beginning to look seedy.

But then came the beautiful and luxurious amphitheater embedded in a wooded hillside with a rippling stream, wide esplanades and vast, carefully tended lawns. Came also the New York City Ballet and then the Philadelphia Orchestra in search of permanent summer homes.

They, in turn, developed such satellites as the City Center Acting Company, the School of Orchestral Studies and the Saratoga-Potsdam Choral Institute that attract their own sets of followers, and the place has become a beehive of activity morning, noon and night all summer long.

Some festivals are devoted entirely to opera, others to jazz and still others to various manifestations of folk, country and other popular music. None of the lighter types of music have taken a firm hold at either Tanglewood or Saratoga as yet, but there are signs that a flirtation is going on.

Tanglewood, for example, had a concert last Tuesday at its day-long Tanglewood-on-Parade event that was devoted to music by Scott Joplin, Jelly Roll Morton and Duke Ellington played by members of the Berkshire Music Center under the direction of Gunther Schuller.

And, at Saratoga, a new wrinkle this year will be the first American Song Festival, Aug. 30 to Sept. 2, at which American pop composers, professional and amateur, from all over the country, will compete for substantial prizes and will get to hear their entries performed by top musicians in the pop field. The big jamboree (the first song festival of its type to be held in the United States) is expected to attract a crowd of 100,000.

In physical layout and surroundings, both Tanglewood and Saratoga are considerably more attractive than their counterparts in Europe, with the exception of the Baths of Caracalla in Rome, the Arena in Verona and maybe one or two others.

The result is that in this country, the summer people have found a golden lure that is attracting more big game with every passing season.

Melissa Hayden, with an unlikely audience in the background at Saratoga.

Verdant Tanglewood Hills Music Lovers' Oasis

LENOX, Mass. — Tanglewood is a gorgeous, verdant 210-acre estate overlooking the serene ripples of Lake Mahkeenac in the Berkshire Hills. Emerson, Holmes and Melville met here, productively, in the 1850s. Nathaniel Hawthorne conceived his "Tanglewood Tales" and "Wonderbook" on the premises and actually finished "The House of the Seven Gables" while in residence.

HE complained, however, that the overwhelming beauty of the locale sometimes proved more distracting than inspiring.

Artists have been paying lip service to the same half-hearted lament ever since, but in the 1930s, their favored mode of expression became music. The venerable Boston Symphony had arrived.

IT arrived at its summer orchestra's acquisition of the grounds. In the middle of the "Ride of the Vallyries," however, there erupted the fiercest of extra-Wagnerian torrents.

Thunder clapped, lighting bolted and the rains came. And came.

THE mightly Koussevitzky, unaccustomed to the outrage of competition while he was on the podium, had to stop and start again. Three times. The audacious elements were upstaging him.

Adding injury to insult, some of the orchestra members soon found themselves incapcitated when their instruments got soaked. The second half of the program had to be altered at the last moment to accommodate a suddenly reduced ensemble.

THE crusty and generous patrons of the arts were not amused. Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, a pillar among Berkshire samaritans, angrily commandeered the stage when the concert limped to an undignified end. "The storm," she told the audience, "has proved conclusively the need for a shed."

Her timing was excellent.

TANGLEWOOD soon got its shed, and the Berkshires got one of the most remarkable and most distinguished summer festivals in the world.

The Tanglewood shed seats approximately 6,000. It is a ruggedly simple structure, suggesting nothing so much as a fan-shaped airplane hangar with open sides. It also happens to be something of an acoustical wonder, for it projects the noble and mellow sound unaided — not only throughout its own protected spaces but also on the vast meadow outside.

PURISTS come to Tanglewood to listen seriously, inside the shed.

The more casually inclined bring blankets and camp on the lawns — by the thousands (at $3 a head). They may not be able to see the orchestra, but they find consolation in birds, flowers, trees, stars,

BETHLEHEM, PA.
GLOBE-TIMES
D. 31,000

AUG 7 1973

Conventional opera used to be an integral part of the scene, but it departed a few years ago, quietly and mysteriously, together with its champion-mentor Boris Goldovsky.

Even at its most experimental, Tanglewood always used to pride itself on dignity, on a prim Bostonian sense of decorum, if you will. When I first came here, in the early 1950s, guides habitally handed wrap-around skirts to any lady-visitor thoughtless-enough to wear short. A carnival atmosphere was to be avoided at all costs, as were billboards, program puffery and rank commercial reminders of the outside world.

Tanglewood — Informality The By-Word

L. A. Times Wire

LENOX, Mass. — Tanglewood is a gorgeous, verdant 210-acre estate overlooking the serene ripples of Lake Mahkeenac in the Berkshire Hills.

Emerson, Holmes and Melville met here, productively, in the 1850s.

Nathaniel Hawthorne conceived his "Tanglewood Tales" and "Wonderbrook" on the premises and actually finished "The House of the Seven Gables" while in residence.

He complained, however, that the overwhelming beauty of the locale sometimes proved more distracting than inspiring.

Artists have been paying lip service to the same half-hearted lament ever since, but in the 1930s, their favored mode of expression became music.

The venerable Boston Symphony had arrived.

It arrived at its summer home, literally, with a splash.

The fateful day was Aug. 12, 1937.

Serge Koussevitzky, the much feared and much adulated maestro, planned an all-Wagner program in a huge tent to celebrate the orchestra's acquisition of the grounds.

In the middle of the "Ride of the Valkyries," however, there erupted the fiercest of extra-Wagnerian torrents.

Thunder clapped, lightning bolted and the rains came. and came.

Koussevitzky, unaccustomed to the outrage of competition while he was on the podium, had to stop and start again. Three times. The audacious elements were upstaging him. Adding injury to insult, some of the orchestra members soon found themselves incapacitated when their instruments got soaked. The second half of the program had to be altered at the last moment to accommodate a suddenly reduced ensemble.

The crusty and generous patrons of the arts were not amused.

Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, a pillar among Berkshire samaritans, angrily commandeered the stage when the concert limped to an undignified end.

"The storm," she told the audience, "has proved conclusively the need for a shed."

Her timing was excellent.

Tanglewood soon got its shed, and the Berkshires got one of the most remarkble and most distinguished summer festivals in the world.

The Tanglewood shed seats approximately 6,000.

It is a ruggedly simple structure, suggesting nothing so much as a fan-shaped airplane hanger with open sides.

It also happens to be something of an acoustical wonder, for it projects the noble and mellow sound unaided—not only throughout its own protected spaces, but also on to the vast meadow outside.

Horror of horrors, at the bookstore Linda Lovelace books and Beethoven are side by side.

Purists come to Tanglewood to listen seriously, inside the shed.

The more casually inclined bring blankets and camp on the lawns—by the thousands—at $3-a-head.

They may not be able to see the orchestra, but they find consolation in birds, flowers, trees, stars, picnics and obvious romantic togetherness.

Both the insider and the outsider at Tanglewood can savor the music in its pristine state.

There is no need for amplification here and perhaps even more wonderous, there are no airplanes.

Lenox is tucked far off in the Western corner of Massachusetts, some 150 miles away from Boston and its busy flight patterns.

The Boston Symphony uses Tanglewood not only for summer concerts, but also for a unique training ground known as the Bershire Music Center.

The symphony players form the nucleus of the faculty at this short-term, high-powered network of master classes.

The master classes are concerned with much more than the immediate interests of the Boston Symphony.

Andre Watts is teaching a special piano symposium this summer, and soprano Phyllis Curtin is repeating her incomparable seminar for young singers. Dazzling.

While the artistic profile of the orchestral Bostonians remains reasonably conservative, the activities of the music center have become remarkably progressive.

The school can boast an orchestra of its own, usually superb, which explores all sorts of esoterica when it isn't sampling repertory standards.

The school also sponsors chamber music ad quasi-infinitum, puts on a forward-looking annual festival of contemporary music, hosts a edagogical institute for high school musicians, tinkers with far-out musical theater and sits still for the inevitable ego indulgences of composers' forums.

Often, the most interesting performances at Tanglewood occur not with the symphony in the big, hopefully glamorous shed, but with the students in the little theater-concert hall nearby (capacity 1,200, not counting grass-sitters), or in the even littler chamber music hall (capacity 300), or even in one of the rehearsal barns.

The last concerts at Tanglewood will be next Friday-Sunday.

Ballet has never reared its pretty leg here, but there is no need.

The Jacob's Pillow Festival is only 15 miles away.

Conventional opera used to be an integral part of the scene, but it departed a few years ago, quietly and mysteriously, together with its champion-mentor Boris Goldovsky.

When I first came here, in the early 1950s, guides habitually handed wrap-around skirts to thoughtles shorts.

A carni to be avo were bill fery and reminder world.

Today, loosening

Shorts on the l Sunday even spo

Moder now dot menades

Where days, looked at such tions as the Bo sponsors pearance Blood, S Denver, America

And, music-ar the boxo ing Tan Linda L right al scores, Bernstei

Nothin

TANGLEWOOD VISITORS LISTEN TO CONCERTS ON SEATS INSIDE S
. . . people come from around world to hear the Boston Symphony pla

Arts Tourists Flock to Berkshires

The Los Angeles Times

LENOX, Mass. — Tanglewood is a gorgeous, verdant 210-acre estate overlooking the serene ripples of Lake Mahkeenac in the Berkshire Hills. Emerson, Holmes and Melville met here, productively, in the 1850s. Nathaniel Hawthorne conceived his "Tanglewood Tales" and "Wonderbook" on the premises and actually finished "The House of the Seven Gables" while in residence.

He complained, however, that the overwhelming beauty of the locale sometimes proved more distracting than inspiring.

Artists have been paying lip service to the same half-hearted lament ever since, but in the 1930s, their favored mode of expression became music. The venerable Boston Symphony had arrived.

It arrived at its summer home, literally, with a splash. The fateful day was Aug. 12, 1937. Serge Koussevitzky, the much feared and much adulated maestro, planned an all-Wagner program in a huge tent to celebrate the orchestra's acquisition of the grounds. In the middle of the "Ride of the Valkyries," however, there erupted the fiercest of extra Wagnerian torrents.

Thunder clapped, lightning bolted and the rains came. And came.

The mighty Koussevitzky, unaccustomed to the outrage of competition while he was on the podium, had to stop and start again. Three times. The audacious elements were upstaging him.

All Wet

Adding injury to insult, some of the orchestra members soon found themselves incapacitated when their instruments got soaked. The second half of the program had to be altered at the last moment to accommodate a suddenly reduced ensemble.

The crusty and generous patrons of the arts were not amused. Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, a pillar among Berkshire samaritans, angrily commandeered the stage when the concert limped to an undignified end. "The storm," she told the audience, "has proved conclusively the need for a shed."

Her timing was excellent.

Tanglewood soon got its shed, and the Berkshires got one of the most remarkable and most distinguished summer festivals in the world.

The Tanglewood shed seats approximately 6,000. It is a ruggedly simple structure, suggesting nothing so much as a fan shaped airplane hangar with open sides. It also happens to be something of an acoustical wonder, for it projects the nable and melow BSO sound unaided — not only throughout its own protected spaces but also on to the vast meadow outside.

Purists come to Tanglewood to listen seriously, inside the shed. The more casually inclined bring blankets and camp on the lawns — by the thousands (at three dollars a head). They may not be able to see the orchestra, but they find consolation in birds, flowers, trees, stars, picnics and obvious romantic togetherness.

No Airplanes

Both the insider and the outsider at Tanglewood can savor the music in its pristine state. There is no need for amplification here and, perhaps even more wonderous, there are no airplanes. Lenox is tucked far off in the western corner of Massachusetts, some 150 miles away from Boston and its busy flight patterns.

Tanglewood, in short, is a lovely place to hear music. I suspect it is an equally lovely place to make music.

Symphony

In any case, it happens to be a most unusual place. The Boston Symphony uses Tanglewood not only for summer concerts, but also for a unique training ground known as the Berkshire Music Center. The symphony players form the nucleus of the faculty at this short-term, high-powered network of master classes.

The master classes are concerned with much more than the immediate interests of the Boston Symphony. Andre Watts is teaching a special piano symposium this summer, and Phyllis Curtin is repeating her incomparable seminar for young singers. I had an opportunity to spy on two recent sessions as this extraordinary soprano, using equal parts of charm and common sense plus uncanny physiological and psychological insights, turned at least four talented and befuddled young things into enlightened incipient artists. Dazzling.

Conservative

While the artistic profile of the orchestral Bostonians remains reasonably conservative, the activities of the music center have become remarkably progressive. The school can boast an orchestra of its own, usually superb, which explores all sorts of esoterica when it isn't sampling repertory standards. The school also sponsors chamber music ad quasi-infinitum, puts on a forward-looking annual festival of contemporary music, hosts a pedagogical institute for high-school musicians, tinkers with far-out musical theater and sits still for the inevitable ego indulgences of composers' forums.

Often, the most interesting performances at Tanglewood occur not with the symphony in the big, hopefully glamorous shed, but with the students in the little theater-concert hall nearby (capacity 13,200, not counting grass-sitters,) or in the even littler chamber music hall (capacity 300), or even in one of the rehearsal barns.

Proper Bostonian

Today, Tanglewood is loosening up a bit. It still has a long way to go before it can compete with Hollywood Bowl in folksy appeal. But there are sobering danger signals.

Shorts are now permitted on the lawn, and on a sunny Sunday afternoon one can even spot a bikini or two. Modern abstract sculptures now dot the once austere promenades. Whereas, in the "good" old days, Tanglewood habitues looked down collective noses at such low-brow manifestations as jazz and bop and pop, the Boston Symphony now sponsors Tuesday night appearances by Roberta Flack, Blood, Sweat and Tears, John Denver, Seals and Crofts, America, et al. On hot days, the formerly superformal instrumentalists blithely play in shirtsleeves. And, horror of horrors, the music-and-book store next to the box office has taken to selling Tanglewood T-shirts and Linda Lovelace paperbacks right along with Beethoven scores, Ozawa records and Bernstein postcards.

Nothing is sacred.

Cellist Pablo Casals, 96, a Marlboro regular.

Coll. of Bethlehem.
ADDISON COUNTY INDEPENDENT MIDDLEBURY VT
AUG 9 1973
New England Newspaper

On the Berkshire Scene

Women Play Key Roles In Cultural History

By CAROLYN ROBBINS
Republican Staff

There were good old days, and there are good new days on the Berkshire scene. "Snap" of Berkshire Symphonic Festival held at Hanna Farm was taken in 1936. Musical project was aided by Gertrude Robinson Smith one of the women who have figured prominently in cultural history of the region. Picture from scrapbook in files of Stockbridge Library.

Pulling through the toll gate on the Massachusetts Turnpike (Exit 2) which leads to the heart of Berkshire County, motorists are greeted by a post of signs listing points of interest throughout the county. It would take a speed reader to digest the information quickly enough to make a decision as to what direction to proceed in. Any decision pays off beautifully. The Berkshire Hills hold magic at any season, but summer is a very special time. Discover it or re - discover it. The Berkshires are for the whole family.

Besides the cultural attractions of the Tanglewood Music Festival in Lenox, Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival in Lee and the Berkshire Playhouse in Stockbridge, the area is a mecca for shoppers, browsers, history buffs and art and nature lovers.

Craft and antiques shops can be found in any of the town centers. Historical houses in Lenox and Stockbridge with rotating exhibits and art galleries such as the Tyringham Gallery Gingerbread House located near the Mass. Pike exit are but a few of the draws.

Best bet for people unfamiliar with the area is a stop at tourist information booths located in most of the centers.

Accidents of geography can determine the character and destiny of a community and Berkshire county is no exception. For years professionals in music, dance and theater have found in the graceful, romantic Berkshire hills the perfect backdrop in which to practice their arts.

Berkshire county is bounded on the west by the Taconic mountain range, on the east by the Berkshire Barrier. To the south is Mt. Everett and Mt. Greylock fortresses its northern border.

Cultural Haven

The attractions are numerous today but the setting with the Hoosic River flowing from the north and the Housatonic flowing southward, attracted artists of another sort long before the Tanglewood Festival made Lenox a summer cultural haven.

In 1844, writer Samuel Gray Ward of New York moved to Lenox for health reasons. He did some writing, farming and became a disciple of the region. Throughout the 40's and 50's other authors followed his example.

Springfield Republican

LIVING

SECTION THREE

heydey three trains came daily to Lenox.

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., forerunner of the Tanglewood Festival, was conceived in 1934 with the help of Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith of Stockbridge, a well - known summer resident of the Berkshires.

The Lenox Library contains papers showing that at the time Dr. Henry Hadley, conductor - composer with the New York Philharmonic approached Miss Smith with his dream to give concerts "under the stars."

Miss Smith was delighted and wasted little time rallying community support for the idea. The first concert was held at the Hanna Farm estate on Aug. 23, 1934 and the excitement that first day was evident throughout the community. Miss Elizabeth Daly of Sheffield remembers attending that first concert with her parents. "My parents knew it was something we should attend," she said.

The farm's grazing ground became a make - shift parking lot and close to 3000 people attended.

Dr. Hadley resigned from the festival in 1935 but wishing the concerts to become a permanent attraction, the board of trustees of the festival began looking for other orchestras to continue the program.

The Boston Symphony, then under ~~the direction~~ of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, expressed interest in locating a summer home, after being turned down by Newport, R. I.

Mrs. Gorham Brooks then offered her family's estate "Tanglewood" to the conductor. By April, 1937 the legal transfer was complete and the Berkshires had a permanent symphonic festival.

In 1930, the late Ted Shawn came to the Berkshires, presumably at the suggestion of his wife, dancer Ruth St. Denis. They purchased an 18th century farm in Lee called Jacob's Pillow and later built a theater for both students and professional dancers from around the world. The school is now directed by Walter Terry.

See BERKSHIRE SCENE Page 34

Berkshire Scene

Continued From Page 31

The Berkshire Playhouse was founded in Stockbridge in 1928. The building was formerly a casino located on Stockbridge's Main St. and was transported to its present location out of the town center. In 1966 the Berkshire Theater Festival was incorporated and the present board is headed by Ann Marlowe Straus.

This year the Lenox Arts Center directed by Lyn Austin will present theater productions at a new location, Wheatleigh, a familiar old estate located near Tanglewood. The Wheatleigh home was built in 1893 for H. H. Cook, an associate of John D. Rockefeller who gave it to his daughter as a wedding present when she married the Count de Heredia. The count who was from southern France found the estate delightful because it was designed by a French architect. Along with its theater program, the art center will have chamber music concerts in the building. Women continue to play a major role in the Berkshires.

NEXT WEEK: New Berkshire Breed.

Nathaniel Hawthorne worked in a red cottage called "Tanglewood," where he penned his famous tales, Herman Melville lived in a cottage known as "Arrowhead" and Oliver Wendell Holmes built a home in Pittsfield, now the county seat. Holmes claimed, "The best of all tonics is the Housatonic."

British actress, Fannie Kemble visited Lenox in 1836 and later purchased property there. She became an exciting social figure in the area for a period of 40 years.

Throughout the late nineteenth century, the Berkshires had established itself as an intellectual community and as a desirable place to sojourn.

After a morning in the Lenox Public Library several interesting facts came to light. Near the turn of the century newly created millionaires looking for a summer resort and discouraged by the old guard in Newport, R. I., discovered the Berkshires as their "inland resort." In 1900 their wealth decorated the landscape of Berkshire County with 75 mansions.

Vacant Mansions

The gilded age in the Berkshires saw its decline with World War I, the income tax and the inability to obtain inexpensive domestic help. Mansions stood vacant for years but now house prep schools, inns and religious orders.

New Yorkers have never taken the county for granted and during the railroad's

Potpourri

A Conductor's Reflections

By Celine Slator

Several times we have been asked to reprint a column which appeared back in 1970 which concerned Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who, before his death, was the noted conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. We recalled this fact again this week when we read a very good article on Leonard Bernstein, a pupil of the great maestro and later to become, for some years, the conductor of the New York Philharmonic.

"Lenny," as we knew him, was in one of "Koussie's," as we knew him, conducting classes at the time we attended the Berkshire Music Center for two summers at Lenox, Mass. But he was more than a student, he was almost a son, and certainly a protege.

Any mention of the younger artist cannot but bring back memories of Dr. Koussevitzky. And that is how we remembered those several verbal requests to reprint some notes we had taken in shorthand back in 1940.

Since Tanglewood is now in session and our own Vermont Symphony Orchestra Association is holding its summer Composers' Conference at Johnson State, it might not be amiss to reprint the article at this particular time as, naturally, it deals with music.

A CONDUCTOR'S REFLECTIONS

On July 9, 1940, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky addressed the first students of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass. It was a warm summer evening when we gathered in the large Music Shed to hear the Center's founder and director and the great famous conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra speak.

In the two years we studied at the Center we seldom heard Dr. Koussevitzky speak formally, except through his music. At that time, however, we were carrying a stenographic notebook as we have, day in and day out for the past 30 years. Thus we recorded his speech in Gregg symbols.

As far as we know no copies of his speech were ever made available and we have never seen it in print. So perhaps, since this is the 33rd anniversary of the Berkshire Music Center, we can share with you what he had to say as we were able to take it down. We didn't have tape recorders for total accuracy then and our Gregg may have slipped here and there. But essentially this is what Dr. Koussevitzky had to say on that momentous day.

"What I shall read to you is not a lecture, but my reflections on the art of interpretation. I could speak about conducting, but it is just the same. The problems of it are the same as any other artistic form; violin, or singing, or piano, etc. So, the art of conducting is very much like the art of the violin, the piano, or any other instrumental performer.

"To a conductor the orchestra is as much an instrument as the violin is to the violinist, the piano to the pianist, the organ to the organist, with the difference that the orchestra is an instrument far more complicated and complex. The conductor must possess profound will power to be able to transmit his will to a live instrument. must be in complete accord, playing on the conductor during his musical offerings.

"First of all, a musician must feel a composition and what its aims might be. He must be feeling the truth by finding it. It is necessary to develop artistic sense to the truth of feeling, and then be able to transmit it.

"Truth without us is not truth, but what is important is truth within us, the truth of our conceptions and our souls. It appears that the feeling of truth is just like the faculty of concentration and musical control and to exercise them through technique, methods, etc. Thus truth is the sense of truth and the best companion of experience.

"A real artist should not have an idle soul. Musical sensation must fly past the music itself. Beyond this, a musician should be conscious of the continuous meaning of a work, feeling it, sensing it and diving its truth. The conductor must help the composer reveal where the mystery of his work is hiding.

DIVINE MEANING

The task of the conductor is to divine the meaning of a work in such a way that it as nearly as possible, approaches the meaning of the composer. The conductor must then guide the music into the right channels. The conductor must help the composer to reveal the broad and spiritual sense of his work.

"It is necessary for the conductor to work with a composition until he feels able to reveal it as nearly as possible, and then work over the score until he sees how it might best be done. Without faith in a work it is impossible to perform any composition. And it is only sincerity of approach to the understanding of a work that can carry a conductor to the true interpretation of it, and the faith, not only in the composer's work, but in his truth.

"Moments occur occasionally when the sense is not easy to grasp. Sometimes it is difficult to find the mood because of lack of adequate marks in the score. But artistic balance must not come from the outer aspect of the score, but from the inner sense of the conductor or interpreter.

"Sometimes a young artist in understanding the outer truth approaches the inner one and the inner truth begins to project the true emotion of his work. It is always from outer to inner, from body to soul, from form to the content. Only true talent, therefore, can grasp the soul of a score and transmit this spiritual medium of the composer.

"Artistic truths once divined and absorbed become a part of the interpreter's nature and he has only to touch a piece to bring it to life without creative thought, thinking and almost without technique, because if his concentration, the spiritual material akin to his former experiences, it is already a part of him without his knowledge. It is however, as difficult to analyze them as it difficult to analyze them our own soul, and I am convinced that time will show that this is how artistic truth is gained."

LITTLE KNOWN

"Truly little is known about the technique of conducting, therefore we can only observe the methods and techniques used in the past and present by conductors of merit. First of all, he must be able to exercise his power on the men of his orchestra.

"When I begin to think of a system for the art of conducting, or a means exactly set down for the art of interpretation, I can only begin to recreate the experiments in this field through old masters of interpretation. I also begin to see my own experiences, during most of my own life, first, as soloist, and then as a conductor.

"I had collected an enormous amount of material as a result of my artistic experience. I felt it was now possible to create a system for the art of interpretation in the work and life of the arts; as his experiences, examined and appreciated, might have played on his soul and thus effected his creative work.

"In my observation of great artists, I notice that the forces at work in their lives had tremendous effect upon their interpretations in performance. The result is always a greater artistic interpretation. I may have felt this state of creative ability during my early years, and thus turned my life and thinking into all future creative work in conducting and interpretation.

EXTERNAL TECHNIQUE

"This is why it is excellent for a conductor to possess an external technique, the technique of the hands, which is after all but an external expression of the internal technique of the soul. This latter technique is an unusual one. The creative faculty is above all a complete concentration. It takes possession of one's eye, one's ear, one's mind. It affects tangibly the imagination. The whole spirit and physical nature

The Daily Argus
MOUNT VERNON, N.Y.
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
D. 19,256
AUG 31 1973

TARRYTOWN, N. Y.
NEWS
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
D. 6,550
AUG 31 1973

The Herald Statesman
YONKERS, N. Y.
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
D. 40,014
AUG 31 1973

Did Westchester move quietly to the Berkshires?

By LOUISA KREISBEJG

Showtime

COLUMBIA COUNTY, N.Y.- Circling in a Piper Cub over Austerlitz we can see the Berkshires laid out before us like an Aubusson tapestry. The superb weave of maples, pines and birches is inherent to the tapestry's design and the surface is woolen with nature's wonders.

Etching the greenness are low-lying farms, quiet hamlets, terra cotta country roads and Great Gatsbys houses, their gables and cupolas and porches filled with sunlight. And in the distance, in a pattern of furrows, budget motels and shopping centers and asphalted arteries heavy with traffic.

And . . . in the midst of all this: the arts in rich profusion. The tapestry is shot through with glittering threads of the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood, dance at Jacob's Pillow, experimental theater at the Lenox Arts Center, chamber music at South Mountain cabaret theater at Williamstown.

FROM GREAT BARRINGTON airport, we drive into the tapestry. At every turn in the road we find a familiar name or face. We wonder: Are any Westchesterites left in Westchester?

At Jacob's Pillow, Steffi MacFajlane of Armonk is dancing with the Cincinnati Ballet. On a wooded slope at South Mountain pianist Tedd Joselson of Harrison is preparing for a Sept. 9 concert. Garrick Ohlsson of White Plains, winner of the Chopin piano competition in Warsaw is just a step ahead of us at Tanglewood.

Everywhere it's the same. At Chesterwood, the studio of Daniel Chester French (sculptor of the Lincoln Memorial) the Herman Katters of Yonkers and A. Schecters of Scarsdale share our guided tour. At Shaker Village at Hancock . . . Clark Art Institute in Williamstown . . . the Old Corner House of the Stockbridge Historical Society (the permanent home of Norman Rocke Rockwell's paintings) and the Stockbridge Playhouse . . . Westchesterites gravitate, congregate and celebrate.

JAMES DE PRIEST is conducting the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood. He crosses the stage on crutches — he was stricken with polio during a tour of Thailand — and we are reminded that his career has roots at the Westchester Music and Arts Camp at Croton.

De Priest was the camp's director of music in 1967. He had just completed a one-year stint as assistant conductor of the N.Y. Philharmonic and was between jobs. He was enormously popular at Croton and the camp wanted him back again the next year. But he said he was going to Europe to look for work.

In Holland De Priest sat on his crutches for 10 months before conducting jobs began filtering his way. One of this country's few black conductors, he has since led many of the world's major orchestras, among them the Philadelphia, Chicago, Washington, Rotterdam and Israel symphonies.

A GAGGLE OF college students from Westchester surrounds De Priest. "We studied with him at Croton," explains one bright-eyed youth. "This is a pilgrimage. He is Our Priest."

A refreshing breeze floods in through Tanglewood's open Music Shed, tempering the humidity. "There's something about the air here," says De Priest, taking a rehearsal break. "It's better even than Westchester."

"As I see it," he says "the air encourages colossal creativity."

The sculptor Daniel Chester French understood this too. "I live here six months of the year — in Heaven," wrote French. "The other six months I live, well — in New York."

The Standard-Star
NEW ROCHELLE, N.Y.
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
D. 21,009
AUG 31 1973

The Daily Times
MAMARONECK, N.Y.
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
D. 9,835
AUG 31 1973

The Citizen Register
OSSINING, N.Y.
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
D. 9,179
AUG 31 1973

CHICAGO SUN-TIMES
AUG 26 1973

New things are happening at traditional Tanglewood

By Martin Bernheimer

Tanglewood is a gorgeous, verdant 210-acre estate overlooking the serene ripples of Lake Mahkeenac in Massachusetts' Berkshire Hills. Emerson, Holmes and Melville met here, productively, in the 1850s. Nathaniel Hawthorne conceived his "Tanglewood Tales" and "Wonderbook" on the premises and actually finished "The House of the Seven Gables" while in residence. He complained, however, that the overwhelming beauty of the locale sometimes proved more distracting than inspiring.

Artists have been paying lip service to the same half-hearted lament ever since but in the 1930s their favored mode of expression became music and the venerable Boston Symphony had arrived.

It arrived at its summer home, literally, with a splash. The fateful day was Aug. 12, 1937. Serge Koussevitzky, the much feared and much adulated maestro, planned an all-Wagner program in a huge tent to celebrate the orchestra's acquisition of the grounds. In the middle of the "Ride of the Valkyries," however, there erupted the fiercest of extra-Wagnerian torrents. Thunder clapped, lightning bolted and the rains came. And came.

The mighty Koussevitzky, unaccustomed to the outrage of competition while he was on the podium, had to stop and start again three times. Adding injury to insult, some of the orchestra members soon found themselves incapacitated when their instruments got soaked. The second half of the program had to be altered at the last moment to accommodate a suddenly reduced ensemble.

The crusty and generous patrons of the arts were not amused. Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, a pillar among Berkshire samaritans, angrily commandeered the stage when the concert limped to an undignified end. "The storm," she told the audience, "has proven conclusively the need for a shed."

HER TIMING WAS excellent. Tanglewood soon got its shed, and the Berkshires got one of the most remarkable and most distinguished summer festivals in the world.

The Tanglewood shed seats approximately 6,000. It is a ruggedly simple structure, suggesting nothing so much as a fan-shaped airplane hangar with open sides. It also happens to be something of an acoustical wonder, for it projects the noble and mellow Boston Symphony sound unaided — not only throughout its own protected spaces but also on to the vast meadow outside.

Purists come to Tanglewood to listen seriously, inside the shed. The more casually inclined bring blankets and camp on the lawns — by the thousands, at $3 a head. They may not be able to see the orchestra, but they find consolation in birds, flowers, trees, stars, picnics and obvious romantic togetherness.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY uses Tanglewood not only for summer concerts, but also for a unique training ground known as the Berkshire Music Center.

While the artistic profile of the orchestral Bostonians remains reasonably conservative, the activities of the Music Center have become remarkably progressive. The school can boast an orchestra of its own, usually superb, which explores all sorts of esoterica when it isn't sampling repertory standards. The school also sponsors chamber music ad quasi-infinitum, puts on a forward-looking annual festival of contemporary music, hosts a pedagogical institute for high-school musicians, tinkers with far-out musical theater and sits still for the inevitable ego indulgences of composers forums.

EVEN AT ITS MOST experimental, Tanglewood always used to pride itself on dignity, on a prim Bostonian sense of decorum. In the early 1950s, guides habitually handed wrap-around skirts to any lady-visitor thoughtless enough to wear shorts. A carnival atmosphere was to be avoided at all costs, as were billboards, program puffery and rank commercial reminders of the outside world.

Today, Tanglewood is loosening up a bit. It still has a long way to go before it can compete with Hollywood Bowl in folksy appeal. But there are sobering danger signals.

Shorts are now permitted on the lawn, and on a sunny Sunday afternoon one can even spot a bikini or two. Modern abstract sculptures now dot the once austere promenades. Whereas, in the "good old days," Tanglewood habitues looked down collective noses at such low-brow manifestations as jazz and bop and pop, the Boston Symphony now sponsors Tuesday night appearances by Roberta Flack, Blood, Sweat and Tears, John Denver, Seals and Crofts, America and others. On hot days, the formerly superformal instrumentalists blithely play in shirtsleeves. And, horror of horrors, the music-and-book store next to the box office has taken to selling Tanglewood T-shirts and Linda Lovelace paperbacks right along with Beethoven scores, Ozawa records and Bernstein postcards.

Nothing is sacred.

Los Angeles Times

CYCLE
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 381,200
SEP 1973

Music lovers will of course want to visit Tanglewood, though by September the Boston Symphony will be back in Boston. Outdoorsmen have dozens of possible activities including trout fishing the Jambs in Winsor State Park, visiting the spectacular Bish Bash Falls near Mount Everett, or the Pleasant Valley Wildlife Sanctuary near Tanglewood. The Trial route crosses the Appalachian Trail several times and if the timing is right, it might be pleasant to hike a few miles of the Trail for a view of the Trial that few others will have. Don't for God's sake try to take a motorcycle up the Appalachian Trail!

The Three B's Of Tanglewood: Berkshires, Brahms, Bikinis

By MARTIN BERNHEIMER
The Los Angeles Times

LENOX, MASS. — Tanglewood is a gorgeous, verdant 210-acre estate overlooking the serene ripples of Lake Mahkeenac in the Berkshires. Emerson, Holmes and Melville met here, productively, in the 1850s. Nathaniel Hawthorne conceived his "Tanglewood Tales" and "Wonderbook" on the premises and actually finished "The House of the Seven Gables" while in residence.

He complained, however, that the overwhelming beauty of the locale sometimes proved more distracting than inspiring.

Artists have been paying lip service to the same half-hearted lament ever since, but in the 1930s, their favored mode of expression became music. The venerable Boston Symphony had arrived.

It arrived at its summer home, literally, with a splash. The fateful day was Aug. 12, 1937. Serge Koussevitzky, the much feared and much adulated maestro, planned an all-Wagner program in a huge tent to celebrate the orchestra's acquisition of the grounds. In the middle of the "Ride of the Valkyries," however, there erupted the fiercest of extra-Wagnerian torrents.

Thunder clapped, lighting bolted and the rains came. And came.

also on to the vast meadow outside.

Purists come to Tanglewood to listen seriously, inside the shed. The more casually inclined bring blankets and camp on the lawns —by the thousands (at $3 a head). They may not be able to see the orchestra, but they find consolation in birds, flowers, trees, stars, picnics and obvious romantic togetherness.

Both the insider and the outsider at Tanglewood can savor the music in its pristine state. There is no need for amplification here and, perhaps even more wonderous, there are no airplanes. Lenox is tucked far off in the western corner of Massachusetts, some 150 miles away from Boston and its busy flight patterns.

Tanglewood, in short, is a lovely place to hear music. I suspect it is an equally lovely place to make music.

In any case, it happens to be a most unusual place. The Boston Symphony uses Tanglewood not only for summer concerts, but also for a unique training ground known as the Berkshire Music Center. The symphony players form the nucleus of the faculty at this short-term, high-powered network of master classes.

The master classes are concerned with much more than the immediate interests of the Boston Symphony. Andre Watts is teaching a special piano symposium this summer, and Phyllis Curtin is repeating her incomparable seminar for young singers. I had an opportunity to spy on two recent sessions as this extraordinary soprano, using equal parts of charm and common sense plus uncanny physiological and psychological insights, turned at least four talented and befuddled young things into enlightened incipient artists. Dazzling.

While the artistic profile of the orchestral Bostonians remains reasonably conservative, the activities of the Music Center have become remarkably progressive. The school can boast an orchestra of its own, usually superb, which explores all sorts of esoterica when it isn't sampling repertory standards. The school also sponsors chamber music ad quasi-infinitum, puts on a forward-looking annual festival of contemporary music, hosts a pedagogical institute for high-school musicians, tinkers with far-out musical theater and sits still for the inevitable ego indulgences of composers forums.

Often, the most interesting performances at Tanglewood occur not with the symphony in the big, hopefully glamorous shed, but with the students in the little theater-concert hall nearby (capacity 1,200, not counting grass-sitters), or in the even littler chamber music hall (capacity 300), or even in one of the rehearsal barns.

Virtually everything happens at Tanglewood except ballet and "grand" opera. Ballet has never reared its pretty leg here, but there is no need. The Jacob's Pillow Festival is only 15 miles away. Conventional opera used to be an integral part of the scene, but it departed a few years ago, quietly and mysteriously, together with its champion-mentor Boris Goldovsky.

Even at its most experimental, Tanglewood always used to pride itself on dignity, on a prim Bostonian sense of decorum, if you will. When I first came here, in the early 1950s, guides habitually handed wrap-around skirts to any lady-visitor thoughtless enough to wear shorts. A carnival atmosphere was to be avoided at all costs, as were billboards, program puffery and rank commercial reminders of the outside world.

Today, Tanglewood is loosening up a bit. It still has a long way to go before it can compete with Hollywood Bowl in folksy appeal. But there are sobering danger signals.

Poughkeepsie Journal
POUGHKEEPSIE, N.Y.
SEP 4 1973

The mighty Koussevitzky, unaccustomed to the outrage of competition while he was on the podium, had to stop and start again. Three times. The audacious elements were upstaging him.

Adding injury to insult, some of the orchestra members soon found themselves incapacitated when their instruments got soaked. The second half of the program had to be altered at the last moment to accommodate a suddenly reduced ensemble.

The crusty and generous patrons of the arts were not amused. Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, a pillar among Berkshire samaritans, angrily commandeered the stage when the concert limped to an undignified end. "The storm," she told the audience, "has proved conclusively the need for a shed."

Her timing was excellent.

Tanglewood soon got its shed, and the Berkshires got one of the most remarkable and most distinguished summer festivals in the world.

The Tanglewood shed seats approximately 6,000. It is a ruggedly simple structure, suggesting nothing so much as a fan-shaped airplane hangar with open sides. It also happens to be something of an acoustical wonder, for it projects the noble and mellow sound unaided — not only throughout its own protected spaces but

Why Tanglewood's so lush

Where music adds to TLC of greenery

By Lorraine M. Lauzon

A current fad among greenthumbers is that in order to have lush gardens or beautiful potted plants, one must talk kindly to them. All growing things require more than sunshine, water, and fertilizer; they need tons of Tender Loving Care.

Speak kindly to your asters and zinnias, and they'll reward you by becoming so overwhelmingly gorgeous they'll take first prize at the county fair. Never argue in front of African violets or scream at tiger lilies, or they just might growl back and refuse to blossom.

Besides sweet talk it has been proven that music also has great charms not only for human beings but can work wonders on plants.

Potted philodendron placed near a piano will grow green and lush, covering the top and cascading down the sides. Your parlor can be a veritable greenhouse, that is, if the right kind of music is played.

All growing things are especially fond of Beethoven, also the light classics, a smattering of popular tunes, and even Rock will turn them on if not played too loudly.

Some scientific types claim it's the vibrations that aerate the soil, but you'll get an argument on this.

Nowhere is this magic more in evidence than at Tanglewood in Lenox. This is the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra where they have performed since 1937.

Tanglewood was the dream of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky to be used not only for outdoor productions but also as a music school offering opportunities to young musicians who come here from all over the world.

It is quite evident that not only is the audience appreciative, but so are the trees and bushes and flowers growing all over this 210-acre estate. The pine trees grow tall and full and stately towering over the place as though not to miss a single note.

Berlioz does surprising things to the maple trees there. Look sharply, and see the spruces sway to the tempo of a Strauss waltz. Birches grow to mammoth proportions, and the oaks and willows are unbelievable. They especially favor MacDowell and Sunday afternoon concerts.

It is possible to bring a blanket or chairs and sit on the lawn to listen and enjoy, and it is this grass at Tanglewood that is a sight to behold. Greener than the law should allow and devoid of weeds and crab grass, it covers the area like velvet wall to wall carpeting, proving too much to resist.

Shoes come tumbling off, and toes tend to wiggle out of sandals to feel the texture of this lawn. Over 100,000 people visit Tanglewood during a season, and technically that's 200,000 feet, yet that grass is still perfect at the end of the season. Blame it on Brahms.

There are profusions of flowers all tenderly cared for and crooned to by the gardener on location and his small army of assistants. And you can be sure they have plenty to do with the plants' richness.

Hundreds of red and white petunias lord over the crowds of geraniums, not to forget to mention the salvias, the ivy and the trumpeter vines. They blossom without provocation obviously enjoying a special Mozart Festival evening.

They are enormous healthy blossoms of astonishing hues and unheard of color combinations. These beauties predominate the Glass House, the small art gallery on the premises next to the book store. They are well within hearing distance of Chopin's concertos.

It is a garden of sheer happiness; every performance a moment of magic and very much appreciated by everyone who comes to the Berkshires in the summer.

HEATHER MACFARLAND, 1½, romps around some of the 5000 (count 'em) irises grown by her father, Craig MacFarland, in his Lexington yard. They're faded now, but in July there's no greater display of color than those of irises. (Globe photo by Joseph Dennehy)

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
S. 581.160

AUG 5 1973

New England Newsclip

A Berkshire bird's-eye view of its festival site

Leonard Bernstein as seen by Boston Symphony performers

Rehearsal break for Michael Tilson Thomas, Aaron Copland

Tanglewood memories: a picture book

By Louis Snyder

Tanglewood, by James R. Holland. Barre, Mass.: Barre Publishers, $4.95.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has already completed another Berkshire Festival, and its scenic home, Tanglewood, has been restored to the serenity and silence it enjoyed when Nathaniel Hawthorne spent a literarily productive year or so there in 1850-51. But for the many who include this historic site on their travel itineraries (there were more than 300,000 listener-visitors on hand for last summer's concerts), the memory of Tanglewood's musical and natural attractions is not a seasonal thing.

James R. Holland has put together a soft-cover booklet of almost 100 pages, with a foreword by conductor Michael Tilson Thomas, and more than 100 of his own photographs of musicians, audience, and the idyllic surroundings. There is a short preface also to describe the area's rich historical heritage, and the circumstances under which Tanglewood became the BSO's summer home away from home.

Whether of not one has picnicked on the lawns, or listened to the music prone on the grass or upright in the great Shed, the Holland book is a pleasant supplement to a unique musical experience. Or if the first trip to the Berkshires is still to come, it provides a preview of what one may expect to find on the heights above Lake Mahkeenac on a summer afternoon or evening.

The pictures themselves show the famous and the anonymous, all of whom fit into this single-purpose setting with equal aptitude. If the quality of reproduction of some of the photos is not as sharp as those in an earlier Holland book — "Mr. Pops," a move-by-move visual biography of Arthur Fiedler — the cloudiness, like Berkshire weather, is only temporary.

The Berks

Pittsfield, Massachusetts,

Joel Librizzi

RUSSIAN MUSICIANS began their second day in America this morning when they arrived at the Pittsfield airport. Berkshire Music Center administrator, Daniel Gustin, right, greeted Michail Zaretsky, front, Victor Yampolski, rear, and families.

Berkshire Eagle July 2nd

Tanglewood enrolls two Russian Jews

Two Russian Jewish musicians, beneficiaries of the Soviet Union's relaxed emigration requirements, arrived in Lenox today to begin an eight-week session with the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

"Leonard Bernstein told us the United States needed string players," said violist Michail Zaretsky in explaining how his and violinist Victor Yampolski's coming to the United States was expedited.

The two are the first Russians in the latest wave of emigration to study in the Tanglewood program. Both were recommended by Zubin Mehta, the India-born conductor of the Los Angeles Symphony Orchestra, and composer-conductor Bernstein, past music director of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

Eight-week program

According to the center administrator, Daniel R. Gustin, who welcomed the emigrant Russians and their families this morning at Pittsfield Airport, Bernstein recommended the BMC training to the two young musicians as the best opportunity the two would have to continue their music studies this summer in America.

Both Bernstein and Mehta are onetime music center students. In 1951, Bernstein succeeded Serge Koussevitzky as head of the center's conducting department.

The two families arrived in New York Monday, spent the night at Kennedy International Airport, and then flew to Pittsfield this morning, Gustin said they would begin familiarizing themselves with the fellowship program this afternoon. "It's only an eight-week program so we have to make it intensive," Gustin said.

Following their studies at Tanglewood, the two Muscovites will go to Dallas to perform with the Dallas Symphony Orchestra.

Zaretsky, 26, and Yampolski, 30, had been performing in Rome when they met Mehta and Bernstein. Their scheduled six-month stay in Rome was cut short after 2½ months when the two conductors began negotiations for their emigration to the USA.

Hyman Brickman, spokesman for the New York group which assists Jewish emigrants in the United States, said the departure of the two musicians and their families from Rome was speeded up by securing for them "conditional entry," a special provisional entry procedure designed specifically to benefit emigrants from Communist nations. His group, the United HIAS Service, will help the two families with settlement problems, Brickman said, and will assure they are introduced to Jewish communities wherever they live in the United States.

School provides house

In Lenox, the two families will live in a Hawthorne Street house put at their disposal by Windsor Mountain School, Gustin said.

Both men are married. Zaretsky has a 3-year-old daughter. Yampolski, a 5-year-old son and a year-old daughter.

Each of the four adults, Zaretsky said, had to pay 900 rubles, about $1,000, to secure his or her departure from the Soviet Union. This sum covered costs of the visa and a charge for terminating Soviet citizenship. There was no charge for their education, Zaretsky said.

Reduced tax

Before the recent announcement by the Soviet government that the tax on education had been at least temporarily suspended, Russian Jews with advanced education were paying $20,000 or more before being allowed to emigrate to Israel or Western countries.

Zaretsky said he believed the two families' departures were facilitated by the Russian-American detente and the Russian Communist party First Secretary Leonid Brezhnev's visit to the United States.

Until his emigration, Yampolski was first violinist and assistant conductor of the Moscow Philharmonic Orchestra and made tours in America with that orchestra. Zaretsky performed with the Moscow radio orchestra but has never been in America before.

Aside from Bernstein's remarks about Tanglewood, Zaretsky said his only knowledge of the music center came from an article in Amerika, a Russian-language periodical about the United States.

"But I've wanted to come to the United States for 10 years," he said.

TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM (E)
HOLYOKE, MASS.

JUL 9 1973 New England Newsclip

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
846,132

JUL 4 1973 New England Newsclip

Two Soviet Jews To Play at Lenox

Two Soviet musicians, both Jewish artists who were permitted to leave their country, arrived at Kennedy International Airport on Monday with their families and left yesterday afternoon for Lenox, Mass. There, on the recommendation of Leonard Bernstein, they have been accepted in the fellowship program of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood for the 1973 season, which recently got under way. The musicians are Victor Yampolski, 30, a violinist who was assistant conductor of the Moscow Philharmonic Orchestra, and Michael Zaretsky, 26, a violinist formerly with the Moscow Philharmonic Quartet and the Radio Orchestra of Moscow.

The musicians were auditioned by Mr. Bernstein in Rome, while the United Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society, the worldwide Jewish migration agency, was processing them for entrance into the United States and arranging for their transportation and resettlement. Zubin Mehta, conductor of the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra, who also auditioned the two musicians in Rome, said: "String players of this caliber are very badly needed in the United States."

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 24,500

JUL 12 1973 New England Newsclip

Soviet-Jewish Musicians Here for Tanglewood

NEW YORK — Two distinguished Soviet Musicians, both Jewish artists permitted to leave their country, arrived at Kennedy Airport with their families July 2 on their way to Tanglewood, where, on the recommendation of Leonard Bernstein, they have been accepted in the fellowship program of the Berkshire Music Center for the 1973 season.

They were auditioned by Mr. Bernstein in Rome while United Hias Service, the worldwide Jewish migration agency, was processing them for migration to the United States and making all the necessary arrangements for their transportation, reception and resettlement.

The newcomers were Victor Yampolski, 30, a violinist who was assistant conductor of the Moscow Philharmonic Orchestra and a one-time student of David Oistrach, and Michael Zaretsky, 26, a violinist formerly with the Moscow Philharmonic Quartet and the Radio Orchestra of Moscow.

Zubin Mehta, conductor of the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra, also auditioned the two artists in Rome, following which he wrote to United Hias Service: "I can say with absolute certainty that . . . they will both be absorbed immediately in any one of the major American symphony orchestras . . . string players of this caliber are very badly needed in the United States . . ."

Gaynor I. Jacobson, executive vice president of United Hias Service, reported that more than 800 Jewish refugees from Eastern Europe; over 700 of them from the Soviet Union, are now in Rome being assisted by his organization to migrate to the United States and other Western countries, mainly for family reunion. While in transit, the refugees are maintained by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee.

Two Russian Jews Playing Violins At Tanglewood

Two Russian Jewish musicians, beneficiaries of the Soviet Union's relaxed emigration requirements, arrived in Lenox to begin an eight-week session with the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

"Leonard Bernstein told us the United States needed string players," said violist Michail Zaretsky in explaining how his and violinist Victor Yampolski's coming to the United States was expedited.

The two are the first Russians in the latest wave of emigration to study in the Tanglewood program. Both were recommended by Zubin Mehta, the India-born conductor of the Los Angeles Symphony Orchestra, and composer-conductor Bernstein, past music director of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

FREE PRESS (M)
BURLINGTON, VT.
D. 46,859

JUL 5 1973 New England Newsclip

2 Jewish Musicians Arrive From Russia

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — The arrival of two Russian Jewish musicians for an eight week appearance at the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood is symptomatic of the recent thaw in U.S.-Soviet relations, one of the musicians said.

Violinists Michail Zaretsky, 26, and Victor Yampolski, 30, arrived at Pittsfield Airport Monday, after paying about $1,000 each for visas and to terminate their Russian citizenship. This amount is far below those paid by other Soviet Jews in emigration taxes.

Zaretsky, formerly a violinist with the Moscow Radio Orchestra said he believed the emigration of Yampolski was helped considerably by the apparent success of summit talks between President Nixon and Soviet Party Leader Leonid Brezhnev.

Zaretsky is married and the father of a three-year-old daughter. Yampolski, formerly assistant conductor of the Moscow Philharmonic Orchestra, is married with a five-year-old son and one-year-old daughter.

SUN (M)
LEWISTON, MAINE
D. 47,055

JUL 4 1973 New England Newsclip

Musicians From Russia Arrive at Tanglewood

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — The arrival of two Russian Jewish musicians for an eight week appearance at the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood is symptomatic of the recent thaw in U.S.-Soviet relations, one of the musicians said.

Violinists Michail Zaretsky, 26, and Victor Yampolski, 30, arrived at Pittsfield Airport Monday, after paying about $1,000 each for visas and to terminate their Russian citizenship. This amount is far below those paid by other Soviet Jews in emigration taxes.

Zaretsky, formerly a violinist with the Moscow Radio Orchestra said he believed the emigration of Yampolski was helped considerably by the apparent success of summit talks between President Nixon and Soviet Party Leader Leonid Brezhnev.

Zaretsky is married and the father of a three-year-old daughter. Yampolski, formerly assistant conductor of the Moscow Philharmonic Orchestra, is married with a five-year-old son and one-year-old daughter.

GLOBE (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,012

JUL 4 1973 New England Newsclip

Two Russians begin studies at Tanglewood

LENNOX — Two Russian Jews, both violinists in Moscow orchestras — arrived yesterday at Tanglewood to become students in the eight-week summer course at Berkshire Music Center.

"Leonard Bernstein told us the United States needed string players," said Michail Zaretsky, explaining how he and Victor Yampolski were allowed entry into the United States.

Zaretsky said he believed their departures from Russia with their families was facilitated by the Russian-American detente and the recent visit to the United States of Communist Party leader Leonid Brezhnev.

Yampolsky was first violinist and assistant conductor of the Moscow Philharmonic Orchestra, which had toured America. Zaretsky performed with the Moscow Radio Orchestra and had never been to America.

Both families arrived in New York Monday and flew to Pittsfield yesterday. Their acceptance as students at Berkshire was recommended by Zubin Mehta of India, conductor of the Los Angeles Syphony Orchestra, and Bernstein, former director of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

CONNECTICUT JEWISH LEDGER
HARTFORD, CONN.
W. 22,692

JUL 12 1973 New England Newsclip

Two Musicians Leave USSR For Tanglewood

NEW YORK (JTA) — Two Jewish musicians who recently received exit visas to leave the Soviet Union, arrived at Kennedy Airport with their families last week enroute to Tanglewood where they have been accepted in the fellowship program of the Berkshire Music Center for the 1973 season.

Victor Yampolski, 30, and Michael Zaretsky, 26, both violinists, were assisted in coming to the United States by the United Hias Service, which arranged their transportation, reception, and resettlement.

Yampolski had been assistant conductor of the Moscow Philharmonic Orchestra and is a former pupil of the Soviet violinist David Oistrach. Zaretsky formerly played with the Moscow Philharmonic Quartet and the Radio Orchestra of Moscow.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
S. 581,750

JUL 6 1973 New England Newsclip

Distinguished Soviets arrive at Tanglewood

Two distinguished Soviet musicians, both Jewish artists permitted to leave their country, have arrived at Tanglewood, where, on the recommendation of Leonard Bernstein, they have been accepted in the fellowship program of the Berkshire music center.

They were auditioned by Bernstein while a worldwide Jewish agency was processing them for migration to the United States and making arrangements for their resettlement.

The newcomers are Victor Yampolski, 30, a violinist who was assistant conductor of the Moscow Philharmonic Orchestra and a one-time student of David Oistrach, and Michael Zaretsky, 26, a violinist formerly with the Moscow Philharmonic Quartet and the Radio Orchestra of Moscow.

The Berks

Pittsfield, Massachusetts,

Joel Librizzi

RUSSIAN MUSICIANS began their second day in America this morning when they arrived at the Pittsfield airport. Berkshire Music Center administrator, Daniel Gustin, right, greeted Michail Zaretsky, front, Victor Yampolski, rear, and families.

Berkshire Eagle July 2nd

Tanglewood enrolls two Russian Jews

Two Russian Jewish musicians, beneficiaries of the Soviet Union's relaxed emigration requirements, arrived in Lenox today to begin an eight-week session with the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

"Leonard Bernstein told us the United States needed string players," said violist Michail Zaretsky in explaining how his and violinist Victor Yampolski's coming to the United States was expedited.

The two are the first Russians in the latest wave of emigration to study in the Tanglewood program. Both were recommended by Zubin Mehta, the India-born conductor of the Los Angeles Symphony Orchestra, and composer-conductor Bernstein, past music director of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

Eight-week program

According to the center administrator, Daniel R. Gustin, who welcomed the emigrant Russians and their families this morning at Pittsfield Airport, Bernstein recommended the BMC training to the two young musicians as the best opportunity the two would have to continue their music studies this summer in America.

Both Bernstein and Mehta are onetime music center students. In 1951, Bernstein succeeded Serge Koussevitzky as head of the center's conducting department.

The two families arrived in New York Monday, spent the night at Kennedy International Airport, and then flew to Pittsfield this morning. Gustin said they would begin familiarizing themselves with the fellowship program this afternoon. "It's only an eight-week program so we have to make it intensive," Gustin said.

Following their studies at Tanglewood, the two Muscovites will go to Dallas to perform with the Dallas Symphony Orchestra.

Zaretsky, 26, and Yampolski, 30, had been performing in Rome when they met Mehta and Bernstein. Their scheduled six-month stay in Rome was cut short after 2½ months when the two conductors began negotiations for their emigration to the USA.

Hyman Brickman, spokesman for the New York group which assists Jewish emigrants in the United States, said the departure of the two musicians and their families from Rome was speeded up by securing for them "conditional entry," a special provisional entry procedure designed specifically to benefit emigrants from Communist nations. His group, the United HIAS Service, will help the two families with settlement problems, Brickman said, and will assure they are introduced to Jewish communities wherever they live in the United States.

School provides house

In Lenox, the two families will live in a Hawthorne Street house put at their disposal by Windsor Mountain School, Gustin said.

Both men are married. Zaretsky has a 3-year-old daughter. Yampolski, a 5-year-old son and a year-old daughter.

Each of the four adults, Zaretsky said, had to pay 900 rubles, about $1,000, to secure his or her departure from the Soviet Union. This sum covered costs of the visa and a charge for terminating Soviet citizenship. There was no charge for their education, Zaretsky said.

Reduced tax

Before the recent announcement by the Soviet government that the tax on education had been at least temporarily suspended, Russian Jews with advanced education were paying $20,000 or more before being allowed to emigrate to Israel or Western countries.

Zaretsky said he believed the two families' departures were facilitated by the Russian-American detente and the Russian Communist party First Secretary Leonid Brezhnev's visit to the United States.

Until his emigration, Yampolski was first violinist and assistant conductor of the Moscow Philharmonic Orchestra and made tours in America with that orchestra. Zaretsky performed with the Moscow radio orchestra but has never been in America before.

Aside from Bernstein's remarks about Tanglewood, Zaretsky said his only knowledge of the music center came from an article in Amerika, a Russian-language periodical about the United States.

"But I've wanted to come to the United States for 10 years," he said.

TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM (O)
NEW YORK, MASS.
JUL 2 1973 New England Newsclip

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
846,132
JUL 4 1973 New England Newsclip

Two Soviet Jews To Play at Lenox

Two Soviet musicians, both Jewish artists who were permitted to leave their country, arrived at Kennedy International Airport on Monday with their families and left yesterday afternoon for Lenox, Mass. There, on the recommendation of Leonard Bernstein, they have been accepted in the fellowship program of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood for the 1973 season, which recently got under way. The musicians are Victor Yampolski, 30, a violinist who was assistant conductor of the Moscow Philharmonic Orchestra, and Michael Zaretsky, 26, a violinist formerly with the Moscow Philharmonic Quartet and the Radio Orchestra of Moscow.

The musicians were auditioned by Mr. Bernstein in Rome, while the United Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society, the worldwide Jewish migration agency, was processing them for entrance into the United States and arranging for their transportation and resettlement. Zubin Mehta, conductor of the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra, who also auditioned the two musicians in Rome, said: "String players of this caliber are very badly needed in the United States."

Two Russian Jews Playing Violins At Tanglewood

Two Russian Jewish musicians, beneficiaries of the Soviet Union's relaxed emigration requirements, arrived in Lenox to begin an eight-week session with the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

"Leonard Bernstein told us the United States needed string players," said violist Michail Zaretsky in explaining how his and violinist Victor Yampolski's coming to the United States was expedited.

The two are the first Russians in the latest wave of emigration to study in the Tanglewood program. Both were recommended by Zubin Mehta, the India-born conductor of the Los Angeles Symphony Orchestra, and composer-conductor Bernstein, past music director of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

GLOBE (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
JUL 4 1973 New England Newsclip

Two Russians begin studies at Tanglewood

LENNOX — Two Russian Jews, both violinists in Moscow orchestras — arrived yesterday at Tanglewood to become students in the eight-week summer course at Berkshire Music Center.

"Leonard Bernstein told us the United States needed string players," said Michail Zaretsky, explaining how he and Victor Yampolski were allowed entry into the United States.

Zaretsky said he believed their departures from Russia with their families was facilitated by the Russian-American detente and the recent visit to the United States of Communist Party leader Leonid Brezhnev.

Yampolsky was first violinist and assistant conductor of the Moscow Philharmonic Orchestra, which had toured America. Zaretsky performed with the Moscow Radio Orchestra and had never been to America.

Both families arrived in New York Monday and flew to Pittsfield yesterday. Their acceptance as students at Berkshire was recommended by Zubin Mehta of India, conductor of the Los Angeles Syphony Orchestra, and Bernstein, former director of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

FREE PRESS (M)
BURLINGTON, VT.
JUL 5 1973 New England Newsclip

2 Jewish Musicians Arrive From Russia

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — The arrival of two Russian Jewish musicians for an eight week appearance at the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood is symptomatic of the recent thaw in U.S.-Soviet relations, one of the musicians said.

Violinists Michail Zaretsky, 26, and Victor Yampolski, 30, arrived at Pittsfield Airport Monday, after paying about $1,000 each for visas and to terminate their Russian citizenship. This amount is far below those paid by other Soviet Jews in emigration taxes.

Zaretsky, formerly a violinist with the Moscow Radio Orchestra said he believed the emigration of Yampolski was helped considerably by the apparent success of summit talks between President Nixon and Soviet Party Leader Leonid Brezhnev.

Zaretsky is married and the father of a three-year-old daughter. Yampolski, formerly assistant conductor of the Moscow Philharmonic Orchestra, is married with a five-year-old son and one-year-old daughter.

CONNECTICUT JEWISH LEDGER
HARTFORD, CONN.
JUL 12 1973 New England Newsclip

Two Musicians Leave USSR For Tanglewood

NEW YORK (JTA) — Two Jewish musicians who recently received exit visas to leave the Soviet Union, arrived at Kennedy Airport with their families last week enroute to Tanglewood where they have been accepted in the fellowship program of the Berkshire Music Center for the 1973 season.

Victor Yampolski, 30, and Michael Zaretsky, 26, both violinists, were assisted in coming to the United States by the United Hias Service, which arranged their transportation, reception, and resettlement.

Yampolski had been assistant conductor of the Moscow Philharmonic Orchestra and is a former pupil of the Soviet violinist David Oistrach. Zaretsky formerly played with the Moscow Philharmonic Quartet and the Radio Orchestra of Moscow.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
JUL 12 1973 New England Newsclip

Soviet-Jewish Musicians Here for Tanglewood

NEW YORK — Two distinguished Soviet Musicians, both Jewish artists permitted to leave their country, arrived at Kennedy Airport with their families July 2 on their way to Tanglewood, where, on the recommendation of Leonard Bernstein, they have been accepted in the fellowship program of the Berkshire Music Center for the 1973 season.

They were auditioned by Mr. Bernstein in Rome while United Hias Service, the worldwide Jewish migration agency, was processing them for migration to the United States and making all the necessary arrangements for their transportation, reception and resettlement.

The newcomers were Victor Yampolski, 30, a violinist who was assistant conductor of the Moscow Philharmonic Orchestra and a one-time student of David Oistrach, and Michael Zaretsky, 26, a violinist formerly with the Moscow Philharmonic Quartet and the Radio Orchestra of Moscow.

Zubin Mehta, conductor of the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra, also auditioned the two artists in Rome, following which he wrote to United Hias Service: "I can say with absolute certainty that . . . they will both be absorbed immediately in any one of the major American symphony orchestras . . . string players of this caliber are very badly needed in the United States . . ."

Gaynor I. Jacobson, executive vice president of United Hias Service, reported that more than 800 Jewish refugees from Eastern Europe; over 700 of them from the Soviet Union, are now in Rome being assisted by his organization to migrate to the United States and other Western countries, mainly for family reunion. While in transit, the refugees are maintained by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee.

SUN (M)
LEWISTON, MAINE
JUL 4 1973 New England Newsclip

Musicians From Russia Arrive at Tanglewood

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — The arrival of two Russian Jewish musicians for an eight week appearance at the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood is symptomatic of the recent thaw in U.S.-Soviet relations, one of the musicians said.

Violinists Michail Zaretsky, 26, and Victor Yampolski, 30, arrived at Pittsfield Airport Monday, after paying about $1,000 each for visas and to terminate their Russian citizenship. This amount is far below those paid by other Soviet Jews in emigration taxes.

Zaretsky, formerly a violinist with the Moscow Radio Orchestra said he believed the emigration of Yampolski was helped considerably by the apparent success of summit talks between President Nixon and Soviet Party Leader Leonid Brezhnev.

Zaretsky is married and the father of a three-year-old daughter. Yampolski, formerly assistant conductor of the Moscow Philharmonic Orchestra, is married with a five-year-old son and one-year-old daughter.

Distinguished Soviets arrive at Tanglewood

Two distinguished Soviet musicians, both Jewish artists permitted to leave their country, have arrived at Tanglewood, where, on the recommendation of Leonard Bernstein, they have been accepted in the fellowship program of the Berkshire music center.

They were auditioned by Bernstein while a worldwide Jewish agency was processing them for migration to the United States and making arrangements for their resettlement.

The newcomers are Victor Yampolski, 30, a violinist who was assistant conductor of the Moscow Philharmonic Orchestra and a one-time student of David Oistrach, and Michael Zaretsky, 26, a violinist formerly with the Moscow Philharmonic Quartet and the Radio Orchestra of Moscow.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
1973 New England Newsclip

REUNION IN BOSTON — A Jewish family from Odessa in the Soviet Union was reunited at Logan Airport Aug. 29. (Top photo) Mrs. Ela Kislin (right) and her son Arnold greeted her daughter Zelig Flaschtatz (left), his wife Riorita (center) and their daughter Angela, and Mrs. Kislin's father and mother, Slomo and Tania Flaschtatz. (Bottom) Mrs. Kislin, her son and her husband, Michail, who arrived a week earlier in Boston, are greeted on their stopover in New York by Harry Berse, chairman of the National Council of United Hias Service, which has responsibility for the transportation and resettlement of Jewish immigrants in nations other than Israel. The three families, now living in the Brighton-Allston area, are among 20-25 families from the Soviet Union who are being resettled in Boston this year by the Jewish Family and Children's Service, under a $60,000 grant from the Combined Jewish Philanthropies of Greater Boston.

By MADELYN BELL WISNIA

For the first time in many decades, Russian Jews are once again coming to Boston.

The Jewish Family & Children's Service, a constituent agency of the Combined Jewish Philanthropies of Greater Boston, has settled 17 families within the past few months. More are on the way. At least 24 additional families are expected to arrive in Boston within the next year.

Included in the group are a furrier, a butcher, and a hairdresser, as well as several doctors, musicians, a dentist, a psychiatrist and engineers. Most of the wives were employed in various professions in Russia.

"There was $40,000 in our budget allocated for the arrival of new Americans in June," Simon Krakow, Executive Director of JF & CS, explained.

"When the Russians were granted immigrant status, the Executive Committee of CJP allocated an additional $60,000 for resettlement expenses. How much more it will cost depends on how rapidly the remaining families are allowed to come to the United States.

"The drain on the physical as well as the financial resources of the agency was tremendous," Krakow continued. Eleven families arrived within two weeks, with another six immediately thereafter.

"Staff had to be transferred, and everyone worked on an emergency basis to get the families settled," he added.

Now living in Allston, Brookline and Brighton, the Soviet group is attempting to make the difficult adjustment to life in a veritable "new world."

The language barrier is more difficult for the Russians than it has been for Jews from other nations. They speak almost no English, and no Yiddish either; interpreters are needed for the simplest exchanges.

The Russians' high level of professionalism works both as an advantage and disadvantage. Doctors, dentists and lawyers, for example, need extensive retraining to pass the examinations governing their professions. It's not easy to work as an orderly in a state hospital, studying nights, after a career as a prominent physician in another country.

Not only do they have to master a new language, but they must learn the vocabulary of a sophisticated profession as well.

But the strong personal motivation and intelligence which marked their success in Russia is still present, and they are eager to meet the challenges of "making it in America."

The story of the Russian influx began in June, when U.S. Attorney General Elliot Richardson signed a "parole" lifting immigration restrictions on the Russian Jews. (This is an emergency measure used in times of crisis, as after the Hungarian and Cuban uprisings.)

Of more than 60,000 Jews leaving Russia, about 800 elected to come to America instead of Israel. They were being cared for by the Joint Distribution Agency (a CJP beneficiary) in Rome—some for many months. Following the parole, Jewish communities across the nation agreed to share the responsibility for their resettlement.

In Boston, JF & CS sprang into action. "Agency assurance" was given for each family. JF & CS accepts full financial responsibility for the new immigrants. Apartments are located and furnished at a time when the city was filling rapidly with students seeking housing. (As they have in the past, members of the JF & CS Women's Committee will handle the furnishing.) A social worker is assigned to each family, and must become familiar with its particular needs.

Other CJP agencies help: Beth Israel Hospital furnished medical care, and the Jewish Vocational Service aids in job placement.

For two young musicians, the job of JF&CS will be a relatively easy one. One is Victor Yampolski, a 30-year-old violinist who studied at the Moscow Academy of Music under David Oistrakh and served as an assistant conductor of the Moscow Philharmonic Orchestra. The other, 27-year-old Michael Zaretsky, studied viola at the Moscow Academy.

While waiting in Rome, they learned that Leonard Bernstein was going to conduct at the Vatican. The arranged to audition for him, and on the strength of Bernstein's recommendations, received fellowships to Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Both applied to fill vacancies in the BSO string section, and after auditions, were hired and will be playing as permanent members of the orchestra.

The Russians range in age from small babies to 70-year-old grandparents. Included are three families who are related. All are acquainted, having shared the long wait in Rome together.

The feelings of the Boston community toward the Russian Jews was best expressed by a local landlord who stated, "Whatever they ask me for I'm delighted to do. After all, they gave up everything to come here. They're entitled to all the help I can give."

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 24,500

SEP 20 1973 New England Newsclip

REUNION IN BOSTON

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 24,500

SEP 20 1973 New England Newsclip

Two Russian Emigres Join Boston Symphony

Among the new members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this Fall are two recent emigres from the Soviet Union, Victor Yampolsky, violin, and Michael Zaretsky, viola.

Mr. Yampolsky was born in 1942 in Frunze, Soviet Socialist Republic of Kirgizia, where his parents had temporarily relocated in order to escape the wartime dangers of Moscow. His mother and father were pianists, the latter a frequent chamber music partner of David Oistrakh. Mr. Yampolsky began his musical studies at age seven when he enrolled as a violin student at the Central Music School in Moscow. His teacher was Michael Garlitsky, with whom he continued his studies at the College of the Moscow Conservatory, from which he received a diploma in 1961. From then until 1966 he studied with David Oistrakh at the Moscow State Conservatory, meanwhile accepting, in 1965, a position as violinist with the Moscow Philharmonic. In 1968 he began to study conducting under the supervision of Nicolai Rabinovich of the Lenigrad Conservatory. In December 1970 he became assistant conductor, under Kiril Kondrashin, of the Moscow Philharmonic.

Mr. Yampolsky left Russia in 1973 to immigrate to Israel, and it was during a stopover in Vienna that he decided to come to the United States instead. He spent the past summer at Tanglewood as a member of the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, and it was at this time that he successfully auditioned for the Boston Symphony. Mr. Yampolsky is no stranger to Boston. He was here in two previous occasions, in 1965 and 1970, as a participant in United States tours of the Moscow Philharmonic.

Mr. Zaretsky was born in Polonoe, Republic of the Ukraine, in 1946. His musical studies began in 1953 at the Central Music School, Moscow, where he studied with Ulia Breidburg. In 1970 he continued his education at the Moscow State Conservatory, where his teacher was Michael Terian. At this same time he became a member of the Moscow Philharmonic String Quartet and later of the Moscow Broadcasting Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Zaretsky left Russia in 1972 in order to immigrate to Israel. He spent ten months in that country, where he became principal violist of the Jerusalem Broadcasting Orchestra and a soloist of Radio Israel. Following that he decided to come to the United States.

It was in Rome, while awaiting approval of his visa application, that he came to the attention of two American musicians who proved to be of valuable assistance. Mr. Zaretsky and his compatriot Mr. Yampolsky auditioned for Zubin Mehta and Leonard Bernstein. Mr. Mehta then enlisted the support of United HIAS Service in their behalf, while Mr. Bernstein recommended them for fellowship study at Tanglewood this past summer. It was while a member of the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra at Tanglewood that Mr. Zaretsky also successfully auditioned for the Boston Symphony.

The Ann Arbor News
ANN ARBOR, MICH.
D. 39,589

SEP 2 1973

Boston Orchestra Hires Russians

By Alexander Fried

In the United States and Western Europe there's said to be a long-standing shortage of fine orchestra string players.

Hence it has become a common practice for some European orchestras — notably the Amsterdam Concertgebouw — to engage Japanese players or sometimes Indonesians or Koreans when necessary. Any number of such Oriental talents do their advanced study in America and Europe.

Meantime the Boston Symphony, which like the San Francisco Symphony has Seiji Ozawa as its director, has just recruited a couple of highly trained, experienced strings from an unusual source, Soviet Russia.

According to a Boston Symphony announcement, among three new string appointees have been American cellist Martha Babcock and a Soviet violinist and a violist, both of whom emigrated from Russia with an intention of settling in Israel.

The Russian players are Victor Yampolsky and Michael Zaretzky. The former's teachers included David Oistrakh. Both have held good posts in Soviet orchestras.

Yampolsky left the USSR this year, passed through Vienna and spent this summer in the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra at Tanglewood, Mass.

Zaretsky left the USSR in 1972, played orchestrally and as soloist for 10 months in Jerusalem and likewise wound up at Tanglewood. Like Yampolsky he won the praise and aid of such musicians as conductors Zubin Mehta and Leonard Bernstein.

In acquiring the two former Soviet players, the Boston Symphony undoubtedly followed standard practices, involving stiff competitive auditions and Musicians' Union rules.

As to the scarcity of string players, one theory is that string talents in late years have tended to build careers in other fields. Another reason, particularly in this country, would be that the demand for strings has increased because there are so many more orchestras than there used to be.

UP COUNTRY
PITTSFIELD, MASS.

SEP 1973

Music

A successful summer

BY IRWIN SHAINMAN

By most measurements that are meaningful to management, this summer in music has to be considered successful, in spite of heat waves, competition from Watergate, cloudbursts, and a few last-minute cancellations due to indisposition and illness. Inflation and gasoline shortages to the contrary, attendance at places offering high quality music has been up, perhaps suggesting that more people than we generally credit are interested in a type of cultural attraction not ordinarily available in their hometown concert halls or on TV. It also might mean that all those horror stories about prices in Europe have kept more people seeing America first.

The Saratoga Performing Arts Center reports its third biggest ballet season ever, with one matinee performance of Felix Mendelssohn's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," danced by the New York City Ballet, drawing 5,303 people. In fact, during one week of that particular offering, over 24,000 attended. The Philadelphia Orchestra weekend of Aug. 3-5 drew 38,053 customers to all attractions, including a "pop" program, with over 15,000 showing up specifically for the orchestra.

Lake George Opera is up 120 per cent over last season. A vigorous subscription drive, more local support, popular but not overly simple repertoire, and just plain good high-quality performances seem to have made the difference. For example, their production of the American opera "The Crucible" was absolutely stunning, and don't be surprised if the name and voice of Catherine Malfitano are heard from soon again. The Marlboro concerts were as usual sold out completely before the season even started, suggesting, among other things, that Rudolf Serkin & Co. have the right combination and shouldn't need too much encouragement to hold on to it.

Tanglewood is also ahead of last year, despite more than the usual headaches involving substitutions (Fruhbeck de Burgos, William Steinberg and James King), the heat wave during the week of Aug. 6, and an unprogrammed storm scene and brief power failure on Friday, Aug. 10. My impression is that the small-scale concerts of the first three weeks were better than usually attended, and were performed with clarity and care. The Friday evening "Weekend Preludes," with opportunities for picnicking on the lawn, are certainly a plus factor. Those large, early-season audiences were rewarded with hearing two brilliant new members of the orchestra's wind ensemble: horn player Charles Kovaloski and clarinetist Harold Wright. Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein continues to grow in stature as a player, conductor, liason man, and all-around utility infielder. The Beethoven concert on Saturday, July 21 was a veritable love affair between Eugene Ormandy and the BSO. They both obviously tried, with admirable success, to convince each other that they truly belonged in the big time. What a difference it can make when an entire orchestra gets psyched up for a performance. Beethoven's noble "Ninth" never sounded better.

Although some of the theatre productions during August's Contemporary Music Week at Tanglewood were packed, the audiences for several of the Fromm mostly-instrumental programs were relatively small. I'm not sure that this should be simply interpreted as a lack of interest, since Fromm, as well as other somewhat similar programs, has had a really positive effect on the all-year-round performance of small-scale new music, particularly on university campuses. What, a few seasons ago, used to be a unique opportunity, now is widely available for those who wish to seek it out.

Joseph Silverstein

Having several times raised the question of the crying need for more performances of contemporary music, I have to state that there have been some quite important and significant examples, especially by young composers, in this area during the summer, though still not done by major orchestras or before large crowds. After attending some Fromm concerts at Tanglewood and other performances featuring examples of leading compositional trends, I would honestly have to register disappointment with the results. One had the strong feeling that composers, especially those protected by the relative security of academic life, were more interested in intellectual than aural and emotional responses, resulting in an unavoidable contrived quality. Most of the pieces I heard — generally fitting into what is called the post-Webern era — sounded really quite old fashioned. How many more times is some young composer going to write that de-da-da-de violin figure that Shoenberg used in 1924 and Alban Berg immortalized in his opera "Wozzeck" with the words "wir arme leute" (we poor people)? It disturbs me to think that musicians who often criticize concert audiences for demanding, usually getting, music that sounds familiar, end up writing compositions that sound so like each other and have so little individuality. So many pieces emerge as quite pretentious, much too long for the quality of their ideas, and in many cases almost totally lacking in contrast. Pieces that start slowly go on and end that way. Multi-movement works often give us three parts that are similar in tempo, or use texts that all evoke the same mood.

This is not necessarily a new phenomenon. In the late '40s and early '50s, the desire to be part of the "counterpoint at any price" parade was strong. The number of composers that wrote final movements derivative of Roy Harris's "Third Symphony" were legion. But eventually they got over their self-consciousness, and some music of real stature resulted. I think we have now reached another bench-mark in our musical development. Maybe we're ready for a new neo-Romantic era? Composers are simply going to have to stop writing to impress each other and regarding the large public orchestral concert as non-relevant. If the time ever comes when the Boston Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra are willing to make more than just a token gesture toward really new music, then it behooves the composers of our time to be willing to, at least, meet them half way.

RECORDER (E)
GREENFIELD, MASS.
11,723

SEP 9 1973

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (E)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
35,000

AUG 29 1973

Tanglewood Shows Gain

LENOX, Mass. (AP) — Total attendance at Tanglewood showed a 23 per cent increase over 1972, and established an all time record, officials said Sunday.

Weekend attendance at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was 29,490 for the 1973 season.

That brought the total summer attendance for all musical events to 313,774.

Russian musicians beginning new life with BSO

By Susan Besaw

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra returns to its winter home in Symphony Hall in Boston this week, two new members celebrating their ninth week and a new life in America, will begin the long hours of practicing both their music and a new language.

Excited to be in BSO

Victor Yampolski and Michail Zaretsky, Jewish emigrants from the Soviet Union, arrived in the United States on July 3 to study in the fellowship program at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood. They are seemingly quiet, gentle men, but when they recalled their happiness and pride at becoming members of the orchestra, the words tumbled over each other; the English tenses all mixed up, their faces a study in frustration and their hands trying to do what the tongue could not.

An interpreter stood by but, realizing the importance of what they were about to say, the musicians waved him away and managed slowly, "We are very, very happy to be in America and part of one of the best symphonies in the world."

They shook their heads when asked if they had thought they would be selected. The rigorous fellowship program did not leave them much opportunity to practice for the day-long tryout, when they would be competing with other qualified musicians from all over the world.

Yampolski, a violinist who also likes to try his hand at conducting, auditioned and made the BSO from a field of 33 candidates July 17. The two friends celebrated the Russian way with some native vodka. But after Zaretsky was chosen Aug. 15 from among 21 violists, in their own words, "We could now really relax." They apparently did so by bringing out the extra bottle of vodka.

Friends in music school

The two Russians were friends when they studied at the Moscow Academy of Music and later as members of the Moscow Philharmonic Orchestra. Their joint arrival at Tanglewood involves more than a little luck and, for them, the happiest of coincidences.

Despite the difficulties of life as refugees, good fortune favored them as soon as they left the Soviet Union. Both were en route to Israel, which is the customary way for Russian Jews to finally reach the United States. Zaretsky was in Tel Aviv, but Yampolski asked the Jewish organization that was helping him, Sohnut, if it was possible to avoid Israel and travel straight to Vienna and thence to America. Sohnut, which handles only immigrants to Israel, turned the case over to the HIAS service, which has its world headquarters in New York.

Whitestone

Michail Zaretsky, at left, and Victor Yampolski

Both families finally arrived at an immigrant pension in Rome, overjoyed to be reunited with friends in an alien land. HIAS told them it would be seven or eight months before their visas to this country would be processed, but the two became impatient when they saw all the advertisements of the need for string players all over the world.

The real break came when Radu Aldulesku, a Romanian immigrant and cellist in the Rome Radio Orchestra, befriended them and arranged a meeting with conductors Zubin Mehta and Leonard Bernstein, both former students at the Berkshire Music Center. Mehta, the India-born conductor of the Los Angeles Symphony Orchestra, had to fly between Milan and Rome every day for rehearsals, but made time to hear the musicians play. He was so impressed that he decided to personally endorse the two per- writing a letter to HIAS in New York to speed up their arrival.

He also asked HIAS to furnish new instruments for the Russians, which it refused to do. But a violinmaker in Rome, hearing them try some of his instruments in his store, gave them a 30 per cent discount.

Aldulesku also arranged a meeting with Bernstein, past music director of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra. At that time, Bernstein was rehearsing for his "Mass" in the Vatican but said he would give the Russians five minutes in a back room. But the minutes stretched into a half-hour while he listened to the musicians play Bach solos.

Now the two famous conductors, the American Embassy, various immigration officials and the HIAS director made a concerted effort to speed up their departure, which was accomplished only 10 days after the meeting with Bernstein.

"The HIAS people," said Zaretsky, "told me Bernstein did the impossible. Only he could have done it."

On the basis of the conductor's recommendations, several orchestras expressed more than idle interest. The Dallas Symphony even sent a contract without an audition.

Wives like high fashion

But the pair were convinced by Mehta and Bernstein that Tanglewood was the best place to continue their music studies. On the basis of their testimonials and an article in Amerika, a Russian magazine about the United States, they set out with their families for the long voyage.

When they walked from the plane at Pittsfield Municipal Airport, it was evident that their wives, at least, had enjoyed their first taste of high fashion in Rome. Their wardrobe was a curious mixture of simple, functional Russian design and the latest platform shoes from Italy with matching handbags. The three children were wide-eyed and curious about the strangers that they could not understand.

The people at Tanglewood have since advised the families on stores and American products, so they have become more accustomed to the types and wide variety of foods. "In the beginning we bought everything to test it," said the two musicians laughing, "but have since learned to choose."

Zaretsky said recently he went into a few stores to buy a sweater, but the selection was so overwhelming that he walked out without buying anything.

This was Zaretsky's first trip to the States, but Yampolski had visited North America twice before on tour with the Moscow Philharmonic. His wife, Tatjana, had lived here at a very young age while her father worked in Washington.

"She remembers cookies, ice cream and candy from her stay," said Yampolski.

The musicians were most impressed with conductor Seiji Ozawa and with Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, who has given them private lessons twice during the summer. They were also amazed by the BMC's orchestra, with its international roster of students. In Russia, they explained, music education begins in elementary school, and each student is trained for a certain niche in the music world. A musician becomes very good at solo playing with one instrument but has a difficult time adjusting to being just another member of the string section in an orchestra.

Zaretsky commented, "I think it is good that here a young musician learns all kinds of music — instrument playing, conducting, composing — and doesn't set out to be just a violinist or a violist." He also said the rotating schedule of conductor and first instrumentalists at the BMC was a first in his experience.

HIAS has continued to help them through their branch in Boston, called the Jewish Family and Children's Service. They now have an apartment in Brookline, a school for their children and an introduction to the community through HIAS.

But the burden of adjustment remains within themselves. To be suddenly uprooted from their homeland; to be forced to sell many of their belongings, including their beloved instruments, to finance their visas and to terminate their Soviet citizenships; to be completely separated from all remaining relatives and friends; to make a new home in a land which has been traditionally diametrically opposed to all their teachings since birth; and to make this long and arduous journey with wives who speak no English and very young children, has been harder than they care to admit. But they have adapted well, so much so that they have become almost "Americanized," and the only traces of their heritage are in their heavy accents and their fond and disturbing memories.

They are looking now only to a long and successful future with the BSO and, maybe later, citizenship in a creatively free land.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
S. 207,21
SEP 2 1973
New England Newsclip

Many Outstanding Performances at Tanglewood

Springfield Daily News
The Arts
20 SPRINGFIELD, MASS., THURSDAY, AUGUST 30, 1973

Safford

Of Lenox and B.S.O. in R.I.

THE MAIN TROUBLE WITH summer music festivals, the big ones, anyway, is getting to them. Popularity begets clogged highways.

The Berkshire Music Festival was founded 39 years ago and moved to its present site at Tanglewood on the outskirts of Lenox, Mass., three years later. To get there from any direction you still have to travel two-lane roads. Weekend traffic gets pretty thick, especially through Lenox.

That was the horrifying example selectmen and other folk in nearby Great Barrington threw up in the face of a baroque festival and institute held there over three weeks in June. You may have read about it.

If not, an investment banker named Lee M. Elman now owns Aston Magna, formerly the 50-acre summer home of violinist Albert Spalding. Elman has established the Aston Magna Foundation for the purpose of forming courses of study in baroque performance practice and holding concerts.

While people of the caliber of harpsichordist Albert Fuller were on the faculty and announced to give the concerts, Elman's neighbors clamored against even the anticipated audiences of 125. "Tanglewood traffic!" Concerts were transferred to a welcoming Episcopalian church in the business district.

Elman, who seems not to have prepared Great Barrington for his enterprise very well, sued. His case comes up in October.

Meanwhile Lenox endured its Tanglewood traffic with apparent equanimity. And approximate figures show attendance was up 5 per cent from 1972 for weekend festival concerts and up 23 per cent for total attendance, including Tanglewood-on-Parade, the Pops and the Popular Artist Series. All told, some 313,774 came to Tanglewood this summer, an increase of 60,348 over 1972.

You talk to people like the manager of Dee's Department Store and she responds to the story of a friend for whom it took two hours to get from the center of Lenox to Tanglewood, a distance perhaps of a mile.

"Oh," she says good naturedly, "that must have been the Beethoven weekend. There was a pop concert at the Lenox Arts Center, too. I couldn't get out of the driveway to go home until a policeman finally saw me and let me through. The only serious trouble we've had was with the hard rock concerts a few years ago down there."

The final concerts last Friday night through Sunday afternoon saw the seven thousand seat music shed filled and surrounding lawns well occupied. Nobody looked disgruntled; in fact delight appeared the general reaction to being there, heavy traffic or not.

Holding greatest advance interest of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season's programs were Friday's and Sunday's, each reflective of the romantic revival and each conducted by Seiji Ozawa. Most romantic of all was Friday.

(This is the final item of a two-part article on this past season at Tanglewood.)

By RICHARD CONWAY

"Let me see, Outstanding performances." He set the cold draft on the bar. "Well, how about Harold Wright's performance of that Mozart Clarinet concerto? That second movement was just incredibly lovely. Like some kind of mountain top experience."

I thought for a moment.

"I think if I had to choose one concert as the outstanding one that would be it, it was one of those nights when one thing seemed to be better than the one that preceded it. Remember it began with Malcolm Frager's Weekend Prelude?"

"Yes. Two piano sonatas by Haydn and one by Mozart. The Haydn just sparkled with joy and vibrancy. They were played with such great clarity. I was so taken with the wonderfully expressive use of the left hand."

"Right. And then Charles Kavaloski opened the regular concert with that Mozart Horn concerto. And I thought to myself that this would be the thrust of my review."

"And then Wright played the Clarinet piece. And you knew that here was something special."

"And then Joe Silverstein and Burton Fine did that Mozart piece for violin and viola, and that was great too. And everybody seemed to sense that they were in on a very special concert — Ozawa, the guys in the orchestra, the audience. It was some kind of experience."

He took a long drink from his glass.

"You know, slow second movements were something special all summer long. The pianissimo playing of the orchestra was so luminous."

"It certainly was," I agreed. "And a few weeks later there was Joe Silverstein's beautiful playing of a Mozart Violin concerto, and the second movement of that one was outstanding.

"I've said it before, I know, but I always enjoy the early weeks at Tanglewood. That's when they tend to do orchestral works of chamber dimensions, and the guys in the orchestra get to play these wonderful clarinet, and horn, and oboe concertos, and they're just great. Stuff that we seldom get to hear in the Springfield area.

"By the way, make sure that you don't miss Andre Watts when he plays with the Springfield Symphony this season. He did a wonderful Prelude concert too, and was outstanding playing Franck and Liszt a week ago."

"I didn't get to hear that one. But wasn't that performance of the Berlioz "Fantastique" something? That marvelous waltz in the second movement, or the grotesqueness of the Witches' sabbath? And I had never heard the companion piece, the 'Lelio'," he said.

"No, neither had I. It's really quite a dramatic piece. Certainly one of the highlights of the season for me."

"What did you think of the Verdi Requiem today? Wasn't that chorus work great?"

"That Dies Irae was thrilling wasn't it? And the wonderful dynamic contrasts in the last movement, the Libera Me? But, you know, a lot of the solo work just didn't make it for me; and, on the whole, I found the Verdi rather anti-climactic. I guess the 'Messiah' was still too much with me."

"Well, shall we descend from the mountain-top?"

"Yeah, I guess I gotta go to work."

The Standard-Star
NEW ROCHELLE, N.Y.
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
D. 21,059
AUG 24 1973

The Daily Argus
MOUNT VERNON, N.Y.
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
D. 19,256
AUG 24 1973

The Daily Times
MAMARONECK, N.Y.
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
D. 9,835
AUG 24 1973

THE REPORTER DISPATCH
WHITE PLAINS, N.Y.
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
D. 46,556
AUG 24 1973

That had the Berlioz Fantastic Symphony in a remarkably lucid performance with Ozawa eliciting almost chamber clarity, followed by its heart on the sleeve sequel, Lelio, or the Return to Life. Michael Wager was the poetic, frock suited narrator, Mallory Walker and Victor Braun the good tenor and baritone soloists.

Also present was the Tanglewood Festival Chorus which John Oliver has developed into a truly distinguished ensemble. Again during the Verdi Requiem on Sunday it was in superlative form, fully responsive to Ozawa.

Soloists then were Lou Ann Wyckoff, adequate to the assignment, Maureen Forrester and Seth McCoy, both superior, and Ezio Flagello, whose bass delivery was a bit unresonant but whose delivery was contributing. The orchestra, too, behaved effectively under Ozawa's dynamic shadings.

James De Priest, the black associate conductor of the National Symphony, led Saturday night's performance, opening with a beautifully constructed prelude to Mussorgsky's Khovanghchina. Byron Janis' playing in the Rachmaninoff third piano concerto was notable for the intimate, glistening passage work. Shostakovich's fifth symphony was no more convincing than usual, yet entertaining in the last movement especially.

The weekend produced also an announcement of the Boston Symphony's Providence season, to open Nov. 1 with Ozawa conducting the infrequently heard Rachmaninoff third symphony, Gunther Schuller's Capriccio stravagante and Debussy's La Mer.

Michael Tilson-Thomas is listed for the Dec. 6 concert, conducting Bach's Suite No. 3, Piston's flute concerto, with Doriot Anthony Dwyer, and the Brahms second piano concerto, with Malcolm Frager. The third and last program will be Feb. 28 under Okko Kamu, who will direct the Beethoven fourth symphony, the symphony of Sallinen and Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel.

Before not too long after that plans will be in the works for next summer's Berkshire Festival. So far as parking is concerned there is good news. A new lot will be open across the street to the north of Tanglewood.

ARTHUR FIEDLER CONDUCTS AT TANGLEWOOD
. . .applause followed every movement

Tanglewood breaks all previous records

Louisa Kreisberg

LENOX, Mass. — The night was three-quarter-mooned and the light so bright and sweet it was painful. Outlines and edges were razor sharp. And under Tanglewood's Music Shed, Arthur Fiedler was doing what he does better than anyone in the world—popularizing the classics.

Fiedler is 79 going on 37 and if you ran him for president he might just win. The Viennese virtuoso has led the Boston "Pops" for 43 years. Under his direction the orchestra has made more recordings than any in the world. The total sales of "Pops" albums, singles, tapes and cassettes hover around 50 million. . .one million recordings alone of Gade's "Jalousie."

FIEDLER WAS making the first of two appearances this week at the Berkshire Music Festival and the crowd was thick with interesting types. Germaine Greer-like females and Norman Mailer-like males. An usher paging William Buckley. A grandmother reading "Jonathan Livingston Seagull." Three nuns in miniskirts. A black executive bearing a bouquet of plastic flowers as a present to Fiedler. Box holders in white summer tux eyeing denimed teens singing Bob Dylan numbers a cappella at intermission.

And. . .hordes of Japanese with a yen for western symphonic music. Americans have so devalued the dollar that Japanese tourists are surfacing in droves from Lenox Hill, to Lenox, Mass.

THIS PAST winter Japanese buyers snapped up millions of dollars in fine art at Parke Bernet auctions and this summer they're snapping up millions of notes of fine music at festivals throughout the Berkshires.

Tanglewood is a mecca for orientals. "We have nothing like this," one Japanese tourist told me. By "this" he meant not only the music festival but Seiji Ozawa, its artistic director who will begin his first season as music director of the Boston Symphony this fall.

Ozawa was born in Hoten, Manchuria, in 1935 and graduated from the Toho School of Music in Tokyo. There is no American-born, American-trained conductor who can boast a similar position in Japan.

Yet Ozawa seems more occidental than oriental. Hovering near Arthur Fielder Saturday night, Ozawa talked about how the landscape at Tanglewood brings out the best in artists and audiences.

"Melville wrote "Moby Dick" here," Ozawa said with reverence. Hawthorne completed "The House of Seven Gables." And the Boston Symphony has summered here since 1934.

"We've broken all previous attendance records at Tanglewood this year," Ozawa smiled, estimating total single admissions at more than 300,000.

CERTAINLY TANGLEWOOD brings out the best in Arthur Fiedler. Snaking his way across the stage Saturday, sporting a yellow jacket and black tie, looking, if possible, more healthy than Dave Whottle, Fiedler leaped—not stepped—onto the podium.

Talk about Super Energy. Fiedler grew younger, not older, as he conducted. The white-haired maestro gave the audience exactly what it wanted: old standards like Dvorak's "New World Symphony," Rachmaninoff's Second Piano Concerto (with Earl Wild, soloist) and Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

The program was a perfect example of Fiedler's philosophy. Approach the audience directly with familiar, but emotional music. It's the same formula that sold 50 million Fiedler recordings.

Fiedler romped through the program with breathtaking organizational skill and the results were immediately evident. Applause followed every movement. More formal, constrained audiences would have remained silent until each piece was completed. This audience made its feelings known instantly.

At the end, people clambered to their feet howling "More! More!" The Japanese, many of whom had followed the music directly from the original scores, began running down the aisles to shake the maestro's hand. Even the hoi polloi, the esoterics who complained Fiedler was just playing the same old stuff over again, grudgingly approved.

. . .as I was saying, if you ran Arthur Fiedler for president, he might just win.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
S. 207,218
SEP 2 1973

Many Outstanding Performances at Tanglewood

Springfield Daily News
The Arts
20 SPRINGFIELD, MASS., THURSDAY, AUGUST 30, 1973

(This is the final item of a two-part article on this past season at Tanglewood.)

By RICHARD CONWAY

"Let me see, Outstanding performances." He set the cold draft on the bar. "Well, how about Harold Wright's performance of that Mozart Clarinet concerto? That second movement was just incredibly lovely. Like some kind of mountain top experience."

I thought for a moment.

"I think if I had to choose one concert as the outstanding one that would be it, it was one of those nights when one thing seemed to be better than the one that preceded it. Remember it began with Malcolm Frager's Weekend Prelude?"

"Yes. Two piano sonatas by Haydn and one by Mozart. The Haydn just sparkled with joy and vibrancy. They were played with such great clarity. I was so taken with the wonderfully expressive use of the left hand."

"Right. And then Charles Kavaloski opened the regular concert with that Mozart Horn concerto. And I thought to myself that this would be the thrust of my review."

"And then Wright played the Clarinet piece. And you knew that here was something special."

"And then Joe Silverstein and Burton Fine did that Mozart piece for violin and viola, and that was great too. And everybody seemed to sense that they were in on a very special concert — Ozawa, the guys in the orchestra, the audience. It was some kind of experience."

He took a long drink from his glass.

"You know, slow second movements were something special all summer long. The pianissimo playing of the orchestra was so luminous."

"It certainly was," I agreed. "And a few weeks later there was Joe Silverstein's beautiful playing of a Mozart Violin concerto, and the second movement of that one was outstanding.

"I've said it before, I know, but I always enjoy the early weeks at Tanglewood. That's when they tend to do orchestral works of chamber dimensions, and the guys in the orchestra get to play these wonderful clarinet, and horn, and oboe concertos, and they're just great. Stuff that we seldom get to hear in the Springfield area.

"By the way, make sure that you don't miss Andre Watts when he plays with the Springfield Symphony this season. He did a wonderful Prelude concert too, and was outstanding playing Franck and Liszt a week ago."

"I didn't get to hear that one. But wasn't that performance of the Berlioz "Fantastique" something? That marvelous waltz in the second movement, or the grotesqueness of the Witches' sabbath? And I had never heard the companion piece, the 'Lelio'," he said.

"No, neither had I. It's really quite a dramatic piece. Certainly one of the highlights of the season for me."

"What did you think of the Verdi Requiem today? Wasn't that chorus work great?"

"That Dies Irae was thrilling wasn't it? And the wonderful dynamic contrasts in the last movement, the Libera Me? But, you know, a lot of the solo work just didn't make it for me; and, on the whole, I found the Verdi rather anti-climactic. I guess the 'Messiah' was still too much with me."

"Well, shall we descend from the mountain-top?"

"Yeah, I guess I gotta go to work."

Safford

Of Lenox and B.S.O. in R.I.

THE MAIN TROUBLE WITH summer music festivals, the big ones, anyway, is getting to them. Popularity begets clogged highways.

The Berkshire Music Festival was founded 39 years ago and moved to its present site at Tanglewood on the outskirts of Lenox, Mass., three years later. To get there from any direction you still have to travel two-lane roads. Weekend traffic gets pretty thick, especially through Lenox.

That was the horrifying example selectmen and other folk in nearby Great Barrington threw up in the face of a baroque festival and institute held there over three weeks in June. You may have read about it.

If not, an investment banker named Lee M. Elman now owns Aston Magna, formerly the 50-acre summer home of violinist Albert Spalding. Elman has established the Aston Magna Foundation for the purpose of forming courses of study in baroque performance practice and holding concerts.

While people of the caliber of harpsichordist Albert Fuller were on the faculty and announced to give the concerts, Elman's neighbors clamored against even the anticipated audiences of 125. "Tanglewood traffic!" Concerts were transferred to a welcoming Episcopalian church in the business district.

Elman, who seems not to have prepared Great Barrington for his enterprise very well, sued. His case comes up in October.

Meanwhile Lenox endured its Tanglewood traffic with apparent equanimity. And approximate figures show attendance was up 5 per cent from 1972 for weekend festival concerts and up 23 per cent for total attendance, including Tanglewood-on-Parade, the Pops and the Popular Artist Series. All told, some 313,774 came to Tanglewood this summer, an increase of 60,348 over 1972.

You talk to people like the manager of Dee's Department Store and she responds to the story of a friend for whom it took two hours to get from the center of Lenox to Tanglewood, a distance perhaps of a mile.

"Oh," she says good naturedly, "that must have been the Beethoven weekend. There was a pop concert at the Lenox Arts Center, too. I couldn't get out of the driveway to go home until a policeman finally saw me and let me through. The only serious trouble we've had was with the hard rock concerts a few years ago down there."

The final concerts last Friday night through Sunday afternoon saw the seven thousand seat music shed filled and surrounding lawns well occupied. Nobody looked disgruntled: in fact delight appeared the general reaction to being there, heavy traffic or not.

Holding greatest advance interest of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season's programs were Friday's and Sunday's, each reflective of the romantic revival and each conducted by Seiji Ozawa. Most romantic of all was Friday.

The Standard Star
NEW ROCHELLE, N.Y.
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
D. 21,079
AUG 24 1973

The Daily Argus
MOUNT VERNON, N.Y.
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
D. 19,256
AUG 24 1973

The Daily Times
MAMARONECK, N.Y.
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
D. 9,835
AUG 24 1973

THE REPORTER DISPATCH
WHITE PLAINS, N.Y.
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
D. 48,596
AUG 24 1973

That had the Berlioz Fantastic Symphony in a remarkably lucid performance with Ozawa eliciting almost chamber clarity, followed by its heart on the sleeve sequel, Lelio, or the Return to Life. Michael Wager was the poetic, frock suited narrator, Mallory Walker and Victor Braun the good tenor and baritone soloists.

Also present was the Tanglewood Festival Chorus which John Oliver has developed into a truly distinguished ensemble. Again during the Verdi Requiem on Sunday it was in superlative form, fully responsive to Ozawa.

Soloists then were Lou Ann Wyckoff, adequate to the assignment, Maureen Forrester and Seth McCoy, both superior, and Ezio Flagello, whose bass delivery was a bit unresonant but whose delivery was contributing. The orchestra, too, behaved effectively under Ozawa's dynamic shadings.

James De Priest, the black associate conductor of the National Symphony, led Saturday night's performance, opening with a beautifully constructed prelude to Mussorgsky's Khovanghchina. Byron Janis' playing in the Rachmaninoff third piano concerto was notable for the intimate, glistening passage work. Shostakovich's fifth symphony was no more convincing than usual, yet entertaining in the last movement especially.

The weekend produced also an announcement of the Boston Symphony's Providence season, to open Nov. 1 with Ozawa conducting the infrequently heard Rachmaninoff third symphony, Gunther Schuller's Capriccio stravagante and Debussy's La Mer.

Michael Tilson-Thomas is listed for the Dec. 6 concert, conducting Bach's Suite No. 3, Piston's flute concerto, with Doriot Anthony Dwyer, and the Brahms second piano concerto, with Malcolm Frager. The third and last program will be Feb. 28 under Okko Kamu, who will direct the Beethoven fourth symphony, the symphony of Sallinen and Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel.

Before not too long after that plans will be in the works for next summer's Berkshire Festival. So far as parking is concerned there is good news. A new lot will be open across the street to the north of Tanglewood.

ARTHUR FIEDLER CONDUCTS AT TANGLEWOOD
. . .applause followed every movement

CERTAINLY TANGLEWOOD brings out the best in Arthur Fiedler. Snaking his way across the stage Saturday, sporting a yellow jacket and black tie, looking, if possible, more healthy than Dave Whottle, Fiedler leaped—not stepped—onto the podium.

Talk about Super Energy. Fiedler grew younger, not older, as he conducted. The white-haired maestro gave the audience exactly what it wanted: old standards like Dvorak's "New World Symphony," Rachmaninoff's Second Piano Concerto (with Earl Wild, soloist) and Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

The program was a perfect example of Fiedler's philosophy. Approach the audience directly with familiar, but emotional music. It's the same formula that sold 50 million Fiedler recordings.

Fiedler romped through the program with breathtaking organizational skill and the results were immediately evident. Applause followed every movement. More formal, constrained audiences would have remained silent until each piece was completed. This audience made its feelings known instantly.

At the end, people clambered to their feet howling "More! More!" The Japanese, many of whom had followed the music directly from the original scores, began running down the aisles to shake the maestro's hand. Even the hoi polloi, the esoterics who complained Fielder was just playing the same old stuff over again, grudgingly approved.

. . .as I was saying, if you ran Arthur Fiedler for president, he might just win.

Tanglewood breaks all previous records

Louisa Kreisberg

LENOX, Mass. — The night was three-quarter-mooned and the light so bright and sweet it was painful. Outlines and edges were razor sharp. And under Tanglewood's Music Shed, Arthur Fiedler was doing what he does better than anyone in the world—popularizing the classics.

Fiedler is 79 going on 37 and if you ran him for president he might just win. The Viennese virtuoso has led the Boston "Pops" for 43 years. Under his direction the orchestra has made more recordings than any in the world. The total sales of "Pops" albums, singles, tapes and cassettes hover around 50 million. . .one million recordings alone of Gade's "Jalousie."

FIELDER WAS making the first of two appearances this week at the Berkshire Music Festival and the crowd was thick with interesting types. Germaine Greer-like females and Norman Mailer-like males. An usher paging William Buckley. A grandmother reading "Jonathan Livingston Seagull." Three nuns in miniskirts. A black executive bearing a bouquet of plastic flowers as a present to Fiedler. Box holders in white summer tux eyeing denimed teens singing Bob Dylan numbers a cappella at intermission.

And. . .hordes of Japanese with a yen for western symphonic music. Americans have so devalued the dollar that Japanese tourists are surfacing in droves from Lenox Hill, to Lenox, Mass.

THIS PAST winter Japanese buyers snapped up millions of dollars in fine art at Parke Bernet auctions and this summer they're snapping up millions of notes of fine music at festivals throughout the Berkshires.

Tanglewood is a mecca for orientals. "We have nothing like this," one Japanese tourist told me. By "this" he meant not only the music festival but Seiji Ozawa, its artistic director who will begin his first season as music director of the Boston Symphony this fall.

Ozawa was born in Hoten, Manchuria, in 1935 and graduated from the Toho School of Music in Tokyo. There is no American-born, American-trained conductor who can boast a similar position in Japan.

Yet Ozawa seems more occidental than oriental. Hovering near Arthur Fielder Saturday night, Ozawa talked about how the landscape at Tanglewood brings out the best in artists and audiences.

"Melville wrote "Moby Dick" here," Ozawa said with reverence. Hawthorne completed "The House of Seven Gables." And the Boston Symphony has summered here since 1934.

"We've broken all previous attendance records at Tanglewood this year," Ozawa smiled, estimating total single admissions at more than 300,000.

TANGLEWOOD 1973

SEIJI OZAWA Artistic Director, Berkshire Festival
GUNTHER SCHULLER Artistic Director, Berkshire Music Center
LEONARD BERNSTEIN Adviser

The Berkshires, home of America's finest concerts

TANGLEWOOD 1973

SEIJI OZAWA Artistic Director, Berkshire Festival
GUNTHER SCHULLER Artistic Director, Berkshire Music Center
LEONARD BERNSTEIN Adviser

Perhaps it's no accident that Melville wrote his masterpiece in the Berkshires.

The Berkshires, home of America's finest concerts

BLANK PAGE

END OF VOLUME

VOLUME 132

BSO
Pops

1973 - 1974

Subscription Concerts 1973-74

Seiji Ozawa Music Director
Ninety-Third Season
Colin Davis & Michael Tilson Thomas, Principal Guest Conductors

All programs are subject to change.

Friday/Saturday

Friday at 2:00 p.m.
Saturday at 8:30 p.m.

These series have been increased to twenty-two concerts in order to give our regular subscribers the opportunity of hearing two Spectrum concerts.

1 September 28/29	Berlioz	Seiji Ozawa The damnation of Faust Edith Mathis, soprano René Kollo, tenor Donald McIntyre, bass Thomas Paul, bass Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver Conductor
2 October 5/6	Beethoven Ligeti Brahms	Seiji Ozawa 'Emperor' concerto Christoph Eschenbach Melodien first Boston performance Symphony no. 1
3 October 19/20	Beethoven Stravinsky Sibelius	Colin Davis Overture 'Leonore' no. 2 Orpheus Symphony no. 4
4 October 26/27	Haydn Stravinsky Vaughan Williams	Colin Davis Symphony no. 84 Dunbarton Oaks Symphony no. 4
5 November 2/3	Rachmaninov Schuller Debussy	Seiji Ozawa Symphony no. 3 Capriccio stravagante first Boston performance La mer
6 November 9/10	Tchaikovsky	Seiji Ozawa Violin concerto David Oistrakh Symphony no. 6 'Pathétique'
7 November 23/24	Beethoven Bartók	Rafael Kubelik Symphony no. 5 Concerto for orchestra
8 November 30 December 1		Michael Tilson Thomas Spectrum program
9 December 7/8	Bach Strauss Brahms	Michael Tilson Thomas Suite no. 3 Also sprach Zarathustra Piano concerto no. 2 Malcolm Frager
10 January 4/5		William Steinberg Program to be announced
11 January 11/12		William Steinberg Program to be announced
12 January 18/19	Piston Paganini Tchaikovsky	Michael Tilson Thomas Sinfonietta in honor of the composer's 80th birthday Violin concerto no. 3 Henryk Szeryng first Boston performance Suite no. 3
13 January 25/26		Michael Tilson Thomas Spectrum program
14 February 1/2	Monteverdi	Michael Tilson Thomas Vespers (1610) Soloists New England Conservatory Chorus, Lorna Cooke De Varon, Conductor
15 February 8/9	Haydn Strauss Sibelius	Colin Davis Symphony no. 87 Four last songs Jessye Norman Symphony no. 1
16 February 15/16	Schumann Tippett	Colin Davis Piano concerto Michael Roll Symphony no. 3 Heather Harper, soprano first American performance
17 March 1/2	(Overture) Beethoven Aulis Sallinen Strauss	Okko Kamu Symphony no. 4 Symphony first Boston performance Till Eulenspiegel
18 March 8/9	Haydn Schoenberg	Seiji Ozawa Symphony no. 1 Sinfonia concertante for oboe, bassoon, violin and cello Ode to Napoleon Verklärte Nacht
19 March 15/16	Mozart Stravinsky	Seiji Ozawa Piano concerto in A, k. 488 Maurizio Pollini The firebird
20 March 29/30	Bruckner	Carlo Maria Giulini Symphony no. 2 Remainder of program to be announced
21 April 4 (Thursday) April 5	Beethoven	Carlo Maria Giulini Mass in C Soloists and Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, Conductor
22 April 19/20	Holst Schoenberg Mahler	Seiji Ozawa The hymn of Jesus Modern psalm New England Conservatory Chorus, Lorna Cooke De Varon, Conductor Symphony no. 1

Friday Afternoon/22 Concerts
Floor: $229, $185, $157, $134, $112, $99, $83.
1st Balcony: $203, $157, $148, $134, $112, $83.
2nd Balcony: $112, $83.

Saturday Evening/22 Concerts
Floor: $220, $170, $160, $140, $130, $110, $100, $90
1st Balcony: $190, $170, $160, $140, $110, $90
2nd Balcony: $110, $90, $65
Saturday subscribers may buy all twenty-two concerts or only eleven by buying odd or even numbered series.

Odd/Even Series/11 Concerts
Floor: $112, $90, $83, $76, $70, $60, $55, $50
1st Balcony: $100, $90, $83, $76, $60, $50
2nd Balcony: $60, $50, $40

Tuesday A/8:30 pm

1 October 9	Beethoven Ligeti Brahms	Seiji Ozawa 'Emperor' concerto Christoph Eschenbach Melodien Symphony no. 1
2 October 30		Program to be announced
3 November 27	Beethoven Bartók	Rafael Kubelik Symphony no. 5 Concerto for orchestra
4 December 18	Bach Tchaikovsky Strauss	Michael Tilson Thomas Suite no. 5 Suite no. 2 Also sprach Zarathustra
5 January 8		William Steinberg Program to be announced
6 January 29	Bach	Michael Tilson Thomas Concerto for two violins Joseph Silverstein, Jerome Rosen Concerto for two pianos Brandenburg concerto no. 2
7 February 12	Beethoven Schumann Sibelius	Colin Davis Overture to 'Coriolan' Piano concerto Michael Roll Symphony no. 1
8 March 12	Mozart	Seiji Ozawa Piano concerto in A, k. 488 Maurizio Pollini Remainder of program to be announced
9 April 2	Bruckner	Carlo Maria Giulini Symphony no. 2 Remainder of program to be announced
10 April 16	Stravinsky	The firebird Remainder of program to be announced

Tuesday A Evening/10 Concerts
Floor: $72, $46, $34
1st Balcony: $72, $59, $46
2nd Balcony: $46, $34, $29

Tuesday B/7:30 pm

1 October 16	Beethoven Brahms	Colin Davis Overture to 'Coriolan' 'Emperor' Concerto Christoph Eschenbach Symphony no. 2
2 November 6	Rachmaninov Schuller Debussy	Seiji Ozawa Symphony no. 3 Capriccio stravagante La mer
3 November 20		Conductor and program to be announced
4 January 22	Bach Piston Tchaikovsky	Michael Tilson Thomas Suite no. 3 Sinfonietta Suite no. 3
5 March 5	Haydn Bach Schoenberg	Seiji Ozawa Symphony no. 1 Sinfonia concertante for oboe, bassoon, violin and cello Concerto for two violins Joseph Silverstein, Jerome Rosen Verklärte Nacht
6 April 9	Bach Schoenberg Strauss	Michael Tilson Thomas Brandenburg concerto no. 2 Accompaniment to a film-sequence Also sprach Zarathustra

Tuesday B Evening/6 Concerts
Floor: $37, $33, $27, $20
1st Balcony: $37, $33, $27
2nd Balcony: $27, $20, $13

Tuesday C/8:30 pm

1 October 23	Beethoven Stravinsky Sibelius	Colin Davis Overture 'Leonore' no. 2 Orpheus Symphony no. 4
2 November 13	Schoenberg Tchaikovsky	Seiji Ozawa Violin concerto Joseph Silverstein Symphony no. 6 'Pathétique'
3 December 4		Michael Tilson Thomas Spectrum Program
4 January 15		Conductor and program to be announced
5 February 5	Beethoven Haydn Vaughan Williams	Colin Davis Overture to 'Coriolan' Symphony no. 84 Symphony no. 4
6 March 26		Conductor and program to be announced

Tuesday C/6 Concerts
Floor: $37, $33, $27, $20
1st Balcony: $37, $33, $27
2nd Balcony: $27, $20, $13

Thursday A/8:30 pm

1 October 4	Beethoven Ligeti Brahms	Seiji Ozawa 'Emperor' Concerto Christoph Eschenbach Melodien Symphony no. 1
2 October 25	Beethoven Stravinsky Sibelius	Colin Davis Overture 'Leonore' no. 2 Orpheus Symphony no. 4
3 December 20	Bach Tchaikovsky Strauss	Michael Tilson Thomas Suite no. 3 Suite no. 2 Also sprach Zarathustra
4 January 31	Monteverdi	Michael Tilson Thomas Vespers (1610) Soloists and New England Conservatory Chorus, Lorna Cooke De Varon, Conductor
5 March 7	Haydn Schoenberg	Seiji Ozawa Symphony no. 1 Sinfonia concertante for oboe, bassoon, violin and cello Ode to Napoleon Verklärte Nacht
6 April 18	Holst Mahler	Seiji Ozawa The hymn of Jesus Modern psalm New England Conservatory Chorus, Lorna Cooke De Varon, Conductor Symphony no. 1

Thursday A Evening/6 Concerts
Floor: $37, $33, $27, $20
1st Balcony: $37, $33, $27
2nd Balcony: $27, $20, $13

Thursday B/8:30 pm
Romantic Series

1 January 17	Piston Paganini Strauss	Michael Tilson Thomas Sinfonietta Violin concerto no. 3 Henryk Szeryng Also sprach Zarathustra
2 February 7	Haydn Strauss Sibelius	Colin Davis Symphony no. 87 Four last songs Jessye Norman Symphony no. 1
3 March 28	Bruckner	Carlo Maria Giulini Symphony no. 2 Remainder of program to be announced

Thursday B Evening/3 Concerts
Floor: $18.50, $16.50, $13.50, $10
1st Balcony: $18.50, $16.50, $13.50
2nd Balcony: $13.50, $10, $6.50

Open Rehearsals
Thursdays/7:30 pm

The music played during these rehearsals is ordinarily drawn from the program for the following day's concert

1 September 27		Seiji Ozawa
2 October 18		Colin Davis
3 November 8		Seiji Ozawa
4 January 3		Conductor to be announced
5 January 10		Conductor to be announced
6 February 14		Colin Davis
7 March 14		Seiji Ozawa

Subscription price: $16
Single tickets on sale at $3 each, all seats unreserved.

Spectrum Concerts

These programs, unusual in character and presented in an informal manner, will be announced at a later date.

1 November 29	Michael Tilson Thomas
2 January 24	Michael Tilson Thomas
3 April 11	Michael Tilson Thomas

Spectrum/3 Thursday Concerts
Floor: $15, $12, $9
1st Balcony: $12, $9
2nd Balcony: $6

Subscription Office
Symphony Hall
251 Huntington Avenue
Boston, Massachusetts 02115

For new subscribers

Please call the Subscription Office (266-1492) for the latest subscription information and for immediate reservations. Enclose this coupon with your check. Enclosed is my check for $_____ for _____ subscriptions at $_____ each to the Boston Symphony Orchestra's _____ series. Checks should be made payable to the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Name_____
Address_____
City_____ State_____ Zip_____
Telephone_____

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass.
266-1492

Baldwin Piano
Deutsche Grammophon and RCA Records

Thomas D. Perry, Jr., Manager

Design: Emily Hiestand
Photographs: Suzanne Estel

Subscription Concerts 1973-74

Seiji Ozawa Music Director
Ninety-Third Season
Colin Davis & Michael Tilson Thomas, Principal Guest Conductors

All programs are subject to change.

Friday/Saturday

Friday at 2:00 p.m.
Saturday at 8:30 p.m.

These series have been increased to twenty-two concerts in order to give our regular subscribers the opportunity of hearing two Spectrum concerts.

● September 28/29 — Seiji Ozawa
Berlioz — The damnation of Faust
Edith Mathis, soprano
René Kollo, tenor
Donald McIntyre, bass
Thomas Paul, bass
Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver Conductor

2 October 5/6 — Seiji Ozawa
Beethoven — 'Emperor' concerto
Christoph Eschenbach
Ligeti — Melodien
first Boston performance
Brahms — Symphony no. 1

● October 19/20 — Colin Davis
Beethoven — Overture 'Leonore' no. 2
Stravinsky — Orpheus
Sibelius — Symphony no. 4

4 October 26/27 — Colin Davis
Haydn — Symphony no. 84
Stravinsky — Dunbarton Oaks
Vaughan Williams — Symphony no. 4

● November 2/3 — Seiji Ozawa
Rachmaninov — Symphony no. 3
Schuller — Capriccio stravagante
first Boston performance
Debussy — La mer

6 November 9/10 — Seiji Ozawa
Tchaikovsky — Violin concerto
David Oistrakh
Symphony no. 6 'Pathétique'

● November 23/24 — Rafael Kubelik
Beethoven — Symphony no. 5
Bartók — Concerto for orchestra

8 November 30 December 1 — Michael Tilson Thomas
Spectrum program

● December 7/8 — Michael Tilson Thomas
Bach — Suite no. 3
Strauss — Also sprach Zarathustra
Brahms — Piano concerto no. 2
Malcolm Frager

10 January 4/5 — William Steinberg
Program to be announced

● January 11/12 — William Steinberg
Program to be announced

12 January 18/19 — Michael Tilson Thomas
Piston — Sinfonietta
in honor of the composer's 80th birthday
Paganini — Violin concerto no. 3
Henryk Szeryng
first Boston performance
Tchaikovsky — Suite no. 3

● January 25/26 — Michael Tilson Thomas
Spectrum program

14 February 1/2 — Michael Tilson Thomas
Monteverdi — Vespers (1610)
Soloists
New England Conservatory Chorus, Lorna Cooke De Varon, Conductor

● February 8/9 — Colin Davis
Haydn — Symphony no. 87
Strauss — Four last songs
Jessye Norman
Sibelius — Symphony no. 1

16 February 15/16 — Colin Davis
Schumann — Piano concerto
Michael Roll
Tippett — Symphony no. 3
Heather Harper, soprano
first American performance

● March 1/2 — Okko Kamu (Overture)
Beethoven — Symphony no. 4
Aulis Sallinen — Symphony
first Boston performance
Strauss — Till Eulenspiegel

18 March 8/9 — Seiji Ozawa
Haydn — Symphony no. 1
Sinfonia concertante for oboe, bassoon, violin and cello
Schoenberg — Ode to Napoleon
Verklärte Nacht

● March 15/16 — Seiji Ozawa
Mozart — Piano concerto in A, k. 488
Maurizio Pollini
Stravinsky — The firebird

20 March 29/30 — Carlo Maria Giulini
Bruckner — Symphony no. 2
Remainder of program to be announced

● April 4 (Thursday) April 5 — Carlo Maria Giulini
Beethoven — Mass in C
Soloists and Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, Conductor

22 April 19/20 — Seiji Ozawa
Holst — The hymn of Jesus
Schoenberg — Modern psalm
New England Conservatory Chorus, Lorna Cooke De Varon, Conductor
Mahler — Symphony no. 1

Friday Afternoon/22 Concerts
Floor: $229, $185, $157, $134, $112, $99, $83.
1st Balcony: $203, $157, $148, $134, $112, $83.
2nd Balcony: $112, $83.

Saturday Evening/22 Concerts
Floor: $220, $170, $160, $140, $130, $110, $100, $90
1st Balcony: $190, $170, $160, $140, $110, $90
2nd Balcony: $110, $90, $65
Saturday subscribers may buy all twenty-two concerts or only eleven by buying odd or even numbered series.

Odd/Even Series/11 Concerts
Floor: $112, $90, $83, $76, $70, $60, $55, $50
1st Balcony: $100, $90, $83, $76, $60, $50
2nd Balcony: $60, $50, $40

Tuesday A/8:30 pm

1 October 9 — Seiji Ozawa
Beethoven — 'Emperor' concerto
Christoph Eschenbach
Ligeti — Melodien
Brahms — Symphony no. 1

2 October 30 — Program to be announced

3 November 27 — Rafael Kubelik
Beethoven — Symphony no. 5
Bartók — Concerto for orchestra

4 December 18 — Michael Tilson Thomas
Bach — Suite no. 5
Tchaikovsky — Suite no. 2
Strauss — Also sprach Zarathustra

5 January 8 — William Steinberg
Program to be announced

6 January 29 — Michael Tilson Thomas
Bach — Concerto for two violins
Joseph Silverstein, Jerome Rosen
Concerto for two pianos
Brandenburg concerto no. 2

7 February 12 — Colin Davis
Beethoven — Overture to 'Coriolan'
Schumann — Piano concerto
Michael Roll
Sibelius — Symphony no. 1

8 March 12 — Seiji Ozawa
Mozart — Piano concerto in A, k. 488
Maurizio Pollini
Remainder of program to be announced

9 April 2 — Carlo Maria Giulini
Bruckner — Symphony no. 2
Remainder of program to be announced

10 April 16 — The firebird
Stravinsky
Remainder of program to be announced

Tuesday A Evening/10 Concerts
Floor: $72, $46, $34
1st Balcony: $72, $59, $46
2nd Balcony: $46, $34, $29

Tuesday B/7:30 pm

1 October 16 — Colin Davis
Beethoven — Overture to 'Coriolan'
'Emperor' Concerto
Christoph Eschenbach
Brahms — Symphony no. 2

2 November 6 — Seiji Ozawa
Rachmaninov — Symphony no. 3
Schuller — Capriccio stravagante
Debussy — La mer

3 November 20 — Conductor and program to be announced

4 January 22 — Michael Tilson Thomas
Bach — Suite no. 3
Piston — Sinfonietta
Tchaikovsky — Suite no. 3

5 March 5 — Seiji Ozawa
Haydn — Symphony no. 1
Sinfonia concertante for oboe, bassoon, violin and cello
Bach — Concerto for two violins
Joseph Silverstein, Jerome Rosen
Schoenberg — Verklärte Nacht

6 April 9 — Michael Tilson Thomas
Bach — Brandenburg concerto no. 2
Schoenberg — Accompaniment to a film-sequence
Strauss — Also sprach Zarathustra

Tuesday B Evening/6 Concerts
Floor: $37, $33, $27, $20
1st Balcony: $37, $33, $27
2nd Balcony: $27, $20, $13

Tuesday C/8:30 pm

1 October 23 — Colin Davis
Beethoven — Overture 'Leonore' no. 2
Stravinsky — Orpheus
Sibelius — Symphony no. 4

2 November 13 — Seiji Ozawa
Schoenberg — Violin concerto
Joseph Silverstein
Tchaikovsky — Symphony no. 6 'Pathétique'

3 December 4 — Michael Tilson Thomas
Spectrum Program

4 January 15 — Conductor and program to be announced

5 February 5 — Colin Davis
Beethoven — Overture to 'Coriolan'
Haydn — Symphony no. 84
Vaughan Williams — Symphony no. 4

6 March 26 — Conductor and program to be announced

Tuesday C/6 Concerts
Floor: $37, $33, $27, $20
1st Balcony: $37, $33, $27
2nd Balcony: $27, $20, $13

Thursday A/8:30 pm

1 October 4 — Seiji Ozawa
Beethoven — 'Emperor' Concerto
Christoph Eschenbach
Ligeti — Melodien
Brahms — Symphony no. 1

2 October 25 — Colin Davis
Beethoven — Overture 'Leonore' no. 2
Stravinsky — Orpheus
Sibelius — Symphony no. 4

3 December 20 — Michael Tilson Thomas
Bach — Suite no. 3
Tchaikovsky — Suite no. 2
Strauss — Also sprach Zarathustra

4 January 31 — Michael Tilson Thomas
Monteverdi — Vespers (1610)
Soloists and New England Conservatory Chorus, Lorna Cooke De Varon, Conductor

5 March 7 — Seiji Ozawa
Haydn — Symphony no. 1
Sinfonia concertante for oboe, bassoon, violin and cello
Schoenberg — Ode to Napoleon
Verklärte Nacht

6 April 18 — Seiji Ozawa
Holst — The hymn of Jesus
Modern psalm
New England Conservatory Chorus, Lorna Cooke De Varon, Conductor
Mahler — Symphony no. 1

Thursday A Evening/6 Concerts
Floor: $37, $33, $27, $20
1st Balcony: $37, $33, $27
2nd Balcony: $27, $20, $13

Thursday B/8:30 pm Romantic Series

1 January 17 — Michael Tilson Thomas
Piston — Sinfonietta
Paganini — Violin concerto no. 3
Henryk Szeryng
Strauss — Also sprach Zarathustra

2 February 7 — Colin Davis
Haydn — Symphony no. 87
Strauss — Four last songs
Jessye Norman
Sibelius — Symphony no. 1

3 March 28 — Carlo Maria Giulini
Bruckner — Symphony no. 2
Remainder of program to be announced

Thursday B Evening/3 Concerts
Floor: $18.50, $16.50, $13.50, $10
1st Balcony: $18.50, $16.50, $13.50
2nd Balcony: $13.50, $10, $6.50

Open Rehearsals Thursdays/7:30 pm

The music played during these rehearsals is ordinarily drawn from the program for the following day's concert

1 September 27 — Seiji Ozawa
2 October 18 — Colin Davis
3 November 8 — Seiji Ozawa
4 January 3 — Conductor to be announced
5 January 10 — Conductor to be announced
6 February 14 — Colin Davis
7 March 14 — Seiji Ozawa

Subscription price: $16
Single tickets on sale at $3 each, all seats unreserved.

Spectrum Concerts

These programs, unusual in character and presented in an informal manner, will be announced at a later date.

1 November 29 — Michael Tilson Thomas
2 January 24 — Michael Tilson Thomas
3 April 11 — Michael Tilson Thomas

Spectrum/3 Thursday Concerts
Floor: $15, $12, $9
1st Balcony: $12, $9
2nd Balcony: $6

Subscription Office
Symphony Hall
251 Huntington Avenue
Boston, Massachusetts 02115

For new subscribers

Please call the Subscription Office (266-1492) for the latest subscription information and for immediate reservations. Enclose this coupon with your check. Enclosed is my check for $_____ for _____ subscriptions at $_____ each to the Boston Symphony Orchestra's _____ series. Checks should be made payable to the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Name_____
Address_____
City_____ State_____ Zip_____
Telephone_____

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass.
266-1492

Baldwin Piano
Deutsche Grammophon and RCA Records

Thomas D. Perry, Jr., Manager

Design: Emily Hiestand
Photographs: Suzanne Estel

Pre-season

1

SARASOTA, FLA.
JOURNAL
D. 8,500
SEP 25 1973

Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 463,503 SUN. 867,810
SEP 27 1973

SUN (E)
HUDSON, MASS.
D. 3,050
30 1973

SEP 25 1973

Rochester Times-Union
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
D. 145,803

SYRACUSE
Herald Journal
D. 129,656
SEP 25 1973

Montgomery Advertiser
MONTGOMERY, ALA.
D. 63,928 SUN. 80,174
SEP 27 1973

ELMIRA, N. Y.
STAR-GAZETTE
D. 50,500

PEEKSKILL, N. Y.
STAR
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
D. 13,000
SEP 26 1973

THE ATLANTA CONSTITUTION
D. 203,790

GAZETTE (E)
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 92,743
SEP 25 1973

EAGLE-TRIBUNE (M) (E)
LAWRENCE, MASS.
D. 48,000
25 1973
New England Newsclip

SUN (E)
LOWELL, MASS.
D. 54,500
SEP 25 1973
New England Newsclip

NEWS-TRIBUNE (E)
WALTHAM, MASS.
D. 17,000
SEP 25 1973
New England Newsclip

TIMES (E)
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
D. 39,000
15 1973
New England Newsclip

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 441,961 SUN. 423,790
SEP 25 1973

GLOBE (E)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 195,032
SEP 25 1973
New England Newsclip

MAESTROS HUDDLE — Seiji Ozawa, (right) who Monday became the 15th director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, chats with famed 'Pops' conductor Arthur Fiedler as the two met in Boston. Ozawa, from Japan, conducted the orchestra in rehearsal despite injured right hand. He strai the hand lifting family suitcases over the week

Arthur Fiedler, 78, and Seiji Ozawa, 38. (Photo by Ted Dully)

MICHAEL STEINBERG

The Ozawa-Watch begins

Yesterday morning at 10:37, Seiji Ozawa gave his first downbeat as Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Not that he and the orchestra are strangers — he has been its guest conductor many times since 1964, and for the last four summers he has been in charge of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood — but it was the first rehearsal of his first season.

Before that, coffee and picture-taking. Ozawa, in a white over-the-head embroidered shirt and as always a pleasure to look at for the vitality he radiates, shook hands with his left, the right wrapped in an Ace bandage. "Suitcases," he explained. "I'm the tour leader for my family — the only man" (the other Ozawas are his Russian-Japanese wife, Vera, and their daughter, Seira, who will be two Dec. 29). Mayor White was there, and 78-year-old Arthur Fiedler, who has seen them come and go, Muck, Rabaud, Monteux, Koussevitzky, Munch, Leinsdorf, Steinberg, and now Ozawa, born when Fiedler had already been running the Pops a half dozen years.

The players were seated and ready when a small procession made its way to the podium. First to speak was Robert H. Gardiner, Vice-President of the Trustees: cold and stiff words of welcome, congealed in cliches (and can't they find someone who can deliver two minutes' worth of commonplaces without reading each syllable?). Then, "on behalf of each and every lady and gentleman artist of the Bohton Symphony Orchestra," violist Jerome Lipson, expressing pleasure, promising cooperation, and predicting "the greatest era in the history of the Boston Symphony Then the Mayor, with practised, professional ease: "You've gained a new Music Director: I understand I've gained a tennis partner." Ozawa knows what orchestras think of talking conductors, so he didn't say a thing.

The music to be rehearsed was Berlioz's dramatic legend, "Faust's Damnation" (performance dates in Symphony Hall are 28 and 29 Sep. and 9 Oct.). It begins quietly, with Faust alone in the fields at sunrise, so for a better show, Ozawa began with the roof-raising Hungarian March. "Just for a few minutes, the March, please," he said, twirling index fingers to say "cameras," and off they went. When the March was over, the visitors left. Ozawa took a moment to introduce the new players to their colleagues, then he said, "now to work," and the quiet opening music began.

For Ozawa, the 38-year-old son of a Japanese dentist and the brother of a sculptor (who is also an innkeeper in Kyoto), a professor of German literature, and an actor, this is the top of the greasy pole. In his profession, there is no better or more important job than the Music Directorship of the Boston Symphony. And the downbeat yesterday rounds off a sequence of events that began in 1957, when he heard the Boston Symphony under Charles Munch in Japan, an experience that crucially served to fire his determination to become a conductor. (Piano, his first love, was out because he had broken both index fingers at rugby). Munch was on the jury when Ozawa won the International Competition at Besancon in 1959, and it was Munch who in 1960 arranged for him to study at Tanglewood where he won the Koussevitzky Prize.

That led to the rest: Assistant Conductor to Leonard Bernstein at the New York Philharmonic, Music Director of the Toronto Symphony, the Ravinia Festival, the Berkshire Festival, the San Francisco Symphony, an interim year as Music Adviser to the Boston Symphony, and now BSO Music Director. He continues to hold his San Francisco position.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Inc. hopes that Ozawa's assumption of power means an end to the uncertainty that has clouded the orchestra's fortunes since 36-year-old Guido Cantelli, who was being groomed as Charles Munch's successor, died in a plane crash in 1956. In the event, Munch was succeeded in 1962 by Erich Leinsdorf, and he in 1969 by William Steinberg, but neither arrangement was a success with the public, the orchestra, and the critics.

Ozawa's appointment, announced February 1972, is a fresh start after a deep breath. The orchestra, which had some say in the decision, is pleased, and its pleasure is reflected in the renewed liveliness and finesse of its playing. As for what it is the Symphony will play beautifully — Ozawa's interest and strength, to judge by his programs and his past achievements, lies in 19th and turn-of-the-century repertory, particularly that with a certain element of flash. This year's programs are weak in 18th-century music and outrageously neglectful of contemporary developments. For the time being, Ozawa and the orchestra are relying on Principal Guest Conductors Colin Davis and Michael Tilson Thomas to balance the ticket, but in the long run the responsibility for a sensible and enlivening artistic policy devolved upon the Music Director.

There is no malice in reminding that in 1962, when Leinsdorf was the new man, Symphony Hall was drenched in optimism about "the greatest era in the history of . . ." What we all want is for the Boston Symphony once again to be what it was under Koussevitzky and Muck, an artisitc and intellectual excitement center for this city. The Ozawa-Watch begins, and now we shall see if a new era began at 10:37 yesterday.

2

HERALD-AMERICAN (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 424,654
SEP 25 1973
New England Newsclip

SEIJI OZAWA chats briefly with Boston Mayor Kevin H. White and Boston Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler before conducting first rehearsal with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his new position as Music Director. The bandaged hand he is displaying was injured slightly while carrying his family's luggage on arrival here. He later removed bandage during the rehearsal.

Mayor White Welcomes Ozawa to Hub Symphony

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

Clad in his customary turtle neck and a loose embroidered shirt, 38-year old conductor Seiji Ozawa opened his first orchestral rehearsal Monday morning as Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

After a brief ceremony on the Symphony Hall stage that included welcoming statements by officials and players of the orchestra and by Boston Mayor Kevin H. White, Ozawa gave the first downbeat. Apparently eager to get down to business and appearing a little uncomfortable with the fuss being made, he launched into the familiar and festive Rakoczy March from Berlioz' "The Damnation of Faust," the work which will open the BSO season Friday afternoon.

The March being concluded, Ozawa politely dismissed the press and spectators and went on with his work, conducting an orchestra with which he has been associated for almost a decade. Apparently, being Music Director hasn't made him feel any differently.

Introducing the orchestra to Ozawa in his new capacity, Robert H. Gardiner, vice president of the trustees of the BSO, reminded the players and public that the symphony had been anticipating that moment for a year and a half. Ozawa was named music director-designate in the spring of 1972, but because of prior commitments — notably his position as Music Director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra — he was able only to take on a Music Advisorship during the 1972-73 season. In this position, he contributed to the planning of the season and conducted on several occasions, but on a limited basis.

OZAWA raises his baton for the first time as Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Music: Berlioz' Rakoczy March from the "Damnation of Faust."

Ozawa has, however, been a frequent guest conductor with the BSO for a number of seasons and, since 1970, has been Artistic Co-Director of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood.

The Manchurian-born conductor is known to be very popular with the orchestra musicians and the congenial relationship was quite obvious in the demonstration of cheering, clapping and foot-stamping which followed the welcoming speech by Jerome Lipsom of the Players' Committee.

Noting the anticipation with which classical music buffs had awaited the arrival of a full-time orchestra leader, Mayor White stated, "You now have a new Music Director and, as I learned this morning, I've gained a tennis partner." He added, more seriously, that Ozawa "will bring new vitality to the musical life of the city."

Ozawa, who received his training at the Toho School of Music in Tokyo won the Internation Competition of conductors in Besancon, France, in 1959 and, the following year, won the Koussevitzky prize at Tanglewood. As a result of this exposure, he became an assistant conductor with the New York Philharmonic in 1961.

Since that time, he has conducted major symphony orchestras throughout the world and served as Music Director of the Toronto Symphony and guest conductor of the Ravinia Festival and the Cleveland and Philadelphia Orchestras. He retains his position as Music Director of the San Francisco Orchestra, a post he holds concurrently with his new BSO duties.

HERALD NEWS (E)
FALL RIVER, MASS.
D. 42,275
SEP 28 1973
New England Newsclip

NEWS (E)
NEWPORT, R. I.
D. 15,387
SEP 26 1973
New England Newsclip

Trio of Directors

Boston Mayor Kevin White, left, extends an official welcome to Seiji Ozawa as he takes over as the 15th music director of the Boston Symphony. At center is Boston Pops Director Arthur Fiedler. AP Wirephoto

PRESS-HERALD (M)
PORTLAND, MAINE
D. 53,743
SEP 25 1973
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony under new hand

Seiji Ozawa, who became the 15th director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Monday, conducts despite having strained his right hand lifting suitcases over the weekend. He was welcomed officially by Boston's Mayor Kevin White and Boston Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler. (UPI)

GLOBE (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042
SEP 25 1973
New England Newsclip

3

Seiji Ozawa presents a variety of expressions and gesticulations — not to mention varied attire — as he leads the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a rehearsal of music from Charles Gounod's opera, "Faust." It marked 38-year-old, Japanese-born conductor's first appearance with the orchestra since being named its 15th musical director. Story. other photo, Page 31. (Globe photos by Ted Dully)

ENTERPRISE-SUN (E)
MARLBORO, MASS.
D. 10,150
SEP 20 1973
New England Newsclip

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 137,897
SEP 12 1973
New England Newsclip

SEIJI OZAWA, new music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the orchestra's 93rd winter season on Thursday, Sept. 27 at 7:30 p.m. at Symphony Hall in Boston. Selections will include Hector Berlioz' "La damnation de Faust," legende dramatique op. 24. Soloists for this work are Edith Mathis, Stuart Burrows, Harry Theyard, Donald McIntyre, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus and the St. Paul's School Boy Choir.

Ozawa takes BSO helm with Sept. 28 concert

After spending last season as the Boston Symphony's music adviser, Seiji Ozawa officially becomes music director of the orchestra with the opening of the 93rd Boston season on Friday afternoon, Sept. 28, at Symphony Hall.

A large-scale musico-dramatic presentation, the Berlioz "Damnation of Faust," will be given on Friday at 2 p.m., and on Saturday evening, Sept. 29, at 8:30, with a repetition on Oct. 9, to begin the Tuesday evening A series. Three of the principal slolists —soprano Edith Mathis (Marguerite), tenor Stuart Burrows (Faust), and baritone Donald McIntyre (Mephistopheles) — will be making their BSO debuts on Friday, with tenor Harry Theyard, also in his firs appearances with the orchestra, replacing Mr. Burrows on Saturday evening and on Oct. 9. basso Thomas Paul returns to sing Brander at all performances.

The Tanglewood Festival Chorus, and the St. Paul's School Boy Choir, directed by John Oliver and Theodore Marier, respectively, will also be heard in the "legende dramatique," which is being performed in Boston for the first time since 1955, when Charles Munch was the conductor. Ozawa directed a Tanglewood performance during the 1971 Berkshire Festival.

Among the events scheduled for the period before this year ends are Boston premieres of Gyorgy Ligeti's "Melodien," and Gunther Schuller's "Capriccio Stravagante," under Ozawa's baton; guest appearances by Colin Davis and Rafael Kubelik; a "Program of Transcriptions," including the local premiere of the John Cage-Lou Harrison "Suite for Toy Piano," conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas, and as the opening concert of 1974, an all-Wagner program under William Steinberg's direction.

Three new members will join the orchestra this season:

Cellist Martha Babcock, a graduate of Radcliffe, formerly with the Montreal Symphony, a Piatigorsky Award winner at the Berkshire Music Center, and this past spring, soloist with Boston Pops.

Violinist Victor Yampolsky, a native of Kirgizia, USSR, was a student of David Oistrakh at Moscow Conservatory, later a member of Moscow Philharmonic and its assistant conductor under Kiril Kondrashin. He emigrated to the United States, instead of to Israel as planned, and spent last summer at Berkshire Music Center.

Violist Michael Zaretsky, born in the Ukraine, also left Russia for Israel, where he became principal violist of the Jerusalem Broadcasting Orchestra and soloist of Radio Israel. Before his emigration there, he had studied at Moscow State Conservatory, later joining the Moscow Broadcasting Symphony Orchestra. In the process of coming to the United States, both he and Mr. Yampolsky were aided by Leonard Bernstein and Zubin Mehta, whom they met in Rome. The two conductors respectively recommended them to the Berkshire Music Center and secured the assistance of United HIAS Service, a Jewish immigration agency, to speed the trip.

L. Sn.

GLOBE (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042
SEP 26 1973
New England Newsclip

Welcome to Ozawa

When Elliott Carter, now the most exciting and highly regarded of our living composers, picked a college in 1926, he chose Harvard "because of its proximity to the Boston Symphony and to all the advanced musical activity that was then going on under Koussevitzky." It has been a while since the orchestra was that kind of magnet, that sort of artistic and intellectual excitement center, and this is the challenge to Seiji Ozawa, 38, who today conducts his first concert as Music Director of the Boston Symphony, 93.

That the orchestra has been in a slump is no secret, and Ozawa's arrival has been looked to with special anticipation and hope. The players, who for the first time had some considerable say in the choice of a new Music Director, are happy. The public is responsive, and the measure for that is simple: subscriptions are up, and some of the shorter series are sold out in advance for the first time in years. Ozawa comes, then, with the blessing of both his constituencies.

His orchestra, player for player, is the equal of any in the world, and they have a magnificent hall. Ozawa has plenty going for him. There is plenty as well to make life difficult for the Music Director of a major orchestra: his employers, the Trustees, are responsible men and women whose involvement with music is apt to be remote; it gets more and more expensive to run an orchestra while income cannot be correspondingly increased, so that the financial pinch gets worse; the cultural climate, with its push to replace education with popularization, is not friendly to quality.

Seiji Ozawa is young (though Sir George Henschel, the BSO's first conductor, was just 31 when he took over), energetic, dedicated and superbly equipped as a conductor. We welcome him in Boston as an old friend, a guest conductor on many occasions, Music Director of Tanglewood for the past four summers, and someone who has in fact known the BSO longer than we have known him, because hearing the orchestra on its Japanese tour in 1957 was crucial in fixing his determination to become a conductor. His career has unfolded rapidly, and even now we share him with the San Francisco Symphony, whose Music Director he has been since 1970. What he has taken on here is at once tough and enviable. Welcome, good wishes and a long stay!

4

SUN-CHRONICLE (E)
ATTLEBORO, MASS.
D. 18,000

OCT 4 1973

New England Newsclip

Ozawa Begins BSO Directorship

By DAVID STERRITT

With a single "dramatic legend" of a work — lengthy, theatrical, alternately lyrical and fiery — Seiji Ozawa has begun his tenure as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

For his first appearance in his new role, the much-celebrated conductor has chosen an appropriate vehicle. Berlioz's "La Damnation de Faust" rises and falls in musical peaks and valleys, providing ample opportunity and challenge for the interpreter. Likewise its characteristically keen orchestration and narrative thrust make it a splendid medium for personal communication between podium and audience.

Thus, for listeners eager to make fresh, intimate acquaintance with their new orchestral guru, the Op. 24 "legende dramatique" of Berlioz offers a potent and multifaceted meeting ground. It is a piece of typically Berliozian stature, using Goethe's "Faust" — as in itself an epic feat of imagination — as starting point for all sorts of heady and fantastical invention.

The metaphysical complexities of Goethe's vision are largely subjugated to a heart-pounding sense of drama, which builds effectively through various episodes of beauty, romance, and eloquent despair. Inevitably, these sundry musical gems are all directed toward and ultimate galloping ride to hell and the infernal chorus of the damned pouring out its soullessness in senseless syllables — a colossal double climax guaranteed to tingle anyone's spine before the final loveliness of "celestial spirits," the chorus here augmented with a boys choir, welcoming the heroine's soul to heaven. Not quite Goethe's plot, but that's entirely beside the point.

Cautious Demeanor

Friday afternoon's performance had its own peaks and valleys of effectiveness. Occasional lyrical passages seemed overrefined, sapped of some strength; and Ozawa maintained a cautious demeanor at certain moments when barely restrained thunderousness might justifiably burst into outright thunderclap.

Yet on the whole, the work's "infuriate glamouring song" — to borrow some words of Goethe's — seemed every bit as strongly shaped as its "gentle, powerful sounds of Heaven." The conductor's approach was commanding and imaginative throughout, shaping the work firmly, evoking some feisty emotion, guiding the orchestra forcefully (except during isolated moments in Parts 1 and 2 when the woodwinds seemed not in full touch with the other forces).

The BSO, Tanglewood Festival Chorus, and Boston Boy Choir seemed supple and responsive, and the well-chosen soloists were in fine voice. Stuart Burrows's gorgeous tenor — last heard here in the Opera Company of Boston's "La Traviata" — seemed capable of any expressive feat with its wide range and flexible repertoire of tonal nuances. Donald McIntyre gave a ripely theatrical performance as Mephistopheles, combining an aptly demonic wit with tastefully tempered musical presence.

Edith Mathis made a warm and charming Marguerite, with Thomas Paul rounding out the cast as a sturdy Brander. All will be on hand for the work's final performance on Oct.9 except for Burrows, who will be replaced as he was Saturday night by Harry Theyard.

SENTINEL
FRANKLIN, MASS.
W. 9,973

OCT 31 1973

New England Newsclip

Ozawa, New Director of BSO, Had Early Love of Music

BOSTON — On Thursday, Nov. 1 at 8:30 p.m., Music Director Seiji Ozawa will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the first of the three Providence series concerts this season at Veterans Memorial Auditorium.

Ozawa opens the concert with the Rachmaninov Sympohny No. 3 in A, op. 44, and follows with the Schuller Capriccio stravagante. The concert closes with Debussy's La mer.

Ozawa, music director of the Boston and San Francisco Symphony Orchestras, was born in 1935, in Hoten, Manchuria, which was then a part of Japan. His family early recognized his love of music and arranged for him to receive lessons on traditional Japanese instruments.

Not long afterwards, at age seven, he also began to study the piano and Western music, and when he was 16, he enrolled as a piano student at the Toho School of Music in Tokyo. There, as a result of a finger broken while playing football, he decided to devote his time to composition and conducting, which he studied under the guidance of Professor Hideo Saito. His first conducting appearances were with the NHK and the Japan Philharmonic Orchestras, and his success was such during these early years of his career that in January 1959 he was chosen by the NHK and the Friends of music magazine as the outstanding talent of the year.

At the urging of Professor Saito, Ozawa left Japan for Europe in the fall of 1959, in order to broaden his musical experience. The enterprising young conductor persuaded a Japanese firm to give him a motor scooter and free transportation for the trip in exchange for his promotion of their product.

Travelling around the continent on motor scooter and supporting himself with various odd jobs, he entered the International Competition of Orchestra Conductors at Besancon, France, in the fall of 1959 and won first prize. One of the judges was the Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the late Charles Munch, who invited the young conductor to study at Tanglewood the following summer.

At the end of the Tanglewood season, Ozawa received the Koussevitzky Memorial Scholarship as the outstanding young conductor at the Berkshire Music Center.

Shortly afterwards, he won a scholarship to study with Herbert von Karajan in West Berlin. It was there that Leonard Bernstein, who was touring Europe with the New York Philharmonic, asked him to accompany him and his orchestra on a tour of Japan during the spring of 1961 and to return to New York during the 1961-1962 season as one of his assistants. He directed several concerts of the Philharmonic that season, though it was with the San Franciso Symphony Orchestra, during the same season that he made his first full-length professional concert appearance in North America.

Ozawa's debut with the Toronto Symphony occurred during the 1963-1964 season and his success there led to his appointment as music director of that Orchestra beginning with the 1965-1966 season. During his initial season with the Toronto he guest conducted a number of major orchestras in the United States and Europe, having in the previous season added the London Symphony and Lamoureaux Orchestras to the list of his European debuts.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 187,897

SEP 25 1973

New England Newsclip

By Barth J. Falkenberg, staff photographer

Starters

As Seiji Ozawa began conducting a rehearsal session of the Boston Symphony yesterday, he also officially began his own new career as music director of the orchestra. Having been ceremonially welcomed by Mayor Kevin H. White of Boston a few minutes earlier, Maestro Ozawa rehearsed the musicians in their first session together since Tanglewood.

4

SUN-CHRONICLE (E)
ATTLEBORO, MASS.
D. 18,000

OCT 4 1973

New England Newsclip

Ozawa Begins BSO Directorship

By DAVID STERRITT

With a single "dramatic legend" of a work — lengthy, theatrical, alternately lyrical and fiery — Seiji Ozawa has begun his tenure as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

For his first appearance in his new role, the much-celebrated conductor has chosen an appropriate vehicle. Berlioz's "La Damnation de Faust" rises and falls in musical peaks and valleys, providing ample opportunity and challenge for the interpreter. Likewise its characteristically keen orchestration and narrative thrust make it a splendid medium for personal communication between podium and audience.

Thus, for listeners eager to make fresh, intimate acquaintance with their new orchestral guru, the Op. 24 "legende dramatique" of Berlioz offers a potent and multifaceted meeting ground. It is a piece of typically Berliozian stature, using Goethe's "Faust" — as in itself an epic feat of imagination — as starting point for all sorts of heady and fantastical invention.

The metaphysical complexities of Goethe's vision are largely subjugated to a heart-pounding sense of drama, which builds effectively through various episodes of beauty, romance, and eloquent despair. Inevitably, these sundry musical gems are all directed toward and ultimate galloping ride to hell and the infernal chorus of the damned pouring out its soullessness in senseless syllables — a colossal double climax guaranteed to tingle anyone's spine before the final loveliness of "celestial spirits," the chorus here augmented with a boys choir, welcoming the heroine's soul to heaven. Not quite Goethe's plot, but that's entirely beside the point.

Cautious Demeanor

Friday afternoon's performance had its own peaks and valleys of effectiveness. Occasional lyrical passages seemed overrefined, sapped of some strength; and Ozawa maintained a cautious demeanor at certain moments when barely restrained thunderousness might justifiably burst into outright thunderclap.

Yet on the whole, the work's "infuriate glamouring song" — to borrow some words of Goethe's — seemed every bit as strongly shaped as its "gentle, powerful sounds of Heaven." The conductor's approach was commanding and imaginative throughout, shaping the work firmly, evoking some feisty emotion, guiding the orchestra forcefully (except during isolated moments in Parts 1 and 2 when the woodwinds seemed not in full touch with the other forces).

The BSO, Tanglewood Festival Chorus, and Boston Boy Choir seemed supple and responsive, and the well-chosen soloists were in fine voice. Stuart Burrows's gorgeous tenor — last heard here in the Opera Company of Boston's "La Traviata" — seemed capable of any expressive feat with its wide range and flexible repertoire of tonal nuances. Donald McIntyre gave a ripely theatrical performance as Mephistopheles, combining an aptly demonic wit with tastefully tempered musical presence.

Edith Mathis made a warm and charming Marguerite, with Thomas Paul rounding out the cast as a sturdy Brander. All will be on hand for the work's final performance on Oct.9 except for Burrows, who will be replaced as he was Saturday night by Harry Theyard.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 187,897

SEP 25 1973

New England Newsclip

Starters

...ssion of ...y began ...hestra. ...vin H. White of Boston a few minutes earlier, Maestro Oza... rehearsed the musicians in their first session toge... since Tanglewood.

SENTINEL
FRANKLIN, MASS.
W. 9,973

OCT 31 1973

New England Newsclip

Ozawa, New Director of BSO, Had Early Love of Music

BOSTON — On Thursday, Nov. 1 at 8:30 p.m., Music Director Seiji Ozawa will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the first of the three Providence series concerts this season at Veterans Memorial Auditorium.

Ozawa opens the concert with the Rachmaninov Sympohny No. 3 in A, op. 44, and follows with the Schuller Capriccio stravagante. The concert closes with Debussy's La mer.

Ozawa, music director of the Boston and San Francisco Symphony Orchestras, was born in 1935, in Hoten, Manchuria, which was then a part of Japan. His family early recognized his love of music and arranged for him to receive lessons on traditional Japanese instruments.

Not long afterwards, at age seven, he also began to study the piano and Western music, and when he was 16, he enrolled as a piano student at the Toho School of Music in Tokyo. There, as a result of a finger broken while playing football, he decided to devote his time to composition and conducting, which he studied under the guidance of Professor Hideo Saito. His first conducting appearances were with the NHK and the Japan Philharmonic Orchestras, and his success was such during these early years of his career that in January 1959 he was chosen by the NHK and the Friends of music magazine as the outstanding talent of the year.

At the urging of Professor Saito, Ozawa left Japan for Europe in the fall of 1959, in order to broaden his musical experience. The enterprising young conductor persuaded a Japanese firm to give him a motor scooter and free transportation for the trip in exchange for his promotion of their product.

Travelling around the continent on motor scooter and supporting himself with various odd jobs, he entered the International Competition of Orchestra Conductors at Besancon, France, in the fall of 1959 and won first prize. One of the judges was the Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the late Charles Munch, who invited the young conductor to study at Tanglewood the following summer.

At the end of the Tanglewood season, Ozawa received the Koussevitzky Memorial Scholarship as the outstanding young conductor at the Berkshire Music Center.

Shortly afterwards, he won a scholarship to study with Herbert von Karajan in West Berlin. It was there that Leonard Bernstein, who was touring Europe with the New York Philharmonic, asked him to accompany him and his orchestra on a tour of Japan during the spring of 1961 and to return to New York during the 1961-1962 season as one of his assistants. He directed several concerts of the Philharmonic that season, though it was with the San Franciso Symphony Orchestra, during the same season that he made his first full-length professional concert appearance in North America.

Ozawa's debut with the Toronto Symphony occurred during the 1963-1964 season and his success there led to his appointment as music director of that Orchestra beginning with the 1965-1966 season. During his initial season with the Toronto he guest conducted a number of major orchestras in the United States and Europe, having in the previous season added the London Symphony and Lamoureaux Orchestras to the list of his European debuts.

Words & Music

EastWest Journal
October 1973

Ozawa Ablaze

by Patti Schmieg

Ten years ago, I heard Seiji Ozawa's name buzzing around the Ravinia, Illinois Music Festival, as the vital, 28-year-old guest conductor with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. The name came up a year ago at Tanglewood, where his rendition of Mahler's Eighth sang and slammed through me at high blaze.

On Monday, September 24, 1973, the Boston Symphony Orchestra welcomed him as Music Director: a post he accepted months ago. The 10:30 am rehearsal featured Berlioz' "La Damnation de Faust", which began 1973-74 concert season. It also recalled the Mahler performance at Tanglewood, wherein Faust is redeemed, and not damned. The real excitement lay in the reaction of an orchestra in rapport with its conductor. Concentration and passion flickered from face to face, to the conductor, and back again. The emotional state of the music was similar to the anger and titillation of war companions before battle. The percussion of the Berlioz Rakoczy March vibrated the hall; it was awhile before I found my legs again.

Describing Ozawa as conductor proved as difficult as making a fire stand still. He was mutable and sensitive to the subtler nuances of the music, yet forced air, without bombast, into the more fiery passages. I found it significant that many of his recordings depicted fire as an element or a passion: Stravinsky's Firebird and Petrushka Suites; Orff's Carmina Burana; Berlioz' "Symphonie Fantastique."

The program for this season includes works by such rarely performed composers as Schoenberg and Cage.

Ozawa's career read like the life of a man in perpetual motion. Besides being Music Director for the BSO, he is the Artistic Director of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood (1972) and Music Director of the San Francisco Symphony Orch. (1970).

He was born in Hoten, Manchuria, in 1935, and graduated from the Toho School of Music in Tokyo. His studies at Tanglewood and as assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic led him to appearances with other major orchestras in the U.S. and Europe.

He returned to Tanglewood in 1970 as co-director of the Music Festival with Gunther Schuller. That same year, he was off to Japan with the New York Philharmonic, as co-director with Leonard Bernstein, before beginning his inaugural season with the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra.

I found that the best justification of Ozawa's musicianship came not from the accumulation of biographical credits, but from the rounds of applause which the orchestra gave its conductor after the press walked away.

GLOBE (E)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 195,032
SEP 24 1973
New England Newsclip

Seiji Ozawa, right, welcomed today as 15th director of the Boston Symphony by Mayor Kevin White, left, at Symphony Hall, shows mayor hand he strained lifting family suitcases over weekend. Boston Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler is at center. The injury has not hampered Ozawa's work as he led the orchestra in its first full rehearsal. (UPI) PAGE ONE

Conducting at rehearsal yesterday was the first appearance for Seiji Ozawa as the 15th conductor of the Boston Symphony. The music he led the orchestra in rehearsing was Berlioz's "Faust's Damnation," to be performed Sept. 28-29 and Oct. 9 at Symphony Hall. See story on Page 31. (Ted Dully photo)

GLOBE (E)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 195,032
SEP 25 1973
New England Newsclip

Newsclippings which document Mr. Ozawa's inauguration as BSO Music Director, October 1973.

Words & Music

EastWest Journal
October 1973

Ozawa Ablaze

by Patti Schmieg

Ten years ago, I heard Seiji Ozawa's name buzzing around the Ravinia, Illinois Music Festival, as the vital, 28-year-old guest conductor with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. The name came up a year ago at Tanglewood, where his rendition of Mahler's Eighth sang and slammed through me at high blaze.

On Monday, September 24, 1973, the Boston Symphony Orchestra welcomed him as Music Director: a post he accepted months ago. The 10:30 am rehearsal featured Berlioz' "La Damnation de Faust", which began 1973-74 concert season. It also recalled the Mahler performance at Tanglewood, wherein Faust is redeemed, and not damned.

The real excitement lay in the reaction of an orchestra in rapport with its conductor. Concentration and passion flickered from face to face, to the conductor, and back again. The emotional state of the music was similar to the anger and titillation of war companions before battle. The percussion of the Berlioz Rakoczy March vibrated the hall; it was awhile before I found my legs again.

Describing Ozawa as conductor proved as difficult as making a fire stand still. He was mutable and sensitive to the subtler nuances of the music, yet forced air, without bombast, into the more fiery passages. I found it significant that many of his recordings depicted fire as an element or a passion: Stravinsky's Firebird and Petrushka Suites; Orff's Carmina Burana; Berlioz' "Symphonie Fantastique."

The program for this season includes works by such rarely performed composers as Schoenberg and Cage.

Ozawa's career read like the life of a man in perpetual motion. Besides being Music Director for the BSO, he is the Artistic Director of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood (1972) and Music Director of the San Francisco Symphony Orch. (1970).

He was born in Hoten, Manchuria, in 1935, and graduated from the Toho School of Music in Tokyo. His studies at Tanglewood and as assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic led him to appearances with other major orchestras in the U.S. and Europe.

He returned to Tanglewood in 1970 as co-director of the Music Festival with Gunther Schuller. That same year, he was off to Japan with the New York Philharmonic, as co-director with Leonard Bernstein, before beginning his inaugural season with the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra.

I found that the best justification of Ozawa's musicianship came not from the accumulation of biographical credits, but from the rounds of applause which the orchestra gave its conductor after the press walked away.

GLOBE (E)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 195,032

SEP 24 1973

New England Newsclip

Seiji Ozawa, right, welcomed today as 15th director of the Boston Symphony by Mayor Kevin White, left, at Symphony Hall, shows mayor hand he strained lifting family suitcases over weekend. Boston Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler is at center. The injury has not hampered Ozawa's work as he led the orchestra in its first full rehearsal. (UPI) PAGE ONE

Conducting at rehearsal yesterday was the first appearance for Seiji Ozawa as the 15th conductor of the Boston Symphony. The music he led the orchestra in rehearsing was Berlioz's "Faust's Damnation," to be performed Sept. 28-29 and Oct. 9 at Symphony Hall. See story on Page 31. (Ted Dully photo)

GLOBE (E)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 195,032

SEP 25 1973

New England Newsclip

Newsclippings which document Mr. Ozawa's inauguration as BSO Music Director, October 1973.

Words & Music

EastWest Journal
October 1973

Ozawa Ablaze

by Patti Schmieg

Ten years ago, I heard Seiji Ozawa's name buzzing around the Ravinia, Illinois Music Festival, as the vital, 28-year-old guest conductor with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. The name came up a year ago at Tanglewood, where his rendition of Mahler's Eighth sang and slammed through me at high blaze.

On Monday, September 24, 1973, the Boston Symphony Orchestra welcomed him as Music Director: a post he accepted months ago. The 10:30 am rehearsal featured Berlioz' "La Damnation de Faust", which began 1973-74 concert season. It also recalled the Mahler performance at Tanglewood, wherein Faust is redeemed, and not damned. The real excitement lay in the reaction of an orchestra in rapport with its conductor. Concentration and passion flickered from face to face, to the conductor, and back again. The emotional state of the music was similar to the anger and titillation of war companions before battle. The percussion of the Berlioz Rakoczy March vibrated the hall; it was awhile before I found my legs again.

Describing Ozawa as conductor proved as difficult as making a fire stand still. He was mutable and sensitive to the subtler nuances of the music, yet forced air, without bombast, into the more fiery passages. I found it significant that many of his recordings depicted fire as an element or a passion: Stravinsky's Firebird and Petrushka Suites; Orff's Carmina Burana; Berlioz' "Symphonie Fantastique."

The program for this season includes works by such rarely performed composers as Schoenberg and Cage.

Ozawa's career read like the life of a man in perpetual motion. Besides being Music Director for the BSO, he is the Artistic Director of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood (1972) and Music Director of the San Francisco Symphony Orch. (1970).

He was born in Hoten, Manchuria, in 1935, and graduated from the Toho School of Music in Tokyo. His studies at Tanglewood and as assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic led him to appearances with other major orchestras in the U.S. and Europe.

He returned to Tanglewood in 1970 as co-director of the Music Festival with Gunther Schuller. That same year, he was off to Japan with the New York Philharmonic, as co-director with Leonard Bernstein, before beginning his inaugural season with the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra.

I found that the best justification of Ozawa's musicianship came not from the accumulation of biographical credits, but from the rounds of applause which the orchestra gave its conductor after the press walked away.

Conducting at rehearsal yesterday was the first appearance for Seiji Ozawa as the 15th conductor of the Boston Symphony. The music he led the orchestra in rehearsing was Berlioz's "Faust's Damnation," to be performed Sept. 28-29 and Oct. 9 at Symphony Hall. See story on Page 31. (Ted Dully photo)

GLOBE (E)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 195,032
SEP 25 1973
New England Newsclip

Newsclippings which document Mr. Ozawa's inauguration as BSO Music Director, October 1973.

6

Week 1 Sept. 28/29

Berlioz: The Damnation of Faust

GLOBE (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042

SEP 29 1973 New England Newsclip

MICHAEL STEINBERG

Orchestra gave all Ozawa asked

Yesterday afternoon, Seiji Ozawa conducted his first concert as music director of the Boston Symphony. His welcome at the beginning of the afternoon was distinctly friendly, with many in the audience standing to applaud him, but next time he starts out on a new job he might be well advised to choose a program with a loud ending and something less long than Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." When it ended, most of the audience was concerned only with getting out, and, indeed, ladies had been determinedly shuffling or striding toward the exits for the last three quarters of an hour.

Ozawa conducted "The Damnation of Faust" at Tanglewood in 1971, but it seems we have not had it in Boston since Munch did it in 1954. High time then, because it is so beautiful. Berlioz was ruthless and possessive with Goethe—as ruthless and possessive as Goethe had been with the Faust legend—but by legitimate authority: He knew and understood the poet, completely and profoundly. The man was equipped to deal with the irony of Mephistopheles, to see the mixed pain and pride behind Faust's aspirations, to know the abyss of Faust's and Marguerite's love for each other. The composer had the range and command of musical language: no one has gone beyond what he said in Marguerite's "D'amour l'ardente flamme" to the theme of love betrayed, and the writing of that took heart and brain and ear, all three.

I see that with a few reservations, particularly about cuts, I found Ozawa's 1971 performance "marvelous," which I admit astonishes me. I don't know which of us has changed, but I thought his work yesterday often rather flat and on the surface. He strikes me as a Berlioz conductor by fiat (party that of Deutsche Grammophon, who plan to record the major works with him) or by act of will more than by affinity. With "Faust," he was respectful and energetic, but not imaginative or responsive. He tended to neutralize Berlioz's many modifications of speed volume, and, for example, in the postlude to Faust's "Merci, doux crepuscule!" he gave us, with the straight-ahead, purely "musical" playing of the meandering violin line, no suggestion of the touching picture of Faust walking quietly about Marguerite's room for the first time, examining it "with passionate curiosity."

The singing of Stuart Burrows as Faulst was unflawed pleasure. His tenor voice is virile, pliant, lyric (and yesterday it was "there" from the first note); he uses it with intelligence, ardor and taste. On the other hand, getting Edith Mathis to sing Marguerite is less a believable response to the question of who can do it best (or well) than the decision of a record company to push one of its important properties. Marguerite wants to be a mezzo with ease and lightness at the top, or, failing that, a soprano with unusual intensity and character in her low notes. Mathis is an admirable artist and singer, but as Pamina or Aennchen or Sophie; here, miscast, she was pallid. The Mephistopheles, Donald McIntyre, had wit, rhythm, presence, and projection, but not the sensuous warmth that is needed when you get to "Voici des roses" (in his operatic life in Europe, he specializes in growly and declamatory parts). Thomas Paul was incisive and quick as Brander, but a bit hollow and unsure in pitch when he returned in the Epilogue as an Earthly Voice, Judith Dickison then being his satisfactory Celestial counterpart.

The orchestra gave Ozawa all he asked for, and had he asked for more — like all the pianissimos Berlioz wanted — they would no doubt have given him that, too; they were in admirable condition and high spirits.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 187,897

OCT 1 1973 New England Newsclip

Ozawa lifts baton as BSO director

By David Sterritt

With a single "dramatic legend" of a work — lengthy, theatrical, alternately lyrical and fiery — Seiji Ozawa has begun his tenure as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Music

For his first appearance in his new role, the much-celebrated conductor has chosen an appropriate vehicle. Berlioz's "La Damnation de Faust" rises and falls in musical peaks and valleys, providing ample opportunity and challenge for the interpreter. Likewise its characteristically keen orchestration and narrative thrust make it a splendid medium for personal communication between podium and audience.

Thus, for listeners eager to make fresh, intimate acquaintance with their new orchestral guru, the Op. 24 "legende dramatique" of Berlioz offers a potent and multifaceted meeting ground. It is a piece of typically Berliozian stature, using Goethe's "Faust" — as in itself an epic feat of imagination — as starting point for all sorts of heady and fantastical invention.

The metaphysical complexities of Goethe's vision are largely subjugated to a heart-pounding sense of drama, which builds effectively through various episodes of beauty, romance, and eloquent despair. Inevitably, these sundry musical gems are all directed toward the ultimate galloping ride to hell and the infernal chorus of the damned pouring out its soullessness in senseless syllables — a colossal double climax guaranteed to tingle anyone's spine before the final loveliness of "celestial spirits," the chorus here augmented with a boys choir, welcoming the heroine's soul to heaven. Not quite Goethe's plot, but that's entirely beside the point.

Cautious demeanor

Friday afternoon's performance had its own peaks and valleys of effectiveness. Occasional lyrical passages seemed over-refined, sapped of some strength; and Ozawa maintained a cautious demeanor at certain moments when barely restrained thunderousness might justifiably burst into outright thunderclap. Yet on the whole, the work's "infuriate glamouring song" — to borrow some words of Goethe's — seemed every bit as strongly shaped as its "gentle, powerful sounds of Heaven." The conductor's approach was commanding and imaginative throughout, shaping the work firmly, evoking some feisty emotion, guiding the orchestra forcefully (except during isolated moments in Parts 1 and 2 when the woodwinds seemed not in full touch with the other forces).

The BSO, Tanglewood Festival Chorus, and Boston Boy Choir seemed supple and responsive, and the well-chosen soloists were in fine voice. Stuart Burrows's gorgeous tenor — last heard here in the Opera Company of Boston's "La Traviata" — seemed capable of any expressive feat with its wide range and flexible repertoire of tonal nuances. Donald McIntyre gave a ripely theatrical performance as Mephistopheles, combining an aptly demonic wit with tastefully tempered musical presence.

Charming Marguerite

Edith Mathis made a warm and charming Marguerite, with Thomas Paul rounding out the cast as a sturdy Brander. All will be on hand for the work's final performance on Oct. 9 except for Mr. Burrows, who will be replaced as he was Saturday night by Harry Theyard.

PATRIOT LEDGER (E)
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 71,020

OCT 11 1973 New England Newsclip

In Concert

Ozawa Begins Well

By Peter M. Knapp

It's now official. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has a permanent music director following a year without one and the William Steinberg interregnum, and the beginning of that new directorship has been auspicious for Seiji Ozawa.

Not that Ozawa has been a stranger hereabouts and particularly at Tanglewood where he has guided the orchestra since Erich Leinsdorf left in 1969. But he's now in charge, and the orchestra is able to plan and dream for hopefully another great era.

Symphony Hall has been undergoing some renewal and renovation for the opening of the 93rd season — air conditioning has been installed, as well as a downstairs bar and new corridor chandeliers — not especially attractive ones in my opinion.

As a style note, the men of the BSO have abandoned the long locks and sideburns and the several beards of a few seasons ago, and Ozawa is wearing a white turtleneck and beads under his tailcoat. Bars, air conditioning and turtlenecks — and oh yes, television, WGBH-TV was taping the program — what would Henry Lee Higginson have said?

To open his season, Ozawa chose a hefty production — Hector Berlioz' dramatic legend "La Damnation de Faust", a work which the BSO has been doing about once every two decades. Ozawa did close the 1971 Tanglewood season with the work, but the version heard Tuesday night in Symphony Hall had greater dramatic impact and was in all respects a very special event.

Like much of Berlioz, his treatment of the "Faust" legend tends to grow on a listener. It is not a comprehensive treatment of Goethe's poem, rather a series of compressed dramatic episodes. Berlioz was not reluctant even to invent a scene — "on a plain in Hungary" — for the admitted purpose of inserting a brilliant version of the Hungarian Rakoczi March, which never fails to make its mark.

The four main sections and 20 linked scenes present the dramatic highlights of the story — the twist being Faust's damnation rather than his redemption. With this compression and episodic treatment, the weighty philosophical issues posed by Goethe are hardly hinted, and Berlioz sacrifices character development and thus audience involvement with the characters as in opera. But his virtuosity and flair for theatrical musical events brings off what on paper scans as scenic hopscotch.

And above all, the work abounds with astonishing examples of compositional wizardry; not all the ideas come off, but one has to admire the fertile mind and daring of a musician trying such stunts as uniting two colliding choruses in the conclusion of Part 2, or inventing a nonsense demon-language for the depiction of Pandemonium. Throughout, there is a dazzling display of Berlioz' instrumental legerdemain, exquisite details of orchestration, and intricate polyphony.

Ozawa has a special flair for this kind of music, an instinctive sense of theater and sound and color. One may quibble about details and definition of certain passages, but Ozawa's Berlioz has scale, vividness and a vitality which, coupled with some of the BSO's most resplendent playing, made this performance compelling. (The one spot of real uneasiness occurred in the Scene 14 trio and chorus which nearly came unhinged.)

Of particular impact were the march, the rowdy drinking scene in Auerbach's cellar, the chilling Ride to the Abyss (the gentle Gounod could never conjure up such demonic measures), and perhaps the climax of the evening, Edith Mathis' emotion-packed, artfully shaped singing of "D'amour l'ardente flamme" abetted by Ozawa's sensitive accompaniment. The Swiss soprano, making her BSO debut as Marguerite, is a superb artist with a voice of sunshine and fresh air.

Also impressive was the personality filled Mephistopheles of baritone Donald McIntyre, a London opera stalwart. McIntyre belongs to the select group of gifted singing-actors, communicating through vocal and facial inflection. With his rugged baritone and expressive features, McIntyre characterized a sly, witty, cynical devil obviously programmed to triumph over the dead-pan Faust.

As that unfortunate gentleman, tenor Harry Theyard sang very well, especially in the Invocation to Nature, but without much projection of personality and ran into vocal distress in the duet with Marguerite. Bass Thomas Paul effectively handled Brander's song, and there was first-rate, clean-cut singing by the Tanglewood Festival Chorus joined by the Boston Boy Choir in the caramel-coated Apotheosis of Marguerite.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 24,500

OCT 4 1973

New England Newsclip

Ozawa Disappoints in Opening Of Boston Symphony Season

With the fanfare over and a new music director at the helm, the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its ninety - third season last weekend. The buildup had been fully Madison Avenue in style with radio and newspaper ads proclaiming "Ozawa Wants You," and urging listeners and readers to "Put a little Ozawa in your life." If the taste of the performances in Symphony Hall were to match the taste of the advertising, the audiences might have steeled themselves for a season of shlock.

Fortunately, in one respect, it wasn't that way. Seiji Ozawa, the much lauded new musical director, had chosen to launch his incumbency with the presentation of a superbly eloquent work, Hector Berlioz' dramatic legend for soloists, chorus, boys choir, and orchestra, "La damanation de Faust." The Berlioz epic was the lone piece on the program.

Goethe had a way of fascinating the musical imagination with his Faust legend. Many composers took it as their text for one form of composition or another. Gounod and Boito chose it as the libretto for operas. Wagner wrote a concert overture and Liszt a symphony. Mahler's Eighth Symphony, the Symphony of A Thousand, is also based on the Faust story, and so is Busoni's opera "Doktor Faust." No single work can be said to have inspired more musical settings than the powerful Goethe masterpiece.

Berlioz was instantly enthralled by a French translation of Faust and said he always carried it with him, reading it everywhere, whether at dinner or in the theater, or even in the streets. Twice he tried his hand at writing music for Faust, first his Huit scenes de Faust and then, nearly twenty years later, La damnation itself.

In composing the Damnation, Berlioz took liberties with the Faust story, moving the opening of its four parts to Hungary in order to validate the inclusion of the Rakoczi March which had captured his fancy. The famed march became the climax of Part One and subsequently of the excerpts frequently presented at orchestral concerts.

From beginning to end, the music is profound and passionate, stunningly orchestrated in the manner of Berlioz and it remains one of the high points among his works for voices and orchestra. The cast calls for Faust, a tenor; Marguerite, a mezzo soprano; Mephistopheles, a baritone; Brander, a bass; and a chorus and boys' choir.

Friday afternoon, Stuart Burrows was the Faust. I heard the Saturday evening performance with Harry Theyard in the title role and he was a keen disappointment. His voice was forced and short of the many different colors the music demands.

Donald McIntyre, the Mephistopheles, unfortunately suffered an attack of laryngitis on Saturday and despite gallant efforts was obviously performing under a great handicap that evening. Thomas Paul was excellent as Brander and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, directed by John Oliver, and the Boston Boy Choir, directed by Theodore Marier performed admirably.

Edith Mathis, the Marguerite, is a fine soprano whose talents are better suited to other roles. Marguerite is not her cup of tea. She was clarly unsuited to the role. Judith Dickison sang effectively in the epilogue as the celestial soprano.

What about Ozawa? It has been years since the Orchestra played so cleanly and sounded so brilliantly. There was nothing it could not do and it seemed to have a very warm regard for the new maestro. This speaks well for the new regime and promises good sounds to come.

But sound is only one part of orchestral satisfaction. Drama, excitement, mood are others. If the interpretation of La damnation is any indication of what lies ahead, there could very well be a "let's not go so fast" attitude in some minds about putting a little Ozawa in their lives. For all the elegant orchestral playing, the better moments of the singing, and the applause of the audience, it was essentially a dull performance that never probed the dramatic content of the Berlioz score.

Ozawa, like Miss Mathis, may be better suited to other works. One can only hope so.

H.

HERALD-AMERICAN (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 424,654

SEP 29 1973

New England Newsclip

Symphony Open on Grand Note

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

Berlioz La Damnation de Faust" was the chosen vehicle to open the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 93rd season and Seiji Ozawa's first as Music Director yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. Employing large orchestra, soloists and chorus and dealing with cosmic reality, the work was an appropriatly splashy gesture for such an occasion.

It is, of course, something more than an occasional piece. A grandly dramatic canvas, it is Berlioz supreme effort on behalf of a work (Goethe's drama) which he cherished and identified with throughout his life.

As with most of Berlioz music, this is definitely quirky — the melodic phrases, which a musician friend of mine calls "stream of consciousness," are irregular and always surprising; the orchestral effects and colors uniquely Berlioz. In fact, this idiosyncratic idiom, which never quite loses its strangeness, is perhaps what accounts for audience's general lack of symphony, buth now and in Berlioz time, for the composer's music.

Nevertheless, "The Damnation" is masterful. In its depiction of a gothic world peopled with dark spirits, devils eager to lure men's souls to the abyss, and great battles between evil and good, it is unsurpassed by the numerous other settings of Goette's work.

There is nothing, for example, quite so hair-raising as

Concert Review

Faust's and Mephistopheles' wild ride to the Abyss with the philosopher's shouts of terror and the infernal horses' pounding hooves. Nothing like the Pandemonium, the dead souls' screams of triumph (Hell seen as unremitting and unbearable noise) when Faust gallops over the brink.

On the same dramatic plane, if a little less overpowering, there is an intoxicating Sprites' Ballet which charms Faust into enchanted sleep; the cynical Amen fugue attached to a ribald song with which Berlioz very obviously ridiculed his Conservatoire masters; and the very lovely and touching "seduced and abandoned" scene for Marguerite with its orchestral flashbacks. And there is lots more.

Ozawa, who has conducted the "Damnation" at Tanglewood, obviously has an affectionate and admiring feeling for it. He also understands that sort of thing musically — it is perhaps the kind of idiom for which he has the greatest affinity. Friday afternoon's performance, therefore, was exciting — although, to be honest, still not quite as much of a turn-on as one might have expected.

The new music director has a fine sense of pace and direction and sensitivity for Berlioz unusual color combinations, however, his dynamic architecture leaned rather too heavily in the direction of loudness which resulted, for example, in a Hungarian March which sounded so loud and final that people were almost forced to applaud its conclusion. A rather strange thing to happen only three sections into the work.

Berlioz wrote impossible things for his tenor (Faust) — music meant to penetrate with steely tone thick orchestral textures and, yet, also lyrical love songs; plus a lot of high notes which many respectable tenors almost strangle on.

Ozawa's soloist, Stuart Burrows, had the high notes and the lyricism. However, good Alfredo and Tamino that he is, he didn't have the punch when it was needed. Given that one limitation, though, he sang with good dramatic sense, musicality and intelligence.

9) Week 2 Oct. 4/5/6/9
Beethoven: 'Emperor' Concerto
Ligeti: Melodien
Brahms: Symphony No. 1

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 187,897
OCT 9 1973 New England

Whitestone Photo

Ozawa was on the podium

Surging Brahms brings audience to feet

By David Sterritt

When Seiji Ozawa made his first appearance as the Boston Symphony's music director, a week and a half ago, an enthusiastic audience greeted him with a standing ovation before he had conducted a single note.

Music

During Ozawa's second program, heard last Friday afternoon, matters changed only slightly. This time the standing O came when the music had ended — after a surging Brahms First Symphony had brought the listeners forcefully to their feet by sheer strength of sound.

Perhaps the symphony's impact was subtly enhanced by its position in the proceedings — following Gyorgy Ligeti's 1971 "Melodien" for orchestra, a concentrated and complicated work packing a very different kind of effect. And perhaps the mighty "Emperor" Concerto of Beethoven made an especially apt program-opener, its sturdily conducted mass realizing both gorgeous logic and thrusting emotional weight. But it was Brahms who most clearly won the day, his Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68, managing to dominate even so strong and varied an afternoon with apparent ease.

Ozawa's rhythmic strength

When he wants to, the nimble Ozawa can command a most extraordinary rhythmic strength. This special attribute permeated the Brahms opening movement, underlying and underlining the full, sweeping string work and dramatic urgency that lay the groundwork for the piece as a whole.

The Andante offered more of the same, plus a slow poetry. This was followed by a properly spare third movement, and n the symphony's compelling conclusion — Ozawa drawing a majestic grace from its recurring triumphal strains, and imbuing the immaculate overall development with a fine charge of dramatic rightness.

Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 5 in E flat received a similarly substantial performance, with Christoph Eschenbach the versatile and confident soloist. He worked well with Ozawa, the two evidently sharing a stolid if not particularly warm approach to the work.

The central Adagio, played at a surprisingly slow tempo, rose to occasional moments of extravagant lushness, yet Mr. Eschenbach maintained a stance of careful objectivity throughout the concerto. Ozawa countered this with a ripe, sometimes punchy approach, for a balanced and moving final impression.

Ligeti's reputation

Ligeti, an inventive and resourceful composer, received a sudden boost in fame when his "Atmospheres" showed up as a theme in Stanley Kubrick's brilliant film "2001: A Space Odyssey." Alas, the composer is reportedly most unhappy with both the film and the use of his music in it.

What is done cannot be undone, especially in the mass medium of cinema. But Ligeti's "serious" reputation will surely endure. Boston was reminded of it once again on Friday, through the BSO's precise reading of his "Melodien."

The piece is shaped like some lopsided surrealist arch. It begins with a spare, airy-eerie complex of fragments: builds to a climax that seems almost crashing for so small an orchestral force; and then fades vanishingly into nothing. It is short without seeming small, jagged without seeming rocky, difficult yet unpretentious.

Programming "Melodien" between the Beethoven and the Brahms was an adventurous decision, and not a wholly successful one. Ligeti's busy texturizing contrasted with the others' sonic might to the others' advantage; a sparser environment would have been more appropriate to a work of such self-conscious economy of means. Yet it lent an evocative extra dimension to a musicianly afternoon at Symphony Hall, and — in its first Boston performance — it offered another welcome look at a most significant contemporary composer.

HERALD-AMERICAN (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 424,654
OCT 6 1973 New England Newsclip

Eschenbach's Beethoven Tops

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

In the recently published monumental biography of Gustav Mahler, the composer's conducting (which made his reputation long before his compositions did) is characterized through reports of contemporary journalists, and over and over, the 19th century critics praise Mahler's tremendous control over dynamics.

He was said to be capable of producing wide varieties of shading, infinite colors and great contrasts.

It was this kind of dynamic control, along with his marvelously clear articulation, that characterized Christoph Eschenbach's playing of the Beethoven Piano Concerto No. 5 in E-flat with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Seiji Ozawa Thursday evening.

RATHER unusually for Eschenbach, his playing of the concerto seemed not to be inspired by any particularly individual conception — although there were some localized eccentricities which proved sometimes magical insight, sometimes just irritating.

Instead, the idea seemed to be to take a too well-known work, play it absolutely straight but musically, sensitively, lovingly. Something which happens none too often with the "Emperor."

Something else which doesn't happen very often: this was not a performance in which the performer banged

• Concert Review

hell out of the piano (to quote the elegant phrase of Harold Schoenberg).

IF THERE was the proverbial contest between orchestra and piano for dominance, the latter certainly wasn't competing on the basis of over-kill. Which brings us back to Eschenbach's dynamics.

Throughout the three movements, one was struck by the multiple levels of sound at the pianist's disposal, but perhaps nowhere was he so beautifully in command as in the opening statement of the second movement. Ozawa and the orchestra, who begin the movement, matched him nuance for nuance with absolutely the most sensuous tone I've heard in some time.

FOR MY PART, everyone should have gone home after that — there would be nothing to match the moment in what followed.

The Boston premiere of Gyorgy Ligeti's "Melodien" was next on the program and it proved to be 12 minutes of the same piece Ligeti has been writing for some time now. An amusing program note pointed out that Ligeti was distressed that his "Atmospheres" had been used (without permission, incidentally) as background music for the apes and mystical stone blocks in Kubrick's "2001."

I have to admit that "Melodien" is enough like "Atmospheres," at least initially, to take me back to the apes and blocks.

ALTHOUGH it purports to concentrate on melody and rhythm, the two-year-old work is a sort of atmospheric color piece similar to other Ligeti pieces and has a shimmering, occasionally chattering surface. Harmonically, it is surprisingly conventional, even lush, and there is always a good deal of simultaneous activity going on.

Although initially attractive it is really too long and too much the same throughout.

To compensate the audience for this contemporary excursion, Ozawa programmed the Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C-minor, which sounded rather rough and crude although the listeners found it exciting music-making, to judge from their ovation.

GLOBE (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042
OCT 6 1973 New England Newsclip

MICHAEL STEINBERG

An exciting BSO concert

With Crumb, Ligeti, and Martino as the competition, the week's best modern piece turned out to be by Beethoven — the Emperor Concerto, which Christoph Eschenbach played Thursday evening with Seiji Ozawa and the Boston Symphony. A dangerous remark, cheaply sententious (a commencement address — by whom? for what school?), but I don't mean it as a slap at our contemporaries, and it was Beethoven's newness, his huge and effortless originality that was projected so excitingly at Thursday's concert.

It is not often you perceive those qualities in a work as much played and as enshrined as the Emperor. You are reassured by the familiar sounds or you are invited to play "comparing pianists" games, but actually there is nothing reassuring about a piece of such audacity and irregularity, and Thursday's performance drew attention only to Beethoven.

It is an audacity of economy, of the exuberant outrageousness of building so grand a structure from material of such purposeful neutrality. Beethoven's compensation is to lavish prodigious and subtle inventiveness on the details of the piano figurations. He restricts the colors, too, but what a range of possibilities he reveals in grey and silver and blue, and what adventure he finds in the sound of muted strings, a solo clarinet, a duet of piano with pianissimo kettledrum. The dialogue of solo and orchestra is wild, offering always what you least expect in distribution of emphasis, length of statement, and punctuation.

With Eschenbach's and Ozawa's performance I have just one quarrel: the "Adagio un poco mosso" sounded lovely, but it is just not believable that Beethoven can have imagined anything like so slow a tempo. For the rest, Eschenbach's playing was pianistically brilliant, in hard and accurate focus, forceful and keen, alert, witty. In the Adagio, I have rarely heard a pianist so enjoy the difference between three and four, and that exhilarating, glad moment when the finale suddenly explodes free was felt and played with a freshness that made it almost as startling as it must have been 160 years ago.

Eschenbach and Ozawa work with special rapport, and there was a wonderful sense both of sureness — as in a virtuoso trapeze team — and of humor to their ensemble. Much of the finale consists of provocative remarks by the piano, to be fielded somehow by the orchestra, and the quality of Eschenbach's launchings and Ozawa's catchings was delightful to observe (and, I must add, one rarely sees a pianist who so intensely and effectively thinks "across" the orchestral phrases and paragraphs in which he does not play).

Ligeti's "Melodien" is his version of the International Twittering-Machine Piece. What the Los Angeles program annotator (quoted in our program book) had in mind when he wrote, "it is unlikely you will hear the 'melodies' of the title because there are so many of them occurring simultaneously," I can't imagine. Many melodies, or melodic fragments, are easily heard in this short, mildly engaging, cutely scored, slightly tricky piece.

Ozawa ended with the Brahms First, and that was impressive: massive without being ponderous, unforced, and, above, all, superbly rhythmic. The Symphony Concert As Adventure is still an option.

Week 3

(9)

GLOBE (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042
OCT 20 1973
New England Newsclip

Colin Davis conducts BSO in 'Leonore,' 'Orpheus' and Sibelius 4th

BSO

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

An interesting study in economy, the three pieces Colin Davis conducted at yesterday's Boston Symphony Concert: Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 2, "Orpheus" by Stravinsky, and the Sibelius fourth symphony.

"Leonore" No. 2 is the crazy one, No. 3 its rational revision. The craziness lies in the combination of extraordinary deletions and compressions (leaving out the recapitulation, for example) with extreme rhetorical extravagances. Economy has become outright theatrical.

Twenty-five years ago, when "Orpheus" was new, the critics got all exercised over its having almost no loud music — really just the 14 bars when the bacchantes close in for the kill. It is, in fact, a marvel of restraint, of tenderness and serenity. The orchestra is modest and sounds still more so, the harmonies are restricted and cool. But it is also beautiful, in the rightness, the chastity of expression, the patience with which this story of anguish and terrible impatience is told. Musically, there is one miracle after another, and I love especially those that arise from Stravinsky's way with voicing that makes common chords sound as though he had just invented them (a cunning he shares with Beethoven).

For true Sibelians, the fourth is the summit, and it is also th symphony most likely to interest musicians otherwise not sympathetic to him (tourists prefer the flashier second or fifth). It is laconic, close-mouthed. We know, though, that what is held down in one place will erupt in another, and so from time to time it screams. Once, in the Largo, whe Sibelius thinks nobody is listening, it sings. It is a half-hour spent with a man who is obsessive and ungracious, but strong and sure of who he is — tiresome and compelling together, therefore.

An exceptionally interesting program (though recommended primarily to the sober), eloquently performed, and available again tonight, Tuesday, and Thursday.

HERALD-AMERICAN (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 424,654
OCT 22 1973
New England Newsclip

Leningrad Philharmonic, BSO Perform Modern Symphonies

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

Two symphonies composed in the Twentieth Century — during which the form has not been taken quite so for granted as in the previous century — occupied places on the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Leningrad Philharmonic both at Symphony Hall Friday.

The first, Sibelius' craggy, difficult No. 4, dates from 1910 when further extensions of the traditional tonal system seemed impossible and composers were beginning to move on to new or non-systems and the forms which could be engendered from them. The latter, the 15th symphony by Shostakovich, the Leningraders' compatriot, dates from 1972 and is the work of a man dedicated to bucking a trend, one who has continued to see possibilities in an "old-fashioned" procedure.

Music Review

COLIN DAVIS, who also conducted a wonderfully clean, beautifully logical performance of Stravinsky's ballet, "Orpheus" (choreography by Balanchine), made the Sibelius sound just exactly Balanchine), made the Sibelius sound just exactly like what it is: a lush, decadent art work.

The piece which has provoked criticism since the first performance and still isn't dear to the hearts of audiences (to judge by Friday's lukewarm reception), has been denounced as "cubist music," "dissonant and dolefule mutterings, gene lly leading nowhere," and "a mixture of musical quassia and wormwood."

Actually what really bothered all those folks and audiences today, one suspects, is that there are no complete melodies. There are a number of lush possibilities, but Sibelius never let them become more than a truncated suggestion. Everything is tremendously compact and economical.

THERE IS ALSO the matter of his ending all the movements with very tentative-sounding cadences — many open octaves — and without any great fortissimo climaxes, and the unremittingly dark, gloomy atmosphere and the rather forbidding chamber music-like groupings of instruments by families.

All these things militate against instant approachability and the Sibelius, has therefore been thought of as mysterious, uniquely original, puzzling. Actually, it is a fairly conventional structure with clearly defined form and tonal scheme and harmonies that sound different because of use of things like the whole tone scale and tritone.

IT IS, HOWEVER, a fascinating work, especially in the context of Sibelius' other music — never does he make any concessions to prettiness. The work is tough, muscular and needs to be thoroughly chewed to be enjoyed. But it is worth the effort, and Colin Davis and the BSO gave a marvelous performance of it phrases and wonderfully con— with beautifully shaped trolled dynamics.

The Shostakovich 15th is also characterized by its chamber-music like disposition of instruments and general absence of orchestral tuttis. It, however, does not have the grit displayed by the Sibelius.

For a visiting orchestra like the Leningrad Philharmonic (under Gennady Rozhdestvensky), it is a natural — a brilliant show-piece by which to show off the orchestra's considerable wares.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 187,897
OCT 23 1973
New England Newsclip

Colin Davis and BSO— Sibelius to Stravinsky

By David Sterritt

"The time seems near, if it has not actually arrived, when the chastened sublimity of a moor, a sea, or a mountain, will be all of nature that is absolutely in keeping with the moods of the more thinking among mankind."

Critic Cecil Gray once cited these words of Thomas Hardy — from "The Return of the Native" — in attempting to explain the strange appeal of Sibelius's Fourth Symphony, a work of "deepest tragedy and gloom . . . elusive and baffling." Perhaps indeed, as Hardy suggested, "It is a question if the exclusive reign of orthodox beauty is not approaching its last quarter."

Music

Today the symphony as a whole sounds tamer than it apparently did to critics in 1913. One of them found it to be "cubist music" at a time when cubism itself was still a new mystery; another heard in it "harmonic idioms" that would place Sibelius in "the very vanguard of the leading innovators of today."

Epic sweep

Yet there remains a darkly inviting epic sweep to the "chastened" A minor Op. 63 of the man who also gave us "Finlandia." This mood of shadowy, twilight beckonings faded evocatively into new life through the Boston Symphony's first-rate performance on Friday afternoon, under the baton of "principal guest conductor" Colin Davis. The flowing incisiveness of the first movement, and the almost Wagnerian fullness of the third, lent particular weight to this strong program-closer.

Problems cropped up occasionally. In the second movement, for example, conductor Davis often seemed to be receiving less dynamic expressiveness than he sought — an unusual situation, since Davis is known to have a particularly good relationship with the BSO. Yet such a momentary difficulty was more than overshadowed by the magnificently strong string work of the Largo movement, and by the precision of articulation that also marked the symphony's latter half.

'Orpheus' ballet

The Sibelius was preceded by Stravinsky's "Orpheus" ballet, a deliberately minimal work in three rigorously refined scenes. Davis reached for and grasped a striking balance among the orchestral forces, deftly maintaining his footing while stepping through the work's understated but often tricky rhythms and syncopations.

The concert began with Beethoven's Overture "Leonore" No. 2, Op. 72a — interpreted broadly and dramatically, marred only by some careless offstage trumpet work (yet one must sympathize with the trumpeter's probable problem in adjusting his intonation to an orchestra on the other side of a wall).

The program was heard again in Symphony Hall on Saturday evening, and will be repeated tonight and Thursday night — complete with its mood-boosting critical quotations in the program notes.

TIMES (E)
BEVERLY, MASS.
D. 9,514
OCT 10 1973
New England Newsclip

Davis to lead BSO in Sibelius

BOSTON—Principal Guest Conductor Colin Davis conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in works by Beethoven, Stravinsky and Sibelius in a Thursday evening Open Rehearsal on October 18 and in the Friday afternoon, October 19 concert, the Saturday evening, October 20 concert and concerts on Tuesday, October 23 and Thursday, October 25.

Mr. Davis opens the concerts with Beethoven's Overture "Leonore No. 2," and follows it with Stravinsky's "Orpheus," ballet in three scenes. The closing piece of the concerts is Sibelius' Symphony No. 4 in A minor.

Colin Davis, principal guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is musical director of the Royal Opera, Covent Garden.

His conducting career began in 1949, and his early experience was with the Kalmar Chamber Orchestra, the Chelsea Opera Group, and Festival Ballet and the Ballet Rusee.

In 1957 he became assistant conductor of the BBC Scottish Orchestra.

Two years later he was called at short notice to take the place of Otto Klemperer, who became ill, in a concert performance of Don Giovanni.

This marked a turning point in Davis' career; he was shortly afterwards appointed musical director of the Sadler's Wells Opera, made his debut with the CBC Symphony in Canada, and appeared with the Minneapolis Symphony.

10)

Week 4

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 187,997

OCT 29 1973

New England Newsclip

Colin Davis conducting

First-time masterworks for the BSO

By Louis Snyder

A number of fortunate composers had their works heard in "first time" Boston performances over the weekend. Their names? Haydn, Stravinsky, Vaughan Williams, Sauguet, Elkan, and Poulenc. A fairly distinguished group.

It all began when the Boston Symphony, in its second week under principal guest conductor Colin Davis's direction, introduced Haydn's Symphony No. 84 in E flat to Boston, and vice versa (it appears to have surfaced first in Paris in the 1780's).

Music

Then the BSO gave its first performances of Stravinsky's chamber "Concerto in E flat," better known as "Dumbarton Oaks," and the mighty Vaughan Williams Fourth Symphony in F minor, a BSO premiere to shiver Symphony Hall's sacred timbers. Putter-downers of the traditional Friday afternoon audience must have been confounded by its enthusiastic reception of the 15-instrument Stavinsky, and the all-out Vaughan Williams. The artistocratic Haydn went without saying.

While the Haydn symphony, one of several commissioned in 1786 by an exclusive Parisian musicmaking organization, was all elegance and charm, and the better known Stravinsky "Concerto," also a 1937 commission from an American philanthropist, showed the composer at his most characteristically inventive, it was the pre-World War II Vaughan Williams work that proved itself made-to-order for Mr. Davis and the Boston Symphony.

It is this F-minor symphony, so gnarled and intense, that many commentators and hearers felt should have a "program," that is, specifically "be about something" — war, anger, violence, perhaps. But the composer always denied it. "I don't know whether I like it," he said "but this is what I meant," and ended the discussion there.

"What he meant" is contained in a tumultuous four-movement work which basically builds rugged, seemingly disproportionate hunks of sound into what suddenly becomes an awesome monument for the hearer. It is practically themeless, and from the immense roar that begins it, one finds oneself caught up in an onward rush of insistent tone and instrumentation too powerful to withstand. This is not cacophony, however, but a mass of solid musical ideas, each with its kernel of warm if fleeting familiarity, even at first hearing.

Handel and Haydn open

Mr. Davis and the orchestra gave it a magnificent performance on Friday — in fact the entire program was further evidence of the high standard of achievement that results when this conductor and these musicians get together.

There was music of considerably less substance on the program that opened the 159th season of the Handel and Haydn Society at Jordan Hall on Friday night. Under Thomas Dunn's direction, numbers about or by "Ghosts, Gypsies, Necromancers, and Brahms" were on the Hallowee nish bill of fare, which seemed to suit the taste of many in the good-sized audience, despite some heavy attempts at cuteness.

As its token contribution, as a singing society, to such Handel and Haydn's "novelty" programs, the chorus led off with Brahms's "Fest und Gedenksprueche" ("Festival and Memorial Sayings"), three serious and impressive unaccompanied part songs "for times of great national solemnities," which aren't heard too often. They were beaurifully done by singers and their conductor. But after that, the mood turned capricious.

Since at these variety concerts the line between solemnity and laughter is rather thin, the remaining three numbers — all local rarities — were salon-type pieces, intentionally on the lighter side. There was an attempt at staging Henri Sauguet's "La Voyante" ("The Fortune Teller") by having the lady in question direct her musical comments on "Card-reading," "Astrology," and "Palmistry" at two rather puzzled-looking couples seated at cafe tables. Behind two painted screens, three oboes and a bassoon played the witty Sauguet score, while mezzo Jan Curtis rose above the unproductive stage direction in which she was involved by singing superbly.

Charles-Henri Alkan's "Funeral March for a Dead Parrot" found the chorus dressed in mourning, intoning their one line, "Polly want a cracker? What?" and Mr. Dunn conducting with a black feather retrieved from an empty birdcage. It all seemed a lot more trouble than it was worth.

During the final number, Francis Poulenc's "Le Bal Masque," with baritone David Evitts, and the orchestra, the chorus remained as a human (non-singing) backdrop, wearing masks, while four songs set to nonsense syllables, were performed, concert-style before them. Poulenc is always a pleasure, and Mr. Evitts, Mr. Dunn, and the instrumentalists did well by him. But since the unintelligible French words, translated at great length in the program, were all important, both in the Sauguet and Poulenc, why wasn't there enough light on in the hall so they could be followed by the audience? That seemed like carrying a joking evening too far.

Two by Bream

There were no advertised Boston premieres on the program of lute and guitar music that Julian Bream played at Jordan Hall to sell-out audiences on Saturday evening and yesterday afternoon. But surely Joamrosio Dalza, a 16th-century Venetian lutenist, and Simone Molinaro, who, Mr. Bream pointed out, played the loudest of instruments (the organ in Genoa Cathedral) and the softest (the lute), are hardly well known, though they deserve to be.

It has become legendary that Mr. Bream, Orpheus-like, "with his lute made trees and the mountain tops that freeze, bow themselves when he did sing." This time, on his annual Boston visit, his rapt audiences found again that singing excepted it was true — the selections by Dalza, Robert Johnson (four), Molinaro (two), and John Dowland (two), all of which he introduced in his endearing informal manner, were conveyed with the utmost artistry and irresistible charm.

For the guitar half of the program, two sonatas by Domenico Scarlatti, the Sonata No. 2 in C major by Fernando Sor, and Benjamin Britten's Nocturne, after John Dowland's song, "Come Heavy Sleep," written expressly for Mr. Bream, reaffirmed his mastery of this instrument. The Sor sonata particularly, which calls for a full catalog of effects, was brilliantly played, and the Britten, which is a contemporary treatment of variations leading backward to their theme, demanded and received virtuoso treatment from this ingratiating performer. There were standing ovations, cheers, applause, and two encores before the audience finally let Mr. Bream retire.

PATRIOT LEDGER (E)
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 71,020

OCT 31 1973

New England Newsclip

In Concert

Judicious Performances

By David Noble
Patriot Ledger Correspondent

Since the arrival of Seiji Ozawa as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra there have been countless reports telling how delighted the orchestra members are with the Japanese conductor.

This delight is nice to hear about, because such positive emotions often are reflected in an orchestra's work.

A test of the orchestra's playing was provided in the BSO's past two Friday concerts when the ensemble tackled two tricky works from Stravinsky's "middle" period, the "Dumbarton Oaks" concerto of 1937 and the ballet score, "Orpheus," written 10 years later.

These are classic tests of an orchestra's ensemble and morale because they are written in the bare, texturally stripped-down style the composer adopted after 1914, and expose mercilessly such players as the principal double-bassist or second oboist — players who usually are "covered" in more conventional music.

Testing

This test was made both more difficult and more easy by the fact that both works were conducted by Colin Davis: more difficult perhaps because he is a guest conductor; more easy because he is respected by the BSO players, who stood when he took the podium for the first of these concerts as if he were a judge entering a courtroom.

The "Orpheus" that was played in that program was not a disappointment, on the whole.

Those manifold problems of co-ordinated phrasing in the winds, and of correct tuning in the brass, that grew into the BSO's playing during the resentments of the Leinsdorf years and the indiscipline of the transitional period that followed, were audible under the surface.

But the fact there was a surface was encouraging. In fact, Davis kept the players' noses to the grindstone, and they responded well. Those little problems in the winds (some of them not so little) have hardened into habits that are not going to be overcome in a couple of rehearsals, even ones conducted by Davis. But the fact remains, their bitterly hard task was faced with full professionalism.

The music of Orpheus, pretty almost to the point of blandness over its rewarding complexities, is suited well to Davis' soft-spoken approach to Stravinsky. So, despite mistakes of detail and an audible appearance of walking on eggs, it all came out rather nicely indeed.

Mixed

Reactions were divided: A trumpet player (not a BSO member) came up to me at intermission and asked, "Were you as appalled by that as I was?"; A pianist sitting near me, however, murmured a sentence as the last chord died away — "That really is a beautiful piece, isn't it?" All the Boston reviews I saw were complimentary.

After that concert a leading member of the orchestra commented, "After we've played it a few more times it'll be solider. We did all we could in rehearsal; beyond a certain point you have to do it under fire."

A week later the "Dumbarton Oaks" concerto (really titled Concerto Grosso in E-flat) was a milder test in that it only calls for 15 instruments, and thus in practice can be done by an orchestra's stronger players.

So it turned out. The flute solos of Doriot Dwyer and the prominent bassoon passages played by Sherman Walt were not always done in just the way Davis was conveying to the ensemble as a whole, but things went more confidently than they had in "Orpheus."

The music of the "Dumbarton Oaks," something of a sly joke on Bach's "Brandenburg" concertos, is more ruggedly rhythmic than that of "Orpheus." Davis conducted it in a way that minimized its local disruptions, however, and brought out its broader structural ingenuities unusually well. Friday's audience and Boston's critics seemed pleased.

Comparisons

The "Orpheus" was played between Beethoven's second "Leonore" overture, reticent and spacious in comparison with the better known No. 3, and Sibelius's Fourth Symphony, reticent and pessimistic in comparison with the better known No. 2. All in all, it was a long afternoon's draught of excellent white wine.

Haydn's 84th Symphony, alive with that composer's characteristic musical oddnesses, and Vaughn Williams' Fourth Symphony, turbulent and gruff in a way quite uncharacteristic of its author, surrounded Stravinsky's concerto in last weekend's program.

In these concerts Davis clearly earned the judicial honor the players had awarded him.

GLOBE (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042

OCT 27 1973

New England Newsclip

Colin Davis and the BSO delight Symphony-goers

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

The works by Beethoven, Stravinsky, and Sibelius which Colin Davis chose for his Boston Symphony program last week all had a certain enigmatic, veiled quality. Yesterday, with two diversions and one oration, everything was very open. The diverters were Haydn (Symphony No. 84) and Stravinsky (Dumbarton Oaks Concerto), the orator was Vaughan Williams (Symphony No. 4 in F minor).

"Well, gentlemen, if that's modern music, you can have it," V. W. once told an orchestra at the end of a rehearsal of his Fourth. It was a once-only venture for him into "modern music," and many commentators, including some as close to him as Adrian Boult, have read its dissonances and explosions as political criticism and prophecy (it was sketched 1931-32 and completed 1934). I am more persuaded by the interpretation of the composer's widow: she sees the Fourth as a Rembrandt-like self-portrait of a man capable of "towering furies" and full of "fire, pride, strength."

Whatever, it is tremendous. Granted that sometimes the scoring is raucous and the form stiff, but even those ungracious qualities come across with a firm sense of, by God, it's written that way on purpose. And its triumphs are on a grand scale — the huge-ranged melodies and masterful harmonic layout of the first movement (the one of the four composed with by far the greatest finesse), the dangerous and completely convincing building of another darkness-to-daylight bridge as in Beethoven's Fifth, the potent and original use of the B-A-C-H theme, but most of all what it is as a whole, in the exuberance of its anger and in its moments of tranquility.

Davis caught it all, and the Boston Symphony played wonderfully for him.

Week 5

(11)

4
HERALD-AMERICAN (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 424,654
OCT 30 1973
New England Newsclip

Colin Davis Creates Interesting Parallel

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

Colin Davis' program with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon offered an interesting parallel to the one he conducted a week ago: both contained a Stravinsky work, a Classic (or borderline Classic), and the fourth symphonies piece of Sibelius and Vaughn Williams respec-

Concert Review

Aside from having the same number within their composers' symphony catalogues, the two symphonies each represented a shocking departure (at least to most listeners) from what the composers had previously written. Each took a decisive step away from the past. Each was iconoclastic and each remains among the least favored works by otherwise extremely popular musicians.

The Sibelius, which we heard last week, was a tough, gritty, uncompromising work which, underneath a forbidding surface, proved genuinely rewarding and moving. The Vaughan-Williams piece, heard Friday, preceded the composer's "Dona Nobis Pacem" by one year and, like that work, seems to be very noisy without a lot of substance.

By no means as unapproachable and knotty as the Sibelius, it sounds pretty tame to a listener in 1973—whatever was revolutionary about it in 1934 has mellowed considerably. Davis and the BSO gave it an eloquent performance, raging in the angry parts and lyrical in the more lushly melodic ones.

There was also a fine performance of Stravinsky's "Dumbarton Oaks" Concerto in which architecture was cleanly shaped and the various textures highlighted with an unusual clarity. A fizzy Haydn Symphony No. 84 completed the program.

Fizzy might well describe the program for the opening of the Handel and Haydn Society season Friday evening.

Entitled "Ghosts, Gypsies, Necromancers, and Brahms," it opened with the chorus in a ragged performance of Brahms' "Fest- und Gedenksprueche" (Festival and Memorial Sayings).

Following this was Sauguet's "La Voyante" in which Jan Curtis played a seer in white brocade and rhinestone earrings, whose den looked like an ice cream parlor, and whose blase customers dressed in evening attire and sipped pink lemonade. The music was French pastry.

The Ghost of the title was that of a departed parrot who was lamented in straight-faced fashion in Alkan's Marcia Funebre sulla Morte d'un Pappagallo." Chorus members in black watched mournfully as conductor Thomas Dunn and assistants brought out an empty bird-cage, placed it center-stage and covered it with black crepe. Then they intoned endlessly "As-tu dejeune, Jaco," which loosely translated means "Polly want a cracker?"

Finally, in the best offering of the evening, David Evitts sang Poulenc's "Le Bal Masque" with the chorus, of course, masked (black on white face, white on black face). Poulenc's sardonic, tongue-twisting, rapid-fire songs are settings of whimsical poems by the eccentric poet Max Jacob and Evitts, pokerface did them superbly,

GLOBE (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042
NOV 3 1973
New England Newsclip

THE ARTS

Rachmaninoff 3d provides sensuous feast for Ozawa

MICHAEL STEINBERG

Not long after the premiere of his Third Symphony, Rachmaninoff noted that there seemed to be just three people who liked it: Sir Henry Wood, the conductor, Adolf Busch, the violinist, and himself. Interesting that his list did not include Stokowski, who conducted that first performance, and that may have some bearing on what Rachmaninoff called the work's "sour" reception by the public and the critics.

Thirty-seven years later, it has more friends, but not many. Seiji Ozawa, who conducted it at yesterday's Boston Symphony concert, clearly is one, and I would guess that his superb performance made some converts. My own admiration for it is pretty new: when Kondrashin conducted it here in 1970, I heard only "Rachmaninoff imitating Rachmaninoff writing a symphony," though (I add by way of slender excuse) responding to a crude performance.

It is in three movements, or better, four-in-three in that a scherzo is offered as middle section of the Adagio. The finale disappoints: it goes in for a lot of mere churning, and where the big climactic tune is meant to come, Rachmaninoff manages only, "this is where it will be, I'll fill it in later." But the first two movements are strong, orderly, and with lots of handsome Rachmaninoff melody.

Written soon after the Corelli and Paganini variations, the Symphony is a bit fatter than either, but, if you take a broad perspective, clearly enough in his late style. That means a rather tougher sound, more flexible rhythm, tighter economy, and a more ingeniously playful approach to composition generally. And the sound is stunning. Rachmaninoff wrote with the Philadelphia Orchestra in mind, and, working from a combination of knowledge, fantasy, and refined taste, he gave the score his all in virtuosity. The Adagio is especially rich in this respect but the whole work, from its lovely opening (clarinet, muted horn, muted solo cello, all in unison and pianissimo) to the most extravagant martial brilliance of the finale, is a sensuous feast. The orchestra played brilliantly, and it would be nice if Ozawa could some time put Rachmaninoff's last work, the Symphonic Dances, on his schedule.

Gunther Schuller (another friend of the Rachmaninoff Third) may well be the most versatile musician I have known, but, God knows, I never thought to see him try to make his mark as a humorist. His "Capriccio stravagante," written last year for San Francisco plays quotation games and makes a few surprising noises, but except for an amusing stop-and-go jazz piece, it hasn't a thing in it to raise the "bemused smile or chuckle" Schuller mentions in his panifully arch program-note. And long, my goodness.

To finish up, Debussy's "La mer," bright and clear, but with not a bit of salt or kelp.

HERALD-AMERICAN (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 424,654
NOV 3 1973
New England Newsclip

'Capriccio Stravagante' Lacks Humor for BSO Audience

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

Gunther Schuller's "Capriccio stravagante," given its first Boston performance Friday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Seiji Ozawa, is described by its composer as essentially a "fun-piece . . . a light piece which does not pretend to plumb profound depths of expression and meaning" and also a work which falls within the tradition of musical humor established by Mozart's Musical Joke and Carlo Farina's "Capriccio stravagante" (1627).

Having derived its title and sectional architecture from the 17th century Farina work, Schuller's piece is written in a contemporary idiom and utilizes the very large turn of the century orchestra bolstered by harpsichord and a wide variety of percussion instruments.

It's a peculiar concoction.

Schuller himself anticipates in his program note that the language of the music—"contemporary and couched in atonality"—might prevent audiences, who find such writing "unintelligible or downright annoying," from perceiving the humor in the work. And he goes on to say that the humor isn't of the belly-laugh variety anyway.

He's right, and the audience didn't seem to get the joke. To be honest, this reviewer didn't find it very amusing. But the unfunniness is not due entirely to the musical language. (To be sure, a modern idiom will and did put off many people—the lady next to me, in fact, was positively hopping mad.) "Capriccio stravagante" isn't really funny because it is too obscure an in-joke.

• Movie Review

Both Mozart's Joke and Farina's "Capriccio" had fun at the expense of other people's music—the Farina piece even has the alternate title "Kurtzweiliges Quodlibeet."

Schuller's piece also plays with music of his era and there are to be heard quotes and paraphrases and compositional cliches in his "Capriccio." But to find such references amusing one has to recognize them and to do so, he has to have a thorough acquaintance with contemporary music. Most audiences run at the sight of a 20th century work so such an acquaintance is not theirs.

However, assuming that the audience will recognize the playful and obscure references, the composer still has to use them in a funny or, at least, amusing way and that, I think, was the problem. Mozart's Joke, for example, is sophisticated, but it is funny. The more one understands about music, the better it becomes, but basically it is funny because Mozart knew how to tell a good joke. Schuller didn't in this case.

Which is a shame, because the work itself is extremely well-crafted, displaying a virtuosic way with orchestral colors and their combinations, considerable spirit, some striking ideas, and even occasional puckishness (the Till-like mocking laugh which concludes the work).

Also on the Friday program was Rachmaninov's Third Symphony with its blowsy melodies and fatalistic use of the Dies Irae and Debussy's "La Mer" in a beautifully played, if sticky, interpretation.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 24,500
NOV 8 1973
New England Newsclip

Music in Review

By GERALD A. BERLIN

BSO — EYE vs. EAR

The programs this season add up to the most weirdo collation in recent history. So far, though, it has always turned out that more has met the ear than the eye. Last weekend's proceedings were squarely in point—the Rachmaninoff Symphony no. 3 in A minor, Schuller's Capriccio stravagante and Debussy's La mer. Who would break down the door to get at that? Yet the fare provided some better than ordinary listening.

The linch pin was the Rachmaninoff symphony. Unlikely as it may seem, the vogue for this composer was once such that Irving Kolodin, writing in 1949 of the earlier Second Symphony could aver that it was "surpassed only by the works of Sibelius in popularity among the achievements of living composers." By 1959, when the latest Groves Dictionary came out, Rachmaninoff was noted only by four paragraphs and put down severely in the doing.

The return to involvement with the music of romanticism is now running at considerable velocity, and a lot of us find ourselves listening with attention and pleasure again to kinds of pieces that we would have dismissed as sound track drivel a very short while back. The first rank romantic repertory is distinctly lean, hence the exhumation of a good many of the ilk of a lower order of magnitude. Such is the A minor Symphony, which had not been done here since Koussevitsky introduced it locally in 1947.

Taken in terms of its acknowledged post-Tchaikovskian boundaries, the work is characteristically warm and distinctive, beautifully balanced (save for the subject of the slow movement) and flecked with melodic inventiveness and instrumental richness. Moreover, there are elements in it that have the makings of the materials for a second Norton Lecture Series, such as the subtle advertence to the Dies irae and the traditional American anthem, and "Shenandoah" — items that had eluded me all my listening life until they appeared in the remarkable program notes by Jack Diether. Mr. Ozawa's reading was notable in its sinuousness, lovely sound and crafting of details.

Incidentally, Rachmaninoff, whose100th season this is, had a very special relationship to Boston. One of the few soloists ever to make Koussevitsky cower at a rehearsal, he was thrice offered the post of conductor of the Orchestra, twice to succeed Max Fiedler and then Muck.

We digress, though. Making its first Boston performance and jumping out at the audience from the purring velvety sounds of the Rachmaninoff was the Gunther Schuller work. Commissioned in celebration of the 50th anniversary of the San Francisco Orchestra and dedicated to that orchestra and its music director, Mr. Ozawa, it received its first performance in San Francisco in December 1972. It is a vintage example of the intricate, sonorous, ear-catching pieces of contemporaries that we so often get: a horn call here, a triangle there, the strings glissandoing elsewhere. This one actually had a self-contained combo. All very enjoyable while in process, but try to take some of it home with you.

Finally, La Mer. In many ways this piece is one of the greatest things in its genre, but hearing it again and again in the days of Dr. Munch flattened out enjoyment beyond resuscitation. Or so it would seem. To encounter it again after a long sabbatical, one in such a posture could still find ever so much of its ineffability and evocativeness. As throughout the concert, the orchestral playing was absolutely first-rate. Still, conceding that comparisons are odious, there was somethin lacking from those bygone times, and that something was that final element of spontaneity, a catalyzing excitement—just as was the case with the Damnation of Faust last month. For all the beauty of the sound, incisiveness of attack, perfection of intonation, that hard fact remains.

This week Joseph Silverstein is doing the Schoenberg violin concerto. Still in the same programmatic vein, there will be Tchaikovsky's Pathetique. Mr. Ozawa again conducts.

2

(12)

Week 5

A solid, varied concert schedule

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

World premieres of two works by Gunther Schuller and Charles Wuorinen, a performance of two 18th Century concerti on a reproduction Fortepiano, and a program of orchestrated Scott Joplin rags are three standouts in this week's packed-solid schedule of musical events.

Creating perhaps the most speculation, however, is the uncertainty as to whether Sviatoslav Richter will really give those two performances here on Thursday and Sunday. The Soviet pianist was rumored to be cancelling, after having deliberately missed a U.S.-bound boat recently and then claiming illness.

The two premieres will be featured in concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Friday and Saturday) and the BSO Chamber Players (this afternoon) and include Schuller's "Capriccio Stravagante" and Wuorinen's Bassoon Variations with Harp and Percussion.

To judge by its title, the former promises to pay its respects to old music (Schuller, one will recall, has had a longtime interest in early music and his last piece to be premiered by the BSO, "Museum Piece", utilized musical compositions of Mozart's mediocre contemporaries).

The performance of Wuorinen's piece by the Chamber Players is some indication that the musicians and composer have patched things up since their last collaboration (the stormy premiere of the Concerto for Amplified Violin at Tanglewood in 1972).

Apparently both sides are now willing to forgive and forget an incident in which players were apparently uncooperative and unreceptive toward the new piece and the composer wrote an angry denunciation of them in a subsequent Sunday New York Times.

One of the other facets of Gunther Schuller's many-sided talents will also be on display this week when his New England Conservatory Ragtime Ensemble performs rags by Joplin, Jelly Roll Morton and others. The concert, in Jordan Hall Saturday at 8:30 p.m., will include some selections from the Ensemble's No. 1 Best-selling recording of Joplin's "The Red Back Book."

Proceeds from the benefit concert go to the New England Conservatory fund-raising campaign.

"ALTHOUGH the harpsichord has become popular on the concert stage by now, the renaissance of the early piano is just beginning," states the Cambridge Society for Early Music program book. So, to nudge this renaissance just a bit, the society's second concert of the season tomorrow night will feature works performed on a replica Johann Andreas Stein Fortepiano. Apparently it was this type of instrument that Mozart praised highly and which was typically used in the Viennese school of the 18th Century.

The Stein piano represented an improvement on the early German instruments because it was the first to employ an escapement action (a device which resulted in a touch that was lighter and shallower than other pianos and which facilitated performance of the sparkling passagework characteristic of the Viennese school).

The peculiar color and capabilities of this instrument are contrasted with the harpsichord in the Double Concerto in E-flat major by C.P.E. Bach and are again utilized in Mozart's Concerto K. 449, also in E-flat major, which is something of a tribute to C.P.E. and others in the Bach family.

HERALD ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
S. 521,285
OCT 28 1973
New England Newsclip

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 187,897
NOV 5 1973
New England Newsclip

Starker, Schuller, Sabicas

Big welcome for music stars

By Louis Snyder

There were some impressive personalities making music in and around Boston this past weekend — Seiji Ozawa, Janos Starker, Gunther Schuller, and Sabicas, to name just a few.

A new piece by Mr. Schuller, commissioned and already played by the San Francisco Symphony, was given its local premiere by the Boston Symphony under the direction of Mr. Ozawa, who is San Francisco's music director too. Cellist Starker, unaccountably absent from these parts for nine years, returned in a burst of glory as soloist with the enterprising Harvard-Radcliffe Orchestra in Cambridge, and flamenco fans were on hand to welcome back the high-priest of that genre' Sabicas.

Before he introduced Mr. Schuller's "Capriccio Stravagante," Mr. Ozawa brought back Rachmaninoff's Symphony No. 3 in A minor, which the BSO hasn't played here since 1947.

The Third Symphony is a large-scale undertaking, the kind in which Mr. Ozawa and the BSO excel. He shaped it artfully, and they played it for all the rich ingredients it contains, not the least being, always surprisingly, the American folk song, "Shenandoah," which achieves main-theme status, along with quotes from Russian religious and secular music. Listeners found it fresh and vital, and gave conductor, musicians, and symphony an enthusiastic reception.

There was another warm greeting given to Mr. Schuller and the performers after his "Capriccio Stravagante," a lively caper which, according to the composer, bows in the direction of a similar "fun piece," Carlo Farina's 17th-century invention with the same name.

Mr. Schuller's jocularity is based on quite different tonal materials — thoroughly modern, but of such general instrumental diversity as to suggest an aural cartoon, if that can be imagined. Pizzicato strings, woodwinds of varied sonorities, percussion in many forms, deep-voiced cellos, and throbbing bass all contributed to this good-humored series of segments.

The program (to be repeated tomorrow evening at 7:30) concluded with Debussy's "La Mer" ("The Sea") in which there might have been detected some Pacific touches by Mr Ozawa added to the more Atlantic version wherein Symphony Hall has been awash these many years. A little rougher than one is used to, perhaps, but still imbued with salt spray and undulation.

Janos Starker's return

The Harvard-Radcliffe Orchestra, whose conductor is James Yannatos, scored the soloistic coup of the local season thus far by inviting Janos Starker to appear at its first concert on Friday evening at Sanders Theater in Cambridge.

Mr. Starker, who is one of the top ranking cellists of our day, needs to be heard only once to confirm this designation, and it was evident by the end of Friday's program that he had done so again. An audience that jammed Sanders to the rafters gave him the longest and loudest standing ovation experienced hereabouts for quite some time.

The elbow-to-elbow situation, so well known in Sanders' pews on a crowded night, existed on the stage too. There, about 95 or so university musicians filled all the space except for Mr. Yannatos's podium, and a small raised platform on which Mr. Starker was perched rather precariously.

All this seemed to make no difference to the cellist, whose technique unostentatiously amazed the eye, and whose tone melted in the ear. In Vivaldi's D major Concerto, played with classic and stylish grace, he tended to give the instrumentalists a run for their money in the opening Allegro, but the whispered Larghetto, which is not so demanding of the orchestra, provided a chance to hear Mr. Starker at his most refined and stunning best.

The concert had begun with Hindemith's "Morgenmusik" for two trumpets and two trombones, soaringly conveyed from that wide, seldom used, balcony ledge high above the Sanders stage. Then, following the Vivaldi, Mr. Yannatos threw caution to the winds, and led his musicians through a vigorous performance of Stravinsky's wonderful "Petrushka" (the 1947 revision).

While the utmost in musical nuance may not have been achieved throughout, Mr. Yannatos kept his forces well coordinated — no easy task in this piece, particularly — and there were solo passages (trumpet, oboe, piano, violin, flute, for instance) that added splendidly to the whole. This is, after all, an extra-curricular organization, with a more or less transient membership, and, as such, may well provoke wonder and admiration.

There was hissing during the next number — but not of disapproval. An over-pressured steam valve (apparently) burst its bounds with such a racket that the Dvorak B minor Concerto, which Mr. Starker, conductor, and orchestra had started promisingly, had to be halted until the situation was remedied.

It was to everyone's credit that, after the interruption, the mood and the music were recaptured in equal measure. The student instrumentalists were again playing relaxedly, and Mr. Starker was pouring out golden cello tone in behalf of a work that is one of the instrument's masterworks. The audience explosion at its close made the steam valve's outburst sound like a sigh, and it brought about many bows by soloist, conductor, and orchestra, as well as two impeccable solo encores by Mr. Starker, whose happy return was never for a moment in doubt.

Flamenco by Sabicas

There is a very special audience for the art of Sabicas, a group who wouldn't be turned on by any other Andalusian playing Bach transcriptions on a guitar. The difference is that the music of Sabicas is all flamenco and all his own, and short of actually being there, it brings Spain to life in all its aspects like a series of dazzling colored tonal postcards.

Jordan Hall was filled with these admirers Saturday night when Sabicas, born Augustin Castellon, made his first smiling, dapper appearance. And they were still there after he had added four encores to a program with such evocative titles as "Flamenco Rhapsody," "Nights in Cadiz," "Remembrance of Carmen Amaya," "Homage to Malaga," "Holy Week in Seville" (a Sabicas must), "Inspiration," and "Compliments to the Spanish Style."

But it was more than a travelogue. Sabicas wraps himself around his guitar, and suddenly, with dulcet clarity, his busy fingers are making the strings sing, speak, mourn, laugh, and sigh the sounds of Spain we have experienced or dreamed of.

Seiji Ozawa, Symphony Conducter Is Teriffic

By DOROTHY DALE

SYMPHONY HALL HAS BEEN invaded — invaded by a sprite with a spirit of overwhelming intentness and joy .... more than that a sprite with such extraordinary talent that his ability to reach out and touch everyone withing the large confines of that elegant hall is nothing short of miraculous.

It was our first experience. We had not before heard the Boston Symphony under the baton of Seiji Ozawa, the new director of that famous orchestra. As we recall the afternoon. we found ourselves tingling all over again as we called up the memory.

The orchestra was playing Rachmaninoff for its opening number and that in itself was enough to sharpen our anticipation. And there we were in the middle of the balcony in that final stir that reaches its own height just before the director makes his entrance.

The arms of the hall formed by the 3 balcony rows above rows running down the side were clearly in our vision. So vivid were they with the ladies predominantly in brilliant red with some accenting the picture in an acid-like blue, that we thought of those painters of another era that used to delight in a typically Boston scene.

How I wished just one of them — Childe Hassam, A. C. Goodwin, Jane Peterson — were there to recreate the scene in oil.

THE HUSH CAME suddenly. There he was — Seiji Ozawa .... so tiny so quick of step so bright and happy that he almost shone lighting up the whole hall. And up the tiny figure jumped onto that huge-appearing podium, the baton raised, the silence complete, Symphony No. 3 in A minor was swelling into the hall, filling with its utter beauty of sound, every corner and every heart.

But what of him? What had we expected, what did we see. A tiny figure in black, black pants that fit the small leg closely, a black jacket that was not cut to fit, square it hung on the figure, black shining hair, brushed away from the face but hanging squarely to the shoulder, wide and thick.

The arms go up and the sleeve we see is also closely fitted. These arms are extraordinarily long and thin as are the legs. And they all work for the talent of this unusual man. One knee is bent, one leg stretched straight, the arms spread to their full length and the entire orchestra is gathered into the heart of Director Ozawa who makes us think of a huge spider weaving a web of the most excruciatingly glorious sound we'd heard for a long time.

Rachmaninoff we love you but we have never heard you interpreted so beautifully. It was sheer extravagant beauty — swelling, soaring, teasing, tempting, the exquisite sound was all around us .... the strings reaching with their soft singing wooing us, touching us, thrilling ....

Then it was over and the applause of those hundreds there was its own music reflected in the joyous impish oh so youthful face that turned to us.

AFTER INTERMISSION THERE was further evidence of the extraordinary talent of this man who might very well lay the direction his talent took to an accident. Seiji Ozawa played soccer in his youth and when he wasn't playing soccer he was playing his favorite instrument — the piano. One day while pursuing the game, he was injured and the injury was mostly in his hand. Bad enough so the piano would never be the instrument of his talents. It was then that he began to compose and yearn to lead an orchestra.

ENTERPRISE (E)
BROCKTON, MASS.
D. 54,587
NOV 7 1973
New England Newsclip

CAPRICCIO STRAVAGANTE by Schuller, an extremely modern fantasy was chosen for the filling before the Debussy. Delicate, playful and delightful as interpreted by Ozawa this pleased the audience no end. And we were a happy part of that audience listening to the charming poo poos and baa baas as Mr. Ozawa made the symphony talk while every so often the audience too, in the same gay spirit, laughed right out loud.

The number reminded us of an Alexander Calder mobile — a rather large one, mais naturelle. The mobile was at loose and at the mercy of an eratic breeze which, wafting it this way and that, jangled its tiny pieces for delightful tinkles and every so often knocked together some of its larger pieces for a haw, haw and a rumble of some extension.

HOW HAPPY EVERYONE looked as they streamed forth from the hall late that afternoon. The invasion of Symphony was complete. The sprite who had come from out of the west with his unlimited joy had sent joy into thousands of hearts. May he continue for a long time to come.

Week 5

A solid, varied concert sc

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

World premieres of two works by Gunther Schuller and Charles Wuorinen, a performance of two 18th Century concerti on a reproduction Fortepiano, and a program of orchestrated Scott Joplin rags are three standouts in this week's packed-solid schedule of musical events.

Creating perhaps the most speculation, however, is the uncertainty as to whether Sviatoslav Richter will really give those two performances here on Thursday and Sunday. The Soviet pianist was rumored to be cancelling, after having deliberately missed a U.S.-bound boat recently and then claiming illness.

The two premieres will be featured in concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Friday and Saturday) and the BSO Chamber Players (this afternoon) and include Schuller's "Capriccio Stravagante" and Wuorinen's Bassoon Variations with Harp and Percussion.

To judge by its title, the former promises to pay its respects to old music (Schuller, one will recall, has had a longtime interest in early music and his last piece to be premiered by the BSO, "Museum Piece", utilized musical compositions of Mozart's mediocre contemporaries).

specifically, to a work of the same title composed by one Carlo Farina in 1627.

Schuller intends "Capriccio Stravagante" to be "a fun piece," a musical joke a la Mozart (which, of course, was a spoof on the bad musical composition of Mozart's mediocre contemporaries).

The performance of Wuorinen's piece by the Chamber Players is some indication that the musicians and composer have patched things up since their last collaboration (the stormy premiere of the Concerto for Amplified Violin at Tanglewood in 1972).

Apparently both sides are now willing to forgive and forget an incident in which players were apparently uncooperative and unreceptive toward the new piece and the composer wrote an angry denunciation of them in a subsequent Sunday New York Times.

One of the other facets of Gunther Schuller's many-sided talents will also be on display this week when his New England Conservatory Ragtime Ensemble performs rags by Joplin, Jelly Roll Morton and others. The concert, in Jordan Hall Saturday at 8:30 p.m., will include some selections from the Ensemble's No. 1 Best-selling recording of Joplin's "The Red Back Book."

Proceeds from the benefit concert go to the New England Conservatory fund-raising campaign.

"ALTHOUGH the harpsichord has become popular on the concert stage by now, the renaissance of the early piano is just beginning," states the Cambridge Society for Early Music program book. So, to nudge this renaissance just a bit, the society's second concert of the season tomorrow night will feature works performed on a replica Johann Andreas Stein Fortepiano. Apparently it was this type of instrument that Mozart praised highly and which was typically used in the Viennese school of the 18th Century.

The Stein piano represented an improvement on the early German instruments because it was the first to employ an escapement action (a device which resulted in a touch that was lighter and shallower than other pianos and which facilitated performance of the sparkling passagework characteristic of the Viennese school).

T capa are harpsich Concerto C.P.E. Ba utilized in K. 449, also which is so tribute to C.P.E. the Bach family.

Jackso

'For

By PETE Jackson B long years, released h For Ever SD3867). tween rec manage receive My Ey The

HERALD ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
S. 521,285
OCT 28 1973
New England Newsclip

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 137,897
NOV 5 1973
New England Newsclip

Starker, Schuller, Sabicas

Big welcome for music stars

By Louis Snyder

There were some impressive personalities making music in and around Boston this past weekend — Seiji Ozawa, Janos Starker, Gunther Schuller, and Sabicas, to name just a few.

A new piece by Mr. Schuller, commissioned and already played by the San Francisco Symphony, was given its local premiere by the Boston Symphony under the direction of Mr. Ozawa, who is San Francisco's music director too. Cellist Starker, unaccountably absent from these parts for nine years, returned in a burst of glory as soloist with the enterprising Harvard-Radcliffe Orchestra in Cambridge, and flamenco fans were on hand to welcome back the high-priest of that genre' Sabicas.

Before he introduced Mr. Schuller's "Capriccio Stravagante," Mr. Ozawa brought back Rachmaninoff's Symphony No. 3 in A minor, which the BSO hasn't played here since 1947.

The Third Symphony is a large-scale undertaking, the kind in which Mr. Ozawa and the BSO excel. He shaped it artfully, and they played it for all the rich ingredients it contains, not the least being, always surprisingly, the American folk song, "Shenandoah," which achieves main-theme status, along with quotes from Russian religious and secular music. Listeners found it fresh and vital, and gave conductor, musicians, and symphony an enthusiastic reception.

There was another warm greeting given to Mr. Schuller and the performers after his "Capriccio Stravagante," a lively caper which, according to the composer, bows in the direction of a similar "fun piece," Carlo Farina's 17th-century invention with the same name.

Mr. Schuller's jocularity is based on quite different tonal materials — thoroughly modern, but of such general instrumental diversity as to suggest an aural cartoon, if that can be imagined. Pizzicato strings, woodwinds of varied sonorities, percussion in many forms, deep-voiced cellos, and throbbing bass all contributed to this good-humored series of segments.

The program (to be repeated tomorrow evening at 7:30) concluded with Debussy's "La Mer" ("The Sea") in which there might have been detected some Pacific touches by Mr Ozawa added to the more Atlantic version wherein Symphony Hall has been awash these many years. A little rougher than one is used to, perhaps, but still imbued with salt spray and undulation.

Janos Starker's return

The Harvard-Radcliffe Orchestra, whose conductor is James Yannatos, scored the soloistic coup of the local season thus far by inviting Janos Starker to appear at its first concert on Friday evening at Sanders Theater in Cambridge.

Mr. Starker, who is one of the top ranking cellists of our day, needs to be heard only once to confirm this designation, and it was evident by the end of Friday's program that he had done so again. An audience that jammed Sanders to the rafters gave him the longest and loudest standing ovation experienced hereabouts for quite some time.

The elbow-to-elbow situation, so well known in Sanders' pews on a crowded night, existed on the stage too. There, about 95 or so university musicians filled all the space except for Mr. Yannatos's podium, and a small raised platform on which Mr. Starker was perched rather precariously.

All this seemed to make no difference to the cellist, whose technique unostentatiously amazed the eye, and whose tone melted in the ear. In Vivaldi's D major Concerto, played with classic and stylish grace, he tended to give the instrumentalists a run for their money in the opening Allegro, but the whispered Larghetto, which is not so demanding of the orchestra, provided a chance to hear Mr. Starker at his most refined and stunning best.

The concert had begun with Hindemith's "Morgenmusik" for two trumpets and two trombones, soaringly conveyed from that wide, seldom used, balcony ledge high above the Sanders stage. Then, following the Vivaldi, Mr. Yannatos threw caution to the winds, and led his musicians through a vigorous performance of Stravinsky's wonderful "Petrushka" (the 1947 revision).

While the utmost in musical nuance may not have been achieved throughout, Mr. Yannatos kept his forces well coordinated — no easy task in this piece, particularly — and there were solo passages (trumpet, oboe, piano, violin, flute, for instance) that added splendidly to the whole. This is, after all, an extra-curricular organization, with a more or less transient membership, and, as such, may well provoke wonder and admiration.

There was hissing during the next number — but not of disapproval. An over-pressured steam valve (apparently) burst its bounds with such a racket that the Dvorak B minor Concerto, which Mr. Starker, conductor, and orchestra had started promisingly, had to be halted until the situation was remedied.

It was to everyone's credit that, after the interruption, the mood and the music were recaptured in equal measure. The student instrumentalists were again playing relaxedly, and Mr. Starker was pouring out golden cello tone in behalf of a work that is one of the instrument's masterworks. The audience explosion at its close made the steam valve's outburst sound like a sigh, and it brought about many bows by soloist, conductor, and orchestra, as well as two impeccable solo encores by Mr. Starker, whose happy return was never for a moment in doubt.

Flamenco by Sabicas

There is a very special audience for the art of Sabicas, a group who wouldn't be turned on by any other Andalusian playing Bach transcriptions on a guitar. The difference is that the music of Sabicas is all flamenco and all his own, and short of actually being there, it brings Spain to life in all its aspects like a series of dazzling colored tonal postcards.

Jordan Hall was filled with these admirers Saturday night when Sabicas, born Augustin Castellon, made his first smiling, dapper appearance. And they were still there after he had added four encores to a program with such evocative titles as "Flamenco Rhapsody," "Nights in Cadiz," "Remembrance of Carmen Amaya," "Homage to Malaga," "Holy Week in Seville" (a Sabicas must), "Inspiration," and "Compliments to the Spanish Style."

But it was more than a travelogue. Sabicas wraps himself around his guitar, and suddenly, with dulcet clarity, his busy fingers are making the strings sing, speak, mourn, laugh, and sigh the sounds of Spain we have experienced or dreamed of.

Seiji Ozawa, Symphony Conducter Is Teriffic

By DOROTHY DALE

SYMPHONY HALL HAS BEEN invaded — invaded by a sprite with a spirit of overwhelming intentness and joy .... more than that a sprite with such extraordinary talent that his ability to reach out and touch everyone withing the large confines of that elegant hall is nothing short of miraculous.

It was our first experience. We had not before heard the Boston Symphony under the baton of Seiji Ozawa, the new director of that famous orchestra. As we recall the afternoon. we found ourselves tingling all over again as we called up the memory.

The orchestra was playing Rachmaninoff for its opening number and that in itself was enough to sharpen our anticipation. And there we were in the middle of the balcony in that final stir that reaches its own height just before the director makes his entrance.

The arms of the hall formed by the 3 balcony rows above rows running down the side were clearly in our vision. So vivid were they with the ladies predominantly in brilliant red with some accenting the picture in an acid-like blue, that we thought of those painters of another era that used to delight in a typically Boston scene.

How I wished just one of them — Childe Hassam, A. C. Goodwin, Jane Peterson — were there to recreate the scene in oil.

THE HUSH CAME suddenly. There he was — Seiji Ozawa .... so tiny so quick of step so bright and happy that he almost shone lighting up the whole hall. And up the tiny figure jumped onto that huge-appearing podium, the baton raised, the silence complete, Symphony No. 3 in A minor was swelling into the hall, filling with its utter beauty of sound, every corner and every heart.

But what of him? What had we expected, what did we see. A tiny figure in black, black pants that fit the small leg closely, a black jacket that was not cut to fit, square it hung on the figure, black shining hair, brushed away from the face but hanging squarely to the shoulder, wide and thick.

The arms go up and the sleeve we see is also closely fitted. These arms are extraordinarily long and thin as are the legs. And they all work for the talent of this unusual man. One knee is bent, one leg stretched straight, the arms spread to their full length and the entire orchestra is gathered into the heart of Director Ozawa who makes us think of a huge spider weaving a web of the most excruciatingly glorious sound we'd heard for a long time.

Rachmaninoff we love you but we have never heard you interpreted so beautifully. It was sheer extravagant beauty — swelling, soaring, teasing, tempting, the exquisite sound was all around us .... the strings reaching with their soft singing wooing us, touching us, thrilling ....

Then it was over and the applause of those hundreds there was its own music reflected in the joyous impish oh so youthful face that turned to us.

AFTER INTERMISSION THERE was further evidence of the extraordinary talent of this man who might very well lay the direction his talent took to an accident. Seiji Ozawa played soccer in his youth and when he wasn't playing soccer he was playing his favorite instrument — the piano. One day while pursuing the game, he was injured and the injury was mostly in his hand. Bad enough so the piano would never be the instrument of his talents. It was then that he began to compose and yearn to lead an orchestra.

ENTERPRISE (E)
BROCKTON, MASS.
D. 54,587
NOV 7 1973
New England Newsclip

CAPRICCIO STRAVAGANTE by Schuller, an extremely modern fantasy was chosen for the filling before the Debussy. Delicate, playful and delightful as interpreted by Ozawa this pleased the audience no end. And we were a happy part of that audience listening to the charming poo poos and baa baas as Mr. Ozawa made the symphony talk while every so often the audience too, in the same gay spirit, laughed right out loud.

The number reminded us of an Alexander Calder mobile — a rather large one, mais naturelle. The mobile was at loose and at the mercy of an eratic breeze which, wafting it this way and that, jangled its tiny pieces for delightful tinkles and every so often knocked together some of its larger pieces for a haw, haw and a rumble of some extension.

HOW HAPPY EVERYONE looked as they streamed forth from the hall late that afternoon. The invasion of Symphony was complete. The sprite who had come from out of the west with his unlimited joy had sent joy into thousands of hearts. May he continue for a long time to come.

HERALD-AMERICAN (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 424,654
NOV 10 1973
New England Newsclip

Silverstein's Solo At BSO Marvelous

By ELLEN PFEIFER
MUSIC CRITIC

As Leonard Bernstein pointed out in his Norton lecture Tuesday evening, Arnold Schoenberg's correspondence is full of poignant remarks about the general non-acceptance and misunderstanding of his music by concert-goers. One particularly haunting letter states:

"Is it so much to be taken for granted if, in the face of the whole world's resistance, a man does not give up, but continues to write down what he produces? . . . I do not know what the great have thought about this . . . I know only one answer: they had things to say that had to be said. Once, in the army, I was asked if I was really the composer Arnold Schoenberg. 'Someone had to be,' I said, 'and nobody else wanted to, so I took it on myself.'"

• Music Review

Since his death, appreciation for Schoenberg has not been dramatically forthcoming — at least among lay listeners — and, in fact, the composer has remained one of the thorniest and most off-putting musical figures.

But, there does seem to be hope. At the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert yesterday, Joseph Silverstein and Seiji Ozawa collaborated in the Violin Concerto, Op. 36 and drew what could be called a warmly polite response.

Certainly that (and more) was deserved. Silverstein's playing of the prodigiously difficult solo part was marvelous. He had all the brilliant pyrotechnics, the multiple stops, harmonics, the difficult bowings (which violinist Louis Krasner called "the very edge of instrumental brinkmanship) completely under control and the lyric melodies were played with gorgeous tone and sensitivity.

The orchestra, under Ozawa, performed with similar virtuosity and musicality its wonderful, multi-hued part — Schoenberg's selection of colors and the endlessly inventive ways he put them together is astounding.

The concerto, as a whole, is masterly, but what was most moving was the Andante Grazioso with its, yes, beautiful melody lines. Certainly this one work puts the lie to George Rochberg's contention (as stated in the preface to his newly-recorded Third String Quartet) that the 12-tone method is incapable of expressing graciousness or anything but a twisted, tortured intensity.

After the Schoenberg, Ozawa conducted Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6, which one might have expected to get the crumbs of rehearsal time (what with a difficult contemporary work on the program). But, no. Ozawa Ozawa gave us a Sixth which was beautiful thought out and performed; a Sixth without the usual syrup, but with taut lines and clean articulation. If anything, it was a slightly austere Sixth in which the great subordinate theme of the first movement lacked just the slightest elasticity and dynamic flexibility.

Nevertheless, it was performance in which the greatest possible care was taken to follow all the directions to the letter. It resulted in a wonderfully crisp and martial third movement and, what really floored mme, a real "pppppp" by the solo bassoon at the transition into the development section of the first movement. Certainly, no one has managed to play it that quietly before.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 187,897
NOV 12 1973
New England Newsclip

BSO's crowd-teaser and -pleaser

By Louis Snyder

Seiji Ozawa's latest Boston Symphony program paired a crowd-teaser and a crowd-pleaser — a viable combination for audiences over the weekend at Symphony Hall and on live radio broadcasts of the concerts.

Music

Tomorrow evening's repetition at the hall is also being taped for later television airing.

When Arnold Schoenberg's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra (Op. 36) had its premiere in 1940, a Philadelphia writer described it as combining "the best sound effects of a hen yard at feeding time, a brisk morning in Chinatown, and practice hour at a busy conservatory." Fortunately, most listeners everywhere have grown a new pair of ears in the interim, and now they can have the last laugh at the naivete of this assessment.

Not that the concerto, played on this occasion by concertmaster Joseph Silverstein (as it was in its only other BSO hearings in 1965), is easily assimilated. Its performance history has proven that, as indicated in illuminating program notes by Michael Steinberg, writing of its structure (". . . what is required — and at an extreme level of concentration — is a chamber-music sense of the place in context, horizontal and vertical, of every event"), and by reminiscences of violinist Louis Krasner, soloist in the Philadelphia premiere. ("Efforts were exerted repeatedly to thwart the performance and to effect its cancellation.")

'I can wait'

In fact, the composer himself agreed: "The Concerto is extremely difficult, just as much for the head as for the hands. I am delighted to add another unplayable work to the repertoire. I want the Concerto to be difficult and I want the little finger to become longer. I can wait," he was quoted as saying.

At Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon, no one booed, laughed, or stamped out. Three decades of listening have made a difference. Reaction observed varied from absorption to complaisance to drowsiness, but the attentive ones were caught up in the sound, and they were in the majority. Barnyards, rush hour, and student practice no longer suggested themselves on Friday to even the most uninvolved, for several reasons. Twelve-tone writing has, albeit under some protest, slipped into the inquiring hearer's consciousness — he is no longer alarmed when tossed into a sea of agitated notes without a melody to hang on to. And he further gains assurance from performances in which knowledgeable participants are obviously at ease and in active agreement.

Technical virtuosity

The performance by Mr. Silverstein, Mr. Ozawa, and the BSO was of that persuasive, relaxed kind. If the concerto is still considered "unplayable" in any quarter, the soloist demonstrated the contrary in an unostentious display of technical virtuosity. As for keeping everything in its place in the score, horizontally and vertically, Mr. Ozawa seemed, as far as one could judge by ear, to have succeeded admirably. From the musicians' point of view, the concerto represented the brilliant result of a highly cooperative effort.

To the average listener, however, the work still speaks in academic terms, impressive but with the cool logic of mathematics. The ambience of Friday's performance began to hint that its appeal may be deeper, but there remains only one way to be sure — more frequent repetitions.

The program's second half — Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 in B minor ("Pathetique") — has not, over the years, lacked repetitions; in fact, one might have expected, on this occasion, that it was being offered as recompense for patient listeners to the earlier, iffy number.

Such was not the case, happily. The Sixth, as shaped by Mr. Ozawa and conveyed by the orchestra, was strong and sensitive without descending to sentimentality — a revealing exhibition of the basics of Tchaikovsky, too often overornamented and overindulged.

GLOBE (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042
NOV 10 1973
New England Newsclip

Tchaikowsky, Schoenberg and BSO

By Richard Dyer
Globe Correspondent

There are at present 24 recordings of the Tchaikowsky 6th Symphony and three of the Schoenberg Violin Concerto, and you could tell which piece most of the people had come to Symphony Hall yesterday to hear. The applause for the Schoenberg was sturdily polite, after (and at one point between the movements of) the Tchaikowsky enthusiastic, and I wondered how many knew that the Evening Transcript in 1898 called the Pathetique a foul ditch and sewer, vulgar, obscene, billingsgate, rot.

Unlike such other artifacts of 1936 as "Gone With the Wind," "Peter and the Wolf" and "You Can't Take It With You," the Schoenberg has no whiff of must about it; it is still challenging, still demanding to performers and listeners, still very beautiful.

It is a piece of formidable logic, but it is silly to insist on that — Washington provides daily examples, worthless because based in unconvincing premise. What is important is that the concerto sounds. And what sounds! The score has few of the verbal demands for sweetness and expressivity that dot the Tchaikowsky, but Schoenberg doesn't need them — everything is there already when it is executed exactly, as it was yesterday — the constantly shifting perspectives on the thematic material, illuminated by rhythmic and instrumental pointing.

And fortunately neither Joseph Silverstein, the soloist, nor Seiji Ozawa belongs to that school that believes that the way to preserve Schoenberg's meanings is the freeze-dry process. Silverstein's virtuosity was transcendent, but that wasn't the point; his performance though spare was warm-hued, unsparing.

The Tchaikowsky is one of those pieces irrevocably segmented for me by the side-breaks on the Toscanini 78's. This time for once, swept along by the fervor, pampered in plush, I forgot all about them. Far from the continence of that informing childhood one, this was not a performance to "live with," I guess, but a wonderfully voluptuary way to spend an adulterous afternoon.

14

Week 7

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 187,897

NOV 26 1973

New England Newsclip

Kubelik and the BSO in a showcase concert

Music

By Louis Snyder

Thanksgiving at home, Harvard-Yale football at New Haven, and the Osmond Brothers at Boston Garden notwithstanding, Symphony Hall was sold out with turnaways on Saturday evening for Rafael Kubelik as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony in a program to be repeated tomorrow evening at 8:30.

They were climbing the walls to get in to hear the Metropolitan Opera's (and Bavarian Radio's) music director conduct Beethoven (Symphony No. 5), and Bartok (Concerto for Orchestra), not only because of his world preeminence as interpreter of the orchestral repertoire, but because there seems to exist between him and his Boston Symphony colleagues a tacit agreement to make music with honors even. It was an all-out virtuoso encounter.

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, not played by the BSO in Symphony Hall for six years, obviously received special treatment from Mr. Kubelik. It was, interestingly enough, rather spare, without the pulsing heart of a Walter or the frantic discipline of a Szell, but perhaps cleaner in an interpretative sense than most versions one hears on discs. Under Mr. Kubelik's baton, it achieved its overwhelming effects through quasi-architectural means — the structural summation, impeccably built, ultimately revealed a towering musical monument that is the Fifth.

Conductors have always been fascinated by the Fifth Symphony, and the past is full of critical outcries against "this mania for original interpretations." In his current biography, "Mahler," Henry-Louis de La Grange quotes an outraged reaction to his subject's conducting of Beethoven in 1892: "One has no right to indulge in subtleties with a work like the Fifth Symphony." But the critic was reminded by a contemporary of the composer that Beethoven himself often took liberties in performing his own works, and fortunately today's audiences are intrigued by the variety of new strengths and colorations found by conductors in this and other hitherto traditionbound masterpieces.

BSO's 'own' concerto

The second half of the program — Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra — is, of course, a precious Boston Symphony property. Commissioned for it by the Koussevitzky Foundation, and premiered in Symphony Hall in 1944 (and repeated in the same subscription series a month later), the work has, somehow, always seemed to "belong" to the BSO, despite its worldwide circulation.

And how the Bostonians played it for Mr. Kubelik on this occasion! Since every choir has its chance to shine in this delectable score, the performance produced a wonderfully high polish of glowing tonal textures, masterfully controlled by the guest director. Mr. Kubelik, who stands tall on the podium, was, both literally and figuratively, on top of the music, and maintained a balance and precision that permitted the Bartok work to flow with special eloquence.

There was a holiday mood in the hall on Saturday (the program will be repeated there tomorrow evening at 8:30), and enthusiasm after both the Beethoven and the Bartok was loud and long, as it well deserved to be.

GLOBE (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042

NOV 24 1973

New England Newsclip

Kudos to Kubelik, BSO — and Bartok

By Robert Taylor
Globe Staff

MUSIC REVIEW

Rafael Kubelik, now Music Director of the Metropolitan Opera, made an exceedingly favorable impression here when, in 1971, he conducted (and later recorded with the Boston Symphony Orchestra) Smetana's cycle of six symphonic poems, "Ma vlast." Yesterday's concert reinforced that impression in a standard-repertory program of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra.

Certain items are associated with certain conductors. If the earliest association with the Bartok is Serge Koussevitzky, then Kubelik's dedication to it for the past two decades has linked his name with the score. These have been decades also in which the Bartok Concerto has become a staple of the record companies, principally because of its sonic qualities. And it has been treated so often in those terms, as though it were a sort of superior "Young Person's Guide to the Orchestra," that it is wholly refreshing to encounter musical ideas like Kubelik's, whose sensitivity to the weights and balances of rhythm is never coarsely virtuosic.

His tact with this music, a tact which enables its concerto grosso structure to appear with clarity, is accompanied by what is patently an intense personal commitment. The commitment made the difference between the Bartok and the Beethoven and overweighted the concert in favor of the former. Kubelik's approach to the Fifth Symphony is similarly understated; he does not strive for the grand line, and I found his lack of pomp engaging enough: a lyrical rather than a heroic performance, although like so many things lyrical it tends to fade quickly. The Bartok acquired driving urgency not so much because of Kubelik's attention to detail and tempo, pleasant as these were, but because of this vital sense of personal identification.

The orchestra played well for the guest conductor, and the elegaic charcter of the Concerto emerged in some limpid woodwind textures while the robust dances fully exploited the strings. It was all happily judged. Owing to a sudden indisposition on the part of Michael Steinberg, I found myself assuming his normal role, and could not help but reflect that I should be grateful for his holiday megrim. He returns next week.

HERALD-AMERICAN (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 424,654

NOV 24 1973

New England Newsclip

Bartok's Concerto Warm, Sympathetic

By ELLEN PFEIFFER

• Music Review

One of the New York critics, after hearing Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra for the first time in 1945 when Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought it on tour, commented that the work represented "a wide departure from its author's harsher and more cerebral style. What is evident is the courage, which this composer never has lacked, with which he is striking out, in his late years, in new directions. The style is less involved and ingrowing than we have thought much of Bartok's late music to be, and it escapes in a large measure the pale cast of isolated thought which has brooded over so many of his pages . . . it is an emergence from pessimism."

Although one may find that reviewer to have been somewhat overimpressed with the difficulty of works which no longer seem so thorny, one has to agree with his observations. The Concerto for Orchestra, which the Boston Symphony Orchestra revived Friday afternoon under the direction of Rafael Kubelik, is a wonderfully warm and optimistic work. It is a clear reflection of the revival of hope and experienced by the dying Bartok upon being commissioned to write the score by Koussevitzky and that hope takes the form of boisterous wit, elegaic sentiment, dazzling contrapuntal virtuosity and extraordinary sound world.

Cast in Bartok's arch form — five movements in which the first and fifth and second and fourth sections are related through procedural elements and flank a unique central section — the work calls for brilliance from both the instrumental soloists (or duos) and the tutti players. It got that from the BSO players as well as a warm and radiant ambience encouraged by Kubelik. It was a performance marked by straightforwardness and absolute clarity — an explication that was at once precise and human.

The same could be said for the Beethoven Fifth Symphony which occupied the program's first half. Although, it is considered an overworked warhorse by many, it doesn't appear on programs half as often as one would expect of a warhorse and it was a pleasure to hear it. Particularly in Kubelik's careful, conscientious, selfless performance. It was the kind of interpretation that allowed one to rediscover Beethoven and his marvels again and that, I think, is saying a lot.

15

In Concert

An Evening that Could Have Been Fascinating

By David Noble

Patriot Ledger Correspondent

Last week's BSO concerts were a demonstration of how music is translated; how a piece written for one instrument or a small group of instruments can be transcribed for symphony orchestra.

Since this was one of the orchestra's "Spectrum" concerts (played Thursday, with the same program repeated for the regular concerts Friday, Saturday and, again, tonight), conductor Michael Tilson Thomas illustrated the process of transcription with a lecture and some valuable before-and-after examples of the procedure.

First was a piece by John Cage, the radical innovator, transcribed by his almost equally radical colleague, Lou Harrison, for orchestra. Cage's piece was a "Suite for Toy Piano," a sweetly clinking miniature offered as a breath of fresh air in the ponderously neo-romantic American musical scene of 25 years ago. Harrison's transcription of it takes off on the put-on — Cage's tinkly games with Balinese temple music are blown back up to symphonic size.

With a little more effort for cleanness and crisp fluidity, the orchestra might have made something interesting in its own right out of Harrison's transcription, but Saturday night it was obvious that a relaxed approach to these matters was in effect.

The next offering of the concert was not so much a transcription as an extension of a chamber work, namely, Monteverdi's "Lament of Ariadne" — a work wildly popular in its time but now partially lost by fire. It was written as part of an opera on "Ariadne," all of which was burned by accident some time ago, but a fragment of the "Lament" survived because Monteverdi had transcribed it into a madrigal which has been preserved. That was one transcription; another was made of the piece when German composer Carl Orff rewrote the madrigal for mezzo-soprano and orchestra, and conjecturally restored the lost parts of the song, using the full text (which has been preserved.)

Soloist Rose Taylor was all heart, but the orchestra played tepidly again. I got the impression that Orff was not trying to reproduce the torrid soul of Monteverdi, even at the beginning when he was (freely) transcribing the madrigal. However, what he achieved at this seeming distance was presentable and interesting — one of Orff's better pieces, though not one of Monteverdi's. Monteverdi's madrigal version was sung by a dozen New England Conservatory students before Orff's restoration was played.

Then came — this was, in its own way, quite a night — a delicate Ravel orchestration of some movements out of Schumann's thunderously pianistic "Carnaval." Ravel managed to make something worthwhile out of this even through Saturday's performance, which was giving his transcription a dangerous resemblance to Offenbach. But beneath the frothy playing a wiry muscle was present in Ravel's writing as he rapidly shifted instrumentations to cope with the demands of Schumann's vigorous writing. The "Valse allemande" (German Waltz) came out particularly nicely in delicate orchestration and dulcet performance.

After intermission a Schoenberg orchestration of a chamber piece — the Piano Quartet in G Minor — by Brahms stole the show. Schoenberg, the reputedly grim, neurotic composer of bad dreams knocked everybody out with his loving and insightful transcription of the surging, romantic quartet.

If he took the opportunity to emphasize in his brilliant scoring how Brahms really anticipated some of the notorious Schoenberg procedures, no matter — cheering at the end of the muscular but careless performance showed that I wasn't the only listener who'd sat entranced.

Conductor Thomas went along with the orchestra's relaxed mood, confining his attempts at arousal to occasional accents and other local matters of that kind. His spoken program notes were briefer and more to the point than they have been on other occasions, and his performance of part of Cage's toy piano suite was excellent.

All in all — an interesting evening that could have been fascinating if only the orchestra players had felt that it was worth doing well.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 217,264
DEC 3 1973

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 24,500
DEC 6 1973

PATRIOT LEDGER (E)
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 71,020
DEC 4 1973
New England Newsclip

Week 8

Transcriptions mark BSO concert

By Thor Eckert, Jr.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's "Spectrum" series got off to a remarkable start Thursday evening under the baton of its innovator, Michael Tilson Thomas.

The evening was devoted to transcriptions.

The practice of transcribing has always been part of the music world.

Music

It was often done by the composer himself to allow a good tune to be performed by instruments or groups other than those for which it was originally conceived.

One of the most eminent transcribers was the virtuoso pianist, Franz Liszt, who reduced whole Beethoven symphonies (among a host of other things) to two-hand piano music.

As the BSO program showed, the art of transcribing smaller works into larger was a curiously 20th-century phenomenon. The proceedings opened with a relatively recent transcription: Lou Harrison's orchestral version of John Cage's "Suite for Toy Piano." Mr. Thomas first played excerpts of the original "Suite," composed as a continuing attempt to reduce to a minimum the notes played, and to get people to hear music in other and by other, than traditional ways and means.

The Lou Harrison transcription was rather conventional and large-scale. Though very engaging and pleasant, it was not especially faithful to Mr. Cage's intent.

Monteverdi madrigal

The next offering was an unprogrammed Monteverdi madrigal — the composer's own transcription of his "Lamento d'Arianna" well sung by members of the New England Conservatory Chorus. There followed Carl Orff's transcription and partial reconstruction of the original scene from the opera "Arianna" of which only this fragment remains. Mr. Thomas called the transcription some of the best work Orff has done.

The sound is modern and somewhat denser than Monteverdi would have it, but obviously Orff has a great reverence for the music that enhances the drama while letting Monteverdi "speak" for himself. Rose Taylor was the sonorous soloist in this stunning vehicle for mezzo-soprano. Why, one asks, was this only the first Boston performance of a work that surely deserves better?

First U.S. performance

To close the first half of the concert, Mr. Thomas led the BSO in the first U.S. performance of four segments of Robert Schumann's "Carnaval" orchestrated by Maurice Ravel. The pieces are clearly Ravelian without the incisiveness and tightness of his best efforts. Perhaps this orchestration is just too largescale to be convincing. This can be seen only as an interesting experiment, by a master orchestrator.

The program closed with a stunning reading of Arnold Schoenberg's transcription of Brahms's G minor piano quartet. Mr. Thomas called this the "transcription to end all transcriptions." Done in 1937, while Schoenberg was living in California, it was conceived as an extension of the Brahms sound (a fifth symphony) in terms of a 20th-century orchestra. For the most part, it remains faithful to that unique sound. Only in the third movement do "modern" elements (quite Mahlerian enter in: The last movement — a Hungarian gypsy rondo — is a riot of orchestral virtuosity (the piece demands a first-rank orchestra) translating, as it does, the music of the original four instruments into a broad orchestral palette. The effect of having a late Brahms sound in early Brahms music is quite bewitching.

This fascinating evening should have been better attended. As it was Symphony Hall was little more than half full. The Spectrum series deserves to survive. It is refreshing to attend a casual evening of great musicmaking, complete with informative and entertaining narrative from Mr. Thomas, who never ceases to amaze for his artistic maturity matched with that wonderfully theatrical flair that makes his concerts so satisfying.

From New York

The Chamber Music Society of Lincoln Center made an auspicious debut in Jordan Hall last Saturday. The group, formed in 1969 at the time of the opening of Alice Tully Hall (their artistic home) in Lincoln Center, New York City, brings together prominent musicians dedicated to the performance of chamber music literature.

The core of musicians for the Boston debut were Jaime Laredo (violin), Walter Trampler (viola), and Leslie Parnas (cello). They opened the evening with a fluid and well-balanced performance of Beethoven's String Trio in E flat.

Messrs. Laredo and Parnas then performed Zoltan Kodaly's "Duo for Violin and Cello." The work explores a wide range of sonorities for both instruments. It pits the two players against each other, each vying for the spotlight, but all too rarely do the instruments complement each other. When they do, as in the closing pages of the Adagio and parts of the last movement, when some wonderful Hungarian folk-tunes were introduced, the effect is compelling. For all of this, the performance could hardly be faulted, so fine was the playing.

After the intermission the "core" musicians were joined by Ani Kavafian (violin), Marcus Thompson (viola), and Laurence Lesser (cello) in an electrifying reading of Tchaikovsky's "Souvenir de Florence." The group attacked this virtuoso piece with an abandon that swept the audience up into the sunniness of this relatively unfamiliar work.

What was most remarkable about this group was the total dedication to ensemble music making, with soloists shining only when their instruments had the spotlight. Equally remarkable was the rich, warm blend of the players, who, even under pressure, never marred the sound with stridency.

The Chamber Music Society is a welcome addition to the ranks of Boston visitors, and it is hoped they will become an annual tradition.

Tilson Thomas & BSO

A Program of Transcriptions

It was Michael Tilson Thomas' turn to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra last weekend and over the first of the Spectrum group which he created a few years ago. This season, unlike in the past, the Spectrum programs have been incorporated into the regular subscription sequence.

For the initial Spectrum set, Thomas built the concert around the general theme of orchestral transcriptions. Four novelties formed the program: Lou Harrison's transcription of John Cage's Suite for Toy Piano, Carl Orff's version of Monteverdi's Lamento d'Arianna, the Schumann-Ravel Carnaval excerpts, and Schoenberg's transcription of the Brahms G minor Quartet for piano and strings.

In good Spectrum manner, Thomas introduced each of the compositions with brief remarks, and in all but the Schumann-Ravel presented a soupcon of the original before turning to the transcription. This technique, a leaf out of the book of Leonard Bernstein, tends to make of the concert an illustrated lecture. Although it may have validity in the lecture hall or before children and young people, there may be some question as to its appropriateness before a regular subscription concert audience which has most of the information available to it in the printed program book. That some were restless and anxious for Thomas to get on with the music seemed evident.

As for the music itself, the Schoenberg transcription was the major undertaking. Why Schoenberg, who broke away radically from conventional musical language and introduced the twelve-tone idiom, should in his sixties return to the tamer forms of Brahms was somewhat explained in the composer's letter to critic Alfred Frankenstein of the San Francisco Chronicle. Wrote Schoenberg of the Brahms, "1. I like this piece. 2. It is seldom played. 3. It is always played badly, because the better the pianist, the louder he plays and you hear nothing from the strings. I wanted once to hear everything, and this I achieved."

Schoenberg certainly achieved it in brilliant orchestration, though whether Brahms, were he living in 1937, would have approved and used such instruments as the xylophone and E-flat clarinet we shall never know. The Quartet sounds bigger than it is, which raises the question of whether clothing the music in full orchestral attire destroys the intimate mood of the original. Chamber music has a special quality which is lost in an orchestral setting.

The same thing tends to be true, it seems to me, of transcriptions in general. A composer chooses a medium so that the medium is part of his artistic message. Changing the medium provides something entirely different, and however effective it turns out, the result is not the original work, even when the original creator himselfs attends to the transcription, as Brahms did with the Variations on a Theme of Haydn. (The exception, I suppose, would be Ravel's treatment of Moussorgsky's Pictures at an Exhibition.)

Given this observation, the other three transcriptions on the program were more opulent than their originals, but hardly as successful in esthetic expression. Ravel's version of the Schumann Carnaval ran to the tinny side and greatly detracted from the charm of the piano pieces. Harrison's resetting of Cage's suite lacked the childlike innocence of the toy piano, and Orff's treatment of the Monteverdi Lamento, even with the dramatic singing of Rose Taylor, offered yet another character to Monteverdi's poignant aria that didn't truly enhance the original music or even Monteverdi's own transcription into a five-part madrigal.

Perhaps one reason for these reactions was the rough playing of the Orchestra. The performances were neither relaxed nor polished, despite the appearance of the musicians in shirtsleeves and informal dress. One would have to say that the first set of Spectra concerts this time fell at the weak end of the spectrum.

H.

The San Diego Union
SAN DIEGO, CALIF.
D. 139,739 SUN. 246,007
DEC 15 1973

Boston Symphony Is Free-Wheeling

By DONALD DIERKS
Music Writer
The San Diego Union

NEW YORK — One of the agreeable things an orchestra can do with a 52-week season at home, and a sizable number of appearances out of town, is indulge itself and its audiences with music that is off the beaten track.

The Boston Symphony is such a fortunate ensemble and, for one of its numerous concerts in New York this season, it sallied forth into realms of the repertoire that are all but virgin. Thursday night at Carnegie Hall the orchestra, conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas, gave what it calls a "Spectrum Concert." The implication of the name, of course, is that the listener can expect a wide-ranging, free-wheeling sample of the entire orchestral repertoire.

THEATERS

This particular Spectrum Concert had "transcriptions" as its organizing theme. Everything played had been written originally for another medium and later expanded for the giant resources of the modern symphony orchestra.

Thomas, who is one of the few conductors who talks as good a game as the one he plays with a baton, gave verbal program notes and piano demonstrations to make his points.

For John Cage's Suite for Toy Piano, which was transcribed for orchestra by Lou Harrison, Thomas played the original composition on a cute, bright little piano purchased on his podium for the purpose. He explained that the suite had been composed as a reaction to the elephantine porportions of much of the music of the 19th and 20th Centuries. The following performance of Harrison's transcription for an elephantine orchestra brought the music full circle. The music was enjoyable apart from its interests as an aesthetic case study.

The "Lamento d'Arianna" by Monteverdi started life as a madrigal in the 16th Century and was transformed in the 20th Century to a work for orchestra and mezzo-soprano by Carl Orff. It was first sung in the original concert was Arnold Schoenberg's transcription of the Quartet in G Minor for piano and strings by Brahms — well-played — and well-sung by Rose Taylor — but the transformation of such a distinctive antique idiom into a modern medium was performed for Beethoven by than a little unsettling transcribing some of his quartets for orchestra. The

More successful, perhaps for the reason of a smaller time lapse, was Ravel's transcription for orchestra of three pieces from Schumann's piano composition "Carnaval," Opus 25. Ravel, the master orchestrator, created a work that was at once faithful to the spirit of the Brahms symphonies and the original and brilliant in its own right. It was a much more brilliant sound that Schoenberg achieved.

The centerpiece of this concert was Arnold Schoenberg's transcription of the Quartet in G Minor for piano and strings by Brahms — well-played — and well-sung by Rose Taylor — but the transformation of such a distinctive antique idiom into a modern medium was performed for Beethoven by than a little unsettling transcribing some of his quartets for orchestra. The strange thing with Schoenberg's transcription was, however, that the G Minor Quartet rarely sounded as if it were Brahms. The orchestral textures were clearer than those heard in any of the Brahms symphonies and it was a much more brilliant sound that Schoenberg achieved.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
S. 581.160

DEC 9 1973

New England Newsclip

Oh wow, Ozawa zaps the BSO. (Photo by Ted Dully)

The selling of the BSO's new image

By Carolyn Clay
Globe Staff

For a great many of its 93 years that august institution known as the Boston Symphony Orchestra has rested quite properly on its laurels and the assumption that Bostonians of taste and a modicum of musical sense could locate Symphony Hall all by themselves and would decorously clamor to slap their cash on the counter. It calls to mind the television tuna with the overwhelming yen to make the grade and get himself filleted by Starkist. An ad-campaign? Does the Pope advertise? Does the Boston Atheneum?

Well, there may have been some fast flips in the graves of some of the finer families this fall when Provandi Eastwood and Lombardi initiated that grinning photo of Seiji Ozawa, looking for all the world like he is just about to sell someone a used car, with the bold-faced logo to prop him up — "Ozawa Wants You." But sales are the best they've been in six years — since the end of the tenure of conductor Erich Leinsdorf.

It would appear that the Symphony's image is undergoing a facelift. Seiji Ozawa, newly inaugurated music director, is not yet 40; he wears his hair shoulder-length and shaggy and conducts in a frock-coat, turtleneck and beads. Michael Tilson Thomas, a principal guest conductor, is even younger and his commitment to Twentieth Century and little known music is apparent. Last week's Spectrum concert (also performed for the regular Friday afternoon and Saturday evening patrons), a program of transcriptions, included John Cage's "Suite for Toy Piano," rendered with all its tinny tinkle by the conductor himself while, upstairs in the Cabot-Cahners Room, liquor was dispensed from a bar along with cheese spread on Ritz crackers.

After-hours attire for the Ozawas is "casual."

Not to be misleading, the BSO has not undergone any kind of radical transformation. Ozawa was chosen very carefully when William Steinberg announced his intention a year or so ago to step down. Bringing in a new or even a guest conductor is a touchy business for the salesmen down at Symphony Hall. Ideally, the conductor must appeal not only to the youthful, new Boston audience whom they hope to seduce, but to the old faithfuls as well. After all, it is not young Harvardians who write out $100,000 checks to endow a chair in addition to buying their tickets.

Seiji Ozawa pleases everybody, and he has, according to press person Dianah Daniels "been handled very carefully." Artistic co-director of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood since 1970, Ozawa had already garnered a large following and his youth and apparent non-wasp origins made him a favorite of the young.

It was anticipated that there might be some hostility among hardcore orchestra patrons to the youthful foreigner, but this has not materialized. For one thing, Ozawa is a family man who has put down roots, bought a house, and though he still divides his time and commitment between the BSO and the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra of which he is coincidentally conductor, he exudes with his wife and young daughter a stability and permanence that are attractive. He is neither stand-offish nor "kicky" and takes an active role in the administrative dealings as well as the musical end of the orchestra.

This is not the first year that the BSO has undertaken to advertise, but the clever campaign is their most extensive effort to date. This is the first year that the BSO has bought time on a major radio station, WBZ for example, and not just the university stations.

The aim was to attract subscribers since it is cheaper to sell subscription tickets than to rely on selling individual concerts. Indeed, it was the dropping off of subscriptions several years ago that forced the Symphony to reassess its policy of aloofness and overcome the reluctance to "sell itself." Subscriptions began to pick up last year and this year, public relations manager, John Curtis reports they are selling out.

SYMPHONY, Page A-37 65

The selling of the BSO's new image

★ SYMPHONY
Continued from Page A-34 65

There are, of course, several subscription packages, and each has its particular appeal and its distinctive clientiele. Nowhere is the difference more marked than between the connoisseurs of Michael Tilson Thomas's 3-concert "Spectrum Series" and the Friday afternoon subscription audience, part of which is transported to Symphony Hall in buses from the Chilton Club.

Last week I attended the same concert, conducted by Boston favorite son Michael Tilson Thomas, on Thursday evening and on Friday afternoon. Only the music was similar. The Thursday night crowd, Spectrum subscribers, was small but considerably more appreciative of Tilson Thomas' offbeat approach and talky introductions to the program of transcriptions. A Schoenberg transcription of Brahms' Quartet for Piano and Strings, in G minor op. 25, greeted on Thursday evening by "Bravos" from the young, Cambridge-y looking crowd, was received coldly on Friday afternoon if the numerous exits between the movements can be counted as an indicator.

On Thursday evening the audience was casually dressed. A great many carried books like Germaine Greer's "The Female Eunuch." A few carried musical scores, presumably to keep Tilson Thomas on his toes. The group in the bar at intermission was discussing the music. They drank mostly cokes. The orchestra was coatless, and I heard no complaints. One young patron, seated down front, guzzled wine from a bottle throughout the first act.

On Friday afternoon, by contrast, there was no wine-guzzling during the performance and the intermission snacks ran towards sherry and ginger-ale. The Friday afternoon audience, preponderantly female, dresses to the teeth, and there is enough fur in the house to keep everybody warm as toast even if they turn the thermostat way down to conserve energy. The chauffeurs on the sidewalk didn't look too warm, but most of them were crowded into one another's limousines (a lot of Lincolns) for couple of a fast cardgames.

Ozawa is extremely concious of an obligation to appeal to all of his patrons and is careful to balance Twentieth Century composers on his programs with what is tried and true. Not always so with Michael Tilson Thomas, and Friday afternoon the hostility that greeted his Spectrum selections, and especially his chatty interjections, was apparent — at least from where Henry B. Cabot, Trustee Emeritus, was sitting. Midway through one of the conductor's spiels about "contrapuntal harmoney," Cabot requested pretty loudy that he "shut up." Mrs. Cabot confirmed that the outburst later on the phone, saying that she hoped her husband would be forgiven but that he hadn't expected "that kind of concert."

Week 9

17

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 137,897

DEC 10 1973

New England Newsclip

'All normal' again after shirtsleeve concert

Jackets are back at the BSO

By Louis Snyder

Members of the Boston Symphony and their guest conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, were back in traditional performing garb for last weekend's subscription performances.

Something of a Symphony Hall flap had been caused the week previous when Thomas's three-year-old Spectrum series, verbally informative and sartorially informal onstage, was presented for the first time as a Friday afternoon subscription program, provoking everything from puzzlement to vocal resistance. What, performing without jackets?

This week everything was back to normal. Conductor Thomas addressed not a word to the audience about the program — Bach's Suite No. 3 in D, Strauss's "Also sprach Zarathustra," and the Second Piano Concerto of Brahms, with Malcolm Frager as soloist. And on Friday everyone was impeccably dressed, and the audience was on its best behavior.

Music

Whether or not clothes (or words) make the musician, Mr. Thomas and his musicians were in fine form. The Bach Suite, played by a reduced orchestra, was crisp and clean, and bore the Thomas hallmark in the form of unexpected tempos (the "Air" moved along at an unaccustomed but invigorating clip), and the two Gavottes, the Bourree, and the Gigue were eminently danceable.

"Zarathustra," which has acquired new meaning as cinematic space music in "2001 — A Space Odyssey," is probably better off in that context than in the wildly fustian description of its content given in the program notes. A few words from Mr. Thomas on that subject would be well worth hearing — but instead he concentrated on giving the tone poem a lushly theatrical reading, full of light and shade, with just enough but not too much accent on those ever-recurring, irresistible, Straussian tonal gimmicks, which trap even the most wary.

Like much of Strauss, "Zarathustra" can be shamelessly flamboyant and seductively melodic by turns — it is easy to be taken in by it all, particularly when the performance is as slick as the one Mr. Thomas and the BSO conspired to do last week. (The BSO will play it again at Avery Fisher Hall in New York on Dec. 12 and 14, and at Symphony Hall on Dec. 18.)

Mr. Frager, who seemed ubiquitous in Symphony Hall last weekend — two BSO concerts, and a Sunday afternoon recital with vocalists Evelyn Lear and Thomas Stewart — was repeating the Brahms B flat Concerto which he had played with the orchestra during the past summer at Tanglewood. It's a big concerto and Mr. Frager is a big talent, but whether they are made for each other temperamentally still remains a question.

Needless to say, there was no question of his impressive coverage of the keyboard or (this time) a happy musical partnership with Mr. Thomas and the orchestra. But variation in mood, from fire to lyricism, inherent in this many-faceted work, was hardly a distinguishing feature of the collaboration. Nevertheless, on Friday, there was a warmly enthusiastic reception for soloist, conductor, and musicians at the concert's close.

Annual 'Messiah'

Tradition was observed at Symphony Hall again on Friday evening when the Handel and Haydn Society presented its annual rendition of Handel's "Messiah," a custom begun by the society in 1815.

The hall was filled to capacity for this first of two pre-Christmas performances (it was repeated last night), which, over the years, have become a holiday must for Bostonians, young and older. Graybeards and blackbeards, schoolgirls and matrons, formals and informals, family groups, loving couples, and singletons were all there to hear the version of the "Messiah" (Haymarket Theater, London, 1745) which music director Thomas Dunn had chosen to perform this year.

This version, which is of chamber proportions, limits the chorus to about 32, the orchestra to a like number, and distributes the arias among four soloists — on this occasion soprano Barbara Wallace, mezzo Shirley Love, tenor Richard Shadley, and bass Ara Berberian. The reconstruction by Alfred Mann of the Haymarket performances, which, incidentally, were in April rather than at Christmas, is filled with ifs and maybes, according to the program notes, but for most of the Symphony Hall audience, these are of importance secondary to the rehearing of the familiar choruses, arias, and in this realization, several duets, in an agreeable context and ambience.

Mr. Dunn's choristers were in fine vocal shape (the ladies wore fetching red sashes on their black gowns), and the orchestra, showing evidence of having been well rehearsed, included some showy work by trumpeter Peter Chapman, bassoonist Donald Bravo, and the harpsichord and organ of David Carney and Daniel Pinkham. The vocal soloists, entrusted with "authentic embellishments, for which they were mostly unsuited stylistically, handled them gingerly at best. What price the echoes of La Francesina's "active throat" or the "sensational graces" of tenor John Beard whom Londoners heard at the Haymarket in 1745?

But "Messiah," in any of its five versions, is beloved under almost any circumtances because of its basic appeal through word and note, and Handel and Haydn deserves the thanks of generations for making and maintaining a home for it in Boston.

GLOBE (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042

DEC 8 1973

New England Newsclip

Reflections in the afternoon for Tilson Thomas and BSO

By Richard Dyer
Globe Correspondent

MUSIC REVIEW

Smollett's good Win Jenkins had the phrase for it, she did—speaking of what she called "holy mattermoney" she defined the way most people live as upon "dissent terms of civility." And that, I'm afraid, is what the BSO under Michael Tilson Thomas these days is like—it's like a formal dinner with friends whose marriage is in trouble: you love them both (Thomas's is a formidable musical intellect; the BSO is a very great orchestra); the varnish of amenity sends back its crooked reflections; nobody has a very good time.

There were some good ideas and some bracing playing in the opening Bach Suite (the 3d, in D), but both Thomas and the orchestra were inconsistent. If there was an interesting brisk tempo for the Air, there were also some languishing ritards in the Stokowski style; a lot of the playing was bottom-heavy, sludgy; any dancing to those gavottes, to the gigue, would be pretty glue-footed.

It was good next to hear something beyond the first couple of pages of Strauss's "Also Sprach Zarathustra." Thomas mercifully kept out of the frenzy department, and the orchestra at moments sounded as only the BSO in full cry can; other moments had a wonderful cleanness and clarity (the middle part of the science section, after Strauss gives up on his fugue). But too many of those slithering inner voices that contribute so much color and character just couldn't be heard, and my, how jittery (and uncharacteristic) so much of that brass playing was, how out of tune those trebles at the end (playing trebly removed from the treble degree of softness specified).

After intermission Malcolm Frager was soloist in the kind of performance of the Brahsn 2d that I usually admire, one that risks all (it's not the kind of piece that responds very well to patrician self-containment). Unfortunately this time there were too many lapses of concentration, leading to a bit of keyboard splutter and a lot of jangly, racous sound. After two movements I felt pretty pummeled; things settled down a little in the last two, with some especially pleasing fancies towards the end.

"The classics," breathed a lady at the exit, relieved to be spared the rigors of the unfamiliar, "there's nothing to say." Fortunately there is — that's why these pieces are classics — but not enough was said distinctly enough yesterday afternoon.

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
W. 6,043

NOV 23 1973

New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Orchestra offers two concerts

BOSTON—The first of the highly successful Spectrum Concerts (conceived and conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas) takes place on Thursday evening, November 29 at 8:30 p.m. in Symphony Hall. The program, titled Program of Transcriptions, vividly illustrates the ways in which a group of twentieth century composers has rethought the works of other composers.

The program opens with the Cage-Harrison Suite for toy piano. Monteverdi-Orff's Lamento d'Arianna, with Rose Taylor as soloist, follows. The Sibelius-Stravinsky Canzonetta is the next work on the program, followed by the Schumann-Ravel Carnaval (excerpt). The concert closes with the Brahms-Schoenberg Piano quartet in G minor.

Michael Tilson Thomas conducts this concert with contralto Rose Taylor as soloist. The Spectrum concert format offers enlightening comments from the conductor and an informal atmosphere for the listener. Spectrum, now in its third year, has served to bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra a new corps of young and musically aware listeners, who appreciate its inventive programming. In its original statement of purpose, Spectrum vowed to span all musical time . . to present a true spectrum of all that has happened and is to happen in music. Anyone who has attended the concerts of the past two seasons can vouch for the fact that Michael Tilson Thomas is keeping that promise with Spectrum.

Spectrum is a series of three concerts. The following two are on Thursdays, January 24 and April 11. January's concert is titled Where We're At, and the April concert is titled Three Centuries of Drama in Music. Series tickets are available at this time.

On Friday, December 7 at 2:00 p.m. and Saturday, December 8 at 8:30 p.m. Principal Guest Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in works of Bach, Strauss and Brahms. Mr. Thomas opens the concerts with the Bach Suite no. 3 in D and follows it with Strauss' Also sprach Zarathustra. Mr. Thomas closes the concerts with Brahms' Piano concerto no. 2 in B flat. Mr. Frager is piano soloist in this work.

Appointed assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the beginning of the 1969-70 season, Mr. Thomas replaced William Steinberg at concerts in New York during the fall when Mr. Steinberg became ill. Mr. Thomas conducted more than thirty of the Boston Symphony's concerts during that season, and was appointed associate conductor of the orchestra in the spring of 1970. Mr. Thomas has conducted all over the world and at this point is principal guest conductor of the Boston Symphony, music director of the Buffalo Philharmonic and music director of the Young People's Concerts in New York.

Malcom Frager is no stranger to the Boston Symphony. He performs nearly every summer at Tanglewood and has performed with the Boston Symphony in Boston. Mr. Frager is the first--and to date, the only--artist ever to have won what TIME Magazine called "two of the toughest competitions in music": First Prize at the Queen Elisabeth of Belgium International Piano Competition in Brussels, and the Edgar M. Leventritt Competition in New York. Mr. Frager has been in the forefront of the international musical scene ever since this double triumph over ten years ago.

p. 18

Week 9

SUN-CHRONICLE (E)
ATTLEBORO, MASS.
D. 18,000

Orchestra in Fine Form

By LOUIS SNYDER
Monitor News Service

BOSTON — Members of the Boston Symphony and their guest conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, were back in traditional performing garb for last weekend's subscription performances.

Something of a Symphony Hall flap had been caused the week previous when Thomas's three-year-old Spectrum series, verbally informative and sartorially informal onstage, was presented for the first time as a Friday afternoon subscription program, provoking everything from puzzlement to vocal resistance.

What, performing without jackets?

This week everything was back to normal. Conductor Thomas addressed not a word to the audience about the program — Bach's Suite No. 3 in D, Strauss's "Also sprach Zarathustra," and the Second Piano Concerto of Brahms, with Malcolm Frager as soloist. And on Friday everyone was impeccably dressed, and the audience was on its best behavior.

Whether or not clothes (or words) make the musician, Thomas and his musicians were in fine form. The Bach Suite, played by a reduced orchestra, was crip and clean, and bore the Thomas hallmark in the form of unexpected tempos (the "Air" moved along at an unaccustomed but invigorating clip), and the two Gavottes, the Bourree, and the Gigue were eminently danceable.

"Zarathustra," which has acquired new meaning as cinematic space music in "2001 — A Space Odyssey," is probably better off in that context than in the willdy fustian description of its content given in the program notes.

A few words from Thomas on that subject would be well worth hearing — but instead he concentrated on giving the tone poem a lushly theatrical reading, full of light and shade, with just enough but not too much accent on those ever-recurring, irresistible Straussian tonal gimmicks, which trap even the most wary.

Like much of Strauss, "Zarathustra" can be shamelessly flamboyant and seductively melodic by turns — it is easy to be taken in by it all, particularly when the performance is as slick as the one Thomas and the BSO conspired to do. (The BSO will play it again at Avery Fisher Hall in New York on Dec. 12 and 14, and at Symphony Hall on Dec. 18.)

Frager, who seemed ubiquitous in Symphony Hall last weekend — two BSO concerts, and a Sunday afternoon recital with vocalists Evelyn Lear and Thomas Stewart — was repeating the Brahms B flat Concerto which he had played with the orchestra during the past summer at Tanglewood. It's a big concerto and Frager is a big talent, but whether they are made for each other temperamentally still remains a question.

Needless to say, there was no question of his impressive coverage of the keyboard or (this time) a happy musical partnership with Thomas and the orchestra.

But variation in mood, from fire to lyricism, inherent in this many-faceted work, was hardly a distinguishing feature of the collaboration. Nevertheless, on Friday there was a warmly enthusiastic reception for soloist, conductor, and musicians at the concert's close.

Annual 'Messiah'

Tradition was observed at Symphony Hall again on Friday evening when the Handel and Haydn Society presented its annual rendition of Handel's "Messiah," a custom begun by the society in 1815.

The hall was filled to capacity for this first of two pre-Christmas performances which, over the years, have become a holiday must for Bostonians, young and older.

Graybeards and blackbeards, schoolgirls and matrons, formals and informals, family groups, loving couples, and singletons were all there to hear the version of the "Messiah" (Haymarket Theater, London, 1745) which music director Thomas Dunn had chosen to perform this year.

This version, which is of chamber proportions, limits the chorus to about 32, the orchestra to a like number, and distributes the arias among four soloists — on this occasion soprano Barbara Wallace, mezzo Shirley Love, tenor Richard Shadley, and bass Ara Berberian. The reconstruction by Alfred Mann of the Haymarket performances, which, incidentally, were in April rather than at Christmas, is filled with ifs and maybes, according to the program notes, but for most of the Symphony Hall audience, these are of importance secondary to the rehearing of the familiar choruses, arias, and in this realization, several duets, in an agreeable context and ambience.

Dunn's choristers were in fine vocal shape (the ladies wore fetching red sashes on their black gowns), and the orchestra, showing evidence of having been well rehearsed, included some showy work by trumpeter Peter Chapman, bassoonist Donald Bravo, and the harpsichord and organ of David Carney and Daniel Pinkham.

Copyright The Christian Science Publishing Society

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS

PATRIOT LEDGER (E)
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 71,020
DEC 20 1973
New England Newsclip

In Concert

Schoenberg and Strauss: A Hit and a Miss

By Peter M. Knapp
Patriot Ledger Staff

In the contemplation of Arnold Schoenberg as 12-tone Arnold, the shatterer of tonality, we tend to forget that in his early years he was a super-romantic. So it is not thoroughly surprising that in his later years Schoenberg abruptly went back to Brahms, choosing to transcribe for orchestra that composer's Quartet in G minor for piano and strings, Opus 25.

Why? As he explained in a letter to music critic Alfred V. Frankenstein, "I like this piece; It is seldom played. It is always very badly played, because the better the pianist, the louder he plays and you hear nothing from the strings. I wanted once to hear everything, and this I achieved."

And so he did, in a virtuoso labor of love, transforming the chamber work into symphonic dimensions for large orchestra. Michael Tilson Thomas has been programming this work with the Boston Symphony in recent weeks, and he led it again at Tuesday night's concert, paired with another example of ze orchestration brillante, Richard Strauss' "Also sprach Zarathustra."

New Creation

The Schoenberg made a big hit — so at least most listeners were not intimidated by the name and associations with grinding dissonance (but that's another story). While every transformation of art from one medium to another produces a new creation in its own right, Schoenberg remained faithful to Brahms, as he promised. The textures and sound are predominantly Brahmsian, as is the spirit.

One seldom gains the impression of orchestration beyond the scale of the music; the medium is different, the message remains. And Schoenberg's choice of instruments is unfailingly apt, especially in the typically Brahmsian wind voicings.

There are exceptions, of course — notably in the last movement, the "Rondo alla Zingarese," where no one with access to large modern orchestra could resist the temptation to let loose the color. And Schoenberg does, with dashes of glockenspiel, tylophone, tambourine and such.

Old Brahms might have been both astonished at the attention paid to his quartet and flattered by the transcription. (The original version, incidentally, was performed last March in Symphony Hall by the Guarneri String Quartet and pianist Peter Serkin in one of the Boston University Celebrity Series programs.)

Thomas' approach to this music was sympathetic as well, neatly balancing the many polyphonic strands (no mean feat with the highly contrapuntal texture) and putting a good deal of feeling into the surging music. A symphonic approach, rather than an attempt to re-establish a lighter chamber manner, occasionally on the loud side but making a big hit with the zesty Hungarian dances of the finale.

More Control

"Zarathustra" was not as successful, despite a number of admirable passages, primarily because Thomas tended to push the climactic moments too hard, losing some of the balances and details and rushing the phrases. It had a good deal of rhetorical punch but over-all this sprawling tone poem needs greater control and patience — even though anyone's patience is tried by some of the dry patches.

This hymn to Nietzsche remains one of Strauss' most frustrating endeavors, a piece of astonishing power and beauty in its best measures, and pomposity and banality at its worst. One of the best summaries of "Zarathustra" has come from Strauss' biographer, George R. Marek:

"There you have it, a work of curious anomalies, divided against itself. It overwhelms you with opulence and bores you with stuffiness. It lifts you with its inspiration and lectures at you in professorial tone. It is both fulsome and fabulous. It contains both romantic exuberance and doughy pedantry. It includes some of the best and some of the worst of the composer. With its virtues and its faults, both impressive, it could be called 'Thus Spake Richard Strauss.' "

Fair enough.

HERALD-AMERICAN (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 424,654
DEC 8 1973
New England Newsclip

BSO Makes Return To the Conventional

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

After his excursion into the curious world of transcriptions via last week's Spectrum Concert survey, Michael Tilson Thomas and the Boston Symphony Orchestra turned emphatically back to the conventional repertory in the BSO concert yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall.

They began with Bach—the Suite No. 3 in D—which was played with harpsichord and close regard for stylistic conventions like over-dotting, but with still too much string vibrato and a generally bloated sort of sound where a slender, clean one is wanted.

Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra" was next. With this work, I have always had difficulties. Not musical ones, however. The problems arise in trying to figure out what the music has to do with the Nietzsche poem. There are, of course, references—the titles of the musical sections are derived from the poem; there are programmatic elements in the music like the sunrise, the bells, the learned fugato, the dance—but all these still seem superficial correspondences. The music, for the most part, seems quite an independent entity.

In any event, Thomas and the orchestra performed it in a spacious, thoughtful manner—somewhat understated in comparison with some of the great extroverted interpretations of certain other contemporary conductors. The pacing was on the deliberate side and much attention was given to detail. Only occasionally did this bog down the unfolding events—notably in the fugato which literally crawled along and in which the theme showed a distressing tendency to disappear into the surrounding textures.

If the Strauss was thoughtful and carefully molded, the Brahms Piano Concerto No. 2 with Malcolm Frager was, by contrast, casual and even a little slovenly. Most of the first chair players having retired after the Strauss, the solo work proved less polished than usual (with some pitch problems from the cello and horn players particularly). The main trouble, though, seemed to be that the playing lacked any poetry whatsoever. Frager, too, who was using possibly the ugliest instrument I have heard for a long time, has performed with much greater sensitivity than he did on this occasion.

• Concert Review

Week 10

p. 19

HERALD-AMERICAN (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 424,654
JAN 5 1974
New England Newsclip

Bruckner's Seventh At BSO Is Moving

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

Brahms, who seemed always ready with a vinegary remark about the music of his contemporaries, referred to the symphonies of Anton Bruckner — his curious "opponent" in the 19th century Viennese Wagner controversy — as "boa constrictors."

• Concert Review

Large they were, too, both in total length and in the enormous expansion of individual movements, but, for the most part, not suffocating or overpowering. In particular, the Seventh, which was performed yesterday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and William Steinberg, is neither of those, but deeply moving, complex but penetrable, grandly simple and unpretentious. A work which reveals, without any disguises, the gentle character of the intensely feeling Austrian.

Steinberg, who took into account the size of this giant work (1 hour and 15 minutes) when he scheduled the concert, decided to program it by itself. No introductory Bach or Mozart as half- baked warm-ups and no intermission. Thus, it was an exceptionally short concert — which came as a great surprise to many in the audience.

It was, without question, the right decision, however. The Seventh requires much concentration from the listener and much effort from the musicians. Anything that could precede or follow it would seem excesive.

Besides, after Steinberg's performance of it, I wouldn't have wanted to hear another thing — so lovely was the playing.

One hour and 15 minutes, notwithstanding, Steinberg set a broad and spacious pace— in places, too leisurely for this listener — creating a serene and luminous mood. And he reinforced this by refusing to blow the roof off Symphony Hall in some of those brass climaxes. At times, this restraint seemed a little frustrating and one wished the crescendi were performed with more ardor.

Also, one might have desired somewhat more refined ensemble — Steinberg's minimal gestures may not always speak emphatically enough to the musicians.

Yet, one forgot all that at moments such as the wonderfully transparent close of the great Adagio or the beautifully scaled crescendo that leads up to the famous "fff" and cymbal clash in the same movement. It was a calm, carefully judged and, occasionally even delicate, performance which is rare in a time when self-serving bombast is more often the rule. Maybe that's why it took the audience so long to applaud when it was over. Or why the applaus was so cool.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 24,500
JAN 10 1974
New England Newsclip

BSO Concert Offered Brucknerite Feast

There were many reasons why last weekend's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra offered a remarkable satisfying musical experience. To begin with, the program provided a feast for Brucknerites since it contained only a single work, the Seventh Symphony in E, and it was played with elegance and distinction to celebrate the return visit of the Orchestra's former music director, William Steinberg, to Symphony Hall.

Bruckner, like Wagner and Mahler, has a special attraction for Steinberg and he conducts this rich post-romantic music in a modest unassuming way that underlines its virtues and minimizes its weaknesses. He lets the music move along at a steady pace, building its climaxes naturally and resisting temptations to force matters so that there is always a sense of proper proportion and never a feeling of sturm und drang.

The Seventh Symphony was Bruckner's first triumph after a series of heartbreaks suffered at the hands of hostile critics. Even that arch-enemy of the Bruckner - Wagner school, Dr. Edward Hanslick — the prototype for Wagner's Beckmesser — had to concede that the composer was called to the stage several times after each movement at the first Vienna performance in 1886. For the Seventh is a lofty, inspired work filled with the religious devotion of the simple Austrian peasant who comppsed it. And it is hard for even confirmed anti-Brucknerites to resist its majesty.

As performed last weekend, the Seventh shone in all its fervor and splendor. Mr. Steinberg was wise to let it stand alone as other conductors have done with the Beethoven Ninth or the Mahler Eighth. The symphony needs nothing to measure against and nothing else should be measured against it. This is musical architecture at its finest put on display in the best possible light.

The performance was all the more impressive because it was evident that the conductor has been ailing. His walk from the wings to the podium was halting and he sat through most of the third and fourth movements, giving an unobtrusive but commanding beat and clean cues to the musicians. His demeanor was an object lesson for conductors who believe that only wild gesticulation and elaborate choreography will elicit dramatic playing from an orchestra.

Steinberg put them to shame be getting his forces to play superbly with a minimum of physical effort. The brass — The Wagnerian tubas, in particular — were incomparable. More power to him!

Since Bruckner is rarely taken indifferently — one is either a rabid Brucknerite or a violent anti-Brucknerite — it was a great occasion for devotees of the Austrian's towering symphonies. Steinberg made it almost impossible to remain in the anti-camp.

H.

TIMES (E)
BEVERLY, MASS.
D. 9,514
DEC 19 1973
New England Newsclip

Steinberg to conduct BSO

BOSTON—In an open rehearsal on Thursday evening, January 3 at 7:30 p.m, former music director of the Boston Symphony William Steinberg rehearses Bruckner's Symphony no. 7 in E. Then on Friday, January 4 at 2:00 p.m., Saturday, January 5 at 8:30 p.m. and again on Tuesday, January 8 at 8:30 p.m., Mr. Steinberg performs the Bruckner Symphony no. 7 in E in subscription series concerts.

William Steinberg, music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony, who retired from the post of music director of the Boston Symphony at the end of the 71-72 season, was born in Cologne. Graduating from the conservatory of his native city in 1920, he became assistant to Otto Klemperer at the Cologne Opera. Soon afterwards he was appointed one of the company's principal conductors. He was engaged as first conductor of the German Theatre at Prague in 1925, becoming opera director two years later. In 1929 he was invited to Frankfurt as music director of the opera and of the famous museum-concerts. During this period he was a regular guest conductor of the Berlin State Opera.

The Nazis dismissed Mr. Steinberg from his posts in 1933, and he then founded the Jewish Culture League in Frankfurt, and under its auspices conducted concerts and opera for Jewish audiences. Mr. Steinberg came to the United States in 1938 to assist in the formation and training of the NBC Symphony Orchestra.

During his time as associate conductor of the NBC Symphony Mr. Steinberg appeared as a guest conductor from coast to coast both with the major symphony orchestras and with the San Francisco Opera. He became music director of the Buffalo Philharmonic in 1945, and seven years later was engaged as music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony, with whom he now has a lifetime contract.

Under Mr. Steinberg's leadership the Boston Symphony continued its steady progress as one of the fore most musical orginazations of the world. He led concerts not only in the United States, but also in the musical centers of England, Germany, Austria, Italy, Spain and France.

GLOBE (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042
JAN 5 1974
New England Newsclip

THE ARTS

Splendid Bruckner 7th by Steinberg and BSO

MICHAEL STEINBERG

There is a story that Handel, describing what it was like to compose the "Hallelujah" chorus in "Messiah," said, "I thought I saw the Heavens open and the great God Himself." The other composer the story always brings to mind is Bruckner, who has moments, particularly in the last three symphonies, whose radiant openness of sound and feeling partake of that kind of untroubled faith and exaltation.

It is a wonderful adventure in simplicity, really, Bruckner's way of composing music, that unsophisticated but almost always very sure laying end to end of great blocks, and the generous sense of euphony that is so unselfconscious but so original at the same time. The simplicity was clearly revealed in William Steinberg's beautiful performance of the 7th Symphony at yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert.

Steinberg's way with Bruckner is musical rather than mystical (Jochum most convincingly presents the opposite view). Neither the hush nor the blaze is extreme, and there is no possibility ever of confusion with Mahler or any other passionately to-be-leaned-into music, certainly not Wagner, to whom this is a kind of elegiac love letter. This was all out of Haydn and Schubert, inevitably some Beethoven as well, and Steinberg played it very directly, economically, and with a most sure sense of destination.

Walking on and off the stage, he looked frail, and he conducted the scherzo and the finale up to the beginning of the coda sitting down. But the gestures and signals this time were ample and vigorous, and the orchestra responded with defined, nobly sonorous playing. They also applauded the conductor warmly at the end, as did the audience.

The Bruckner was the only work on the program, and that was good. Not that the 7th is extremely long, but even so the difference of coming to it completely fresh was remarkable. The more important point, though, is that the Beethoven 9th and the great Bruckner and Mahler symphonies want to stand by themselves, for that makes their performances feel more like a celebration or even a rite and not as part of an entertainment. That is in their spirit: like it or not, they do absolutely resist the claptrap about making concerts casual and friendly, and the Bruckner 7th, particularly in a performance of such selflessness, concentration, intelligence, and command, makes a musical declaration that justifies its hugely ambitious stance.

The program is repeated tonight and Tuesday, both at 8:30. Next week, William Steinberg conducts the Boston Symphony in a Wagner program of unusual interest, one including such rarities as the Prelude to Act II of "Tannhaeuser" in its original, long form, the Prelude to Act I of "Tristan" with Wagner's own concert ending, and the "Mighty Fortress"-quoting "Kaisermarsch" written to celebrate the founding of the German Empire in the wake of the Franco-Prussian war (a distasteful event, perhaps, but an interesting march).

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 187,897
DEC 20 1973
New England Newsclip

Christmas, New Year's concerts in Boston

Boston's music is plentiful in churches during the weeks of Christmas and New Year's, but there is something of a quietus in the city's concert halls. Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops, with the assistance of the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, help to fill the gap with a Symphony Hall "Pops Christmas Party" tomorrow (Friday, Dec. 21) at 7:30 p.m. and Saturday at 3 and 7:30 p.m. featuring traditional holiday music and a sing-along.

Except for Tuesday evenings, Dec. 25 and Jan. 1, when the Gardner Museum is closed, its free concerts will continue on Sunday and Thursday afternoons at 4: Fiori Musicali (Dec. 23); artists to be announced (Dec. 27), and UMASS Madrigal Singers (Dec. 30). Recitals to be given on Jan. 3 and 6 will be available by calling 734-1359 after Dec. 31.

The Boston Symphony resumes its schedule with an open rehearsal, under William Steinberg's direction, on Thursday, Jan. 3, at Symphony Hall of the program (Bruckner's Symphony No. 7 in E) to be performed Friday, Jan. 4, at 2 p.m. and Saturday and Tuesday, Jan. 5, and 8, at 8:30 p.m.

On the evening of Jan. 6 (at 8 p.m.), Boston Philharmonia, under James Paul as guest conductor, plays Handel, Bach, and Beethoven at the National Theater, Boston Center for the Arts.

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
W. 6,013

JAN 2 1974

New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Orchestra offers several concerts

BOSTON — In an open rehearsal on Thursday evening, January 3 at 7:30 p.m., former Music Director of the Boston Symphony William Steinberg rehearses Bruckner's Symphony no. 7 in E. Then on Friday, January 4 at 2:00 p.m., Saturday, January 5 at 8:30 p.m. and again on Tuesday, January 8 at 8:30 p.m., Mr. Steinberg performs the Bruckner Symphony no. 7 in E in subscription series concerts.

William Steinberg, music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony, who retired from the post of music director of the Boston Symphony at the end of the 71-72 season, was born in Cologne. Graduating from the Conservatory of his native city in 1920, he became assistant to Otto Klemperer at the Cologne Opera. Soon afterwards he was appointed one of the company's principal conductors. He was engaged as first conductor of the German Theatre at Prague in 1925, becoming Opera director two years later. In 1929 he was invited to Frankfurt as music director of the opera and of the famous museum-concerts. During this period he was a regular guest conductor of the Berlin State Opera.

The Nazis dismissed Mr. Steinberg from his posts in 1933, and he then founded the Jewish Culture League in Frankfurt, and under its auspices conducted concerts and opera for Jewish audiences. Mr. Steinberg came to the United States in 1938 to assist in the formation and training of the NBC Sumphony Orchestra. During his time as Associate Conductor of the NBC Symphony Mr. Steinberg appeared as a guest conductor from coast to coast both with the major symphony orchestras and with the San Francisco Opera. He became music director of the Buffalo Philharmonic in 1945, and seven years later was engaged as music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony, with whom he now has a lifetime contract.

Under Mr. Steinberg's leadership the Boston Symphony continued its steady progress as one of the foremost musical organizations of the world. He led concerts not only in the United States, but also in the musical centers of England, Germany, Austria, Italy, Spain and France. Mr. Steinberg records for Deutsche Grammophon and RCA.

On Thursday, January 17 at 8:30 p.m., Friday, January 18 at 2 p.m., and on Saturday, January 19 at 8:30 p.m., Principal Guest Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the orchestra in works of Piston, Chausson, Paganini and Tchaikovsky. Violinist Henryk Szeryng is soloist.

Mr. Thomas opens the concerts with Piston's Toccata, followed by Chausson's Poeme for violin and orchestra. The Paganini Violin concerto no. 3 in E follows, and the concerts close with Tchaikovsky's Suite no. 3 in G.

Appointed assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the beginning of the 1969-70 season, Mr. Thomas replaced William Steinberg at concerts in New York during the fall when Mr. Steinberg became ill. Mr. Thomas conducted more than thirty of the Boston Symphony's concerts during that season, and was appointed associate conductor of the orchestra in the spring of 1970. Mr. Thomas has conducted all over the world and at this point is principal guest conductor of the Boston Symphony, music director of the Buffalo Philharmonic and music director of the Young People's Concerts in New York.

Henryk Szeryng, born in Warsaw, was taught the violin from his childhood, and in 1928 was sent to study with Carl Flesch in Berlin. In 1933 he gave his first public performances in Berlin, Warsaw, Bucharest, Vienna and Paris, where he eventually studied harmony and counterpoint with Nadia Boulanger.

Through the Second World War he devoted himself to playing for the allied armed forces, touring in various countries of Europe and in South America. Szeryng also served as a translator for the Polish Government in Great Britain during World War II and accompanied the Polish Premier to Latin America in search of a home for displaced refugees. Impressed by the generosity and hospitality of the Mexicans in receiving these people, Szeryng later returned to Mexico to teach and in 1946 became a Mexican citizen.

Mr. Szeryng is fluent in seven languages. Today, when his itinerary takes him to another country he travels with a diplomatic passport as Mexico's official ambassador of culture. In addition to his convert appearances, Mr. Szeryng conducts a master class at the Mexican National University.

His recordings have been awarded the French Grand Prix du Disque six times. Mr. Szeryng's most recent performance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra was in February of 1963 when he gave the first Boston performance of the Lees Violin Concerto.

TIMES (E)
BEVERLY, MASS.
D. 9.514

DEC 27 1973

New England Newsclip

Steinberg will conduct Wagner program in Boston

BOSTON—Former Music Director William Steinberg conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in an All-Wagner program in an Open Rehearsal at 7:30 p.m. on Thursday, January 10 and in concert on Friday, January 11 at 2: 00 p.m., Saturday, January 12 at 8:30 p.m. and again on Tuesday, January 15 at 8:30 p.m.

Mr. Steinberg opens his program with the Overture to "Der Fliegende Hollander," followed by the Prelude to Act III "Tannhauser." The Venusberg music from "Tannhauser" is next performed, followed by the Prelude to "Lohengrin." The remaining three works on the program are the Eine Faust Overture, the Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" and the Kaisermarsch.

William Steinberg, Music Director of the Pittsburgh Symphony, who retired from the post of Music Director of the Boston Symphony at the end of the 1971-1972 season, was born in Cologne. Graduating from the Conservatory of his native city in 1920, he became assistant to Otto Klemperer at the Cologne Opera. Soon afterwards he was appointed one of the company's principal conductors. He was engaged as first conductor of the German Theatre at Prague in 1925, becoming Opera director two years later. In 1929 he was invited to Frankfurt as music director of the Opera and of the famous Museum-concerts. During this period he was a regular guest conductor of the Berlin State Opera.

The Nazis dissmissed Mr. Steinberg from his posts in 1933, and he then founded the Jewish Culture League in Frankfurt, and under its auspices conducted concerts and opera for Jewish audiences. Mr. Steinberg came to the United States in 1938 to assist in the formation and training of the NBC Symphony Orchestra. During his time as Associate Conductor of the NBC Symphony Mr. Steinberg appeard as a guest conductor from coast to coast both with the major symphony orchestras and with the San Francisco Opera. He became music director of the Buffalo Philharmonic in 1945, and seven years later was engaged as Music Director of the Pittsburgh Symphony, with whom he now has a lifetime contract.

Under Mr. Steinberg's leadership the Boston Symphony continued its steady progress as one of the foremost musical organizations of the world. He led concerts not only in the United States, but also in the musical centers of England, Germany, Austria, Italy, Spain and France. Mr. Steinberg records for Deutsche Grammophon and RCA.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 187,897

JAN 7 1974

New England Newsclip

Nonstop Bruckner

William Steinberg, beginning a two-week stay with the Boston Symphony, opened the orchestra's new year auspiciously over the weekend at Symphony Hall. He chose to perform Bruckner's Symphony No. 7 in E, not exactly a crowd-rouser, as the only number on the program — no intermission to chat in — so everyone, including the unwary, found themselves captives of the reticent yet declarative, hesitant yet persistent organist-professor-composer who spent a lifetime before achieving the hints of recognition that, only now, are reaching worldwide fulfillment.

Bruckner's Seventh Symphony, through a series of performances in 1884-85 outside Vienna, his adopted but unresponsive home, finally secured for him, at age 62, the local response he had waited for so patiently, despite an ingroup cabal against anyone known to be an admirer of Richard Wagner — Bruckner's idol. Doesn't it sound familiar, albeit in other contexts, and slightly silly today?

Steinberg's way with Bruckner has been demonstrated here before, but perhaps the circumstances have never been so right as in the weekend performances (to be repeated tomorrow evening at 8:30). In programming the Seventh alone, the conductor focused attention on a work and a performance that demand wholehearted concentration, not so much on account of its great length or the intricacies of its scoring, but for the nonstop flow of musical ideas which join and interweave with the greatest compositional ingenuity. The chase they lead the ear, if not merry, is devious and challenging.

Fortunately, from the vivid, open-structured Steinberg reading, what one takes away is a curiosity for further investigation. The persistent clarity, the balanced flow of string sound, and containment of the all-important brass sonority comprised a studied entity that is, in essence, the inevitable approach to Bruckner, whose music, after all, is not readily open to many "interpretations" in the self-indulgent sense.

The performance represented a tremendous show of virtuosity on the part of the orchestra's former music director, and it was aided and abetted by some of the most inspired playing the BSO has produced thus far in its 1973-74 season.

L. Sn.

p. 21

PATRIOT LEDGER (E)
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 71,020
JAN 10 1974
New England Newsclip

Week 10

In Concert

One 7th Is Enough

By Peter M. Knapp
Patriot Ledger Staff

One long work sufficed for Tuesday night's program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of former music director William Steinberg — Anton Bruckner's Symphony No. 7 in E. And while others have included, say, a short symphony or similar work on the same program with the Seventh, this hour and a quarter grand musical statement is quite enough for one evening.

It remains Bruckner's most often-played symphony of the nine he composed (or 11 if you want to add in the first two early works the composer did not regard as "mature") — the symphony that was his break-through in 1884 into public recognition as a composer of stature.

Even so, at that time of lingering Brahms vs. Wagner controversy, there were holdouts, the pro-Brahms Viennese critic Hanslick sniffing, "As every greater work of Bruckner has inspired spots, interesting and even beautiful places — between these flashes are stretches of impenetrable darkness, leaden boredom and feverish agitation." Even today, where Bruckner has achieved a niche of respectability, if not affection, a performance of a Bruckner symphony can evoke much the same audience response.

This is least likely to happen with the Bruckner Seventh, however, with its sense of circumstance, melodic richness and audience familiarity — even the long and difficult become accessible in the comfort-blanket of relatively frequent hearings. Unlike poor Hanslick and the other partisans, we have the luxury of being able to safely accept Brahms and Wagner and Bruckner.

Unquestionably, Bruckner clicked in the Seventh, which has that noble glow of importance without undue pomposity from the opening majesterial theme. The scherzo is immediately appealing with its powerful rhythms and originality. The brass choirs are unfailingly impressive. But what lifts this symphony onto a special spiritual level is the sublime adagio, Bruckner's moving homage to Wagner with its breath-taking climax — "that indescribably beautiful C Major passage, where the gates of Eternity burst open with a triumphant cymbal clash and the hero is welcomed into Valhalla," as one commentator put it.

Tuesday night's performance reflected the serious, painstaking and honest devotion of a musician whose career has been devoted to these qualities. William Steinberg does not look well and seems to have aged a good deal in the past year or so, and he conducted, with spare gestures even for him, sitting down for the last three movements. And yet this was authoritative direction, from memory; the long movements patiently developed with a view of how the components meshed into the whole, the pacing firmly controlled and over-all superbly organized.

It was not a flawless performance — the violins were screechy at times and the brass intonation went occasionally awry — and I have heard more potent, tension-laden performances of the Seventh. But it was spacious, direct and eloquent — free of Dr. Hanslick's "impenetrable darkness, leaden boredom and feverish agitation."

SUN-CHRONICLE (E)
ATTLEBORO, MASS.
D. 12,000
JAN 16 1974
New England Newsclip

Week 11

Wagner Soars, Thanks to BSO

By LOUIS SNYDER
Monitor News Service

BOSTON — "Wagner Schmagner," was the retort of an outspoken American soprano to an interviewer's query as to why she sang concert excerpts from Wagnerian operas but never a complete role onstage. In other words, for her a little Wagner at a time was plenty.

This was hardly the feeling, one may be sure, that prompted William Steinberg to program an all-Wagner potpourri with the Boston Symphony over the weekend at Symphony Hall (to be repeated tonight at 8:30). After all, not only is Steinberg going to conduct "Parsifal" complete at the Metropolitan Opera in April, but earlier in his career in Europe as well as in the United States, his reputation as a Wagnerian opera conductor was widely recognized.

Although the availability these days on recordings of "Wagner's Greatest HIts" has largely relegated this type of hors d'oeuvre programming to the sidelines in live performance, it certainly wasn't frowned upon in the golden days of such maestro-virtuosos as Koussevitzky, Toscanini, and Stokowski, to name a few.

And in Steinberg's experienced hands, the seven disparate orchestral selections became a wordless lecture in Wagnerian style of a strongminded, mellow interpreter, very much on his own terms. Out of their context in full performances of the operas one is perhaps more aware of a conductor's special approach to the "Flying Dutchman" Overture, and Preludes from "Tannhauser" (Act 3, original version), "Lohengrin," and "Tristan and Isolde" (with the composer's concert ending). In Steinberg's case it was thoughtfully measured, not subject to abrupt or startling contrasts — a continuing flow of visceral sound, free of the awesome heaviness that some directors feel Wagner demands.

On Friday afternoon, the musicians were at their most sonorous and congenial. As good as many of them are, how many opera orchestras can make Wagner soar the way the BSO does? The composer's felicitous instrumental treatment was lovingly complemented by all choirs, particularly in the "Lohengrin" and "Tristan" preludes, and solo passages were elegantly accomplished all around.

In addition to the operatic overture and preludes and the "Venusberg" music from "Tannhauser," there were two nonstage works — "A Faust Overture," relic of a never-realized "Faust" Symphony, and the "Kaisermarsch," a curious burst of patriotic bombast, played in Boston in 1871 the year of its first performance in Leipzig, and apparently only once since, in 1914. Both of them were treated with the same meticulous care by conductor and orchestra, but only the "Faust" fragment really deserved it. The march proved to be strictly "Wagner-Schmagner." However, the audience warmed to them all like old friends.

SUN
LOWELL, MASS.
S. 64,500
DEC 30 1973
New England Newsclip

Don't miss all-Wagner program with Steinberg

By ALFRED W. BURKE
Sun Music Critic

LOWELL — Usually if you want to attend an all-Wagner program you simply have to go to the Metropolitan Opera House. Regarding orchestral concerts one seldom, if ever, is treated to a list by the giant of the German school of operatic music.

However, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is going to offer you concert goers an opportunity to enjoy such a musical treat, not once, but four times. Note the dates: Thursday evening, Jan. 10; Friday (matinee), Saturday (evening) Jan. 11-12, and Tuesday evening, Jan. 15.

WILLIAM STEINBERG

What is actually happening is that the former music director of the BSO, William Steinberg, is going to be in Boston as guest conductor and he has chosen an all-Wagner list for the occasion. The conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony is quite talented along the line of Wagnerian opera, having done much of it in German opera houses.

BOSTON-PHOENIX
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 100,000
JAN 22 1974
New England Newsclip

Ear Trumpet: Carrier Waves, etc.

By Richard Buell

Good Works Department. We begin with a few stiff, guilt-producing questions for regular readers of this department. What local radio station has the pluck to program a performance of Karlheinz Stockhausen's "Stimmung" in the middle of the afternoon, or indeed, at any time? Or has devoted an entire program to a discographical retrospective on the career of Albert Coates, (1882-1953) a Russian-English conductor of undeservedly meagre renown? And plays such oddments as the orchestral Portraits of Virgil Thomson? Where do you get such generous helpings of jazz, live jazz, even? And who won an Armstrong Award for a program called "Kids' Talk," which was recently written up in Newsweek?

Enough of this interrogation. The answer, of course, is WBUR, at 90.9 mHz, This reviewer relies heavily on WBUR for keeping abreast of interesting new records, no-longer-available old ones and much, much else. The point of this is that WBUR is a high-class shoestring operation with a budget one-third that of WGBH-FM, mind you, and that they're now passing the hat. WBUR gets along with the help of its friends, who are 1) Boston University; 2) the Corporation for Public Broadcasting; and 3) its hypercritical, stingy listeners. Most universities aren't as rich as they used to be (professors getting the axe and so forth), and money from the Feds is a sometime thing. So that leaves you and me. Be your own Prince Esterhazy and feel what it's like to be a patron of the good stuff. The standard sponsorship is $20; for students and retired people, $12. The address is 630 Commonwealth Avenue, Boston 02215, and the telephone is 353-2790. The next time you feloniously tape something from a WBUR broadcast, readers, look into your hearts and think the words "culture," "fun," "serendipity," and "money." All right, Ear Trumpet has spoken, and there will be no further haranguing in this column.

I have had occasion lately to wonder if compilers of musical reference books, if they are not a wee bit loopy to begin with, tend to glide off into the land of rampant whimsey. There is, I think, an impulse to communicate something other than mere fact in the following extracts from "A New Dictionary of Music" by Arthur Jacobs (Penguin paperback):

"morendo (IT.), dying — direction aimed not at the performer but at the music, which is to lose force and (if necessary) speed." And:

"Mossolov, Alexander Vassilievich (b. 1900), Russian composer (also pianist), pupil of Gliere. Won wide notice with orchestral piece 'Iron Foundry' (also known, unmetallurgically, as 'Steel Foundry'), 1928, incorporating a metal sheet, shaken. Expelled from Union of Soviet Composers for drunkenness, 1936; rehabilitated, and composed a harp concerto, 1939."

What must the contributors to the next edition of Grove's be going through? And, by the way, can someone tell me which twentieth-century European composer of the avant-garde stripe was attacked and killed by a lion?

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's programming lately has been blessedly free of that jadedness and excessive caution that can make institutionalized concert-going anytime, any place, about as uplifting as the forcible ingestion of a pound of Hostess Twinkies. Indeed, on the 11th, Music Director Emeritus William Steinberg was able to achieve the effect, not just the illusion, of novelty, with something so seemingly retrograde and 1930-ish as an all-Wagner concert.

How? To begin with, Mr. Steinberg conducted the music Wagner wrote, not the standard somebody-or-other's carpentered versions for concert use that you will hear from Gene Ormandy and his fabulous Philadelphians, for instance. It was thus a revelation and a delight to hear the structurally self-contained "Tristan" Prelude with Wagner's concert ending, which is endearingly spare and affecting. The "Tannhaeuser" Act III Prelude, in its original version, was news to me. An ample and well-upholstered piece, it seemed just the sort of thing that encourages this orchestra to send forth its plushiest sonorities. The "Faust" Overture hadn't been heard here for 20 years, the "Kaisermarsch" for 60 years. The former, an early, Weber-ish, "un-Wagnerian" affair, was pleasant; the latter was a rather unsettling bit of imperialist rum-tum, loud, manipulative (quoting "Ein feste Burg"), and almost convincing. It may be of some nostalgic interest to recall that Karl Muck, the BSO conductor who last programmed the "Kaisermarsch," was imprisoned as an enemy alien in 1918-1919, first at the East Cambridge Jail, later at Fort Oglethorpe, Georgia, where he was Prisoner No. 1337. He was thereafter deported. There are probably BSO subscribers who can recall that unpleasantness.

Wagner, genius, anti-Semite, and all-round bastard that he was, cannot not call up extra-musical associations, which may be why the ancient program notes by the late John N. Burk and the late Philip Hale were of such interest. All was discretion. As for this concert, it was gratifying to see the humane and venerable Mr. Steinberg in his element, conducting so knowingly; also to hear the respectful and vigorous playing that the BSO gave him.

It is Michael Tilson Thomas's turn again with this orchestra, and, need we say, that means surprises. Henryk Szeryng will be the violinist in the lovely Chausson "Poeme," which this orchestra has not done, surprisingly, since the Boston debut (mid-50's) of David Oistrakh or "King David," as Mr. Szeryng calls him). There will be relatively unfamiliar Piston, Paganini, and Tchaikovsky. The following week some very unfamiliar Steve Reich, Morton Feldman, Oliver Knussen, and Pierre Boulez. That's to be on the 25th and 26th. Mr. Thomas's concerts never, never engender indifference.

p.22

Week 11

GLOBE (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042

JAN 12 1974

New England Newsclip

Symphony-goers see a master

BSO

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

It was apropos the "Kaisermarsch" with which William Steinberg finished his splendid Wagner concert with the Boston Symphony yesterday afternoon that the composer said how much he disliked to write short pieces. He liked to develop material, he explained, and once the development process started, the music tended to proliferate hugely.

Most of his best music occurs within enormous frameworks, which makes for familiar, much-discussed, and perpetually perplexing problems when it comes to the presentation of Wagner's music in concert. The excerpts from his operas, with their non-beginnings or non-endings or both, really are awful. "Bleeding chunks," Tovey called them, and indeed the best discussion of the whole problem — unhysterical, succinct, informed, and witty—is Tovey's in an essay called "Wagner in the concert-room" in Vol. 6 of his "Essays in Musical Analysis" (Oxford paperback).

In that essay, Tovey lists what he claims (with slight exaggeration) to be the only Wagner program you can legitimately do at a concert without singers. It includes the "Flying Dutchman" Overture, the Prelude to Act III of "Tannhaeuser" in the original, long verison, the Venusberg music from "Tannhaeuser," the Prelude to "Lohengrin," "Faust" Overture, the "Seigfried Idyll," the "Tristan" Prelude with Wagner's concert ending, and the "Kaisermarsch." Omitting the Idyll, that is the program Steinberg chose.

It offered several sorts of pleasure. Not least, everything had a proper beginning and ending. Then, it brought out a lot of fresh music. Wagner rightly scrapped the first version of the "Tannhaeuser" Act III Prelude because for dramatic purposes it anticipates too much of the Rome Narrative, including the Pope's pronouncement of anthema; on the other hand, it is just that expansiveness that makes it so grand and noble a concert piece (that penchant for development again).

Wagner wrote the "Kaisermarsch" in 1871 to flatter Wilhelm I of Prussia, newly created German Emperor. It comes with a horrible text which Wagner hoped the audience would sing, but whose beginning, "Heil! Heil dem Kaiser! Koenig Wilhelm!", he adapted for one of his family Christmas celebrations to read "Heil! Heil der Mutter! Unserer Mama!" That aside, it is, in spite of Wagner's misgivings, a handsomely made piece, a bit Meistersingerish in tone, quoting "A Mighty Fortress" (God having obviously been on the Prussian side in the late war against France), and unabashedly sumptuous in sonority.

For that matter, Wagner's magical concert close to the "Tristan" Prelude is at least a semi-rarity, as is the superb "Faust" Overture. Steinberg's performances were those of a master, nothing less.

HERALD-AMERICAN (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 424,654

JAN 12 1974

New England Newsclip

BSO Rewards Brave Patrons With Warm All-Wagner Concert

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

Unlike a St. Louis hockey team which recently opened up its refreshment stand and bar to a small crowd of loyal fans which had braved a blizzard to attend a game, the Boston Symphony Orchestra did not offer free snacks to subscribeers who showed up for Friday's concert despite freezing rain and snow. However, it did offer William

• Concert Review

Steinberg conducting a warm and gorgeously-played all-Wagner concert. And that was more than worth all the sloshing and skidding around it took to get to Symphony Hall.

Much of the music was familiar concert excerpts from the operas but with a couple of filips thrown in — like the original version of the "Tannhaeuser" Act III Prelude, Wagner's own concert ending for the "Tristan" Prelude, and the rarely heard "Kaisermarsch."

In addition, there was the first movement from the planned but-never-completed Faust Symphony which has become known as the "Faust Overture," the Prelude to "Lohengrin" and the Overture to "Der fliegende Hollaender."

The Tannhaeuser Prelude, which Wagner discarded after having second thoughts about it — second thoughts that involved under-rating an audience's perception — and replaced with the present Prelude, is a very well-made piece describing Tannhaeuser's penitential trip to the Pope in expiation for a year of voluptuous pleasure on the Venusberg (and after listening to the extremely sensual Venusberg ballet music which followed the Prelude, I, for one, would wish to remain uncontrite on that mountain top). The original work opens with dark, solemn atmosphere and there are hymn-like choral sections alternating with orchestral recitative (which is what Wagner thought would puzzle his listeners). Actually it is generally very moving and with only a hint of penitential self-righteousness (Wagner, despite his intentions, always seems more convincing when depicting the passions than when he tries to be spiritual).

The concert ending for the "Tristan" Prelude proves to be nothing very surprising. It consists of some chromatic progressions with the ending of the "Liebestod" (and of the opera) tacked on.

The Kaisermarsch, which seems to have beeen recorded only once, and which hasn't been heard before in a live performance by at least three of Boston's critics in their considerable combined concert going, and which was last performed by the BSO in 1914, was the real rarity on the program. And it's surprising that the piiece hasn't become a staple on pops programs so brilliantly scored it is.

Composed in 1871, the march is a concert piece which Wagner had originally wanted to use as part of the triumphant (and chauvinistic) festivities after German victory in war. Consequently, it is a piece full of bells, cymbals and great pompous utterance appropriate to the occasion with sections of solemn lyricism and quotations from "Ein Feste Burg." It is fun.

Like last week's Bruckner concert, the performances were fine. Steinberg, who has a special affinity for Bruckner and Wagner conducted with obvious love and consideration, offering care and logic always and sometimes in place of tempestuousness. This reserve, as in last week's performance, may have proved disappointing to some, but the warmth and musicality overshadowed all that. The orchestra responded to its former music director with affection and, once again, ravishing playing.

Week 12

p.23

HERALD-AMERICAN (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D 424,654
JAN 1 9 1974
New England Newsclip

Grand Night at Symphony

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

• Concert Review

The first of the season's Boston Symphony romantic concerts Thursday night at Symphony Hall was about virtuosity — of both the solo and ensemble kind. Conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas, it featured music by Paganini, certainly the most dazzling of violinists and of writers for the violin; and by Tchaikovsky, arguable one of Paganini's counterparts in orchestral composition.

In addition, there were works by Walter Piston (Toccata) and Chausson ("Poeme") designed respectively to show off brilliant ensemble and solo playing.

PAGANINI'S Violin Concerto No. 3, played in this Boston premiere by Henryk Szeryng, is a recently "discovered" work. The program notes attribute its suppression to Paganini's jealous zeal in keeping his technical inventions secret; thus, he did not publish his manuscripts. Probably equally believable is that the violinist, well-known for his avarice, wanted too large a royalty (he was turned down by publishers on several occasions for such reasons).

To the twentieth century listener, the concerto is like a fast-talking traveling salesman with flashing smile and gold tooth prominently displayed. He tries to sell you a dubious bill of goods and you buy because the show is so dazzling.

IT'S A PIECE of brazen show-offery, Rossinian in tone, but uniquely Paganini in the bravura effects created for the soloist. There are high passages in double stops, extensive harmonics, staccato and pizzicato passages; all the devices which made Paganini's playing so stunning to his contemporary listeners.

For the orchestra, there isn't much to do — the composer's thorough study of orchestration is not employed here to the soloist's advantage.

It's a lot of fun (the BSO string players seemed to enjoy it particularyl), although definitely not for a steady diet. That Szeryng plays it at all is testimony to his technical skills — however.

I don't find him a very interesting player nor does he seem quite slick enough. His intonation, for example, is not always perfect and the tone occasionally gets glassy. But, I'm quibbling.

In the Chausson "Poeme," which requires more in the way of sentiment, Szeryng proved less satisfactory. He and Thomas chose tempi that were too slow and an approach that just didn't work as a musical totality.

Tchaikovsky's Suite No. 3, like the Piston Toccata, offers splendid opportunity for lustrous playing and great panache, particularly in the former's exuberant variation movement. Thomas and the orchestra provided just that.

ARTUR RUBINSTEIN, concert pianist, will give a Symphony Hall recital at 8:30 p. m. Jan. 25.

SUN (E)
HUDSON, MASS.
D. 3,050
JAN 1 0 1974
New England Newsclip

Thomas to conduct

On Thursday, Jan. 17 at 8:30 p.m., Friday, Jan. 18 at 2 p.m., on Saturday, Jan. 19 at 8:30 p.m., Principal Guest Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct the Orchestra in works of Piston, Chausson, Paganini and Tchaikovsky. Violinist Henryk Szeryng is soloist.

Mr. Thomas opens the concerts with Piston's Toccata, followed by Chausson's Poeme for violin and orchestra. The Paganini Violin concerto no. 3 in E follows, and the concerts close with Tchaikovsky's Suite no. 3 in G.

Appointed Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the beginning of the 1969 - 70 season, Mr. Thomas replaced William Steinberg at concerts in New York during the fall when Mr. Steinberg became ill. Mr. Thomas conducted more than 30 of the Boston Symphony's concerts during that season, and was appointed Associate Conductor of the Orchestra in the spring of 1970. Mr. Thomas has conducted all over the world and at this point is Principal Guest Conductor of the Boston Symphony, Music Director of the Buffalo Philharmonic and Music Director of the Young People's Concerts in New York.

Henryk Szeryng, born in Warsaw, was taught the violin from his childhood, and in 1928 was sent to study with Carl Flesch in Berlin. In 1933 he gave his first public performances in Berlin, Warsaw, Bucharest, Vienna and Paris, where he eventually studied harmony and counterpoint with Nadia Boulanger.

Through the Second World War he devoted himself to playing for the allied armed forces, touring in various countries of Europe and in South America. Szeryng also served as a translator for the Polish government in Great Britain during World War II and accompanied the Polish Premier to Latin America in search of a home for displaced refugees.

Impressed by the generosity and hospitality of the Mexicans in receiving these people, Szeryng later returned to Mexico to teach and in 1946 became a Mexican citizen.

In addition to his concert appearances, Mr. Szeryng conducts a master class at the Mexican National University. His recordings have been awarded the French Grand Prix du Disque six times. Mr. Szeryng's most recent performance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra was in February of 1963 when he gave the first Boston performance of the Lees Violin Concerto.

GLOBE (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042
JAN 1 9 1974
New England Newsclip

THE ARTS

BSO

Paganini to Piston with Tilson Thomas and the BSO

MICHAEL STEINBERG

Piston, Chausson, Paganini, and Tchaikovsky were on the program which Michael Tilson Thomas conducted with the Boston Symphony Thursday evening (with repetitions yesterday afternoon and tonight), but, perhaps suprisingly, the 20th-century work was the farthest from being the novelty. Piston's Toccata, composed 1948 for the first American tour of the Orchestre National de Paris under Charles Munch and played now in honor of the composer's 80th birthday tomorrow, had performances by the Czech Philharmonic in 1965 and the Philadelphia Orchestra in 1969. Chausson's "Poeme" and Tchaikovsky's Suite No. 3, on the other hand, have been absent rather longer, and Paganini's Violin Concerto No. 3 in E major was getting its first live hearing in Boston.

When Henryk Szeryng, who was the soloist here, rediscovered and reintroduced the Paganini 3d Concerto a couple of years ago, he gave it its first complete performances since the composer's lifetime. Its vicissitudes between 1833, its last certain performance by Paganini himself, and 1970 are too complicated to go into here, but it is good to have what is arguably Paganini's most interesting concerto restored.

Granted, Paganini had his limitations as a composer. He thought of pleasing melodies in a rather operatic vein and he was ingenious at finding ways of making them exceedingly difficult to play on the violin. The orchestra's share is not wildly interesting, but that has to do not only with the nature of the kind of display piece Paganini wanted to write, but also with his obsession about the guarding of his violinistic secrets: he used to pass out the orchestra parts just before the performance and collect them immediately afterwards, and it all had to be easy enough for all-but-sight-reading by orchestras in Coblenz and Strasbourg and Liverpool, none remotely in a class with the BSO of 1974. (He was quite aware, too, of the publicity value of such hocus-pocus.)

Still, in the 3d Concerto, the tunes are attractive, both when dashing and when tender, and their violinistic exploitation is dazzling. Then, with Szeryng to play it, you see what it is all about. Szeryng, unlike Paganini, does not look like a man possibly in league with the devil: he merely plays that way. Leopold Auer, the teacher of Everybody (Heifetz, Elman, Zimbalist, et al.), used to say that when he had passages in octaves he purposely played them just a little out of tune, otherwise people wouldn't know they were octaves: Szeryng plays his octaves in tune, uncannily so, and to the point where you can hardly tell they are octaves, so that this was the first time the Auer story really was brought home to me.

That is not all he can do. In technique, taste, and breadth of musical interest, he is perhaps the most accomplished in an all-round way of today's big-name players. His performance of the Paganini was from every point of view enchanting, in its brio and grace as much as in its absolutely dazzling instrumental command. The performance of Chausson's lovely "Poeme" disappointed, though. With his cleanly beautiful tone, discreet vibrato, and elegant style, Szeryng ought to be its ideal interpreter. Perhaps on other days he is, but this Thursday the performance was oddly discontinuous and tensionless, Thomas's conducting, which was admirably alert in the Paganini, being extremely vague and unsupportive.

A few details of woodwind intonation and some rather loud "pianissimi" aside, I can hardly imagine a better performance of the Tchaikovsky 3d Suite than the one with which Thomas and the BSO ended the concert. It is wonderful music in Tchaikovsky's most balletic manner, fascinatingly inventive in melody and scoring, piquant, full of character, wistful at first, brilliantly festive at the end. Thomas knew just how to play it and when to play with it, knew how to hold vigor and elegance and humor in perfect balance, and the orchestral response was for the most part handsomely virtuosic.

Piston's bright showpiece got a good performance which I found just a touch heavy, but it was a nice occasion for the audience to stand and cheer the much-loved composer.

M. TILSON THOMAS
. . . admirably alert

p-21

Week 12

PATRIOT LEDGER (E)
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 71,020

JAN 24 1974

New England Newsclip

In Concert

Can the Performer Meet the Teacher's Demands?

By David Noble
Patriot Ledger Correspondent

Henryk Szeryng's double-barrelled weekend in Boston — he gave a master class for student violinists at the New England Conservatory and played a program with the Boston Symphony — gave a unique opportunity to see if a teacher-performer of the highest caliber really lives up to the demands he makes on students in a teaching situation.

The violinist, born in Poland and now a citizen of Mexico, was not bashful of giving advice in Brown Hall Friday night. His self-confidence sometimes brought him to the edge of dogmatism as he diagnosed students' problems and showed them alternative ways of playing music they had learned.

Henryk Szeryng: sometimes a work must be heightened, sometimes not

Outlet

Szeryng's dogmatism found outlet through sensible statements, for the most part. The first student he heard, a girl who played the first movement of the Sibelius Violin-Concerto (with piano accompaniment), moved him to insist that the piece requires conscious projection, perhaps heightening of its dramatic contrasts — a safe enough judgment, particularly in the case of her performance.

A Bach fugue for unaccompanied violin, played by a graduate student, became the occasion for remarks on structural rhythm, and why a performer ought to sound as it he knew about it — once again, good advice.

A partial performance of Bartok's Sonata for Unaccompanied Violin took some of the wind out of Szeryng's sails in the nicest way — graduate student Cyrus Stevens played it so well, in a firm, trenchant way, that Szeryng had no major complaints.

But a remarkable performance of a Nocturne and Tarantella composed by modern Pole, Karol Szymanowski, a performance that was technically the most polished of the evening, brought Szeryng back to the attack.

Too polished, he (in effect) told Joe Scheer, who is a freshman at the conservatory.

What Szeryng meant by that was made shatteringly clear when he took Scheer's violin and played the Tarentella through. What had rippled harmlessly in Scheer's interpretation now drove and slashed quite excitingly. Also remarkable was the difference Szeryng's playing made to the piano accompanist, Myron Romanul, who played cleanly but unaggressively when accompanying Scheer but began to make arresting music when egged on by Szeryng's playing.

For this listener Szeryng missed the mark when he brought the same approach to Bartok's First Violin Rhapsody, a work superficially similar to the Szymanowski. As played by violinist Richard Balkin and pianist Arlene Pepe, this work took on a magical, contrapuntal dimension it almost always lacks in performance — some of Bartok's best ideas went into it, as well as some of his most obvious, the performers made plain.

Szeryng, however, took them to task precisely for the performing reserve which enabled them to find the deeper dimensions. When Szeryng played part of the work on Balkin's violin, his bravura distortions forced the pianist to cheapen her interpretation in order to stay in step with him, and the result was rather ordinary, for all of Szeryng's virtuosity. There were weaknesses in the Balkin-Pepe performance, but Szeryng didn't have time to pin them down.

When the master violinist played with Michael Tilson Thomas and the BSO in the orchestra's weekend concerts the larger questions of style and meaning in the music continued to be crucial; it seemed to me that Szeryng won one and lost one in his BSO concerts.

Paganini's Violin Concerto No. 3, written around 1830 and withheld from the world until recently for reasons best known to the composer's heirs, was Szeryng's triumph. Written as a self-showcase by the greatest violin talent in history, the work is a marvelous sonata-form parody of bel canto operatic devices (whether the humor was intended or not I do not know). On Saturday night Szeryng downplayed the virtuosic aspects of the piece, as much as one can downplay some of the most spectacular and difficult writing in music history, and concentrated on line and point to let the wit of the music emerge. He had occasional local problems with the concerto's technical demands, but still it must be remembered that he is one of the few men in the world who has any business attempting the piece in public, and perhaps the only one of those who would give a self-effacing performance that concentrates on its specialized musical merits.

Different Way

Paganini's orchestral scoring is amazing in a different way: It is so simple and unelaborate that it apparently was intended to be sight-read by the uncertain orchestra players of the early 19th century, but every one of its effects are secure and trenchant, and many of them sound brilliant despite their technical and intellectual modesty.

Chausson's "Poeme" for violin and orchestra was another story. It is a work of subtle harmonic tensions concealed within an almost slobbery kind of late-romantic writing. Neither Szeryng nor conductor Thomas seemed to be interested in those tensions, so the cause was lost before the performance began. Thomas responded to the situation by encouraging the orchestra to ooze through the work in a most uninteresting way, while Szeryng attempted to compensate by hyping up his solo line. The most positive thing that can be said about the performance is that it ended after about 20 minutes.

An orchestral Toccata by Walter Piston, who used to head the music department at Harvard, was sometimes strange and mad beneath a cool, neo-classical veneer. At a few moments Piston's freely intuitive combinations of notes and rhythms equal anything the current avant-garde has done in freakiness — if you can penetrate the Ivy League manners of his music. Other passages are more disciplined, but still have their power once you've learned their language. The BSO's performance was brilliant but not terribly precise.

Major Work

Tchaikovsky's Third Orchestra Suite, which ended the program, turned out to be a major work on the scale of his symphonies, and to be perhaps equal to any of them in musical achievement. It's only mentionable flaw is the concentration of most of its merit in its long last movement — but what a movement that is! Cast as a theme and variations, it flows by as a series of vignettes from vast, subliminal epics buried in the Russian subconscious; not Borodin nor Mussorgsky in all their glory have surpassed this.

After Szeryng left town the New England Conservatory announced that he had awarded a scholarship for summer study with himself to Joe Scheer, the student whose Szymanowski performance he had praised and criticized. According to teachers at the school, Szeryng had been offered a fee for his master class appearance, and he responded by refusing to accept payment, and instead created a scholarship for a New England Conservatory student.

Szeryng's Boston visit was sponsored by the Mexican government, for which he is an official Ambassador of Culture.

p. 25

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 187,887
JAN 21 1974
New England Newsclip

Week 12

Szeryng's violin at BSO, Schubert song-cycle at Jordan Hall

By Thor Eckert, Jr.

The weekend BSO concert was a real pot-pourri affair, with Michael Tilson Thomas presiding over a musical melange.

The Friday afternoon concert opened with a clean, straightforward account of Walter Piston's brassy "Toccata," written in 1948 at the request of another BSO conductor, Charles Munch, who was about to tour with the Orchestre Nationale de France. At the conclusion of this attractive, often broodingly lyric piece, Mr. Thomas brought the composer (who celebrated his 80th birthday over the weekend) out on stage, to a reverential standing ovation.

Henryk Szeryng — Polish-born Mexican violinist — played Ernest Chausson's neglected chestnut "Poeme" for violin and orchestra. This work is a fine lyric showpiece that builds carefully to a sweeping climax, then fades to a quiet, pensive end. The violin is livingly complemented by Chausson's fluid orchestration. Mr. Szeryng, noted for his superb command of the lyric and dramatic aspect of his art, performed with great warmth and beauty.

The violinist then tackled Paganini's Violin Concerto No. 3, to reveal another aspect of his many talents. Unfortunately, this did not fare as well as expected. The work itself is an engaging trifle composed by the virtuoso who revolutionized the art of violin playing.

The concerto requires an extrovert pyrotechnician who can gloss over the fiery figures with digital ease. Mr. Szeryng tends toward scrupulous accuracy, and in such exactness sacrificed the brash abandon that can turn this work into an overwhelming tour de force. Too often phrases were marred by a missed note or slightly dubious intonation in what is, admittedly, fiendish violin writing.

Mr. Thomas devoted the second half of the concert to Tchaikovsky's "Suite No. 3." It was a refreshingly cool and understated performance of a work that has not had too much exposure. The music is notably free of those touches of programmatic bombast that tend to mar this composer's late symphonies. It is a fine showpiece for orchestra, expecially the mercurial scherzo and the concluding Theme and Variations — impressive in their variety, contrast, and wonderful sweep toward a rousing finale.

The orchestra was at its dependable best. And Mr. Thomas was in fine fettle, treading that tricky line between musicality and mere showmanship with his usual flair. Even his baton flying out of his hand on a particularly accentuated up-beat did not faze him.

Norman Foster returned to Boston Friday evening after 20 years in Europe. For his recital with Leonard Shure in Jordan Hall, he chose Schubert's "Winterreise," performed from the original Schubert manuscript. It was an ambitious program that was not notably successful from a singing standpoint.

Mr. Foster is a burly man, who tended to stand feet apart as if on the verge of lifting a great weight — he closed his eyes, clenched a fist, and extended a hand out to the audience when singing. Throughout the evening his manner was one of tense agonizing, often ill-suited to the brooding, haunting mood of the music.

The middle and lower regions of the voice are quite rich and noble, but he did not often exploit this, and as the evening progressed, the overall sound became less and less pliable. Toward the end of the cycle there was evidence of some real pushing to get higher notes out.

NO. SHORE TOWN CRIER
MARBLEHEAD, MASS.
W. 8,000
JAN 23 1974
New England Newsclip

Week 13

2nd Spectrum Concert Offered by Symphony

On Thursday, Jan. 24 at 8:30 p.m., the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Michael Tilson Thomas present the second in a series of three Spectrum Concerts. The concert will be repeated on Friday and Saturday, Jan. 25 and 26, at 2 p.m. and 8:30 p.m., respectively.

The concert is entitled "Where We're At" and opens with Pierre Boulez' Eclat. Oliver Knussen's Symphony no. 3 follows. After intermission, the Orchestra performs Morton Feldman's Cello and Orchestra, and the concerts close with Steve Reich's Music for Mallet Instruments, Voices and Organ.

Each of the works to be performed is a first - Eclat is having its first Boston performance; Oliver Knussen's Symphony no. 3 is receiving its premiere performance; Morton Feldman's Cello and Orchestra (with soloist Jules Eskin) and Steve Reich's Music for mallet instruments, voices and organ (with soloists Joan Heller, Pamela Fraley and Patricia A. Miller) both are Boston premieres.

Jules Eskin, principal cello of the Boston Symphony, came to Boston in 1964 from the Cleveland Orchestra, where he held the same chair for three years under George Szell's direction. Born in Philadelphia, he studied at the Curtis Institute with Leonard Rose. His other teachers were Gregor Piatigorsky and Janos Starker. He won the Naumberg Foundation award in 1954 and made his debut at Town Hall, New York, the same year under the Foundation's auspices. He joined the Dallas Symphony and was later first cellist of the New York City Opera and Ballet Orchestra. In 1961 he made a thirteen week recital tour of Europe, and has in the years since given recitals in many parts of the United States, including several here in Boston, and in Washington D.C. For three years he played with Pablo Casals in Puerto Rico, and at the Marlboro Music Festival with Casals, Alexander Schneider and Rudolf Serkin. He has also been soloist and Master Teacher at the Sarasota (Florida) Music Festival. Mr. Eskin is on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center and is a member of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players.

Joan Heller, a graduate of Oberlin College and the New England Conservatory of Music, was a singing fellow at the Berkshire Music Center during the summers of 1969 through 1972, where she received the C.D. Jackson Prize in 1970 and the High Fidelity-Musical America Prize in 1972. Miss Heller's first performance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra was in a Spectrum concert in January of 1972 when she sang Stravinsky's The Owl and the Pussycat. Since that time she has been the singing member of the Boston Symphony's contemporary music ensemble, Collage. Miss Heller's performances include recitals and concerts in Boston at the Gardner Museum, the Busch-Reisinger Museum, Jordan Hall, Brandeis University and Harvard University. She has also performed with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and with the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra at Tanglewood.

Pamela Fraley, who graduated Summa cum laude from the Howard University School of Music, has been studying voice with Donna Roll and David Blair McClosky since 1969. Miss Fraley has been Director of Pre-School Music at the Elma Lewis School of Fine Arts since 1970, and her voice study with Miss Roll and Mr. McClosky has been provided through a continuing scholarship by the Elma Lewis School. In 1972 Miss Fraley was runner-up in the New England Regional Auditions of the Metropolitan Opera Company. She is Chairman of the Department of Music at the National Center of Afro-American Artists in Roxbury. With her performance in Steve Reich's Music for Mallet Instruments, Voices and Organ, Miss Fraley makes her debut appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Patricia A. Miller is a graduate of the Boston University School of Fine and Applied Arts where she studied with Mary Davenport, Eunice Alberts and coached with Allan Rogers and Adelaide Bishop. Miss Miller is presently a Rowe Fellowship graduate student at the New England Conservatory. She has been active in the opera department there and has given solo performances in a number of oratorios in the Boston area, including both Handel's Messiah and Elijah, and Bach's B minor Mass.

GLOBE (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042
JAN 26 1974
New England Newsclip

Works-in-progress at Spectrum

MICHAEL STEINBERG

Funny how having the men in the orchestra wear jackets didn't seem at all to diminish the audience's huge enjoyment of Thursday evening's Boston Symphony Spectrum concert. For that matter, a title less trendy and less ugly than "Where we're at" might have done all right, too. Again on the plus side (in addition to the music and the performances): the tightness and helpfulness of most of Michael Tilson Thomas's spoken commentary. He shouldn't, however, in the enthusiasm of salesmanship, permit himself nonsense like the claim that Stravinsky was the first composer able to write "a wholly characteristic music" within serialism, or the contention that "most composers have abandoned choosing, in favor of some system" (this apropos Morton Feldman, offered as an exception).

First, "Eclat," the 1964 portion of "Eclat Multiples," a large work-in-progress by Pierre Boulez. Explosions and subsidences, stillness, 15 players making polished and hard sounds: the ghost of "Jeux" and of Debussy's sonatas, it is at once pretty and sapless.

The Symphony No. 3 by the 21-year-old British composer, Oliver Knussen, is work-in-progress, too. It was to have had its world premiere at this weekend's concerts, but because it is just short of finished, the first movement only was played. It proposes a lot of ideas that are developed and completed later: by itself, it is frustrating. And it ends at a point of masterfully calculated suspense, just the place from which to go on, but impossible as a termination. So evaluation wants to wait. There is nothing here of Boulezian concinnity: this is robust, lavish with notes, richly scored, mega-Brandenburg in texture. Knussen, who has the priceless gift of writing absorbing, enormously vital music, was warmly applauded by audience and orchestra.

To make up for the ten minutes of Knussen we didn't get, Thomas put in Stravinsky's sacred ballad of Abraham and Isaac, a chastely expressive, touching masterpiece of the composer's last years. David Evitts was the baritone soloist, exemplary in clarity of pitch and Hebrew diction, expression, and beauty of voice. He had performed it with Thomas at a Boston Philharmonia concert in October, and I admire Thomas for his decision to repeat it so soon and for a wider audience.

Morton Feldman's pieces are pianissimo and slow. Some are keeningly melodic, and a few are quite long. "Cello and Orchestra" (Jules Eskin, soloist) is all four. I tune in and out of that rather attenuated experience, but at the same time I found those soft elegies and that discreet gorgeousness very lovely. So, evidently, did the audience, which gave the composer and the performers an exceptionally friendly reception.

If you enjoy discovering after a while that the blinker on the car in front of you at the stoplight is almost but not quite in phase with yours, if you like listening to the way the frogs and the crickets get it together and then drift apart again, Steve Reich's music is for you. It is about phasing, the pleasures of almost-monotony and of tiny changes. It is for the patient and the playful. "Music for Mallet Instruments, Voices, and Organ" (Joan Heller, Pamela Fraley, Patricia A. Miller, voices) suggesting Bali, the Supremes, and the lush Debussy of "Sirenes," is a wonderful sensuous indulgence, but delights the head, too — mine anyway.

The program is repeated in Symphony Hall at 8:30 tonight.

p.26

BOSTON HERALD AMERICAN 1-26-74

Contemporary Music Concerts Too Long

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

Why are contemporary music concerts always too long? I don't mean seem long (although, often that too). But really just too long for most audiences to have to sit listening and concentrating as intensely as they must in hearing new music.

• Concert Review

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Spectrum Concert Thursday evening was a case in point. At two and a half hours, it was too long by at least one piece (more about which later) and would have been too long even for music from the familiar repertory.

Michael Tilson Thomas had, however, avoided that which makes even short concerts seem excessive — music that is too much alike in instrumentation or technique or mediocrity.

AS THOMAS put it, this Spectrum concert was in direct contrast with previous examples because it sought not to group works having a common theme (except the very general one of "Where We're At") but to collect as diverse a series as possible.

So "where we're at" in 1974 includes:

Pierre Boulez' "Eclat," a piece which functions independently or within the context of a larger work, and which, despite its accompanying philosophy about the arbitrariness of beginnings, endings and formal determinacy, works as extremely attractive and sensuous music.

IT IS SCORED for 15 performers, with nine soloists playing some of the most luscious of the instruments (cimbalom, mandolin, cor anglais, celesta, vibraphone, etc.) and has to do with the sonority of attacks and decay, quiet and duration.

The 21-year-old Oliver Knussen's Symphony No. 3 which had been promised in its entirety, but which was represented by only one movement, Introduction and Masque.

That part is characterized by many simultaneous and complex events, with a good bit of asymetrical rhythms with some rather humorous 6/8 figures for brass. A very intense, beautifully crafted piece and I want to hear more.

STRAVINSKY's "Abraham and Isaac," is a late and neglected serial piece with baritone David Evitts singing the difficult, almost eastern chant-like, melodic line with great finesse and expressivity.

The post-intermission concert proved to be a test of endurance. First, can you sit still for 20 minutes without rattling programs, creaking in the seat, or coughing during Morton Feldman's extremely quiet "Cello and Orchestra?"

ACTUALLY, the piece, with its marvelous cantilena for solo cello (Jules Eskin) and its clouds of sound accompaniment, is quite lovely, only about four times too long.

Second, can you sit through (with or without rattling, creaking, coughing, etc.) Steve Reich's excruciating "Music for Mallet Instruments, Voices and Organ?"

Here the program consists of mallet instruments (marimbas, glockenspiels, metallophone) engaged in additive rhythmic pattern that is repeated and repeated with subtle (very, very subtle) changes resulting from the augmentation of note values.

Week 13

13 CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 187,897
JAN 28 1974
New England Newsclip

'Where We're At' and Rubinstein's Chopin

By Thor Eckert Jr.

Michael Tilson Thomas showed us "Where We're At" musically speaking in this weekend's BSO "Spectrum" concert.

Music

In a rigorous program of music written in the past 10 years members of the BSO performed a program of works and "works in progress."

The most impressive piece was the first movement of Oliver Knussen's Symphony No. 3. A fiery, dramatic virtuoso showpiece for orchestra, it is a rumbling, brassy turbulence out of which emerge frantic snatches of dance beats and tunes. The playing of this first movement whetted the appetite for the whole work, and judging from the reception it got Friday afternoon, Bostonians would like to hear it as soon as possible.

Because the Knussen piece was not complete, Mr. Thomas chose to play "Abraham and Issac," Igor Stravinsky's demanding 12-tone elegy for Israel. No texts were provided (it was a very last minute substitution) and no hint was given by the talkative maestro as to what the Hebrew was all about. The work effectively contrasts an Hebraic vocal line against a serial orchestration. David Evitts, soloist, was a model of accuracy, clarity, musicianship, and tonal beauty in this supremely demanding baritone work.

The program opened with Pierre Boulez's severely intellectual "Eclats" which attempts to freeze bursts of time in delicately explosive sound clusters involving a mere 15 instruments — an intriguing morsel from what will eventually be a complete evening of Boulezian studies in the development of a new musical language.

Morton Feldman's 1972 "Cello and Orchestra," pits a subdued plaintive cello line (played by Jules Eskin) against a very soft, flowing fog of sound. The first half of the work is intriguing as the cello wanders in and out of sound clouds, but the incessant use of non-attack and prolonged decay becomes tediously redundant. Tedious repetition was the problem with Steve Reich's "Music for Mallet Instruments, Voices, and Organ," scored for four marimbas, two glockenspiels, one metallophone, three women's voices, and organ, all amplified. The mallet instrumentalists are given groups of notes from which they can add or subtract. This causes shifts of phase, which creates varied "melodic" patterns. It is a half-hour carillon-hater's nightmare, complete with an incessant foghorn (the electric organ).

The new music bodes ill for the future of orchestras — two compositions excluded orchestra entirely. For now the composer's intellect and whim reign supreme — art for ego's sake.

The concert was too long (2½ hours) and rigorous for subscription audiences. Mr. Thomas may have dealt his valuable and instructive "Spectrum" series a fatal blow with this concert.

Arthur Rubinstein

Exactly four hours after the BSO concert, Arthur Rubinstein stepped in front of an overflowing, adoring audience to play an all-Chopin recital.

What can be said about a legend? The master, who is 87 years young today, is a model of vigor. The audience was a model of hushed attention.

The playing was exactly what was expected — but even given that fact it is still amazing to hear how this consummate musician plows through the stiffest virtuosic demands and makes simple music out of the complex jumble of notes. This Chopin is as poetic as the composer's music, and his simplicity is awe inspiring.

For the record, there were three dazzling encores and five standing ovations. Rubinstein was showing his appreciation for the loving audience and the audience was saying: "Arthur, we love you for being so young, so generous, so consistently masterful. . . for being such an indefatigable living legend . . . we love you for being you!"

14 JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 24,500
FEB 7 1974
New England Newsclip

14 SUN-CHRONICLE (E)
ATTLEBORO, MASS.
D. 18,000
FEB 6 1974
New England Newsclip

Week 14

Monteverdi Masterpiece Presented by Tilson, BSO

By THOR ECKERT JR.
Monitor News Service

BOSTON —, Michael Tilson Thomas led a resplendent performance over the weekend of a 1610 masterpiece: Claudio Monteverdi's "Vespro della Beata Vergine."

The members of the BSO were reduced in number — a small string section, some brass, woodwinds, a harpsichord and the wonderful Symphony Hall organ. Six soloists, the New England Conservatory Chorus and the Boston Boy Choir completed the performing forces.

With the burgeoning interest in late Renaissance and early Baroque music, neglected masterpieces such as the Monteverdi "Vespro" are being performed in their entirety where before it was considered courageous to do merely selections. And the rewards of hearing such a large work complete are rich.

The continuity, scope and sweep of the music is quite overwhelming. Monteverdi at his best — as heard in the whole of this work — abounds in melodic invention and rhythmic variation. Particularly effective is the composer's intertwining of Gregorian chant — the foundation of this liturgical work — within the framework of his musical conception.

There was no doubt, from the reaction of the Friday afternoon audience, that any calculated risk in presenting the entire work had paid off in full.

The BSO musicians performed wonderfully, as ever. The NEC Chorus, under Lorna Cooke deVaron's guidance, contributed outstanding work. Even in the thickest, most complicated contrapuntal and rhythmic passages, the chorus was a model of accuracy. They outdid themselves in the stunning pianissimo work of the Magnificat.

Of the soloists, Susan Davenny Wyner (Soprano I) and John Aler (Tenor I) shone out: Miss Wyner for her purity and richness of sound and Mr. Aler for his nigh faultless handling of the complex Monteverdian embellishments.

Mary Strebing (Soprano II) and Alexander Stevenson (Tenor II) were fine, but their respective vocal outputs did not blend with their partners' as well as they should. It appeared that the soloists were not chosen for vocal blend, so divergent were the various voices. Nowhere was this more obvious than when Timothy Nolen was singing. His big, rather hollow-sounding voice was ill-suited to this demanding, florid music. Gregory Reinhart, however, executed his few passages well.

Thomas kept things moving at a fine clip — opting at times for some very brisk tempi — with a keen eye for clarity and unity, sweeping to the unusual, but moving climax of the Magnificat, the final section of the work, and the most dramatically reverential.

N.E. Chamber Opera

Down at the Boston Center for the Arts over the weekend, the New England Chamber Opera Group presented its first program of the season: Dominick Argento's "The Boor" and Gian Carlo Menotti's "The Medium."

Of the two entertainment pieces — neither work is especially memorable musically and each relies on strongly staged performances for its effect — the Argento came off better.

The cast was strong. Paul Johnson was a good old servant, and Daniel Urton a fine, pompous boor. Jennifer Paterson was a bit lackluster — missing the farcical aspect of her role as the pining widow.

Splendor of Baroque Fills Symphony Hall

The splendor of the baroque filled Symphony Hall last weekend as Michael Tilson Thomas led the Boston Symphony Orchestra and a large corps of voices through the first complete Boston performance of Monteverdi's "Vespro della Beata Vergine."

Vespers, in the Catholic liturgy, is the one hour in the daily spread of time whose rite is suitable to musical treatment. Coming late in the day, vespers includes a set of psalms, a hymn, salutations and responses, and the Magnificat. Monteverdi's Vespers contains all these elements along with several other pieces of a nonliturgical nature. Hence this enormous, wonderful work is not a single, cohesive composition but a rich collection of sacred and secular music.

Although the liturgical parts actually require antiphons for religious use, these brief textual appendages were not presented in the concert version, but since they are not composed but drawn from existing Gregorian melodies already in the ritual their omission did not detract from the dramatic import or line of the music.

Because the components forming the Vespers come from diverse sources they do not have an inherent order. From them, a conductor may construct any structure that makes musical sense to him. Mr. Thomas wisely chose to employ the edition of Denis Stevens which divides the performance into two parts, ending the first with the Sonata sopra Sancta Maria and the second with the Magnificat.

In listening to the Vespers one can only marvel at the genius of Monteverdi. Writing a century before Bach, his harmonic inventiveness boldly ventured into unexplored areas to bring a new dimension to music and to opera, in particular. Much of this invention is evident throughout the Vespers — and an eloquent expression it is, using soloists and choruses effectively and supporting the singing with a modest but meaningful instrumental accompaniment.

The weekend performances were somewhat uneven. At the Saturday evening one which I heard, and which despite the storm attracted a sizable audience, the signing of Susan Davenny Wyner, soprano, and tenor John Aler were noticably superior. Alexander Stevenson, the other tenor, also sang commendably. The major portion of the choral contribution came from Lorna Cooke deVaron's New England Conservatory Chorus and was another positive force in the concert. Apart from these, the singing was pedestrian and the orchestral portions rather routine with some questionable intonation in the brass section at various moments.

Mr. Thomas is to be applauded, nonetheless, for undertaking so challenging a task and handling it so persuasively. But he is an interesting, adventuresome young man from whom we've come to expect big things. This was one of them and the generous response at the end of the evening was no surprise.

Week 14

p.27

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 107,857
FEB 1974 New England Newsclip

Thomas leads BSO's Monteverdi masterpiece

By Thor Eckert, Jr.

Michael Tilson Thomas led a resplendent performance over the weekend of a 1610 masterpiece: Claudio Monteverdi's "Vespro della Beata Vergine."

The members of the BSO were reduced in number — a small string section, some brass, woodwinds, a harpsichord and the wonderful Symphony Hall organ. Six soloists, the New England Conservatory Chorus and the Boston Boy Choir completed the performing forces.

Music

With the burgeoning interest in late Renaissance and early Baroque music, neglected masterpieces such as the Monteverdi "Vespro" are being performed in their entirety where before it was considered courageous to do merely selections. And the rewards of hearing such a large work complete are rich.

The continuity, scope and sweep of the music is quite overwhelming. Monteverdi at his best — as heard in the whole of this work — abounds in melodic invention and rhythmic variation. Particularly effective is the composer's intertwining of Gregorian chant — the foundation of this liturgical work — within the framework of his musical conception.

There was no doubt, from the reaction of the Friday afternoon audience, that any calculated risk in presenting the entire work had paid off in full.

The BSO musicians performed wonderfully, as ever. The NEC Chorus, under Lorna Cooke deVaron's guidance, contributed outstanding work. Even in the thickest, most complicated contrapuntal and rhythmic passages, the chorus was a model of accuracy. They outdid themselves in the stunning pianissimo work of the Magnificat.

Of the soloists, Susan Davenny Wyner (Soprano I) and John Aler (Tenor I) shone out: Miss Wyner for her purity and richness of sound and Mr. Aler for his nigh faultless handling of the complex Monteverdian embellishments.

Mary Strebing (Soprano II) and Alexander Stevenson (Tenor II) were fine, but their respective vocal outputs did not blend with their partners' as well as they should. It appeared that the soloists were not chosen for vocal blend, so divergent were the various voices. Nowhere was this more obvious than when Timothy Nolen was singing. His big, rather hollow-sounding voice was ill-suited to this demanding, florid music. Gregory Reinhart, however, executed his few passages well.

Mr. Thomas kept things moving at a fine clip — opting at times for some very brisk tempi — with a keen eye for clarity and unity, sweeping to the unusual but moving climax of the Magnificat, the final section of the work, and the most dramatically reverential.

N.E. Chamber Opera

Down at the Boston Center for the Arts over the weekend, the New England Chamber Opera Group presented its first program of the season: Dominick Argento's "The Boor" and Gian Carlo Menotti's "The Medium."

Of the two entertainment pieces — neither work is especially memorable musically and each relies on strongly staged performances for its effect — the Argento came off better.

The cast was strong. Paul Johnson was a good old servant, and Daniel Urton a fine, pompous boor. Jennifer Paterson was a bit lackluster — missing the farcical aspect of her role as the pining widow.

"The Medium" is a seedy bit of Grand Guignol claptrap. This production missed it. The special effects were basically rank amateur. The acting was all right, but there was no sign of a director's imprint. The most effective moment of the show was the beating of Toby, the mute — done with a single strobe light. It was a simple trick that worked well.

D'Anna Fortunato is a fine vocal actress but her performance was rather aloof. Jon Keyser substituted stagy theatrics for half-witted innocence as Toby and thus destroyed the most sympathetic character of the show. Marguerite Coughlin — snappy director of "The Boor" — brought a director's awareness to her touching portrayal of Monica.

Opera on an intimate scale is a good idea. The seeds of a fine company are visible, but for now professionalism and imagination appear to be lacking.

The orchestra was under-rehearsed, and too small to do justice to the music. Two pianos would have been superior in the small working area of the theater and would not have drowned out the singers. Consistently good direction could give dramatic focus to the performances — and might have turned "The Medium" into a good show — and an imaginative designer would hardly have considered some bits of hanging cloth and scattered furniture a set.

GLOBE (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,612
FEB 1974 New England Newsclip

MICHAEL STEINBERG

'The Vespers of 1610'

In his Boston Symphony programs ~~last week and~~ this, Michael Tilson Thomas concentrated on music from periods virtually untouched by our orchestras. Last week it was music of the last ten years, generally unplayed because of the indolence and irresponsibility of so many conductors. This week it was music from the beginning of the 17th century, which does get performed, but not usually in the framework of symphony orchestra programs. And that for good reason: there is little repertory that can be played by a modern orchestra without considerable translation, a process that inevitably carries artistic hazard with it.

Finding 1974 counterparts to 1610 sonorities is one of the problems in the performance of Claudio Monteverdi's "Vespro della Beata Virgine," the work Thomas conducted yesterday afternoon (also Thursday evening, with a repeat scheduled for tonight), but it is not the only one, nor the biggest. The question is, what is this work that has become popularly known as "the Vespers of 1610" (its publication date)? There has been bloodshed among musicologists over the point. The publisher, Amadino in Venice, put together eight Monteverdi pieces constituting music for a vespers service, plus five extraneous settings of sacred texts, and for some reason he jumbled it all up rather than keep the vespers and the extras separate.

Some feel strongly that the proper course is to perform the service music, which has a symmetry and plan of its own, and to use the other pieces on other occasions. Thomas, like most conductors and editors, went the other route, playing everything in Amadini's collection except a Mass and a duplicate setting of the Magnificat. The advantage is that you get to hear more music, all of it wonderful; the problem is that "the Vespers" thus interpreted is a long, somewhat shapeless miscellany (mistitled to boot).

The psalms, hymns, antiphons, and so forth, are Baroque music at its most baroque and splendid. The work is fanciful, incredibly varied in texture and rhetorical in scope, and sometimes giddily virtuosic. This was the first full performance here, and welcome. Thomas has feeling for the style (he has conducted the "Sonata sopra Sancta Maria" in Boston before, and the Magnificat at Tanglewood), but parts of the performance seemed unsettled and hectic. It also seems to me that to stress the rhythmic irregularties of "Laudate pueri" and "Lauda Jerusalem" to the point where they begin to sound like the Bernstein Mass shows some want of discretion.

The effectiveness of a performance of this music depends heavily on the soloists. The two sopranos, Susan Davenny Wyner and Mary Strebing, were excellent, and particularly Mrs. Wyner, who gives a solo recital at First Congregational Church, Cambridge, on Feb. 14, is a singer of exceptional musical and vocal endowment. There was good work as well from the tenor John Aler; the others, however, in matters of tone quality and pitch, ranged from fair to grim. The New England Conservatory Chorus (Lorna Cooke de Varon, conductor) suffered from passing pitch troubles, too, but otherwise sang well; the Boston Boy Choir (Theodore Marier, conductor), producing a somewhat veiled version of boy-rasp, was fine. In the orchestra, the flexibly played duets for oboes (Ralph Gomberg, Wayne Rapier) and for violins (Joseph Silverstein, Jerome Rosen) were a particular pleasure.

HERALD-AMERICAN (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 424,654
FEB 2 1974 New England Newsclip

Vespers at BSO Long Overdue

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

• Concert Review

In many respects, it is the composers of transitional period — Bach, Beethoven, Mahler, etc. — who are the most idiosyncratic, the most difficult to categorize and to analyze, and therefore, the most fascinating.

Claudio Monteverdi was another such giant who straddled two musical epochs and styles, who summed up in his work what had come before and, with tremendous vision, shaped and directed that which was to come. As a madrigalist and opera composer, he was an avant gardist and radical. As a composer of religious music, as Hans Redlich points out, he was schizophrenic, maintaining a striking ambivalence between what he referred to as Prima and Seconda Prattica (or the old-fashioned and the modern).

In 1610, Monteverdi published a collection of liturgical music which personified his duality — a Mass, "In Illo tempore" in the old Flemish-influenced polyphonic style; and the Vespers of the Virgin Mary, which threw away most of the old rules and conventions in favor of the new, highly theatrical, expressive techniques.

It was this Vespers which Michael Tilson Thomas performed with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time in its entirety Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall. Certainly, it wss a long overdue premiere.

The work, in fact, is astounding. Contemplating writing about it is awesome: how to detail the structural and expressive marvels without becoming long-winded (as this week's annotator did) and/or excessively technical?

Monteverdi includes in this revolutionary work combinations of voices, both solo and choral, and instruments never before heard in liturgical works and rarely equaled in any music since. The writing for both instruments and voices was more brilliant, passionate and florid than anything that had been heard outside the theater — yet with all the striking effects contained within tightly organized structures. It is a work which at once celebrates strong religious faith and an awesome virtuosity — and does so with great joy.

The Vespers requires outstanding performers; an orchestra of virtuosi (particularly among the brass players), a sextet of vocal soloists who, male and female, can sing difficult coloratura and blend well with one another in ensembles; and a chorus which can also sing florid passagework. Thomas found himself a little short in these requirements.

The orchestra presented few problems: the brass playing was appropriately brilliant and the string sound was attractively light and transparent.

Of the soloists, sopranos Susan Davenny Wyner and Mary Strebing managed the fioriture with elegance and expressiveness and combined beautifully together in duets. John Aler and Alexander Stevenson, tenors, are stylish and attractive to hear individually, but their characteristic vocal timbres do not complement each other in ensembles.

Baritone Timothy Nolen, however, sings at a constant forte and with little grace, and insists dominating all of the ensembles in which he takes part.

The Boston Boy Choir, in its limited part, sang with its usual well-disciplined and homogeneous sound, both of which qualities were wanting in the New England Conservatory Chorus.

p 28

Week 15

GLOBE (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042
FEB 9 1974
New England Newsclip

MICHAEL STEINBERG

Jessye Norman's singing highlights Symphony concert

What a pity that vocal soloists at orchestral concerts have gone out of fashion. They are engaged, of course, for the Beethoven 9th, for oratorios, for special works like "Das Lied von der Erde" but rarely for their own sakes, as it were. We miss some good repertory that way, a glaring example being Mozart's concert arias, of which Jessye Norman sang two superb specimens—perhaps the two most wonderful of the lot—at yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert.

There are fifty-some of them, many of them written for insertion in operas by the forgotten Douglas Moores and Samuel Barbers of their day, others truly independent concert pieces. "Bella mia fiamma," K.528, Mozart wrote for the brilliant Josepha Duschek. The story is that she locked him in a pavilion in the garden of her house near Prague and would not let him out until he had an aria for her. He, in turn, handed it over only on conlition that she sang it at sight, and she must have been an extraordinary musician and singer to have done it.

"Ch'io mi scordi di te," K.505, is special even among the special ones. Mozart set its impassioned text — "I, forget you?" — twice, first, with violin obbligato, to be inserted into a performance of his "Idomeneo," later, with piano obbligato, as a farewell present to Nancy Storace, his first Susanna, who was returning to England with her husband. The piano obbligato was for himself, and the aria has been understood by many as a love letter, as a souvenir — this Einstein — "of the taste and the depth of his playing, and of the depth of his feeling for her."

Norman sang "Bella mia fiamma" convincingly and almost brilliantly. For "Ch'io mi scordi di te" she is not sufficiently intimate or personal a singer (not having memorized the aria was no help either), and its technical demands defeated her, the high notes being thin, the low A flat a toneless expulsion of breath, and the passagework labored. Robert Levin as Mozart phrased sensitively, but his playing seemed incongruously small in scale for so big a hall and with such public singing. Colin Davis and the orchestra created a firm, pliant, and sumptuous frame for the singing and playing.

The two arias followed, respectively, one of the marches from "Idomeneo" and Haydn's Symphony No. 87 in A major, the latter getting its first Boston hearing! It is a delight, starting out all sunshine and open-faced innocence, but, before it has been going a minute, finding the damnedest way of getting from A to E you ever heard. There follows a profusion of neat jokes, silences, unexpected pianissimo, the page that sounds as though repeated by mistake from earlier the movement, the game of making eight sound like the oddest possible number, all played out with limitless invention, charm, lyric warmth, and orchestral brightness. The delivery of it was all you could want — straight, robust, and delicate.

JESSYE NORMAN
. . . almost brilliant

COLIN DAVIS
. . . pliant frame

After intermission, Davis shot forward to the last year of the 19th century and the 1st Symphony of Sibelius. Strange to think of Sibelius just beginning to find who he was at nearly the age at which Mozart died. The 1st is still almost uninhibitedly lush and sweet, but that insistent and so original voice is there, too, speaking with urgency. The performance was of astounding intensity and with a reckless beauty to the playing. The program is repeated tonight at 8:30.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 24,500
FEB 14 1974
New England Newsclip

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

UNUSUAL WORKS WELL DONE

Colin Davis, one of the two "Principal Guest Conductors" in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's present free-form directorial arrangement, is back in town for the second round of this season' assignment. As if often with him, the choice of program was unhackneyed and substantial; and as is almost invariable, the performance was beautifully rendered.

The program included three rarely played Mozart pieces, namely, the march from "Idomeneo", the concert arias, "Bella mia fiamma", K-528, and "Ch'io mi scordi di te", K-505; the first Boston performance of Haydn's A major Symphony, No. 87; and Sibelius' Symphony No. 1 in E minor, which has also become something of a rarity. The soloists were Jessye Norman, soprano, and Robert Levin, pianist.

Each of the two Mozart concert arias in question has quite a story behind it. The first, so it is said, was written by Mozart as a present to his hostess with whom he was residing when finishing "Don Giovanni". She "locked him up" to endure its completion, whereat he made her sight read it as his condition for not tearing apart the manuscript. The second is a "letter" expressing Mozart's unrequited love for the soprano who sang his first Susannah in "Figaro."

Whatever the truth behind these musicological findings, both pieces are magnificently passionate declarations that stand on their own merits and need not be considered in some operatic or other choral context. Their rendering, however, was not as fully realized as one might have hoped. Formidable stage presence Jessye Norman certainly has and in the middle registers her voice must be one of the great vocal instruments of this generation. The upper registers are something again. The opulence is watered down and for that matter the lower notes lack richness of sheen. Miss Norman's technical equipment is adequate, but adequacy does not suffice for music which demands impeccability. Mr. Levin's piano collaboration was small scaled but polished. Incidentally, the improbable combination of piano and voice with orchestra comes off very well as a medium.

The delightful Haydn Symphony is yet another of those reminders that Haydn is at one and the same time the most Procrustian and underrated of geniuses. The No. 87 is the next - to - the - last of the "Paris" set, written near the full flood of Haydn's symphonic career — the transparency of the ensemble, the luminous pointing of detail, the constantly changing application and ordering of the themes and the intricate instrumental combinations leave little doubt of that. Yet here it was, a Boston first.

The faded Nordic Victorian grandeur that is Sibelius' 1st Symphony comprised the contrasting second half of the concert. Sibelius, who had arrived at his vocabulary in the earlier tone poems, was now applying it to the symphonic frame. The construction is immense, but a listener wading through all that tonal and thematic affluence again after years of absence can only wonder at the strength of organization and orchestral resourcefulness. Banality — yes, tons of it — but oh so many and prolonged exquisite passages. The clarinet solo over the drum roll that opens the first movement (hauntingly played by Harold Wright) alone justifies coming to the hall.

Here, and indeed throughout, Mr. Davis had the orchestra playing at the peak of its capacities. In some respects his conducting style seems virtually a contradiction in terms, for while it seems utterly relaxed he produces a tautness of execution that only tension can adduce. The open rehearsals come to mind, for they too usually bring forth such a mix. Whatever the formula for that mix, it is an admirable one.

Mr. Davis will again preside this weekend. The program will consist of Schumann's Piano Concerto in A minor and Tippett's Symphony No. 3. The soloists will be Michael Roll, piano, and Heather Harper, soprano.

HERALD-AMERICAN (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 424,654
FEB 9 1974
New England Newsclip

'Sibelius' Symphony in Uninhibited Performance

By ELLEN PFEIFFER
Music Critic

• Concert Review

Sibelius' Symphony No. 1, which was performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday night under Colin Davis, was something of a rallying point, a secret symbol of resistance for Finnish nationalists during the turn-of-the-century Russian encroachments.

For all of Sibelius' discreet sympathy for the rebels, however, the work was never really intended to have specific programmatic references and, to this listener, it seems difficult indeed to see how the rebels could infer any patriotic fervor from it. Instead it appears that Sibelius had already established him self as a nationalist composer with his earlier tone poems on Nordic legends and that the resistance seized upon his symphony without needing any particular justification.

The work, far from having political overtones, seems a rather personal statement of youthful high spirits, affirmation, physical vigor and, at the same time, a deep well of poetry. It is the kind of revelation of self that makes one smile occasionally at the lack of inhibition, the sincerity and sheer exuberance of it.

I suppose "uninhibited" would best describe Davis' performance of the Symphony, too — passionate, a bit noisy, rarely subtle although there are subtle moments written in, brightly colored, greatly poetic. Especially magnetic was the Scherzo which he took at break-neck speed and his wonderfully schmaltzy way with the cantabile theme of the final movement.

Sibelius was not the only pleasure in the evening at Symphony Hall. On the first half of the program, Davis presented the absolutely charming and crisply rhythmic March from Mozart's opera "Idomeneo."

It was followed by Mozart's concert aria "Bella mia fiamma" with soprano Jessye Norman in not quite warmed-up state — the voice sounding slightly diffuse and heavy. Haydn's Symphony No. 87 (the step-child of the Paris group of symphonies) in a suave and lively performance was next, and finally Miss Norman appeared again in another Mozart aria, "Ch'io mi scordi di te . . . Non temer, amato bene," this time with the voice much better under control, the tone focused, and the singer in a more congenial setting (both vocally and temperamentally). This aria, which requires dramatic coloratura and sensibilities to match, plus a pianist with equal endowments (Robert Levin), was undoubtedly one of the most exciting vocal performances around here in some time.

TIMES (E)
BEVERLY, MASS.
D. 9,514
FEB 6 1974
New England Newsclip

Week 15

p. 29

Boston Symphony to present four concerts in week

BOSTON—On Thursday evening, February 7 at 8:30 p.m., Friday afternoon, February 8 at 2:00 p.m. and on Saturday evening, February 9 at 8:30 p.m., Principal Guest Conductor Colin Davis conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in works by Mozart, Haydn and Sibelius. Soprano Jessye Norman and pianist Robert Levin are soloists.

Mr. Davis opens the concerts with Mozart's March from "Idomeneo" and follows it with Mozart's Concert aria "Bella mia Fiamma." Jessye Norman is soloist in the aria. Haydn's Symphony no. 87 in A Major follows. Then in the Mozart Concert aria with piano obliggato ("Ch'io mi scordi di te") both Jessye Norman and Robert Levin are soloists. The closing work of the concerts is Sibelius' Symphony no. 1 in E minor.

Colin Davis is musical director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden as well as being principal guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His conducting career began in 1949, and his early experience was with the Kalmar Chamber Orchestra, the Chelsea Opera Group, the Festival Ballet and the Ballet Rusee. In 1957 he became assistant conductor of the BBC Scottish Orchestra. Two years later he was called at short notice to take the place of Otto Klemperer, who became ill, in a concert performance of Don Giovanni. This marked a turning point in Mr. Davis' career: he was shortly afterwards appointed musical director of the Sadler's Wells Opera, made his debut with the CBC Symphony in Canada and appeared for the first time in the United States as guest conductor with the Minneapolis Symphony. In 1967 Mr. Davis took up his appointment as chief conductor of the BBC Symphony, which he relinquished at the end of the 1970-1971 season to take up his duties at Covent Garden. Mr. Davis has made many recordings for Philips.

Jessye Norman studied with Pierre Bernac at the University of Michigan, and with Alice Duschack at the Peabody Conservatory. Five years ago she won first prize at the International Music Competition sponsored by the Bavarian Radio in Munich, and was soon afterwards engaged by the Deutsche Oper in Berlin, where she made her debut as Elisabeth in Tannhauser. Since that time she has been engaged by major companies in Europe, among them LaScala, Milan, and the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, and has sung recitals in Italy, Austria, Czechoslovakia, Switzerland and Germany.

During the summer of 1972 she sang at Spoleto, at the Vienna Festwochen, the Edinburgh Festival, at the Hollywood Bowl and at Wolf Trap Farms, and in the months since she has appeared in Graz, Baden-Baden, Berlin, London, Lisbon, Madrid, Frankfurt, Washington D.C., and other major cities in opera, recital and with orchestras. Jessye Norman's many operatic roles include the title roles in Dido and Aeneas and Aida, the Countess in Figaro, and Cassandra in Les troyens, while with orchestras she has sung in performances of Brahams' A German requiem, Bach's Mass in B minor, Handel's Messiah, Verdi's Requiem and Rossini's Petite messe solonnelle. Her recordings are on the Odeon and Philips labels. Miss Norman's most recent performance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra was in March of last year when she sang music of Wagner; Colin Davis conducted.

Robert Levin, who has appeared both as harpsichord soloist and as continuo player with the Boston Symphony on several past occasions, was Chairman of the Theory Department of the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia from the fall of 1968 to the spring of 1973. Since the fall of 1972 he has held a parallel position as co-ordinator of theory in the new professional Music Division of the State University of New York in Purchase. Robert Levin studied with Louis Martin, Stefan Wolpe, Nadio Boulanger and Hans Swarowsky.

He attended Harvard College, and wrote his thesis on 'The unfinished works of W. A. Mozart.' Unfinished movements which Robert Levin has completed have had several performances, while two have been published. Robert Levin has appeared both as Harpsichordist and pianist with the Boston Symphony Chamber Players and has recorded with them for Deutsche Grammophon. As keyboard player for the New York Philomusica-Chamber Ensemble, he has given frequent performances and recorded on the Vox label. He also appears as soloist and chamber music player in many parts of the country, and has been recognized for his reinstatement of eighteenth-century practice in the concertos of Mozart. The continuo parts which he plays he improvises himself.

On Tuesday evening, February 12 at 8:30 p.m., Principal Guest Conductor Colin Davis conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in works by Beethoven, Haydn and Sibelius. Mr. Davis opens the concert with Beethoven's Overture for "Coriolan." Haydn's Symphony no. 87 in A Major follows and the concert closes with Sibelius' Symphony no. 1 in E minor.

SUN-CHRONICLE (E)
ATTLEBORO, MASS.
D. 18,000
FEB 15 1974
New England Newsclip

Musically Rewarding Show Presented by Davis

By THOR ECKERT JR.
Monitor News Service

BOSTON — Colin Davis returned to Boston this weekend for his second series of concerts as principal guest conductor of the Boston Symphony.

Davis chose a program that — while generally unfamiliar — was most rewarding musically.

The concert opened with two Mozart pieces: a march from the opera "Idomeneo" and the concert aria "Bella mia fiamma." In a front row center seat it was necessary to dodge Maestro Davis's downbeats. A trip to the box office changed the seat location but evaluation of the opening pieces (from a vantage point close to the first cellist's heel) was difficult. Suffice it to say that Jessye Norman, the soprano soloist, has a splendid voice.

Davis led the musicians in the first Boston performance of Haydn's Symphony No. 87. It was one of six works commissioned by a Parisian concert group and now designated as the "Paris" symphonies. The 87th has been practically ignored — for a while the piece disappeared entirely — but unjustly so. It is a fine work by a great composer, music which almost looks ahead to future composers, and which belies the long-standing myth that Haydn was a composer of mere entertainment music. Davis conducted a carefully nuanced, well-focused performance.

In Radiant Voice

To close the first half of the concert, the conductor was joined by Miss Norman and pianist Robert Levin for a Mozart-Scena and Rondo: "Ch'io mi scordi di te — Non temer, amato bene". Whereas there had been slight signs of effort in the first aria, in this Scena Miss Norman was in radiant voice — a voice of burnished timbre, and an extraordinary lower register.

The Mozart music suits her well. It needs fluidity and restraint. And when Miss Norman holds back vocally — when she is not trying to make big sounds — she has a brilliance, a resonance, and a carrying power of remarkable dimensions.

She is still quite young as singers go and it is a mark of her keen artistic wisdom that she sang Mozart instead of the Richard Strauss that had been announced last September. She is an interpreter who understands shading and communication and does not overdo either.

The Thursday night audience received her warmly, as they did Levin's gracious playing.

And Then Sibelius

After intermission, Davis conducted Sibelius's First Symphony. The music is full of the craggy grandeur that marks the individualistic style of the Finnish composer and especially his earlier compositions. The music is dramatic and introduces wonderful soaring melodies. Though lacking formal development in the strict theoretical sense, they create a cohesive sound-tapestry.

Copyright The Christian Science Publishing Society

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
1974
New England

Jessye Norman sparks BSO concert led by Colin Davis

By Thor Eckert Jr.

Colin Davis returned to Boston this weekend for his second series of concerts as principal guest conductor of the Boston Symphony.

Mr. Davis chose a program that — while generally unfamiliar — was most rewarding musically.

The concert opened with two Mozart pieces: a march from the opera "Idomeneo" and the concert aria "Bella mia fiamma." In a front row center seat it was necessary to dodge Maestro Davis's downbeats. A trip to the box office changed the seat location but evaluation of the opening pieces (from a vantage point close to the first cellist's heel) was difficult. Suffice it to say that Jessye Norman, the soprano soloist, has a splendid voice.

Music

Mr. Davis led the musicians in the first Boston performance of Haydn's Symphony No. 87. It was one of six works commissioned by a Parisian concert group and now designated as the "Paris" symphonies. The 87th has been practically ignored — for a while the piece disappeared entirely — but unjustly so. It is a fine work by a great composer, music which almost looks ahead to future composers, and which belies the long-standing myth that Haydn was a composer of mere entertainment music. Mr. Davis conducted a carefully nuanced, well-focused performance.

In radiant voice

To close the first half of the concert, the conductor was joined by Miss Norman and pianist Robert Levin for a Mozart Scena and Rondo: "Ch'io mi scordi di te — Non temer, amato bene" Whereas there had been slight signs of effort in the first aria, in this Scena Miss Norman was in radiant voice — a voice of burnished timbre, and an extraordinary lower register.

The Mozart music suits her well. It needs fluidity and restraint. And when Miss Norman holds back vocally — when she is not trying to make big sounds — she has a brilliance, a resonance, and a carrying power of remarkable dimensions.

She is still quite young as singers go and it is a mark of her keen artistic wisdom that she sang Mozart instead of the Richard Strauss that had been announced last September. She is an interpreter who understands shading and communication and does not overdo either.

The Thursday night audience received her warmly, as they did Mr. Levin's gracious playing.

And then Sibelius

After intermission, Mr. Davis conducted Sibelius's First Symphony. The music is full of the craggy grandeur that marks the individualistic style of the Finnish composer and especially his earlier compositions. The music is dramatic and introduces wonderful soaring melodies. Though lacking formal development in the strict theoretical sense, they create a cohesive sound-tapestry. The orchestration is a marvel. Sibelius went on from this work to develop a very concise musical style, and the seeds of that development are visible here.

Mr. Davis gave his usual fine reading — clear and tensile. Not one to languish over melodies or sweeping phrases, his straightforward approach heightened the angular jaggedness of the score. The lyrical melodies thus stood out without special prodding. Some people call this a nonromantic approach to music. But the music then speaks for itself. Mr. David imposes on the music only in matters of execution, not interpretation in its distorted sense. He is individual without being eccentric, a winsome combination.

p.30

Week 16

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
S. 225,000

FEB 10 1974

New England Newsclip

US premiere for Tippett 'No. 3'

MICHAEL STEINBERG

"I always feel I have to go the other way."

(Symphony No. 3 by Sir Michael Tippett will have its first American performances at the Boston Symphony concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Feb. 15 and 16. Colin Davis conducts and Heather Harper is soprano soloist. Both took part in the work's world premiere in London, June 1972. The following remarks by the composer were made in an interview with Bayan Northcott, now music critic of the News Statesman. They appeared first in the June 1972 issue of Music and Musicians, and are used here by kind permission of Mr. Northcott.)

When it came to the new Symphony, I was concerned about this pull in the creative movement inside between these two things: between what I might call the "Beethoven Allegro" to which I have always felt close (I spent years of my life learning how to do it) and the feeling that I'd become too attached to it — that at all costs it must not be there. Then something happened in Edinburgh in 1965. I was listening to a concert of ... what I call a very "motionless" modern music: it hadn't a harmonic or rhythmic or any other sort of drive that I could hear ... I kept saying to myself, "I don't see how I could ever use this kind of thing for expressive purposes unless it were part of a piece based upon sharp contrasts." And this suddenly clicked, and I knew that a symphonic work had begun and that divisions had already appeared between what I then started calling "arrest" and "movement."

. . . This revived a curious interest that goes back a long time, in which I've felt that if these two things were both positive — if the "arrest" were a compression, so to speak, and the "movement" an explosion, of energy (like a jet engine) — then such sections might extend and extend. So that in the opening bars of the symphony the first statements are only six and nine bars, but by the time the fifth and final round is reached, each one is quite long. . .

At this point the music goes over into the equivalent of the symphonic slow movement. Here the contrast was between high and low, as I first heard it — or, indeed, saw it: visual terms entered quite a lot here. It starts with about two minutes of the high music, which is a kind of sound accumulation without any obvious principle of change or extension — you might think of it as a windless night sky, the sounds are up in the air. Then suddenly, over a deep and slow-moving pulse, the other sound comes up from below, like a tidal wave, and so you get a balance between the two . . . This made the first half of the symphony — two movements of about nine minutes each — and is quite abstract.

I had thought that, as in the normal symphony, I would now move over towards the less rigorous things. AND to begin the second part . . . I imagined a real play of five different musics which are quite long sections that hardly change at all in themselves but do change in their relationships with each other . . . It becomes quite fun and games, and ends in a real jam-session — for, of course, being me, the music are very different.

Now comes the thing that happened after these first concepts were gradually put into place . . . I was always certain that I'd come out with a set of blues and breaks — instrumental ones. This is partly because I've always been interested in blues, which I regard as an archetypal form and all the rest of it, and partly because it seemed to me one way of avoiding the terrible difficulties of the finale in which you just pile things on. I can't do the Shostakovich bombast and don't want to.

However, when I really looked into this matter, it became perfectly clear that the blues could not be instrumental . . . And the moment I began to think about words, the thing took a tremendous step forward and I became involved very deeply in the fundamental Ninth Symphony problem: how real is the big affirmatory period of the late 18th and early 19th century to us? Colin Davis once said to me as he came off the platform, "What does this mean, Michael? Does it mean anything to us?" In other words, we still celebrate, are still terribly moved, but we don't really accept the totality of such affirmation in those terms . . .

. . . The moment I came to the break, the Beethoven was fundamental, and I've had to quote the seven bars from the Presto opening of the Ninth's last movement because I can't see any better way of doing it. I feel his way here is archetypal — suddenly, at the end of the slow movement, the raucous noise and that "take this away!"

Then the four blues and breaks began to work out in terms of verbal metaphors: solo voice (because it's blues) and nearly always bodily metaphors. Bit by bit they became the problems of joy and sorrow. I kept looking back to the Schiller and even used direct quotations, very small ones . . . But then comes the modern thing. I have to add: "And did my brother die of frostbite in the camp? And was my sister charred to cinders in the oven? We know not so much joy for so much sorrow." Then I had to make a sequence . . . so that you first get a pure blues — it's like the St. Louis Blues of Bessie Smith, just chord by chord, and the words are frightfully simple, though the vocal line can't like hers stay within the compass of a fifth . . . The chords are very rich, much richer than Bessie Smith would use, but they don't differ in tempo at all. The words are those of a child.

Next is a flamboyant fast blues when she has gone out into the world and is simply living in the normal sense. It's in the tradition of all the things you like with your mistress, from lips to thighs and whatever it may be. But then comes the blues of the bodies that aren't like that, which is deeply moving again — a slow 12-8 blues. "I found the man grown to a dwarf." After the circus, in his tent, he said: "So many take me for a doll," and "I found the girl born dumb and blind" — this is Helen Keller, of course — "She stroked my hand and tap-wrote in the palm: 'I feel but cannot see the sun.'" But at the same time it ends, "As I lay down beside my mate, body to body, we did heed the sorrow."

Then the whole thing finally took off into a long comment on the Ninth Symphony problem: whether we can rejoice at all. Which we do in the end, only it comes out as the "I have a dream" of Martin Luther King. It's a different kind of joy, much more tempered, not so grandiose. Now when I first showed Colin Davis these four texts ... he at once wrote and said, "This is not Schiller, it's Blake." And of course he's right, they're songs of innocence and experience. So that I had after all somehow worked back to the Goethe - Schiller - Hoelderlin period, but to the one contemporary who was totally unknown and unrelated to them, Blake the maverick, who was speaking at the same time.

... So what I've produced, to my surprise, is the famous hybrid work. Famous in the sense that it's had a tradition, of which obviously the Ninth is the greatest example. But it's tolerably rare even now, and it's not the sort of thing I would ever have simply sat down to write. It's something that forced itself upon me and which I shall never do again, so that now already the symphonic archetype has taken a new turn for me.

TIMES (SUNDAY)
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y
1,407,549

FEB 17 1974

New England Newsclip

Marvin Lichtner from Lee Gross

Composer Michael Tippett, whose Third Symphony will be given its New York premiere Wednesday and Friday by the Boston Symphony in Fisher Hall. "An infinite capacity to absorb and transform"

Week 16

p.31

GLOBE (E)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 195,032
FEB 16 1974
New England Newsclip

Tippett's Symphony No. 3: Excitement of a decade

MICHAEL STEINBERG

Do I begin with a reading of my personal barometer, noting that in 10 years of going to Boston Symphony concerts nothing has been so exciting as the first American performance yesterday afternoon of the Symphony No. 3 by Sir Michael Tippett? Yes, because I want it understood how special the occasion was, and how special the work that has been added to our musical landscape.

It is a big work, almost an hour, and divided in two equal parts. First, an outburst of energy, energy compressed, energy released, blasts of brass and percussion, rushing strings, the two characters set side by side without transition, each pairing longer than the previous one. Suddenly, it turns the corner and becomes a nocturne, windless sky at first, with flecks of wide-spaced or isolated high sound and much silence, then a deep, densely orchestral music out of earth or sea, then the sky-music again, more fragmented than before, with remembrances of earth and sea. That is the first part.

Then fun and games, bravura juggling with five crazily disparate objects, stopped by a violent gesture of dismissal, an archetypal gesture first made in music about a century and a half ago. What it is all about, what it is all for, is then set out in a series of blues: a song that looks back to childhood; a song of physical love, of bodies; the song of bodies that have gone wrong, and a song also of compassion, of milk and kisses; finally, the commitment to love.

SIR MICHAEL TIPPETT . . . energy and beauty.

No, the Beethoven Ninth cannot be escaped. Literally. The Tippett Third is by no means Adrian Leverkuehn's "taking back" of the Ninth, but it is perhaps a response to Adorno's statement that "after Auschwitz, it is no longer possible to write a poem." An optimist's response, an affirmation, but made out of the awareness that after Auschwitz. we need an affirmation in a different key — less straight out — from the Schiller-Beethoven one.

It is music of large ambition, technically and spiritually. The spirit speaks powerfully because the technique is so well in hand — and, of course, because Tippett's maverick fantasy, daring, and originality, are as large and generous as his ambition. Also, the urgency of his address is overwhelming.

He can bewilder (yesterday, thanks to rehearsals and to an advance copy of the Philips recording, was my seventh hearing in a week, and that helps). He covers a vast expressive range. He writes the gentlest music and the most abrasive, the most transparent and the most piled up, and he jumps as startlingly from one to the other as he moves from his Stravinsky-sparked language (which hardly ever sounds like Stravinsky) to Beethoven to mucous blues - with - flugelhorn. The orchestral conception is brilliant, the harmonic perspective rich (what an ear for right notes!), and the prodigality of detail in all dimensions is a wonder on and on. It is music I love to listen to.

It is difficult, but there, too, Tippett is an optimist with faith that the world will provide orchestras like the London Symphony (for which the work was written) and the B.S.O. (which plays it still better), conductors like Colin Davis, and singers like Heather Harper (stunningly translated from exquisite "Messiah" soprano to impassioned blues-wailer). The performance was marvellous, and, given it was Friday and that some of the ladies must have been taken aback by some of Tippett's poetry as by his music, the reception of all concerned, composer included, was warm.

GLOBE (E)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 195,032
FEB 14 1974
New England Newsclip

Colin Davis conducts Tippett's Symphony No. 3

MICHAEL STEINBERG

Sir Michael Tippett's Symphony No. 3 will have its first American performances at the Boston Symphony concerts tomorrow at 2 and Saturday at 8:30. Colin Davis, who led the world premiere in London in 1972, will conduct. There is a preview at an open rehearsal tonight at 8:30.

Tippett arrived here Tuesday to attend rehearsals and the concerts here and in New York. He then goes to Chicago for a Northwestern University production of his opera, "The Knot Garden," to Toronto for a Mendelssohn Choir performance of "The Vision of St. Augustine," then back to Chicago where he himself will conduct his Symphony No. 3 and his Piano Concerto at three Chicago Symphony concerts. He does not like all-Tippett (or all-anybody) concerts.

He is 69 — looking at him, one might guess middle to late 50s — and he bears his present celebrity with the same serene ease with which he dealt with the decades of misunderstanding and quasi-neglect that came before. He destroyed all of his works written before his 34th year and first came to wide notice in 1944 with the first hearing of "A Child of Our Time," an oratorio about the 1938 shooting of a German official in Paris by a young Polish Jewish refugee, an event that provided the excuse for the most violent program of the Nazi years.

In this work, which Davis introduces here next season, Tippett uses spirituals much as Bach used Lutheran hymns in his Passions. In "The Knot Garden" and Symphony No. 3, he uses blues, and he has long found America, its musics, its idiomatic speech, its landscapes (particulary those of the Southwest), fascinating "almost to obsession." Politically he will not always have sympathized: pacifism is a central passion with him, and during World War II he spent time in prison as a conscientious objector.

His life now is complicated by a degenerative disease of the retina, "a nuisance, mostly." He can read with a magnifying glass, composes on outsize manuscript paper, and is annoyed at the "assumption that when your sight goes, your mind goes too," which he infers from the fact that most of the books available in large print "seem to be by Agatha Christie" (he prefers Goethe, Yeats, and Jung). It means he has to conduct his symphony from memory in Chicago: "I know the music, but I have to make special effort to remember where I put the barlines. Anyway it won't be as good as here: after all, I'm not Colin."

Sir Michael Tippett scans score of Symphony No. 3.

p. 32

Week 16

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE
MONITOR (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 187,997

FEB 10 1974

New England
Newsclip

A double debut and a U.S. premiere

Tippett's Third Symphony, Michael Roll, Heather Harper, each bowed with Boston Symphony

By Thor Eckert Jr.

Last weekend's Boston Symphony concert marked a double debut and an American premiere: Michael Roll was soloist in the Schumann Piano Concerto in A minor, Op. 54, and Heather Harper was soprano soloist in the U.S. premiere of Sir Michael Tippett's Symphony No. 3. Colin Davis was conductor of both works.

The program opened with a lively performance of the Schumann concerto. From the opening chordal run it was evident that Mr. Roll is not only a gifted technician but has a splendid ear for the varied sonorities of his instrument. He played with an emphasis on clarity and a warm, sometimes impetuous, sometimes poetic, lyricism. It was a most persuasive statement of this bravura concerto. Conductor Davis led an able accompaniment, though at times he did not match Mr. Roll's sensitive attention to dynamic nuance, thus all but drowning out the pianist.

Sir Michael

Music

It is only in the past decade that Tippett has come into the prominence his music would seem to deserve. And it is also in the past 10 years that he has written some mature works that will rank him as one of the major musical talents of the 20th century. But, as in the case of all the major contemporary British composers, his music is an individualistic offshoot of the creative mainstream: Tippett is exploring new modes of expression within the traditional musical/notational system rather than abandoning that system for "avant-garde" modes. As heard in the Third Symphony, his music is a constantly vital argumentative treatise rather than an experiment in aimless sonorities.

Tippett's two favorite composers are Beethoven and Stravinsky and their presences are felt in this new work, along with that of the American composer Charles Ives.

The work is in two parts. Part One is a series of contrasts or arguments based on what the composer calls "arrest" and "movement." He likens the image to a jet plane: The "revving up" is the arrest — no visible forward thrust but plenty of tension — and the airborne flight is the movement.

There are five of these arguments, which culminate in the simultaneous playing of the "arrest" and "movement"; abruptly followed by the "slow movement" — a dreamlike, rather static section with occasional splashes of motion — much like drifting in outer space and watching an occasional object whizz by, or, as the composer notes, like Ishmail, in "Moby Dick," watching a school of whales swim by.

'Ode to Joy'

The second movement opens with a furious allegro molto which breaks out into the presto brass music of Beethoven's "Ode to Joy." This statement deteriorates rapidly into a slow blues with amplified soprano voice. The text, by the composer, comments on the message of the Beethoven and the possibility that we cannot rejoice, in the total Beethoven-Schiller sense of the ideal, nor can we utterly reject a message.

Part II evolves from the Beethoven and the jazz Blues and Breaks and becomes a very personalized abstraction of both.

The work holds together stunningly. From forceful opening to ambivalent close, the composer keeps the arguments and rests cogent, tense, and concise. If there is any weakness, it is in the at times strikingly unpoetic text. Sir Michael said, however, in an interview, that to have a poetic text, as he had once requested of T.S. Eliot, would, as Eliot told him, falsify the music by poeticizing the words. "If you can train yourself," Sir Michael said, "to do it [your own text-writing] . . . you can . . . come to a text which is integrally [woven] into what you've already decided are the musical operations. . . ."

The work is a supremely challenging virtuoso orchestral piece. The performance was, as best it could be assessed on two hearings — this performance and a Thursday rehearsal — quite remarkable, though there were a few minor lapses of rhythmic accuracy. Perhaps more problematic, however, was the inability of the orchestra to "swing" in the blues music. It was all so studied, and was in rather jarring contrast to the soloist, Heather Harper, who managed to get a "Bessie Smith" quality into her singing. Miss Harper in fact, gave a tour de force performance of the fantastically difficult vocal line and the capturing of the "free and easy" jazz beat. She turned into a shining vehicle what could have been a most ungrateful vocal assignment.

Mr. Davis knows the work well by now, having conducted both the world premiere and the recording. His obvious faith in the music permeated the performance — it was a powerful, convincing, premiere performance.

The Friday afternoon audience sat quietly through the 55-minute work and received the composer and the symphony with respect and even warmth, something they rarely do.

GLOBE (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042

FEB 19 1974

New England
Newsclip

Roll finds new excitement

MICHAEL STEINBERG

Once, even the Schumann Piano Concerto was a new piece. We forget. "You mustn't play it as though you knew what was coming," Colin Davis told the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Thursday evening's open rehearsal. The soloist was Michael Roll, a 27-year-old English pianist, and the performances which he, Davis, and the Boston Symphony gave Friday afternoon and Saturday evening were keen, vibrant evocations of what it must have been like when the Schumann was new and an adventure. Roll is an exceptionally interesting pianist, and I would have wished him a more auspicious occasion for his American debut than these concerts that found him sharing the bill with something so attention-hogging as Michael Tippett's 3d Symphony.

I would have wished him a better piano, too, but there we are — there isn't a first-rate Steinway concert grand in this town, and unlike Charles Rosen at Sanders the week before, Roll at least got to play on an instrument that was properly tuned and reasonably voiced. There was some hardness in fortissimo; otherwise, though, the playing was always considerate and colorful.

Roll played impetuously, with a nice feeling of both physical and mental quickness, with wit and some sense almost of caprice. He also rediscovered the virtuosity in the piece. When it was new, it was regarded embarrassingly reticent in that respect compared to the work of the great glitterers of that time, and now, pianists with Brahms, Rachmaninoff, and Prokofiev under their belts look at it with some slight sense of disdain, of "oh, we can do much harder things than that." But Schumann's writing is grateful, indeed downright brilliant, and Roll found a new excitement in its octaves and in the massive chord sequences of the cadenza.

The accompaniment provided by Davis and the orchestra was a beautiful model of flexibility, delicacy, and fire. Before I leave the subject of last weekend's concerts, let me say again how remarkable the playing of the Tippett symphony was — the ensemble virtuosity of brass and strings, and many of the solos, particularly those of Armando Ghitalla (flugelhorn), Burton Fine (viola), Ann Hobson (harp), Ralph Gomberg and John Holmes (oboes), Harold Wright (clarinet), and Sherman Walt (bassoon).

Week 16

HERALD-AMERICAN (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 424,654
FEB 16 1974
New England Newsclip

Davis Conducting Tippetts Fulfills Great Expectations

By ELLEN PFEIFER

Going to hear the premiere of Michael Tippett's Symphony No. 3 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Colin Davis Friday afternoon was a little like going to see "The Last Tango in Paris" at the height of all that media ballyhoo about the film. The big difference: there wasn't the usual disappointment following such heightened expectation.

The American tour of the 70-year old English composer, coinciding with performances of his works by the BSO, the Chicago Symphony and Northwestern University's opera department, has become nearly the event—for music buffs, that is—that "Tango" was, and has engendered feature articles in magazines, issuance of several recordings, pilgrimages by critics to the various performing sites, and hyperbole of the sort that ranks Tippett "among the supreme composers of any time or place."

This listener isn't ready to deny or uphold such a claim yet because much of Tippett's music is still not known. Only recently has it begun to be performed much in the U.S. and recordings have also been scarce. The Symphony No. 3, however, composed in 1972, is masterful.

Set in two parts with internal subdivisions that suggest the classic symphonic structure, the Symphony presents us again with dualities and the implication of wholeness comprising dualities which was a feature of Tippett's opera "The Midsummer Marriage." Specifically, this includes the contrasts between the tense, harmonic stasis of ostinato basses and a more directional flow of events which characterizes the opening subdivision; or the contrasts of deep, bass strings with high, transparent, ringing sonorities in the Lento section.

In contrast too, are the first and second parts—the first being totally abstract music, the second featuring a vocal

• Music Review

part with musical idioms taken from blues and Beethoven.

Of Part I, the opening section (corresponding to a first movement) is sinewy, witty, assymetrical in its rhythms, engaging. But, it's the Lento section that is really extraordinary, an incredible display of sonic imagination and instrumental writing with, as the program notes point out, a "tidal wave" of dark lyricism.

Part II, as we mentioned, combines blues and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony—the opening bars of the "Ode to Joy" fourth movement. Usually, such eclecticism is dangerous, suspect, but Tippett's is absolutely convincing, artful. He presents the Beethoven theme and then slashes out at the "Joy" it expresses, showing us, like Ivan Karamazov, all the cruel tricks life plays despite the presence of a so-called merciful God. He uses the blues to show us this state of things, composing a distillation of the style that ecompasses a huge vocal range (which Heather Harper negotiated with velvet tone, wonderful torchy chest voice, even blue notes). Then, in the words of Martin Luther King, he speaks an affirmation of life that is, to his mind, real and contemporary. To write about it, it seems trendy and awful, but it is instead wonderful.

Davis and the orchestra, along with Miss Harper, performed the piece with great virtuosity and conviction and tremendous intensity.

On the first half of the concert, pianist Michael Roll had the unenviable task of preceding the Tippet playing the Schumann Piano Concerto. However, it proved to be, not a warmup, but a surprisingly virile, crisp performance of a piece that too often is slobbered over.

The concert is performed again today at 2 p.m. I recommend that you not miss it.

GLOBE (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042
MAR 2 1974
New England Newsclip

Finnish conductor is guest with Symphony

OKKO KAMU
(Photo by Bob Backoff)

MICHAEL STEINBERG

Some minutes into yesterday's Boston Symphony concert I remembered that Okko Kamu, the young guest conductor from Helsinki, had been a winner of the von Karajan Competition in Berlin, and it was hard, after that, to stop seeing Karajan. Unlike The Great One, Kamu conducts with his eyes open and with a score in front of him, but he, too, keeps his beat a second or so ahead of where the orchestra is actually playing and he likes his music smoothed out.

Kamu is a talented conductor and coming to be an experienced one. He ought to be getting engagements in Indianapolis and Seattle and Atlanta, but I don't hear achievement of an order to make his coming to the Boston Symphony particularly appropriate at this point. Neither, I suspect, did some of the orchestra. Much of the playing was touched by absent-mindedness, and when it came to the famously difficult 32d-note upbeats in the slow movement of Beethoven's 4th Symphony, there were almost as many opinions as to their duration as there were players. Ah, democracy!

About the Beethoven 4th, Kamu grossly misunderstood one important point of character in that he took the first movement, marked as a lively allegro, in a fairly leisurely way, and then turned the finale, where Beethoven modifies allegro with "not too much", into a ripping presto. For the rest, like the "Egmont" Overture which preceded it, the symphony went uneventfully. In both Beethoven pieces, lyric parts were more convincingly realized than dramatic.

The second half of the program brought Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" and, before that, a Finnish piece, the Sinfonia by Aulis Sallinen. The composer was born 1935, the Sinfonia written 1971 and a winner that year of a competition sponsored by the city of Helsinki. It is in one fairly short movement, given to gestures of pathos, overfond of bells and shampoo-commercial harpsweeps, exceedingly static in harmony and rhythm. It would be a faceless, tedious piece anywhere and any time. but considering the good contemporary music which the Boston Symphony persistently does not play, the unleading here of this particular scow was doubly offensive.

Week 17

ITALIAN ECHO
EAST PROVIDENCE, R. I.
W. 15,000
FEB 14 1974
New England Newsclip

Okko Kamu To Conduct

On Thursday evening, Feb. 28 at 8:30 p.m., the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with conductor Okko Kamu in his Boston Symphony debut, makes its third and final visit to Providence for the 1973-74 season. Mr. Kamu opens the program with Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont" and follows with Beethoven's Symphony No. 4 in B flat. After intermission, the concert continues with Sallinen's Symphony. This concert marks the American premiere of the Sallinen work. The concert closes with Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel.

Okko Kamu, born in 1946, began studying the violin at the age of two with Vaino Arjava, concertmaster of the Helsinki Philharmonic Orchestra. When he was six he became a pupil at the Sibelius Academy where his teacher was Onni Suhonen, one of Finland's leading violin teachers. From 1966-68 Mr. Kamu was concertmaster of the Finnish National Opera Orchestra, and it was during this time that his conducting career really began. When engaged as a conductor for the first time it was when the Opera needed a new conductor. In Sept. of 1969 Mr. Kamu was engaged as a conductor of the Royal Opera in Stockholm. Subsequently he was awarded first prize in the First International Conductors Competition, sponsored by the Herberg von Karajan Foundation. Okko Kamu is the Chief Conductor of the Radio Symphony Orchestra of Helsinki. In addition to his guest conducting appearances in Europe, he has also appeared in the U.S. with the Orchestra of San Francisco, St. Louis, Hollywood Bowl and the Ravinia Festival in Chicago.

DORCHESTER ARGUS-CITIZEN
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 9,800
FEB 21 1974
New England Newsclip

MATTAPAN TRIBUNE
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 4,300
FEB 21 1974
New England Newsclip

Kamu to make debut

On Friday afternoon, March 1 at 2:00 p.m. and on Saturday evening, March 2 at 8:30 p.m., Conductor Okko Kamu makes his Boston Symphony Orchestra debut with works by Beethoven, Sallinen and Strauss.

The concerts open with Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont." Beethoven's Symphony No. 4 in B flat follows. After intermission, Mr. Kamu conducts the American premiere of Sallinen's Symphony. The concerts close with Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel.

Okko Kamu, born in 1946, began studying the violin at the age of two with Vaino Arjava, concertmaster of the Helsinki Philharmonic Orchestra. When he was six he became a pupil at the Sibelius Academy, where his teacher was Onni Suhonen, one of Finland's violin teachers. At eighteen he became first violinist in the leading Finnish string quartet, the Suhonen Quartet. From 1966 to 1968 Mr. Kamu was concertmaster of the Finnish National Opera Orchestra, and it was during this time that his conducting career really began. When the Opera needed a new conductor, he received the post. In September of 1969 Mr. Kamu was engaged as a conductor of the Royal Opera in Stockholm. Subsequently he was awarded first prize in the First International Conductors Competition, sponsored by the Herberg von Karajan Foundation. Okko Kamu is the Chief Conductor of the Radio Symphony Orchestra of Helsinki. In addition to his guest conducting appearances in Europe, he has also appeared in the United States with the Orchestras of San Francisco, St. Louis, Hollywood Bowl and the Ravinia Festival in Chicago.

Week 16

HERALD-AMERICAN (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 424,654
FEB 1 6 1974
New England Newsclip

Davis Conducting Tippetts Fulfills Great Expectations

By ELLEN PFEIFER

Going to hear the premiere of Michael Tippett's Symphony No. 3 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Colin Davis Friday afternoon was a little like going to see "The Last Tango in Paris" at the height of all that media ballyhoo about the film. The big difference: there wasn't the usual disappointment following such heightened expectation.

The American tour of the 70-year old English composer, coinciding with performances of his works by the BSO, the Chicago Symphony and Northwestern University's opera department, has become nearly the event—for music buffs, that is—that "Tango" was, and has engendered feature articles in magazines, issuance of several recordings, pilgrimages by critics to the various performing sites, and hyperbole of the sort that ranks Tippett "among the supreme composers of any time or place."

This listener isn't ready to deny or uphold such a claim yet because much of Tippett's music is still not known. Only recently has it begun to be performed much in the U.S. and recordings have also been scarce. The Symphony No. 3, however, composed in 1972, is masterful.

Set in two parts with internal subdivisions that suggest the classic symphonic structure, the Symphony presents us again with dualities and the implication of wholeness comprising dualities which was a feature of Tippett's opera "The Midsummer Marriage." Specifically, this includes the contrasts between the tense, harmonic stasis of ostinato basses and a more directional flow of events which characterizes the opening subdivision; or the contrasts of deep, bass strings with high, transparent, ringing sonorities in the Lento section.

In contrast too, are the first and second parts—the first being totally abstract music, the second featuring a vocal

• Music Review

part with musical idioms taken from blues and Beethoven.

Of Part I, the opening section (corresponding to a first movement) is sinewy, witty, assymetrical in its rhythms, engaging. But, it's the Lento section that is really extraordinary, an incredible display of sonic imagination and instrumental writing with, as the program notes point out, a "tidal wave" of dark lyricism.

Part II, as we mentioned, combines blues and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony—the opening bars of the "Ode to Joy" fourth movement. Usually, such eclecticism is dangerous, suspect, but Tippett's is absolutely convincing, artful. He presents the Beethoven theme and then slashs out at the "Joy" it expresses, showing us, like Ivan Karamazov, all the cruel tricks life plays despite the presence of a so-called merciful God. He uses the blues to show us this state of things, composing a distillation of the style that ecompasses a huge vocal range (which Heather Harper negotiated with velvet tone, wonderful torchy chest voice, even blue notes). Then, in the words of Martin Luther King, he speaks an affirmation of life that is, to his mind, real and contemporary. To write about it, it seems trendy and awful, but it is instead wonderful.

Davis and the orchestra, along with Miss Harper, performed the piece with great virtuosity and conviction and tremendous intensity.

On the first half of the concert, pianist Michael Roll had the unenviable task of preceding the Tippet playing the Schumann Piano Concerto. However, it proved to be, not a warmup, but a surprisingly virile, crisp performance of a piece that too often is slobbered over.

The concert is performed again today at 2 p.m. I recommend that you not miss it.

GLOBE (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042
MAR 2 1974
New England Newsclip

Finnish conductor is guest with Symphony

OKKO KAMU
(Photo by Bob Backoff)

MICHAEL STEINBERG

Some minutes into yesterday's Boston Symphony concert I remembered that Okko Kamu, the young guest conductor from Helsinki, had been a winner of the von Karajan Competition in Berlin, and it was hard, after that, to stop seeing Karajan. Unlike The Great One, Kamu conducts with his eyes open and with a score in front of him, but he, too, keeps his beat a second or so ahead of where the orchestra is actually playing and he likes his music smoothed out.

Kamu is a talented conductor and coming to be an experienced one. He ought to be getting engagements in Indianapolis and Seattle and Atlanta, but I don't hear achievement of an order to make his coming to the Boston Symphony particularly appropriate at this point. Neither, I suspect, did some of the orchestra. Much of the playing was touched by absent-mindedness, and when it came to the famously difficult 32d-note upbeats in the slow movement of Beethoven's 4th Symphony, there were almost as many opinions as to their duration as there were players. Ah, democracy!

About the Beethoven 4th, Kamu grossly misunderstood one important point of character in that he took the first movement, marked as a lively allegro, in a fairly leisurely way, and then turned the finale, where Beethoven modifies allegro with "not too much", into a ripping presto. For the rest, like the "Egmont" Overture which preceded it, the symphony went uneventfully. In both Beethoven pieces, lyric parts were more convincingly realized than dramatic.

The second half of the program brought Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" and, before that, a Finnish piece, the Sinfonia by Aulis Sallinen. The composer was born 1935, the Sinfonia written 1971 and a winner that year of a competition sponsored by the city of Helsinki. It is in one fairly short movement, given to gestures of pathos, overfond of bells and shampoo-commercial harpsweeps, exceedingly static in harmony and rhythm. It would be a faceless, tedious piece anywhere and any time. but considering the good contemporary music which the Boston Symphony persistently does not play, the unleading here of this particular scow was doubly offensive.

p. 33

Week 17

ITALIAN ECHO
EAST PROVIDENCE, R. I.
W. 15,000
FEB 14 1974
New England Newsclip

Okko Kamu To Conduct

On Thursday evening, Feb. 28 at 8:30 p.m., the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with conductor Okko Kamu in his Boston Symphony debut, makes its third and final visit to Providence for the 1973-74 season. Mr. Kamu opens the program with Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont" and follows with Beethoven's Symphony No. 4 in B flat. After intermission, the concert continues with Sallinen's Symphony. This concert marks the American premiere of the Sallinen work. The concert closes with Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel.

Okko Kamu, born in 1946, began studying the violin at the age of two with Vaino Arjava, concertmaster of the Helsinki Philharmonic Orchestra. When he was six he became a pupil at the Sibelius Academy where his teacher was Onni Suhonen, one of Finland's leading violin teachers. From 1966-68 Mr. Kamu was concertmaster of the Finnish National Opera Orchestra, and it was during this time that his conducting career really began. When engaged as a conductor for the first time it was when the Opera needed a new conductor. In Sept. of 1969 Mr. Kamu was engaged as a conductor of the Royal Opera in Stockholm. Subsequently he was awarded first prize in the First International Conductors Competition, sponsored by the Herberg von Karajan Foundation. Okko Kamu is the Chief Conductor of the Radio Symphony Orchestra of Helsinki. In addition to his guest conducting appearances in Europe, he has also appeared in the U.S. with the Orchestra of San Francisco, St. Louis, Hollywood Bowl and the Ravinia Festival in Chicago.

DORCHESTER ARGUS-CITIZEN
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 9,200
FEB 21 1974
New England Newsclip

MATTAPAN TRIBUNE
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 4,300
FEB 21 1974
New England Newsclip

Kamu to make debut

On Friday afternoon, March 1 at 2:00 p.m. and on Saturday evening, March 2 at 8:30 p.m., Conductor Okko Kamu makes his Boston Symphony Orchestra debut with works by Beethoven, Sallinen and Strauss.

The concerts open with Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont." Beethoven's Symphony No. 4 in B flat follows. After intermission, Mr. Kamu conducts the American premiere of Sallinen's Symphony. The concerts close with Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel.

Okko Kamu, born in 1946, began studying the violin at the age of two with Vaino Arjava, concertmaster of the Helsinki Philharmonic Orchestra. When he was six he became a pupil at the Sibelius Academy, where his teacher was Onni Suhonen, one of Finland's violin teachers. At eighteen he became first violinist in the leading Finnish string quartet, the Suhonen Quartet. From 1966 to 1968 Mr. Kamu was concertmaster of the Finnish National Opera Orchestra, and it was during this time that his conducting career really began. When the Opera needed a new conductor, he received the post. In September of 1969 Mr. Kamu was engaged as a conductor of the Royal Opera in Stockholm. Subsequently he was awarded first prize in the First International Conductors Competition, sponsored by the Herberg von Karajan Foundation. Okko Kamu is the Chief Conductor of the Radio Symphony Orchestra of Helsinki. In addition to his guest conducting appearances in Europe, he has also appeared in the United States with the Orchestras of San Francisco, St. Louis, Hollywood Bowl and the Ravinia Festival in Chicago.

p.34

Week 17

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 187,897
MAR 4 1974
New England Newsclip

Finn conductor

Kamu in BSO bow and Newman's digital Bach

By Thor Eckert, Jr.

Okko Kamu, who made his local debut conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the weekend, is a young maestro of considerable talent.

Originally a violinist, he began conducting after joining the Finnish National Opera Orchestra. He was later engaged as a conductor for the Royal Opera of Stockholm (1969) and won first prize in the First International Conductor's Competition sponsored by the von Karajan Foundation. He is now chief conductor of the Radio Symphony Orchestra of Helsinki.

For his program, Mr. Kamu chose two Beethoven works — the "Egmont" overture and the Fourth Symphony — Finnish composer Aulis Sallinen's "Sinfonia," and Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

The Beethoven works comprised the first half of the concert. Both pieces received strongly lyric performances. The strings took on a darker luster. changing the whole sound of the orchestra. Attacks were more cushioned — precise, but with the crystalline edge softened, an approach favored by certain European conductors.

The performance of the Fourth Symphony was particularly lovely in its understatement of dynamic contrast — some conductors are prone to doubling fortes and halving pianissimos in this score — and its grandly joyous sweep. Mr. Kamu cuts a fine figure on the podium. His movements are ebullient and lithe without exhibitionism.

After the intermission, the first American performance of the Sallinen "Sinfonia" gave a taste of prize-winning, contemporary Finnish composition. The work is based on, and evolved from, the F-sharp minor chord in its second inversion (six-four position) generally the weakest form of any chord, musically speaking. It gives this eminently accessible piece an air of mystery and ambivalence. The Friday afternoon audience seemed quite appreciative of its strong tonal appeal, and, as an exploration of a chord and a "main theme," it has more than a few effective moments, without being especially consistent or ground-breaking. Some strange percussion punctuation tended, however, to add to the din of the climaxes and make unnecessary noise at other times.

Mr. Kamu brought to the closing Strauss the same emphatic lyricism, as well as the sharper attack necessary for this complex score. It was a scintillating, witty, and — when necessary — towering, dramatic reading of this imposing tone-poem.

The orchestra members — apparently somewhat depleted in the string sections — were not up to par in the Beethoven. In fact, there were at least four exposed clinkers from the strings. But by the time the Sallinen came round, everyone was in form, and the execution of the last two selections — both quite difficult — was excellent.

Music

No doubt Mr. Kamu will be back again — he was certainly a hit with the Friday afternoon ladies.

A respectably large audience was assembled in Jordan Hall Friday evening to greet harpsichordist Anthony Newman.

Nr. Newman's all-Bach program consisted of the entire 24-book Well Tempered Clavier, the Chromatic Fantasy and Fugue in D minor, and the Italian Concerto. It was a long (2½ hours) concert, and no doubt quite grueling for those not initiated to Bach keyboard music or Mr. Newman's style.

The "Clavier" cycle, in the best of circumstances, is heavy going in recital — and on the harpsichord the listener has to work doubly hard to follow (and therefore appreciate) Bach's fugal genius — and it was at least courageous of the artist to attempt it.

Newman is gifted with a truly prodigious technique — the mistakes were so few (though as a consequence when they did occur more glaring) that they are not worth cataloguing. Mr. Newman never hesitated to turn the music into mere technical display — the Chromatic Fantasy was a dazzling digital accomplishment, but musical values tended to be sidestepped in the effortless production of notes.

The whole recital ended up as a kind of exercise: He strode in garbed in black — jacket, turtle-neck, trousers, shoes, even socks — took off his jacket, rolled up his sleeves, arranged his music (which he used for all pieces) and began plowing through the thick and thin of Bach's notes.

There were moments where the harpsichordist revealed a very keen musical sense. In some of the preludes and fugues, when he was not inserting some bizarre ritards and pauses, there was a certain poetry to his music-making. And the Andante of the Italian Concerto was, indeed, most effective. But then he charged into the Presto, whizzing through the notes as if there were no tomorrow. The audience reaction to it all was mixed — his vociferous fans tried frantically to turn this into a standing-ovation triumph, but many people remained unconvinced . . . there is more to Bach than technique. Those looking for the music must have felt somewhat cheated.

JOURNAL (M)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
D. 67,117
MAR 1 1974
New England Newsclip

Okko Kamu, 28, conducts Boston Symphony here

By EDWIN SAFFORD

For its third and final concert of the season the Boston Symphony Orchestra, brought along Okko Kamu as conductor last night. The Veterans auditorium concert was his debut with the Bostonians.

Kamu is a 28-year-old Finn, winner of the first International Conductors Competition organized by the Herbert von Karajan Foundation and presently chief conductor of the Helsinki Radio Symphony Orchestra in his homeland. In this country he has been guest conductor of the San Francisco, St. Louis and Hollywood Bowl orchestras and at the Ravinia Festival.

Thursday nights at home in Symphony Hall are often open dress rehearsals for the Boston Symphony when fresh programs are involved. Kamu had a handicap in that respect. Appearing with the orchestra before a subscription audience for the first time, he could be forgiven for some frayed edges in the early part of the concert, Beethoven's overture to "Egmont" and fourth symphony.

When it came to the American premiere of Aulis Sallinen's Sinfonia it was evident more time had been spent in preparation. The composer, also a Finn and 11 years Kamu's senior, appeared to be in the lineage of Sibelius as exemplified by the later symphonies.

While tonal the Sinfonia was worked out very much in the abstract manner of those scores. Dissonances were present though in terms generally of two opposing notes. The large orchestration called for some interesting doublings such as between contrabass and flute and a brief waltz section near the end was an attention grabber.

If the piece hardly was what you might call advanced in style it was at the same time far from dull but rather an extension of an already established method. Furthermore its passionate tension could not be overlooked.

As suggested the Beethoven symphony was not quite perfection. Yet Kamu extracted a pre-"Pastorale" clarity from it which could be enjoyed. He took the final allegro ma non troppo movement at a perpetual motion clip and that brought an enthusiastic response from the full house.

For a finish there was "Till Eulenspiegel" by Richard Strauss. There also small ragged sections were heard, especially among the winds. Still the conductor's pleasure in his work was infectious. None of his energies were misplaced, he had notions of his own to contribute and, with his slim figure, left a forceful impression.

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
W. 6,043
FEB 13 1974
New England Newsclip

Symphony to present a premier

BOSTON — On Friday afternoon, March 1 at 2 p.m. and on Saturday evening, March 2 at 8:30 p.m., Conductor Okko Kamu makes his Boston Symphony Orchestra debut with works by Beethoven, Sallinen and Strauss.

The concerts open with Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont." Beethoven's Symphony no. 4 in B flat follows. After intermission, Mr. Kamu conducts the American premiere of Sallinen's Symphony. The concerts close with Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel.

Okko Kamu, born in 1946, began studying the violin at the age of two with Vaino Arjava, concertmaster of the Helsinki Philharmonic Orchestra. When he was six he became a pupil at the Sibelius Academy, where his teacher was Onni Suhonen, one of Finland's leading violin teachers.

At eighteen he became first violinist in the leading Finnish string quartet, the Suhonen Quartet. From 1966 to 1968 Mr. Kamu was concertmaster of the Finnish National Opera Orchestra, and it was during this time that his conducting career really began. When the Opera needed a new conductor, he received the post.

In September of 1969 Mr. Kamu was engaged as a conductor of the Royal Opera in Stockholm. Subsequently he was awarded first prize in the First International Conductors Competition, sponsored by the Herberg von Karajan Foundation. Okko Kamu is the Chief Conductor of the Radio Symphony Orchestra of Helsinki.

In addition to his guest conducting appearances in Europe, he has also appeared in the United States with the Orchestras of San Francisco, St. Louis, Hollywood Bowl and the Ravinia Festival in Chicago.

p.34

Week 17

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 187,897
MAR 4 1974
New England Newsclip

Finn conductor

Kamu in BSO bow and Newman's digital Bach

By Thor Eckert, Jr.

Okko Kamu, who made his local debut conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the weekend, is a young maestro of considerable talent.

Originally a violinist, he began conducting after joining the Finnish National Opera Orchestra. He was later engaged as a conductor for the Royal Opera of Stockholm (1969) and won first prize in the First International Conductor's Competition sponsored by the von Karajan Foundation. He is now chief conductor of the Radio Symphony Orchestra of Helsinki.

For his program, Mr. Kamu chose two Beethoven works — the "Egmont" overture and the Fourth Symphony — Finnish composer Aulis Sallinen's "Sinfonia," and Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

The Beethoven works comprised the first half of the concert. Both pieces received strongly lyric performances. The strings took on a darker luster. changing the whole sound of the orchestra. Attacks were more cushioned — precise, but with the crystalline edge softened, an approach favored by certain European conductors.

The performance of the Fourth Symphony was particularly lovely in its understatement of dynamic contrast — some conductors are prone to doubling fortes and halving pianissimos in this score — and its grandly joyous sweep. Mr. Kamu cuts a fine figure on the podium. His movements are ebullient and lithe without exhibitionism.

After the intermission, the first American performance of the Sallinen "Sinfonia" gave a taste of prize-winning, contemporary Finnish composition. The work is based on, and evolved from, the F-sharp minor chord in its second inversion (six-four position) generally the weakest form of any chord, musically speaking. It gives this eminently accessible piece an air of mystery and ambivalence. The Friday afternoon audience seemed quite appreciative of its strong tonal appeal, and, as an exploration of a chord and a "main theme," it has more than a few effective moments, without being especially consistent or ground-breaking. Some strange percussion punctuation tended, however, to add to the din of the climaxes and make unnecessary noise at other times.

Mr. Kamu brought to the closing Strauss the same emphatic lyricism, as well as the sharper attack necessary for this complex score. It was a scintillating, witty, and — when necessary — towering, dramatic reading of this imposing tone-poem.

The orchestra members — apparently somewhat depleted in the string sections — were not up to par in the Beethoven. In fact, there were at least four exposed clinkers from the strings. But by the time the Sallinen came round, everyone was in form, and the execution of the last two selections — both quite difficult — was excellent.

Music

No doubt Mr. Kamu will be back again — he was certainly a hit with the Friday afternoon ladies.

A respectably large audience was assembled in Jordan Hall Friday evening to greet harpsichordist Anthony Newman.

Nr. Newman's all-Bach program consisted of the entire 24-book Well Tempered Clavier, the Chromatic Fantasy and Fugue in D minor, and the Italian Concerto. It was a long (2½ hours) concert, and no doubt quite grueling for those not initiated to Bach keyboard music or Mr. Newman's style.

The "Clavier" cycle, in the best of circumstances, is heavy going in recital — and on the harpsichord the listener has to work doubly hard to follow (and therefore appreciate) Bach's fugal genius — and it was at least courageous of the artist to attempt it.

Newman is gifted with a truly prodigious technique — the mistakes were so few (though as a consequence when they did occur more glaring) that they are not worth cataloguing. Mr. Newman never hesitated to turn the music into mere technical display — the Chromatic Fantasy was a dazzling digital accomplishment, but musical values tended to be sidestepped in the effortless production of notes.

The whole recital ended up as a kind of exercise: He strode in garbed in black — jacket, turtle-neck, trousers, shoes, even socks — took off his jacket, rolled up his sleeves, arranged his music (which he used for all pieces) and began plowing through the thick and thin of Bach's notes.

There were moments where the harpsichordist revealed a very keen musical sense. In some of the preludes and fugues, when he was not inserting some bizarre ritards and pauses, there was a certain poetry to his music-making. And the Andante of the Italian Concerto was, indeed, most effective. But then he charged into the Presto, whizzing through the notes as if there were no tomorrow. The audience reaction to it all was mixed — his vociferous fans tried frantically to turn this into a standing-ovation triumph, but many people remained unconvinced . . . there is more to Bach than technique. Those looking for the music must have felt somewhat cheated.

JOURNAL (M)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
D. 67,117
MAR 1 1974
New England Newsclip

Okko Kamu, 28, conducts Boston Symphony here

By EDWIN SAFFORD

For its third and final concert of the season the Boston Symphony Orchestra, brought along Okko Kamu as conductor last night. The Veterans auditorium concert was his debut with the Bostonians.

Kamu is a 28-year-old Finn, winner of the first International Conductors Competition organized by the Herbert von Karajan Foundation and presently chief conductor of the Helsinki Radio Symphony Orchestra in his homeland. In this country he has been guest conductor of the San Francisco, St. Louis and Hollywood Bowl orchestras and at the Ravinia Festival.

Thursday nights at home in Symphony Hall are often open dress rehearsals for the Boston Symphony when fresh programs are involved. Kamu had a handicap in that respect. Appearing with the orchestra before a subscription audience for the first time, he could be forgiven for some frayed edges in the early part of the concert, Beethoven's overture to "Egmont" and fourth symphony.

When it came to the American premiere of Aulis Sallinen's Sinfonia it was evident more time had been spent in preparation. The composer, also a Finn and 11 years Kamu's senior, appeared to be in the lineage of Sibelius as exemplified by the later symphonies.

While tonal the Sinfonia was worked out very much in the abstract manner of those scores. Dissonances were present though in terms generally of two opposing notes. The large orchestration called for some interesting doublings such as between contrabass and flute and a brief waltz section near the end was an attention grabber.

If the piece hardly was what you might call advanced in style it was at the same time far from dull but rather an extension of an already established method. Furthermore its passionate tension could not be overlooked.

As suggested the Beethoven symphony was not quite perfection. Yet Kamu extracted a pre-"Pastorale" clarity from it which could be enjoyed. He took the final allegro ma non troppo movement at a perpetual motion clip and that brought an enthusiastic response from the full house.

For a finish there was "Till Eulenspiegel" by Richard Strauss. There also small ragged sections were heard, especially among the winds. Still the conductor's pleasure in his work was infectious. None of his energies were misplaced, he had notions of his own to contribute and, with his slim figure, left a forceful impression.

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
W. 6,073
FEB 13 1974
New England Newsclip

Symphony to present a premier

BOSTON — On Friday afternoon, March 1 at 2 p.m. and on Saturday evening, March 2 at 8:30 p.m., Conductor Okko Kamu makes his Boston Symphony Orchestra debut with works by Beethoven, Sallinen and Strauss.

The concerts open with Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont." Beethoven's Symphony no. 4 in B flat follows. After intermission, Mr. Kamu conducts the American premiere of Sallinen's Symphony. The concerts close with Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel.

Okko Kamu, born in 1946, began studying the violin at the age of two with Vaino Arjava, concertmaster of the Helsinki Philharmonic Orchestra. When he was six he became a pupil at the Sibelius Academy, where his teacher was Onni Suhonen, one of Finland's leading violin teachers.

At eighteen he became first violinist in the leading Finnish string quartet, the Suhonen Quartet. From 1966 to 1968 Mr. Kamu was concertmaster of the Finnish National Opera Orchestra, and it was during this time that his conducting career really began. When the Opera needed a new conductor, he received the post.

In September of 1969 Mr. Kamu was engaged as a conductor of the Royal Opera in Stockholm. Subsequently he was awarded first prize in the First International Conductors Competition, sponsored by the Herberg von Karajan Foundation. Okko Kamu is the Chief Conductor of the Radio Symphony Orchestra of Helsinki.

In addition to his guest conducting appearances in Europe, he has also appeared in the United States with the Orchestras of San Francisco, St. Louis, Hollywood Bowl and the Ravinia Festival in Chicago.

SUN-CHRONICLE (E)
ATTLEBORO, MASS.
D. 18,000
MAR 8 1974 New England Newsclip

Week 17

P. 35

SEIJI OZAWA — He's back in Boston to conduct "his" orchestra, the Boston Symphony, this afternoon and Saturday night in a program of works by Haydn and Schoenberg.

Kamu Young Maestro with Talent

By THOR ECKERT JR.
Monitor News Service

BOSTON — Okko Kamu, who made his local debut conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the weekend, is a young maestro of considerable talent.

Originally a violinist, he began conducting after joining the Finnish National Opera Orchestra. He was later engaged as a conductor for the Royal Opera of Stockholm (1969) and won first prize in the First International Conductor's Competition sponsored by the von Karajan Foundation. He is now chief conductor of the Radio Symphony Orchestra of Helsinki.

For his program, Kamu chose two Beethoven works — the "Egmont" overture and the Fourth Symphony — Finnish composer Aulis Sallinen's "Sinfonia," and Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

The Beethoven works comprised the first half of the concert. Both pieces received strongly lyric performances. The strings took on a darker luster. Changing the whole sound of the orchestra. Attacks were more cushioned — precise, but with the crystalline edge softened, an approach favored by certain European conductors.

The performance of the Fourth Symphony was particularly lovely in its understatement of dynamic contract — some conductors are prone to doubling fortes and halving pianissimos in this score — and its grandly joyous sweep. Kamu cuts a fine figure on the podium. His movements are ebullient and lithe without exhibitionism.

After the intermission, the first American performance of the Sallinen "Sinfonia" gave a taste of prize-winning, contemporary Finnish composition. The work is based on, and evolved from, the F-sharp minor chord in its second inversion (six-four position) generally the weakest form of any chord, musically speaking. It gives this eminently accessible piece an air of mystery and ambivlaence.

The Friday afternoon audience seemed quite appreciative of its strong tonal appeal, and, as an exploration of a chord and a "main theme," it has more than a few effective moments, without being especially consistent or ground-breaking. Some strange percussion punctuation tended, however, to add to the din of the climaxes and make unnecessary noise at other times.

Kamu brought to the closing Strauss the same emphatic lyricism, as well as the sharper attack necessary for this complex score. It was a scintillating, witty, and — when necessary — towering, dramtic reading of this imposing tone-poem.

The orchestra members — apparently somewhat depleted in the string sections — were not up to par in the Beethoven. In fact, there were at least four exposed clinkers from the strings. But by the time the Sallinen came round, everyone was in form, and the execution of the last two selections — both quite difficult — was excellent.

No doubt Kamu will be back again — he was certainly a hit with the Friday afternoon ladies.

A respectably large audience was assembled in Jordan Hall Friday evening to greet harpsichordist Anthony Newman.

Newman's all-Bach program consisted of the entire 24-book Well Tempered Clavier, the Chromatic Fantasy and Fugue in D minor, and the Italian Concerto. It was a long (2½ hours) concert, and no doublt quite grueling for those not initiated to Bach keyboard music or Newman's style.

The "Clavier" cycle, in the best of circumstances, is heavy going in recital — and on the harpsichord the listener has to work doubly hard to follow (and therefore appreciate) Bach's fugal genius — and it was at least courageous of the artist to attempt it.

Newman is gifted with a truly prodigious technique — the mistakes were so few (though as a consequence when they did occur more glaring) that they are not worth cataloguing. Newman never hesitated to turn the music into mere technical display — the Chromatic Fantasy was a dazzling digital accomplishment, but musical values tened to be sidestepped in the effortless production of notes.

The whole recital ended up as a kind of exercise: He strode in garbed in black — jacket, turtleneck, trousers, shoes, even socks — took off his jacket, rolled up his sleeves, arranged his music (which he used for all pieces) and began plowing through the thick and thin of Bach's notes.

There were moments where the harpsichordist revealed a very keen musical sense. In some of the preludes and fugues, when he was not inserting some bizarre ritards and pauses, there was a certain poetry to his music-making. And the Andante of the Italian Concerto was, indeed, most effective. But then he charged into the Presto, whizzing through the notes as if there were no tomorrow.

The audience reaction to it all was mixed — his vociferous fans tried frantically to turn this into a standing-ovation triumph, but many people remained unconvinced . . . there is more to Bach than technique.

Those looking for the music must have felt somewhat cheated.

HERALD-AMERICAN (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 424,654
MAR 2 1974 New England Newsclip

Kamu Conducts Karate-Chop Style

By ELLEN PFEIFER

Okko Kamu, 27-year old chief conductor of the Radio Symphony Orchestra of Helsinki, Finland, made his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall. He brought with him a karate chop style of conducting and a program of conventional repertory items — Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture and Fourth Symphony and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche" — spiked by the premeire of the Sinfonia by Finnish composer Auluis Sallinent.

A violin prodigy who began lessons at two, commanded the finest teachers at six, became first violinist with Finland's most prestigious string quartet at 18 and concert master with Finnish National Opera at 20, Kamu is, necessarily, still fairly new at the conducting game. The package he presented was a mixed one, conscientious in his approach to the score, serious of purpose, but a bit overcautious even listless, in some cases, immature as concerns the expressive content of the music, and a little uncertain about things like style (as manifest in his decision not to take the repeats of exposition sections).

• Music Review

The Sallinen Sinfonia, composed in 1971, shared first place in the composition contest sponsored by Helsinki in honor of the inauguration of the new Finlandia House. Like many works which win prizes (or performers who win contests), it is not particularly revolutionary and probably would never offend an audience. It is meant primarily to please and succeeds in pleasing even those listeners whose level of tolerance to contemporary music is extremely low.

It is Twentieth Century cream of wheat.

Mostly it sounds like a few ideas pasted together with only the most clumsy and arbitrary of unifying devices — this, despite Kamu's program notes which detail a bipartite structure having an exposition and then a scherzo, reprise and coda. That unifying element comes in the form of a two-note phrase which is repeated almost obsessively without ever being developed or transformed in a very interesting manner.

Sallinen is described in the notes as mainly a composer of chamber music which, translated for the purposes of this piece, means that his orchestration is limited in imagination and sense of what goes well with what. In particular, percussion instruments seemed to be used in a very peculiar manner — the sonorities combined strangely with other instruments and the figures repetitious.

Harmonically, too, it isn't very interesting. The idiom is conservative and mainly tonal and one feels about this the way one often does about conservative political commentators. There is definitely an audience for that point of view, but so rarely an eloquent voice to speak it.

The BSO played the piece very attractively under Kamu's direction and there was particularly lovely solo work by violist Burton Fine.

p. 36

week 18

HERALD-AMERICAN (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 424,654

MAR 8 1974 New England Newsclip

Musical Setting of Schoenberg's 'Ode' Exciting

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

Works taken from the beginnings and near-ends of both the careers of Haydn and Arnold Schoenberg made for an interesting symmetry in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's programme at Symphony Hall last night. Under Seiji Ozawa, the works selected — Haydn's Symphony No. 1 and Sinfonia Concertante (from his 27th and 60th years) and Schoenberg's string orchestra versions of "Verklaerte Nacht" and "Ode to Napoleon Buonaparte" (composed at 25 and 68 years of age)—made also for an evening very heavy on the string sonorities.

That was not helped by the fact that the BSO strings were playing very roughly indeed.

Heard here in its Boston Symphony premiere, the Schoenberg "Ode" is, like "Verklaerte Nacht," to be found originally in a chamber ensemble version — a quartet of strings, piano and reciter. For its text, it uses Byron's poem of the same name in which the poet pours out, in less than his most eloquent language, contempt for his former idol, the fallen emperor Buonaparte.

The generally held opinion is that Schoenberg (who was forced to flee Nazi Germany) saw in Byron's Buonaparte a symbol of Hitler. The program notes point out, however, that Schoneberg never admired Hitler, that the symbolism really doesn't fit, ad that the poem, too, is pretty mediocre stuff.

Nevertheless, the musical setting is extremely exciting and the poem transcended. Iit is particularly engaging for its great rhythmic interest and vitality, and for the masterful counterpoint.

The performance, with Daniel Windham, narrator and Paul Jacobs, piano, proved curiously unfocused, however.

Windham, to his credit, did not declaim the text in the non-expressive sing-song that most often passes for that difficult not-song, not-speech technique known as Sprechgesang. His reciting leaned more heavily toward the speech side with an unusual emphasis on the theatrical. Except that he was almost exaggeratedly expressive, somewhat uncertain of the very definitely specified rhythms, and electronically over-amplified so that the balances between voice, piano and strings were thrown out of kilter.

The "great stereophonic duel of piano and strings" which Glenn Gould once wrote was therefore blunted in effect and this was abetted by the blur made out of most of the counterpoint and rhythms.

There was the same problem with counterpoint in the "Verklaerte Nacht" transcription—one seemed to hear very little else but first and second violins.

Haydn's First Symphony, like the early Mozart pieces, is a curiosity piece, because it's youthful and not because it's really very interesting. Cast in the early "pre-symphony" three-movement, pre-sonata form structure, it is hardly a "real" symphony as one has come to expect. It, too, employes mostly strings —the pairs of oboes and horns used sparingly and then without independent life of their own.

Also something of an archaism was the Sinfonia Concertante — a concerto grosso type work with a solo quartet of violin, cello, oboe and bassoon. Again the performances were marred by less than refined string playing from the tutti and some pitch problems by the string soloists.

GLOBE (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042

MAR 9 1974 New England Newsclip

MICHAEL STEINBERG

'Ode to Napoleon' receives fiery rendition from BSO

Hitler refugees in America adored Franklin D. Roosevelt. One of the most curious and also one of the most powerful records of that feeling, as well, of course, of loathing for Hitler, is Schoenberg's setting of Byron's "Ode to Napoleon Buonaparte," composed 1942 and given fiery performances at the Boston Symphony concerts Thursday and yesterday.

The poem was the immediate reaction to the news of Napoleon's abdication and the work of a single morning. Untroubled by sentimentalities about not kicking an opponent when he is down, Byron produced a 16-stanza jeer, plus, as an afterthought at his publisher's command, three concluding stanzas in praise of George Washington. A virtuosic editorial in verse, it presents in ideal form the snotty brilliance of a good George Frazier column. It's fun.

Schoenberg's setting may be one of those instances — you find many among the songs of Hugo Wolf — of a composer's taking a text more seriously than it was meant to be taken, and with astonishing, illuminating results. The disappointment of early idealistic admirers was not an issue with Hitler, as it had been with Napoleon (and surely the bitterness of Byron's disappointment helps explain his nasty tone, but the parallel, with FDR to play Cincinnatus, was otherwise obvious and immediate.

It produced some of Schoenberg's richest music, and surely his most excited. The work is for reciter with string quartet or string orchestra and piano (the string orchestra version, which is more satisfying accoustically and rhetorically was the one performed here). The reciter's part is in the pitched speech Schoenberg invented for "Pierrot lunaire," though the notation is rather more enigmatic in the "Ode" and one's sense of what Schoenberg wanted somewhat vaguer (on the Nonesuch record, Bernard Jacobson presents an intelligent discussion of the question and a persuasive solution). Behind and around the voice, Schoenberg places a dense, trenchant, intensely dramatic commentary, brilliantly conceived and realized as instrumental sound, and in a harmonic language that covers the range from scratchy dissonance to the pure triad of E flat major (the key of the symphony Beethoven had wanted to dedicate to Napoleon) with which he work ends.

Seiji Ozawa conducted with intensity and care, and the BSO strings responded with brilliant playing. Daniel Windham was the reciter, reading with rightness and justness of expression, effectively modulated voice, and commanding presence. Friday he came closer to following Schoenberg's suggested pitch contours and came by that much closer to doing full justice to Schoenberg as well as to Byron. The piano part was wonderfully played by Paul Jacobs, whose proficiency with 20th-century music is just about legendary in the profession. His incisive sound and electrifying vividness of rhythm provided both backbone and edge to the performance.

It was fascinating to have "Transfigured Night" immediately after the "Ode" and to hear how fully developed Schoenberg's amazing imagination for string sonority was 43 years earlier. Unfortunately that is about all the performance revealed. The textures were magical, but Ozawa s tempi were so misconceived, impatience with slow music being the dominant problem, that the work came out all malformed.

Some of Ozawa's hurry would have been better applied to the second and third movements of Haydn's beautiful Sinfonia Concertante. In other respects, it was an agreeable performance, with good solo playing by cellist Jules Eskin (not always quite in tune, though), oboist Ralph Gomberg, bassoonist Sherman Walt, and particularly by violinist Joseph Silverstein, who charmingly embellished his part. The concert began with Haydn's Symphony No. 1, written in his 27th year, an engaging and brief diversion, pleasingly played.

The program is repeated tonight at 8:30.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 137,897

MAR 11 1974 New England Newsclip

Ozawa back at BSO with mixed program

By Thor Eckert Jr.

Seiji Ozawa returned to the Boston Symphony Orchestra podium over the weekend (his first appearance of the new year) to lead a reduced orchestra in a concert of small-orchestra works by Haydn and Shoenberg. Each composer was represented by an early and a late work: Haydn's Symphony No. 1 and his Sinfonia Concertante in B flat, for Oboe, Bassoon Violin and Cello; and Schoenberg's " 'Ode to Napolean Buonaparte' for String Orchestra, Piano, and Reciter, Op. 41b," and his "Verklaerte Nacht," Op. 4.

Music

The Haydn works were welcome gems under the lyric baton of Maestro Ozawa. The First Symphony flowed along graciously and exuberantly, as did the Sinfonia Concertante — more skillfully composed but just as elegant.

The soloists in the "Sinfonia" were all first-chair men from the orchestra: Joseph Silverstein, violin; Jules Eskin, cello; Sherman Walt, bassoon; and Ralph Gomberg, oboe. They played handsomely, albeit not without some noticeable intonation lapses in the two string players.

The Schoenberg "Ode" is a novelty — never before played by the BSO. It is a dramatic setting of an obvious, pretentious Byron poem. The results, at best, are mixed. Scored for string orchestra, piano, and narrator, it is a musical diatribe against the abuses of absolute power, complete with bombastic praise of America at the end of the poem.

The vocal line uses the Schoenberg innovation of the "sprechstimme" (speech-voice) and or "sprechgesang" (speech-song) an extension of the recitation voice invoving a change in general pitch without specifically singing or chanting notes. For this work the soloist should have a sizable speaking voice to be heard above the orchestra. At these concerts, the narrator, Daniel Windham, used the public-address system, thus throwing off the balances of the work. The result was like a movie soundtrack with the preposterous poem given the spotlight, the violent music becoming mere background accompaniment ably accented by Paul Jacobs's fiery pianistic efforts. It made for a puzzling performance of a strangely unsatisfying work.

"Verklaerte Nacht" ("Transfigured Night") is much more successful a piece. Originally a string sextet, the work is well-represented on records, though this was the first performance by the BSO since the composer himself conducted it in 1934. It is early post-romantic Schoenberg, the lush orchestration aptly capturing radiant transfiguration.

Ozawa conducted a well-gauged, shimmering, atmospheric performance of the work. But surprisingly enough, as in last week's concert under the baton of Okko Kamu, the string playing belied the faultless ensemble one expects. The effects of the players' being too long without a music director are, perhaps, beginning to show. Once Mr. Ozawa is in Boston for the majority of the musical season and has time to put his stamp on the orchestra, these problems should clear up.

Bach society

There is talent galore up at Harvard these days. The Bach Society Orchestra, manned by Harvard and Radcliffe students, gave a splendid concert Saturday evening in Sanders Theater to an overflowing audience. Featured soloist was cellist Yo-Yo Ma, a sophomore music major who is already making a name for himself on the international circuits.

Under the baton of Robert Hart Baker, the usual ensemble problems and noticeable bloopers of student orchestras were generally lacking; they revealed a polish found mostly in the better conservatory orchestras.

In the Haydn "Sinfonia Concertante" (the same one the BSO played this weekend) — marked by an exubererance and commitment that made up for any imperfections — Mr. Ma performed as part of a strong quartet, with Richard Yodder (bassoon), Stephen Hammer (oboe) and Lynn Chang, an outstanding young violinist with a clear bright sound and technique.

To close the concert Mr. Ma performed the Haydn Cello Concerto in D. He is an extraordinarily talented cellist — rich tone, impeccable (though somewhat aggressive) technique, and intelligent musicianship. Harvard is indeed fortunate to have such a fine performer in their music department. The young primarily student audience was audibly awed by his playing — gasping after involved runs and cheering at the end.

Week 19

p. 37

TIMES (E)
BEVERLY, MASS.
D. 9,514
FEB 27 1974
New England Newsclip

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Seiji Ozawa will conduct the Boston Symphony in four concerts, March 5 - 9.

On March 5, at 7:30 p.m., Ozawa conducts the orchestra in works by Haydn, Bach and Schoenberg. The concert opens with Haydn's Symphony no. 1 in D followed by the Sinfonia concertante in B flat for oboe, bassoon, violin and cello.

After intermission, Ozawa conducts the Bach Concerto in D minor for two violins. The concert closes with Schoenberg's Verklarte Nacht.

The soloists for this concert are all members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They include: Principal oboe Ralph Gomberg; Principal bassoon Sherman Walt; Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein; Principal cello Jules Eskin and Assistant Concertmaster Jerome Rosen.

March 7, at 8:30 p.m.; March 8, at 2 p.m. and on March 9, at 8:30 p.m., Ozawa conducts the orchestra in works of Haydn and Schoenberg.

The concerts open with Haydn's Symphony no. 1 in D followed by the Sinfonia concertante in B flat for Oboe, Bassoon, Violin and Cello. Soloists for the Sinfonia concertante are all Boston Symphony Principals.

They are: Principal oboe, Ralph Gomberg; Principal Bassoon, Sherman Walt; Principal Cello, Jules Eskin; and Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein.

After intermission, Ozawa conducts the Orchestra in Arnold Schoenberg's Ode to Napolean Bounprte with soloists Daniel Windham (narrator) and Paul Jacobs (pianist). The concerts close with Schoenberg's Verklarte Nacht (Transfigured Night).

Daniel Windham is a graduate of the High School of Music and Art in New York City and the New England Conservatory of Music. He has performed with the Tri-Cities Opera Company, the New England Conservatory Opera Theater, the Harvard University Festival Opera and the New England Regional Opera. For the past three years he has been a soloist with the Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall. In the field of contemporary and modern music, Mr. Windham has appeared in broadcast and concert performances in Sweden, Norway and Montreal. He is presently a lecturer in music at Wellesley College.

Paul Jacobs, who was born in New York City, graduated from the Juilliard School after making his New York debut in 1951. He has had a long association with new music. Early in his career he performed with the Robert Craft Chamber Arts Society and the Composers' Forum. From 1951 to 1960 he lived in Paris where he was soloist with the Domaine Musical, founded by Pierre Boulez. Mr. Jacobs has performed at the music festivals of Darmstadt and Dartington. He gave the first complete performance of Schoenberg's piano music in France, as well as the first French recording. Since 1961 he has been pianist for the New York Philharmonic. A former student of the Berkshire Music Center, Paul Jacobs served on the faculty there in 1959. He also taught on the faculties of Mannes College of Music and the Manhattan School of Music.

An Exhilarating Afternoon at the Symphony

By ELLEN PFEIFER

• Concert Review

After performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last week of Schoenberg's "Verklaerte Nacht" "Ode to Napoleon Buonaparte," the Viennese pioneer's opposite number, Stravinsky, was represented yesterday afternoon with the Orchestra's first complete performance of the "Firebird" ballet.

One must admit to mixed reactions about such a programming choice: a complete performance is long overdue, of course, but then, Boston hasn't been exactly starved for this music — having heard the several suites from the ballet frequently in recent years (the most recent, the 1919 version in Aug. 1973). Surely, there ought be something else by Stravinsky that could be played.

However, one can't quibble about performances of anything played as well as this one was — with lush orchestral sonority, crisp articulation of rhythms, and well-judged sense of pace and drama.

This is Seiji Ozawa's kind of music, the idiom which draws the most sympathetic response from him, the greatest insight and understanding, and consequently the most successful performances.

A great splashy piece it wears its 64 years with hardly a wrinkle. And it makes one feel very much cheated at not having been able to see the original production (the decor and dancing encouraged by Diaghilev reportedly as brilliant as the music), "Firebird" is marvelous for showing off a virtuoso orchestra.

The BSO played with that kind of flash with particularly fine work by the winds and solo horn.

By contrast, Ozawa has generally shown less affinity for Mozart, but the playing on the first half yesterday of the Piano Concerto in A major, K. 488 — with Maurizio Pollini as soloist — was a model of simplicity and straightforwardness.

It had a first movement that was chaste and clear; the unusual Adagio in the rarely used (for Mozart) key of F-sharp minor melancholy; and the contrasting finale — all exhilarating.

HERALD-AMERICAN (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 424,654
MAR 8 1974
New England Newsclip

GLOBE (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042
MAR 8 1974
New England Newsclip

BSO's 'Firebird' debut a dazzling tour de force

By Richard Dyer
Globe correspondent

Yesterday afternoon's BSO Concert at Symphony Hall began with a simper and ended with a bang.

Seiji Ozawa and the Italian pianist Maurizio Pollini led off with a peculiar performance of the Mozart Piano Concerto in A, K. 488, which began affectedly and disaffectingly, but ultimately set itself to rights. The sound of the reduced orchestra was lean and bright, but the contours were all softened; on this lawn the manicure scissors had been at work along with the scythe and the roller. Pollini's playing in the first movement was lucid, small-scale, even reticent. In the Adagio he played with exquisite voicing and inflection, though his effects were undermined by a couple of rough orchestral entries that were not lovely. In the finale things perked up considerably, and the crowd was properly appreciative.

After intermission came what was, incredibly, the first complete performance by the BSO of Stravinsky's Firebird ballet. The suite was an adolescent enthusiasm of mine, unheard since, and I'm right back where I started — I've never heard a performance this colorful, this exciting.

Many of the orchestral parts are of extraordinary difficulty, but the BSO soloists played them brilliantly. To the almost-arrogant displays of confident virtuosity that are an essential part of the publicized "aristocracy" of the orchestra, the players this time added real skill in characterization — the flute flicking through the Firebird's jeweled flutterings, the muted brass depicting Kashchei's nasties, the whole orchestra whirling in infernal dance, the bassoon, oboe and cello singing the Firebird's lullaby, the contrabassoon growling the villain's last.

Ozawa's reading was a shapely juxtaposition and reconciliation of the colorful and the precise, the subtle and the brazen, the hectic and the reposeful. By the end, with those mighty brass resounding the General Thanksgiving, it had blown my mind.

Pianist Pollini's Mozart with BSO

By Louis Snyder

Pianist Maurizio Pollini is the Boston Symphony's guest artist of the week, playing Mozart's Concerto in A (K. 488) under Seiji Ozawa in Symphony Hall concerts last Tuesday evening, tomorrow afternoon, and Saturday evening. He made his debut with the orchestra in 1970 in the Prokofiev Concerto No. 3, which, as it turned out, was much more congenial to his temperament and style.

Music

Mr. Pollini is an artist with an admirable technique, thoughtful interpretive values, and, on this occasion at least, something less than the electricity necessary to vivify the excitement inherent in one of Mozart's most personal statements. The concerto was calmly, coolly, and uncommunicatively conveyed by soloist and conductor alike. Every note was in place, and there were no Pollinian or Ozawan mannerisms to ruffle the surface of this delectable score, but somehow the admirably executed joint effort lacked the most essential ingredient of all — heart. The audience could admire but not participate — a regrettable state of Mozartian affairs.

Tuesday's program began with a repeat from last week of the Haydn Sinfonia Concertante in which Ralph Gomberg (oboe), Sherman Walt (bassoon), Joseph Silverstein (violin), and Jules Eskin (cello) were in top form this time. Three Ravel selections — "Rapsodie Espagnol," "Alborada del Gracioso," and "La Valse" — were performed after the intermission. Stravinsky's "Firebird" will replace the Ravel trio on the upcoming weekend programs.

Not surprisingly, Mr. Ozawa's innate rhythmic persuasiveness, coupled with the BSO's traditional second-nature response to the music of Ravel, resulted in three separate performances of stunning atmospheric texture and sensuous tonal quality. The warm wash of sound was omnipresent in each of the three selections, which in their compositional strength and ingenuity made one agree with G. Jean Aubry's assessment that "Ravel has an indefinable love of taking you by surprise, an inclination to hoax you with finesse, a love of curious shapes."

Tuesday's audience greeted the soloists warmly, but reserved its greatest applause for the rapturous concluding Osawa-BSO Ravel.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 137,997
MAR 14 1974
New England Newsclip

p. 38

Week 20

SUN-CHRONICLE (E)
ATTLEBORO, MASS.
D. 18,000
APR 9 1974 New England Newsclip

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 187,837
APR 1 1974 New England Newsclip

Giulini Returns to BSO

By THOR ECKERT JR.
Monitor News Service

BOSTON — Carlo Maria Giulini returned to the Boston Symphony Orchestra podium for the first time since 1969, conducting the Boston premiere of Bruckner's Symphony No. 2 as well as Webern's Passacaglia Op. 1 and Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler."

The Webern opened the program. Giulini underscored the smoldering lyricism and drama of the work — a rather massive exercise based on the Baroque passacaglia form. It is an interesting study in contrasts — as in the climaxes, with muted horns sounding over soaring strings. The music reflects the ambivalence of the composer, trained in the post-romantic (Mahlerian) age, who was to become the 20th-century master of concise, formal, structured music.

In the Hindemith, Giulini again emphasized sweep and drama. The fortes, nearly apocalyptic in their intensity, were exemplarily transparent and silvery — a feature which throughout the piece was admirable. The dynamic contrasts — from a hush to a roar — were wonderfully realized in a grandoise statement of Hindemith's music. Unfortunately, however, during some of the quiet but incisive passages, each string player seemed to set his own tempo. String coordination was a problem that was to get worse as the Friday afternoon concert proceeded.

Clarity, Balance

The conductor, a tall, handsome figure on the podium, is lithe and robust, as are his gestures, and his music-making is about as towering as he is. What is perhaps most striking is the combination of brooding intensity and great clarity and balance he emphasizes in the music.

The Bruckner, in its best moments, reflected the best of Giulini and the orchestra. Why this work has been so neglected is hard to guess. The first movement seems to sprawl a bit — the fragmental writing doesn't quite want to hang together. But from the Andante on, the music is readily Brucknerian: The last movement in particular, builds in its almost piecemeal way, to the glorious finale that identifies Bruckner's music.

Poignant Lyricism

Unfortunately, the problem of cuts raised its head Friday. Two editions are available these days: Haas and Nowak. The former is based on the original 1872 score. The latter uses the badly cut "revision" of 1877, done by the composer because critics called his pieces over-long. Time has shown, to a great extent, that Bruckner's original ideas were correct within the frameowrk of his compositions. Giulini chose the Nowak edition and the cuts do seriously affect the balance of the movements, particularly if one us familiar with the Haas version.

The performance improved as it progressed. The conductor tended to understate the dynamic contrasts of the first movement to a fault — heightening the monochrome aspect of much of the writing. But the Andante, bathed in poignant lyricism, was for the most part, impressive, as were the concluding two movements, in which the conductor let the brass blaze through for those thrilling Bruckner climaxes. It was a soft-edged reading, forthright but somewhat gentle, with beautifully gauged developments toward the climaxes.

The orchestra was not up to par on this occasion, however. Often the string sections would get off on their individual tangents, not getting together again until after a rest. And many of the brass attacks were tenuous.

The problem has been getting noticeably worse of late, which is not surprising, considering the variety of conductors and conducting styles in recent months. But from the BSO, this just should not be.

HERALD-AMERICAN (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 421,654
MAR 29 1974 New England Newsclip

Giulini Returns to Hub

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

Anton Bruckner's Second Symphony, given its Boston premiere by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night, has a sparse performing history even at a time when the composer's works are being widely played. There are only two available recordings and, up to now, no Boston performances.

The neglect may, however, be deliberate and deserved.

On the surface, the work features many of the elements that one has come to identify as Brucknerian. The string tremolos, great expanse, the stretching of traditional forms to their utmost capacity, a multiplicity of themes, and wave-like patterns of unresolved and ever-increasing tensions.

However, this is Bruckner at his most pedantic. There is none of the soaring lyricism or nobility of the later works, like No. 7 or No. 9. The ideas are dry and there are only approximations of the soaring music he would compose later in life. The work goes on, page after page, with a lot of dutiful and complex counterpoint and little inspiration.

Conductor Carlo Maria Giulini, returning to the podium after five years for performances of the Webern Passacaglia and Hindesmith's "Symphonie Mathis der Maler" as well as the Bruckner, could not be of much help in the Symphony. The piece, if it is to make any effect, needs absolute clarity of articulation, complete understanding of where to place the emphasis and where to ease up. This, Giulini dtd not provide.

The conductor has a taste, it seems, for big lush cello melodies and these are brought out prominently, although there may be an important contrapuntal line in another voice which languishes in the background.

Further, Giulini proved somewhat erratic in the matter of dynamics—with very few excursions beyoud a forte and below a piano. This is a problem in those wave patterns of tension which should build in intensity and volume to a crest and then refuse to resolve. Without the immense cresendo (usually to triple forte), the tension isn't established and the gesture is lost.

Finally, a matter of musical proportion: Giulini ignores the repeats in both Scherzo and Trio movements making for a strangely short and wholly inappropriate movement.

Hindemith and Webern provided lesser sorts of examples of the same problems. Both were performed with more clarity and insight, but with dynamic restraint and consequent timidity of expression.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 24,500
APR 4 1974 New England Newsclip

Giulini Conducts BSO In Bruckner Second

Anton Bruckner's Second Symphony made a belated entrance over the weekend into the repertoire of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Completed in 1872, nine years before the orchestra's birth, it was played by the orchestra for the first time at concerts last Thursday, Friday and Saturday in Symphony Hall.

There seems to be no supportable reason for the long delay. Nikisch, Muck, Koussevitzky, Leinsdorf and Steinberg all performed other Bruckner symphonies down through the years. Somehow they neglected the Second, sad to say, because this relatively early Bruckner essay into the symphonic field carries many of the composer's hallmarks.

Like the First and Eighth symphonies, the Second carries the key of C minor. It was finished in Vienna in 1972 and first performed there the following year. As with his other symphonies, Bruckner had later thoughts following the premiere and cut and revised the Second on four different occasions. Leopold Nowak based an edition on the composer's third revision and it was that edition that was performed here.

Less lavish in scoring than the later, more monumental symphonies, the Second uses the instrumentation favored by Beethoven and Brahms. It calls for an orchestra of double woodwinds, four horns, two trumpets, three trombones, timpani and strings. One might be inclined to think of it as a "little" Bruckner symphony, but no such adjective will solidly hold. Though on a smaller scale instrumentally than the Fourth through Ninth symphonies, the Second has the basic grandeur, the long modulations and the sharp dynamic contrasts that are characteristic of the later works.

It makes use of the quiet tremelo to set the opening atmosphere, it lets the winds suspend and ultimately resolve the modulations, and it makes dramatic use of the luftpause to separate sections or change mood. More to the Bruckner point, its themes are developed and overdeveloped to the utmost, and its orchestration makes effective use of each instrument.

The performance directed by Guest Conductor Carlo Maria Giulini showed much respect for Bruckner's style. It emphasized the flow of the music but paid especial attention to the romantic aspects of the score. Thus it was a more driving, rushed and less controlled presentation than might have come from Leinsdorf or Steinberg. To this extent, it carried more emotional than intellectual weight and in the process brought forth some ragged attacks and dubious intonation. Nevertheless, it was good to have this overdue entry to the BSO lists, well enough played to make on hope for its reappearance before too long.

Before intermission, Giulini presented Anton Webern's opus 1, a Passacaglia, and the Symphony "Mathis de Maler" by Paul Hindemith. The Webern piece, written when he was 25 and a pupil of his master, Schoenberg, sounds tame these days. It is a gentle work that, despite its serial nature, has a pleasant romantic appeal. Under Giulini it was played with clarity and charm.

The Hindemith Symphony, since its first performances in 1934, has become standard orchestral fare. It is a stunning piece in a number of ways — Hindemith's highly original harmonic ideas, brilliant use of the orchestra, strong feeling, and superb craftsmanship. Giulini and the orchestra gave it a rich and moving reading, a bit restless at times, but well proportioned and strong in its bringing out of inner voices.

Giulini previously conducted here in 1969. At that time and again last weekend, he made a strong impression on the musicians and won the plaudits of the audience. I would be inclined to join the response if his perceptions ran a bit deeper. Exciting as they may seem to some, they are too near the surface for my taste.

H

Week 20

p. 39

BOSTON-PHOENIX
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 100,000

APR 16 1974

New England Newsclip

Ear Trumpet

The BSO and Giulini; Murray Perahia

By David Moran

I read some graffiti in an MBTA trolley that said this column covers so much chamber music that it ought to be called not the Ear Trumpet but the Chamber Pot, so it seemed a good time to drop in on the BSO and give a listen. At least the wall-writing didn't say mene mene tekel upharisn.

This has been a good year for the BSO from all viewpoints: playing, conductors, repertory and so on. I've caught a couple of the extraordinary events on the radio: Colin Davis's subtle yet exceptionally powerful performance of Sir Michael Tippett's new symphony, his third, a deeply felt, effectively constructed work of the greatest importance, one that really deserves your fullest attention; also a duly mocking reading of Schoenberg's "Ode to Napoleon Buonaparte." Daniel Windham was splendid as sprechstimme, turning Byron's lines into rapiers; Paul Jacob's pianism was pleasantly savage; Ozawa's conducting was almost too fierce.

The concert I attended was retiring compared to the preceding, its three works conservative and generally restrained: Anton Webern's Passacaglia, Hindemith's Mathis der Maler (Matthias the painter), and the Boston premiere (!) of the Bruckner's symphony no. 2. Carlo Maria Giulini conducted: it's quite discrepant to hear such frequently lovely and refined playing result from such large, stiff gestures. Written in the mid-30's, Hindemith's exploration of the trials of being an artist is a remarkably attractive piece, and this was the smoothest and shapeliest reading I've ever heard, yet carefully accented as well, especially in the happy first movement and the potent finale. The Webern — early, short, wellmade, easy to comprehend, Parisian-flavored — plodded, I thought, but since there's no recording of it that I'm familiar with, my reference standard was an imagined ideal.

The Bruckner 2nd, over a century old, has never been heard here. Perhaps the reason is that, though each of the first three movements has moments that sound like Bruckner's later works, the piece as a whole doesn't succeed. True, the opening string voicings are utterly characteristic, evocative, quiet, pulsing and the scherzo, which seems to steal from the Eroica, has the same nicely stomping persistency of Bruckner's 7th. Further, the andante between those movements is almost as exalted as Bruckner's mystical later symphonies, though with a gentleness from earlier in the century. But the finale strikes me as long, dim-witted, its enfeebling tedium making one forget what's come before. And this in a version Bruckner edited rather vigorously.

The BSO's execution Friday afternoon of this piece wasn't very good, and though Giulini had a more confident pace and far-sighted overview in mind Tuesday night the horns didn't yet have their parts down. The BSO is not yet a consistently excellent orchestra.

Recordings: Who in heaven's name would have thought that the most exciting recent release would have been Chopin's two sonatas — such standard repertory! — played by a young pianist just beginning his career? Murray Perahia is the name; Columbia is the label; be prepared to hear all sorts of new sense made out of the familiar. Perahia's intelligence is, frankly, as staggering as his technique. He phrases like a master, tying together the most disparate sections of the music; he probes, emphasizes interior surprises, and everywhere eschews received banalities. I intend the highest compliment in saying that throughout these performances one asks, how would Rosen have done that? would Brendel (if he played Chopin) have made a similar link to that earlier moment? Did this kid learn to rethink music from studying with Russell Sherman? It's amazing. I wouldn't part with my Rubinstein or Van Cliburn renditions of these two pieces, but I emphatically recommend this release. Columbia's sound is superbly bright and resonant.

The BSO does some spectacular playing on two new DG discs. But Ozawa's interpretation of Berlioz's Symphonie fantastique is rather characterless, if suave; I recommend Davis, Boulez, or Munch (also with Boston). Eugen Jochum similarly glides glibly over Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony without pointing out anything. It sounds good, but says little. On the other side is a first-rate reading of Schubert's "Unfinished," but Schwann lists almost three dozen for competition, including several also on DG.

The DG disc to get is the Archive recording of Johannes Ockeghem's Mass for the dead. Ockeghem was the teacher of Josquin, and this is moving, lovely, stately, music, its polyphony most ingenious, incessantly pardoying and overlapping in its lines. Bruno Turner's Pro Cantione Antique of London is entirely comfortable with the genius of the 15th century. The disc is filled out with Josquin's emotional Lamention on the death of Ockeghem.

Bach is always being recorded. Harpsichordist Huguette Dreyfus plays the French suites stylishly on two DG discs. Her rhythm is steady but not mechanical, and there is little else to object to. She tends to change registration in a show-offy way, a la George Malcolm. However, Walcha on Mace is altogether preferable, and cheaper. The review pressings were so warped as to be unplayable at under 4 grams.

Columbia has another Switched-on Bach pastiche from Walter Carlos, and it is, predictably, good fun, lively, idiomatic and utterly open in texture. Some of his new registrations, notably in "Sheep May Safely Graze," are pure roller-rink, however, and he is awfully fussy in the long cadenza in the fifth Brandenburg; otherwise, the performances are like those of the first S.O.B.

Brazilian pianist Joao Carlos Martins plays Romantic Bach (in fact, if anyone ever asks what is entirely inappropriate in this music, simply play any Martins Bach recording). His version of the first two partitas is available from Connoisseur. The influence of Glenn Gould — dry touch, clarity of voices, etc. — is somewhat more evident than in previous Martins Bach playing, but it's still mannered, distended by rubato, the fugal entries absurdly spotlighted. It's not saved by snazzy fingerwork, either: listen to what a mess is made in the fast part of the second partita's Sinfonia.

The gimmick on Boston harpsichordist Joseph Payne's new Spaced-out Bach recording (RCA) is overdubbing; the various voices of these well-known pieces are thus spread out across your system. I don't know if overdubbing makes the music easier or harder to play; Payne sometimes upsets his own admirable steadiness because of it, however. The approach otherwise is fairly straightfoward, although occasionally brutal in attack, pursuing the notes. The performer's essay presents, almost incomprehensibly, the argument for spacing-out Bach's counterpoint (i.e. you hear a little more, and technology permits it). The cover is vulgar beyond belief; contemptuous of the youth market, RCA obviously hopes Payne to be their Tony Newman or Virgil Fox (Payne has better taste than they do, however). As with all of the last four years, the review copy was grossly warped. To conclude: despite the disconcerting sonics, I'd take Payne over Kipnis or Leonhardt in these pieces, but the best choice is a $1.00 Vox disc with Helma Elsner's sturdy readings.

GLOBE (E)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 195,032

MAR 29 1974

New England Newsclip

Bruckner's 2d — first time in Boston

MICHAEL STEINBERG

Amazing that Bruckner's 2d Symphony, 102 years old, had never had a performance here until Carlo Maria Giulini conducted it at last night's Boston Symphony concert. Common knowledge of the Bruckner symphonies begins with No. 4 — the 3d is beginning to make its way, but Nos. 2, 1, and 0 (sorry, no time to tell that story now) remain in the waitingroom.

CARLO MARIA GUILINI (Photo Paul Connell)

No. 2, which Giulini played in the much tightened revision of 1877, is the first to sound and behave like a Bruckner symphony: it has the vibrating, endlessly upbeating beginning, the sudden unisons in pianissimo, the theme with pizzicato accompaniment, the silences to mark formal articulations, the characteristic filigree around the returns of the slow movement's main melody, and son on. (Also, alas, a tendency to lose nerve and concentration in the finale, something that is aggravated rather than helped by the drastic cuts made for the 1877 version.)

But its tone is not yet the hortatory, visionary one of the later and grander symphonies: Schubert is still close, and surprisingly, Mendelssohn. It is lyric — comfortable, one almost wants to say — and lovely in that vein, with a touching warmth of melody. Its great moment is the Andante, beautifully built and sustained, with dissonances that are gentle yet firm, and whose reticently intense poignancy seems to look forward to Elgar.

Giulini loves the sound of Bruckner's effortlessly, radiantly opulent scoring, and he takes pains realizing it. He also revels in the passion of individual phrases and gets them played with impressive intensity and feeling for shape. In other ways, I don't always find him convincing as a Bruckner conductor: he fidgets with the tempi, hurries across silences, and perhaps has not the long-range rhythmic structure quite clearly set in his mind. And apart from questions of interpretation, there were problems of execution, odd wrong notes, tentative horn solos, momentary failures of ensemble. With its many eloquent moments, it was a performance that didn't quite come off.

That was a pity, a disappointment, and a surprise, because the first half of the concert had great distinction. Giulini began with Webern's Passacaglia, Op.1, which he articulated and formed with exemplary clarity, and in which he found the hidden Debussy, the enchanting sensuous loveliness that escapes most conductors.

Then came the "Mathis der Maler" Symphony, and from whom else has one heard Hindemith sound so softly sumptuous, flexible, elevated in style? It was the softness of attack that was so remarkable (and startling at first)—that it was thoroughly on purpose was made clear, even dramatized, by the finale's big punctuating chords which came down like the guillotine. And what wonderful coherence to that finale. The first and second movement are already whole pieces in the opera from which the symphony is drawn, the third, however, is a fantasy about which it isn't always clear that Hindemith succeeded in making it whole. With Giulini, though, finding the just tempi and carefully husbanding energy, all for once was lucid and strong.

The program is repeated today at 2, and tomorrow and Tuesday at 8:30.

p. 40

Week 21

HERALD-AMERICAN (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 424,654
APR 5 1974 New England Newsclip

Giulini Performance of 'Stabat Mater' Stunning

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

When the French musicologist Fetis once urged Rossini —who was prematurely retired from opera composing— why he did not write sacred music, the composer demurred, claiming that he was not adequately trained in the "learned" and contrapuntal style of the church. Fetis responded that, indeed, it would be unnatural for someone not entirely facile in the style to write that way, but added that Rossini's powerful theatrical sense was exactly what the church needed.

He was right. The "Stabat Master," which Rossini had begun some years before and which the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Carlo Maria Giulini revived last night, is an incredible piece of theater and a powerful religious statement that transcends the 13th century text.

In it, Rossini made little effort to modify his operatic idiom — the setting consisting mainly of arias, and small ensembles with the choral passages mainly avoiding any contrapuntal texture. There is some coloratura and high notes for all the soloists anad a soprano-mezzo duet that comes straight out of the tradition of "Semiramide" and "Norma."

Giulini's performance was really exciting. With a quartet of really good soloiststs, it would have been extraordinary. As it was, Giulini had soprano Phyllis Curtin — filling in at the last momen for the indisposed Linda Phillips. She is wonderfully musical, knows exatcly how the piece ought to go, but cannot make her voice consistently follow her instincts. However, she proved electrifying in the "Inflammatus et accensus" and contributed two stunning high C's at the end of it. That, alone, is worth the price of admission.

The others were no match for her. Dean Wilder sings with a breathy and nasal sound and he missed nearly every other 16th note in the dotted eighth and sixteenth figure which permeates his aria. He does, however, have the high D-flat which must intimidate a lot of tenors.

Susan Clickner scooped from pitch to pitch and broke up phrases capriciously. Robert Hale, the bass, managed his wide range easily, but made mush out of the dotted rhythms of his aria.

John Oliver's Tanglewood Festival Chorus sang gloriously and with obvious excitement the closing "In sempiterna saecula, Amen" preceding it with a fine transparent "Quando corpus morietur."

Preceding the "Stabat," the orchestra with Joseph Silverstein performed Vivaldi's "The Four Seasons," playing with the same clarity and tonal beauty that had characterized the Rossini. Silvertein's violin solos were positively elegant and the whole performance served to remind us just how charming a descriptive piece this is.

GLOBE (E)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 195,032
APR 5 1974 New England Newsclip

Givlini, Silverstein at Symphony

By Richard Dyer
Globe Correspondent

Carlo Maria Giulini and Joseph Silverstein opened the BSO program last night with Vivaldi's "Seasons" concertos and they were wonderful. The performances, though in every way correct in style, did not insist that this was "baroque" music — it was just music, Italian music, warm, generous, singing, a beaker of sun-burnt mirth and winter chill.

Giulini's masterly conducting and Silverstein's masterly playing demonstrated that alchemy through which gradations of volume and intensity, discriminations of texture, judgment of tempo can turn notes on the page and sounds in our ears into vivid pictures in our minds — think of the precisely judged loping rhythms that changed the "Autumn" alegro into a hunt.

Silverstein's playing was of course impeccable — a beautifully centered tone, delightful ornaments, a notably rapid and even trill, expertly manipulated echo effects; it was also remarkably characterful. John Gibbons played the important harpsichord part in the "Autumn" adagio with subtle rhythmic variety.

After intermission came Rossini's "Stabat Mater." Giulini is the best conductor for this kind of music in the world, and the performance he led was rich in sound, spacious and impetuous in gesture, reverent and theatrical in tone. The Tanglewood Festival Chorus (prepared by John Oliver) was unusually able and responsive, summoning a beautiful suspended tone in the "Quando corpus morietur," fire, accuracy, and a stupendous crescendo in the Amen chorus.

It is consequently a scandal that the management secured inadequate soloists for the performance. In 1842 Rossini's writing showed off what Grisi and Mario could do; now it reveals what most of our present-day singers cannot. Robert Hale (bass), Dean Wilder (tenor) and Susan Clickner (contralto) made an occasional proud noise, but it was a shock when Hale had to span a scale, or dot an eighth note, when Wilder had to match the richly varied inflections of the orchestra with his effortful and unchangingly beefy sound, when an arpeggio exposed the limits of range or a sustained note the crenelated tone of Clickner's voice.

Only Phyllis Curtin knew what to to—and she replaced another artist on very short notice. Some of her righ forte singing curdles these days, but there is a new loveliness in her pianissimo, and she knows all about grandeur of utterance and impetuousness of attack. When the chips were down in the "Inflammatus," that grandest of soprano showpieces, she phrased with majesty, trilled accurately, and summoned two high c's that flared in glory.

What this performance would have been like with all of the soloists on this level (or above it) I cannot even imagine. Even as it was, it was the Rossini "Stabat Mater" of a lifetime, and I'm going back.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 187,897
APR 8 1974 New England Newsclip

Carlo Maria Giulini's 'fine Italian hand' conducts BSO

By Louis Snyder

A "fine Italian hand" can, it seems, also denote skill of magical, almost demoniacal quality. No wonder the two elegant hands of Carlo Maria Giulini which have been leading the Boston Symphony these past weeks have been doubly wonder-working.

Conducting Rossini and Vivaldi at Symphony Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon to complete his engagement here, Mr. Giulini left no doubt of his special gifts of empathy with the local corps of musicians, or of its logical extension among BSO admirers whose greatest reward is to sense, by seeing and hearing, that the orchestra is happy in its work. No question about it last week.

Music

The crowning achievement of this second program, and of his two-week stay, was Mr. Giulini's masterful interpretation of Rossini's "Stabat Mater," in its first performances by the Boston Symphony. A religious piece with a checkered history by the master of opera buffa, the "Stabat Mater" has had to live down a reputation for being too frivolous melodically to treat its serious subject — his mother's sorrow at the crucifixion of Jesus. Which perhaps explains why its BSO premiere is this belated.

Superb chorus

A succession of 10 members for orchestra, chorus, and four soloists alone, in quartet, and in soprano, mezzo-soprano duet, the 13th-century hymn setting, under Mr. Giulini's baton, flowed with tremendous emotional power to the ultimate "In sempiterna saecula, Amen" — "Forever and ever, Amen." His tempos were always considerate of the singers and the graduation of sound, despite the presence of the full orchestra and the entire Tanglewood Festival Chorus, was eloquently gauged. The overall concept was one of monumental proportions.

Acceptable solos

While one might have wished for a more Italianate timbre in the solo voices, their performances on Friday were generally acceptable within the large frame of the work. Phyllis Curtin, deputizing at short notice for indisposed Linda Phillips, brought style and feeling to the soaring "Inflammatus," while Dean Wilder scaled the tenorial peaks of "Cujus animam" with conspicuous success. Both mezzo Susan Clickner and bass Robert Hale handled their assignments satisfactorily. The chorale singing was superb.

The stunning Rossini work was preceded by Vivaldi's concertos celebrating "The Four Seasons," with concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as the impeccable soloist with BSO strings. These lustrous, if extended bucolic scenes, for all their aural simplicity, demand the utmost in technical skill and tonal shading. They received both from Mr. Silverstein, Mr. Giulini, and their colleagues.

Week 22

C-41

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 137,897

APR 22 1974 New England Newsclip

Finale of BSO season

Ozawa returns with surprises

By Louis Snyder

Seiji Ozawa was back to conduct the concluding concerts of the Boston Symphony's 93rd season — and his first as its music director — over the weekend at Symphony Hall. There was Holst, Schoenberg, and Mahler for subscribers on Thursday and Saturday evenings, and Friday afternoon, and at the Sunday matinee Pension Fund event, Ravel and Brahms, with pianist Rudolf Serkin as soloist.

Music

The subscription program had its surprises, to say the least. To begin with, a BSO first, Holst's "The Hymn of Jesus," proved to be an intriguing choral piece of the genre made to order for those great turn-of-the-century English choirs who sang with their hearts in their throats. With a text based on the Apocryphal Acts of St. John, the Hymn floats in a polyphonic stratosphere, buoyed by orchestral writing of the most appealing and congenial sort.

Opening with staunch trombone passages, glowingly played by William Gibson and Ronald Barron, Holst's score, both for voices and instruments, never bows to convention or borrows from tried-and-true sources to gain its effect.

Neglected work

"The Hymn to Jesus" is a beautiful, original, and surprisingly neglected work, and as sung, quite superbly, by the Lorna Cooke de Varon-directed New England Conservatory Chorus, it assumed more than introductory importance on this unusual program. As he has done previously, Ozawa wove vocal and instrumental lines together with special skill. The contribution by Laurence Thorstenberg, English horn, was included in an enthusiastic audience reception.

A first Boston performance of Schoenberg's "Moderner Psalm" followed. With Andrew Foldi as speaker, and a reduced New England Conservatory Chorus backing, Ozawa and the orchestra did nobly by what is at best a fragment of the composer's projected religious series of "Psalms, Prayers, and other Conversations with and about God." In an extremely complicated scheme of speech and song, integrated with instrumental accompaniment, the solo voice and chorus contend with the German text while the orchestra goes its way independently in Schoenbergian idiom. It is over before one can adjust to its stylistic eccentricities.

Mahler's first

A highly individualistic interpretation of Mahler's First Symphony in D completed the program. This included the second "Blumine" movement, which the composer had abandoned in the indecision that marked his early years, but which, when further considered, ideally fills out the opulent tonal contour of this large scale work.

The First Symphony is generally familiar these days, so that variations from the rhythmic and dynamic norm are subject to headshaking. Certainly the Ozawa version wasn't like any other — a brilliant, personal tour de force in which tonal effects were stressed as opposed to a more cohesive overall approach. The result was a craggy but rousing performance, with its subdued pianissimo moments too, and ample proof that Mahler, like any other composer, can still survive a variety of treatments.

The final stormy movement ("Stuermisch bewegt") was sound lashed to a fury, and brought down showers of applause and shouts from Friday's audience on Ozawa and his musicians.

BSO, Chorus Brilliantly Paired

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic
(Reprinted from late editions yesterday.)

• Music Review

It is hard to know what to think about Gustav Holst's "Hymn of Jesus," the choral work which, along with Schoenberg's fragmentary "Moderner Psalm," had a local premiere on the Boston Symphony Orchestra's final program of the season Thursday night. The piece is so eccentric, so uniquely Holst's, such a strange combination of moving moments and banalities that it is nearly impossible to have an opinion that is consistent throughout the entire piece.

Based on a selection from the Apocryphal Acts of St. John, the "Hymn of Jesus" uses two mixed choruses and one semi-chorus of treble voices. There is a prelude with opening modal trombone solo, then two plainsong chants and the setting of the poem — which is, in essence, a hymn of praise. The means are exceedingly simple (and sometimes simple-minded) with many melody lines revolving around just a few notes, with a lot of repeated bass figures, and a good bit of texture that is severely chordal.

The piece does not make its points through subtle means; when Holst is praising God he most often does it with loudly massed choral sound, when he is depicting the connection between dance and mystical ritual he uses bouncing rhythms and tambourines. Sometimes he succeeds in moving the listener; sometimes he merely impresses with his naivete.

Seiji Ozawa and the New England Conservatory Chorus seemed convinced of the work's power and provided a performance marked by great brilliance and enthusiasm. That, I think, is the necessary ingredient if the work is to have its optimum effect.

Schoenberg's "Psalm" — the work on which the 77-year old composer was concentrating when he died in 1951 — is a curio, an unfinished piece whose interest is mainly historical and, therefore, a rather unusual choice for this BSO program. Seeing himself as a latter day psalmist, Schoenberg proposed to add some fifty original songs — both texts and settings — to the repertory. He wrote 15 complete texts and two-thirds of the first one. That is what we heard Thursday night.

It was an immense project, begun less than a year before Schoenberg's death and is a touching display of his indomitable optimism even at a time when he was suffering numerous physical ailments. Judging from this one complete text, it promised to be a deeply spiritual project as well and one regrets never hearing it completed.

The fragment does not tell one a great deal musically. For speech-song chorus and orchestra, it displays fine craftsmanship with its canonic structures as well as some of the contemporary agony man faces in trying to find satisfactory and meaningful religious belief. But, it is frustrating, breaking off as it does right at a pivotal point in the text.

To close the season in a traditionally grandiose way, Ozawa and the orchestra performed Mahler's First Symphony ("Titan") with the usually excluded "Blumine" movement. It was surely one of the noisiest, coarsest performances this listener has heard, lacking the refinement of nuance Mahler so copiously notated, and scoring as high as possible on the decimal scale with every thunderous fortissimo.

HERALD-AMERICAN (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 424,654

APR 30 1974 New England Newsclip

THE ARTS

BSO's 'Modern Psalms' is lively, eloquent

MICHAEL STEINBERG

"And nevertheless I pray"—the last sentence Arnold Schoenberg set to music. Always powerful with words, he spent his final months writing German "psalms, prayers, and other conversations with and about God." In October 1950, he started to write music for the first of what he came to call his "Modern Psalms," but the manuscript breaks off two-thirds of the way through—the state of his eyes no longer permitted him to compose. (Words he could dictate, and he was working on a psalm text only ten days before his death on Friday, 13 July 1951.)

As part of its centenary commemoration of Schoenberg, the Boston Symphony and the New England Conservatory Chorus, with Andrew Foldi as speaker and Seiji Ozawa conducting, last night performed this beautiful and moving six-minute fragment. Its theme is union with God through prayer. That had been a theme in two of Schoenberg's biggest, mightiest works (both incomplete), the oratorio, "Jacob's Ladder," and the opera, "Moses and Aron." This last time, apart from using a speaker, who in a sense frees Schoenberg to give the chorus a densely factured, "difficult" music, he approached the subject with the most restrained rhetoric. Even complete, the Psalm would have been brief, and the orchestra is modest. The intricate, clear, precise texture suggests Webern, though what stamps the piece is less the pupil's delicacy than the master's strength.

The first half of the concert brought another religious masterpiece, "The Hymn of Jesus" by Gustav Holst, who was also born in 1874. Written 1917, it is a setting for two chorus, semi-chorus, and large orchestra of a mystical text translated from the apocryphal Acts of St. John. Holst quotes plainsong and writes Debussyan parallel chords, but he is neither self-consciously "atmospheric" nor luxuriously sensuous. The music is rich, but not lush — Holst's daughter Imogen speaks of her father's religious vision as having encompassed "the fierce unexpectedness of Byzantine mosaics"—and it has striking rhythmic vigor and stretch. Above all, it is a wonderful means of projecting the text, a compelling statement of a rapt, ecstatic prayer.

I have known it for years from score (and before that from Tovey's description), and have wondered what it really sounded like, the only recording being almost worse than none. I know more now: the performance lacked something in mystery, in sense of distance and pianissimo, but it was otherwise eloquent. For the I-don't-know-how-manyeth time I have to say about Lorna Cooke de Varon that she did a superb job of preparing her fresh-voiced singers, and that goess for the very tough Schoenberg a much as for the Holst.

After intermission, Ozawa conducted Mahler's Symphony No. 1, including the "Blumine" movement. I would be interesting some time to restore the original 1888 version—what we usually hear is Mahler's revision of 1899 — so that one could get the lovely "Blumine" in the textural and formal context for which it was written and which is designed to accommodate it. The performance was a little casual in expression and, like the rest of the program, lively, and rather loud and coarse.

GLOBE (E)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 195,032

APR 10 1974 New England Newsclip

SUN-CHRONICLE (E)
ATTLEBORO, MASS.
D. 18,000

APR 25 1974 New England Newsclip

Ozawa in Season's Finale

By LOUIS SYNDER
Monitor News Service

BOSTON — Seiji Ozawa was back to conduct the concluding concerts of the Boston Symphony's 93rd season — and his first as its music director — over the weekend at Symphony Hall. There was Holst, Schoenberg, and Mahler for subscribers on Thursday and Satruday evenings, and Friday afternoon, and at the Sunday matinee Pension Fund event, Ravel and Brahms, with pianist Rudolf Serkin as soloist.

The subscription program had its surprises, to say the least. To begin with, a BSO first, Holst's "The Hymn of Jesus," proved to be an intriguing choral piece of the genre made to order for those great turn-of-the-century English choirs who sang with their hearts in their throats. With a text based on the Apocryphal Acts of St. John, the Hymn floats in a polyphonic stratosphere, buoyed by orchestral writing of the most appealing and congenial sort.

Opening with staunch trombone passages, glowingly played by William Gibson and Ronald Barron, Holst's score, both for voices and instruments, never bows to convention or borrows from tried-and-true sources to gain its effect.

Neglect Work

"The Hymn to Jesus" is a beautiful, original, and surprisingly neglected work, and as sung, quite superbly, by the Lorna Cooke de Varon-directed New England Conservatory Chorus, it assumed more than introductory importance on this unusual program. As he had done previously, Ozawa wove vocal and instrumental lines together with special skill. The contribution by Laurence Thorstenberg, English horn, was included in an enthusiastic audience reception.

A first Boston performance of Schoenberg's "Moderner Psalm" followed. With Andrew Foldi as speaker, and a reduced New England Conservatory Chorus backing, Ozawa and the orchestra did nobly by what is at best a fragment of the composer's projected religious series of "Psalms, Prayers, and other Conversations with and about God."

In an extremely complicated scheme of speech and song, integrated with instrumental accompaniment, the solo voice and chorus contend with the German text while the orchestra goes its way independently in Schoenbergian idiom. It is over before one can adjust to its stylistic eccentricities.

Mahler's First

A highly individualistic interpretation of Mahler's First Symphony in D completed the program. This included the second "Blumine" movement, which the composer had abandoned in the indecision that marked his early years, but which, when further considered, ideally fills out the opulent tonal contour of this large scale work.

The First Symphony is generally familiar these days, so that variations from the rhythmic and dynamic norm are subject to headshaking. Certainly the Ozawa version wasn't like any other — a brilliant, personal tour de force in which tonal effects were stressed as opposed to a more cohesive overall approach. The result was a craggy but rousing performance, with its subdued pianissimo moments too, and ample proof that Mahler, like any other composer, can still survive a variety of treatments.

The final stormy movement ("Stuermisch bewegt") was sound lashed to a fury, and brought down showers of applause and shouts from Friday's audience on Ozawa and his musicians.

p. 41

Tuesday A

PATRIOT LEDGER (E)
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 71,020
JAN 31 1974
New England Newsclip

In Concert

Half-Bached

By Peter M. Knapp
Patriot Ledger Staff

Michael Tilson Thomas was scheduled to conduct Tuesday evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but became ~~ill and Joseph~~ Silverstein, the concertmaster and assistant conductor, stepped in to lead the all-Bach program.

Silverstein, though, also was scheduled to be soloist in two of the works — the Brandenburg Concerto No. 2 and the Concerto for Two Violins in D minor (with Assistant Concertmaster Jerome Rosen). So let's say he played half, conducted half and in all, had a busy night.

It made an interesting contrast, the first half of the program more or less in chamber music style with essentially no conductor, since Silverstein was too busy playing the solo lines to do anything much more than set initial tempi.

In Bach's day, there was hardly anything like the modern all-powerful, all-cuing conductor; keeping order was left principally to the lead violinist or harpsichordist. And most baroque music can get along pretty much on its own, provided a sensible scale of players is maintained and they have a decent sense of ensemble, without the often overly fussy ministrations of a baton-wielder.

No Problems

Thus the concerto for Two Violins in particular encountered no problems, with reasonable tempi, a good sense of order and quite excellent playing from Silverstein and Rosen. Their solo work was alert, informed, and had a good sense of interplay, though perhaps a shade less breathing-space between phrases in the slow movement (thankfully not dragged out) than one recalls from their Tanglewood performance last summer.

The Brandenburg, however, zipped by at a speed approaching Mach 2. I don't know whether this was Thomas' rehearsal pacing or Silverstein's own, but the outer movements went at a speed that made little sense of the music.

"Allegro moderato" of the first movement was quick enough, but the "Allegro" of the finale reduced the music to so much chirping by the soloists — Silverstein, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Armando Ghitalla, trumpet. The Andante provided some pretty contrast — and one could even hear the harpsichord — but this was a Brandenburg too fast for comfort, with little rhythmic or dynamic profile.

On the podium after intermission for the concerto for Two Pianos in C, Silverstein had little to do in this lightly accompanied work but add the occasional string-chord emphasis and brief tutti passages. Otherwise, this is a soloists' work, which Luise Vosgerchian and John Gibbons carried off splendidly with animated style and sharply accented rhythms.

One wondered at the stylistic oddity, though, of having a harpsichord for the first two works, then shifting to pianoforte for the concerto. While the piano sound was something of a stylistic jolt, would two harpsichords have carried throughout the hall?

Useful

A conductor is useful in the larger Suite No. 3 in D, though even here the scaled-down orchestra was maintained. And the performance was a surprise.

Frankly, I was not looking forward to the piece, having endured several dull, messy, treacly previous encounters of the BSO with the suite. But it was a pleasant surprise to hear the baroque inflections, the crisp dotted rhythms and even well executed appogiaturas, and general orderly playing instead of the bland, washed-out "modern" approach. Again, whether this was Thomas' conception or Silverstein's I don't know, but this performance had a vigor and sense of Bach style that was refreshing.

There was a miscalculation in the overly rapid pace of the Overture — the "slow" introduction was quick enough, the fugal allegro flashed by like an SST. But in a context of generally lively tempi, the famous Air benefitted greatly by moving along at andante rather than largo or lento, and the exquisite phrasing and balances, and the pair of Gavottoes had a good deal of spunk and brightness.

#2
PATRIOT LEDGER (E)
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 71,020
NOV 1 1973
New England Newsclip

In Concert

A Comfortable Evening

By Peter M. Knapp
Patriot Ledger Staff

That versatile man of the Boston Symphony, Joseph Silverstein — concertmaster, violin soloist and assistant conductor — was on the podium for Tuesday evening's program.

It was an enjoyable and comfortable program without oddities, premieres or profundities — Schumann's "Manfred" Overture, Dvork's Serenade in E for strings, and Prokofiev's Symphony No. 5. And throughout, the music-making was on a high level.

Every so often it's fun to dust off Schumann's "Manfred" — the BSO last played it eight years ago — with its Byronic gestures so fittingly suited to its subject and the hyper-romantic age. And fitting, too, for the night before Halloween with its conjuring of spirits and Gothic mystery. Silverstein aptly projected its "Sturm and Drang" surge at a rapid clip with brisk, snapped-off phrases — a suitably romantic approach with a good deal of feeling.

The Dvorak Serenade brought us down from the crags and gullies into a lighter world of sunshine and lyricism. It's a lovely work, showing little trace of the rapid work of its composition (in only 11 days), and displaying the Czech composer's facility for creating gracious melodies and surrounding them with a fine filigree of counterpoint. The serenade was a welcome antidote to the brutish reality of today's real world, performed with a supple, natural flow by Silverstein and the Boston strings.

The Boston Symphony gave the American premiere of Prokofiev's Fifth Symphony in 1945, a few months after its first hearing in Moscow. Though written toward the end of the war in the summer of 1944, it has only occasional somber overtones.

Prokofiev stated that the symphony "was intended as a hymn to free and happy Man, to his mighty power, his pure and noble spirit." But this cosmic declaration overstates the case. Only in the adagio does Prokofiev really turn solemn, and the material here is not really profound enough to be called tragic — certainly not with the power of utterance of the Sixth Symphony.

The Fifth has become one of the composer's most familiar symphonic scores, one which in no way is a survey of Prokofiev's strengths and weaknesses. The rising motto theme of the first movement is a stroke of inspiration, and the continual movement and interplay of voices, the shifting, biting harmonies and instrumental combinations invite attention.

But after a while, even the unconventional can become conventional, and the symphony has its share of banal rhetoric outlasting its material.

#7
PATRIOT LEDGER (E)
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 71,020
FEB 14 1974
New England Newsclip

In Concert

Cycling Sibelius

By Peter M. Knapp
Patriot Ledger Staff

Colin Davis has been conducting something of his own Sibelius cycle with the Boston Symphony the last two seasons, and ~~Tuesday night~~ was the turn of the Symphony No. 1 in E minor, capping a program which also included music by Beethoven and Haydn.

The First is among the most familiar of the seven Sibelius symphonies, abounding in ripe melody and less possessed by Nordic ciphers than some of Sibelius. One encounters some echoes of Tschaikowsky, too, especially in the second movement. A work that pleases, tingles, exults, yet still disturbs with its fluctuations of moods and underlay of loneliness, mystic grandeur and melancholy which is the essence of much of the Finnish composer.

It's a first encounter with symphonic form, and not entirely worked into the structural niceties, dealing in episodes and moods without the developmental logic of his later symphonies. But still a declaration of importance, power and rugged individualism.

For Sibelius, a bold entry into the symphony — tough, boney, masculine writing with meaty scoring and heady harmonic seasoning. There's nothing puny or precious about his "slow movement," the andante with its melancholy song, but a song which erupts into heated climaxes. And this symphony has that sense of the "big outdoors" and the dark mysteries of nature Sibelius could convey so well. At the end, irresolution — big, broad chords dissolving into two final pizzicato notes.

Davis led a rugged, virile performance, putting a lot of blood and muscle into the music, keeping up the tension. The English conductor, one of the BSO's two principal guest conductors this season, is good at etching long melodic lines and is valued for his command and control. Here, he consistently maintained an agitated momentum, driving to strong climaxes, though perhaps rushing some of the initial statements in the first movement.

His dramatic approach worked less favorably in the opening work on the program, Beethoven's Overture to "Coriolan," which seemed hyper-dramatic, particularly when reinforced by Davis' crouching, hyperbolic gestures. "Coriolan" certainly is strong stuff, but this seemed over the line into "Ach der anguish! Der drama!"

In between came scampering Haydn — the Symphony No. 87 in A, one of the set of six "Paris symphonies" of the mid-1780s. Mature Haydn of the dazzling effects: abrupt changes in dynamics, dizzying modulations (Haydn could change keys more slickly than any locksmith) the constant surprise, like the big pause before the recapitulation of the first movement.

After some initial hard-toned string playing, the performance settled down into artful Haydn, with Davis getting firm rhythms, nice contrasts in dynamics and the Haydnesque staccato-legato juxtaposition, and a good sense of design. I particularly enjoyed Davis' way with the minuet — a healthy, earthy, foot-stomping type — so neatly inflected and unmistakeably a dance.

#8
PATRIOT LEDGER (E)
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 71,020
MAR 14 1974
New England Newsclip

In Concert

Happy Sounds

By Peter M. Knapp
Patriot Ledger Staff

Tuesday evening's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Music Director Seiji Ozawa, began with the classical concerto and wound up with a mini-Ravel festival.

It was an attractive, and easily familiar, grouping of happy sounds — music with lots of melody and bouyant rhythms with hardly a disturbing underlying thought.

And well played, too, from the opening genialities of Haydn's Sinfonia Concertante in B-flat for oboe, bassoon, violin and cello — a piece of deft interplay of solo quartet against the orchestral tutti, and of high-low string and wind solo instruments.

The soloists — Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, violin; Jules Eskin, cello; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; and Sherman Walt, bassoon — have performed the work several times previously, including last summer at Tanglewood, and by now have played themselves into a fluid, comfortable ensemble. Silverstein was in particularly fine form — the violin gets the cream of the solo work — producing shapely and sensitive garlands of sound.

The other classical work was Mozart's Piano Concerto in A, K. 488, for which the Italian pianist Maurizio Pollini was soloist. I can think of nothing but superlatives in connection with this wonderful creation. It's Mozart in a magical, lyrical mood, summoning forth yards of sublime melody, the orchestral blend mellowed by the inclusion of clarinets, rather than oboes.

The thematic material is extraordinary — from the opening gentle "sigh" of descending thirds. The slow movement is equally magical — the clouds of F-sharp minor obscuring the radiance of A Major, and the unforgettable pathos of the second theme — and the rondo finale sparkles with witty exchanges between soloist and orchestra.

Pollini is a tasteful, technically superb pianist with a classical keyboard technique producing scrupulously clean passagework, but I found his playing of the first two movements rather too well mannered at the expense of expression. One would have welcomed more spunk and temperament — a more crackling staccato, for example, or a less objective approach to the adagio. But his playing of the finale was quite brilliant and had more verve, and in any case, he's definitely a pianist worth hearing.

Ozawa's Ravel was hardly reticent. He included three of the French impressionist's lush scores — "Rapsodie espagnole," "Alborada del gracioso," and "La Valse." Music to tingle the senses, of perfumed Spanish nights, and heady, pulsating Spanish and Viennese dances, to which the conductor supplied his own lithe choreography.

And music of dazzling orchestral effects conjured up by a master orchestrator. Maybe three of these pieces, back to back, is something of a sensualist trip — and a gruelling test for the players in putting together these intricate scores — but it was fun and often exciting down to the orgiastic coda of "La Valse."

#4
TIMES (E)
BEVERLY, MASS.
D. 9,514
DEC 12 1973
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony offers two concerts

TIMES — Wednesday December 12, 1973

BOSTON — Principal Guest Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday, December 18 at 8:30 p.m. in a program which opens with the Brahms-Schoenberg Piano quartet in G minor and closes with Strauss' Also sprach Zarathustra.

Appointed assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the beginning of the 1969-70 season, Mr. Thomas replaced William Steinberg at concerts in New York during the fall when Mr. Steinberg became ill. Mr. Thomas conducted more than thirty of the Boston Symphony's concerts during that season, and was appointed associate conductor of the orchestra in the spring of 1970. Mr. Thomas has conducted all over the world and at this point is principal guest conductor of the Boston Symphony, music director of the Buffalo Philharmonic and music director of the Young People's Concerts in New York.

Joseph Silverstein, assistant conductor and concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the orchestra on Thursday, December 20 at 8:30 p.m. Mr. Silverstein opens the program with Schumann's Overture for Byron's "Manfred." Dvorak's Serenade in E for strings follows, and the concert closes with Prokofiev's Symphony no. 5.

Joseph Silverstein, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since the beginning of the 1971-1972 season and concertmaster since 1962, joined the orchestra in 1955. He was then, at the age of twenty-three, the youngest member. Born in Detroit, he studied at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia, and later with Josef Gingold and Mischa Mischakoff. He was a prize winner in the 1959 Queen Elisabeth of Belgium International Competition, and a year later won the Naumberg Foundation Award. Before coming to Boston he played in the orchestras of Houston, Denver and Philadelphia.

Joseph Silverstein has established an international reputation as soloist and as first violinist of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. In 1967 he led their tour to the Soviet Union, Germany and England, in 1969 a tour to the Virgin Islands and Florida. During past seasons he has performed many concertos with the orchestra, and has recorded those by Bartok and Stravinsky for RCA.

He is violinist of the Boston Symphony String Trio and first violinist of the Boston String Quartet, and as violinist of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players Joseph Silverstein has made many recordings of chamber music for Deutsche Grammophon. Chairman of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, he is also Associate Professor of Music at Yale University, and teaches privately. In 1970 he received an honorary Doctorate of Music from Tufts University. During the 1969-1970 season he made his debut as conductor with the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestra.

p. 41

Tuesday A

PATRIOT LEDGER (E)
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 71,020

JAN 31 1974 New England Newsclip

In Concert

Half-Bached

By Peter M. Knapp
Patriot Ledger Staff

Michael Tilson Thomas was scheduled to conduct Tuesday evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but became ~~ill and Joseph~~ Silverstein, the concertmaster and assistant conductor, stepped in to lead the all-Bach program.

Silverstein, though, also was scheduled to be soloist in two of the works — the Brandenburg Concerto No. 2 and the Concerto for Two Violins in D minor (with Assistant Concertmaster Jerome Rosen). So let's say he played half, conducted half and in all, had a busy night.

It made an interesting contrast, the first half of the program more or less in chamber music style with essentially no conductor, since Silverstein was too busy playing the solo lines to do anything much more than set initial tempi.

In Bach's day, there was hardly anything like the modern all-powerful, all-cuing conductor; keeping order was left principally to the lead violinist or harpsichordist. And most baroque music can get along pretty much on its own, provided a sensible scale of players is maintained and they have a decent sense of ensemble, without the often overly fussy ministrations of a baton-wielder.

No Problems

Thus the concerto for Two Violins in particular encountered no problems, with reasonable tempi, a good sense of order and quite excellent playing from Silverstein and Rosen. Their solo work was alert, informed, and had a good sense of interplay, though perhaps a shade less breathing-space between phrases in the slow movement (thankfully not dragged out) than one recalls from their Tanglewood performance last summer.

The Brandenburg, however, zipped by at a speed approaching Mach 2. I don't know whether this was Thomas' rehearsal pacing or Silverstein's own, but the outer movements went at a speed that made little sense of the music.

"Allegro moderato" of the first movement was quick enough, but the "Allegro" of the finale reduced the music to so much chirping by the soloists — Silverstein, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Armando Ghitalla, trumpet. The Andante provided some pretty contrast — and one could even hear the harpsichord — but this was a Brandenburg too fast for comfort, with little rhythmic or dynamic profile.

On the podium after intermission for the concerto for Two Pianos in C, Silverstein had little to do in this lightly accompanied work but add the occasional string-chord emphasis and brief tutti passages. Otherwise, this is a soloists' work, which Luise Vosgerchian and John Gibbons carried off splendidly with animated style and sharply accented rhythms.

One wondered at the stylistic oddity, though, of having a harpsichord for the first two works, then shifting to pianoforte for the concerto. While the piano sound was something of a stylistic jolt, would two harpsichords have carried throughout the hall?

Useful

A conductor is useful in the larger Suite No. 3 in D, though even here the scaled-down orchestra was maintained. And the performance was a surprise.

Frankly, I was not looking forward to the piece, having endured several dull, messy, treacly previous encounters of the BSO with the suite. But it was a pleasant surprise to hear the baroque inflections, the crisp dotted rhythms and even well executed appogiaturas, and general orderly playing instead of the bland, washed-out "modern" approach. Again, whether this was Thomas' conception or Silverstein's I don't know, but this performance had a vigor and sense of Bach style that was refreshing.

There was a miscalculation in the overly rapid pace of the Overture — the "slow" introduction was quick enough, the fugal allegro flashed by like an SST. But in a context of generally lively tempi, the famous Air benefitted greatly by moving along at andante rather than largo or lento, and the exquisite phrasing and balances, and the pair of Gavottes had a good deal of spunk and brightness.

Tues "A"
#1

#7
PATRIOT LEDGER (E)
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 71,020

NOV 1 1973 New England Newsclip

In Concert

A Comfortable Evening

By Peter M. Knapp
Patriot Ledger Staff

That versatile man of the Boston Symphony, Joseph Silverstein — concertmaster, violin soloist and assistant conductor — was on the podium for Tuesday evening's program.

It was an enjoyable and comfortable program without oddities, premieres or profundities — Schumann's "Manfred" Overture, Dvork's Serenade in E for strings, and Prokofiev's Symphony No. 5. And throughout, the music-making was on a high level.

Every so often it's fun to dust off Schumann's "Manfred" — the BSO last played it eight years ago — with its Byronic gestures so fittingly suited to its subject and the hyper-romantic age. And fitting, too, for the night before Halloween with its conjuring of spirits and Gothic mystery. Silverstein aptly projected its "Sturm and Drang" surge at a rapid clip with brisk, snapped-off phrases — a suitably romantic approach with a good deal of feeling.

The Dvorak Serenade brought us down from the crags and gullies into a lighter world of sunshine and lyricism. It's a lovely work, showing little trace of the rapid work of its composition (in only 11 days), and displaying the Czech composer's facility for creating gracious melodies and surrounding them with a fine filigree of counterpoint. The serenade was a welcome antidote to the brutish reality of today's real world, performed with a supple, natural flow by Silverstein and the Boston strings.

The Boston Symphony gave the American premiere of Prokofiev's Fifth Symphony in 1945, a few months after its first hearing in Moscow. Though written toward the end of the war in the summer of 1944, it has only occasional somber overtones.

Prokofiev stated that the symphony "was intended as a hymn to free and happy Man, to his mighty power, his pure and noble spirit." But this cosmic declaration overstates the case. Only in the adagio does Prokofiev really turn solemn, and the material here is not really profound enough to be called tragic — certainly not with the power of utterance of the Sixth Symphony.

The Fifth has become one of the composer's most familiar symphonic scores, one which in no way is a survey of Prokofiev's strengths and weaknesses. The rising motto theme of the first movement is a stroke of inspiration, and the continual movement and interplay of voices, the shifting, biting harmonies and instrumental combinations invite attention.

But after a while, even the unconventional can become conventional, and the symphony has its share of banal rhetoric outlasting its material.

In Concert

Happy Sounds

By Peter M. Knapp
Patriot Ledger Staff

Tuesday evening's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Music Director Seiji Ozawa, began with the classical concerto and wound up with a mini-Ravel festival.

It was an attractive, and easily familiar, grouping of happy sounds — music with lots of melody and bouyant rhythms with hardly a disturbing underlying thought.

And well played, too, from the opening genialities of Haydn's Sinfonia Concertante in B-flat for oboe, bassoon, violin and cello — a piece of deft interplay of solo quartet against the orchestral tutti, and of high-low string and wind solo instruments.

The soloists — Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, violin; Jules Eskin, cello; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; and Sherman Walt, bassoon — have performed the work several times previously, including last summer at Tanglewood, and by now have played themselves into a fluid, comfortable ensemble. Silverstein was in particularly fine form — the violin gets the cream of the solo work — producing shapely and sensitive garlands of sound.

The other classical work was Mozart's Piano Concerto in A, K. 488, for which the Italian pianist Maurizio Pollini was soloist. I can think of nothing but superlatives in connection with this wonderful creation. It's Mozart in a magical, lyrical mood, summoning forth yards of sublime melody, the orchestral blend mellowed by the inclusion of clarinets, rather than oboes.

The thematic material is extraordinary — from the opening gentle "sigh" of descending thirds. The slow movement is equally magical — the clouds of F-sharp minor obscuring the radiance of A Major, and the unforgettable pathos of the second theme — and the rondo finale sparkles with witty exchanges between soloist and orchestra.

Pollini is a tasteful, technically superb pianist with a classical keyboard technique producing scrupulously clean passagework, but I found his playing of the first two movements rather too well mannered at the expense of expression. One would have welcomed more spunk and temperament — a more crackling staccato, for example, or a less objective approach to the adagio. But his playing of the finale was quite brilliant and had more verve, and in any case, he's definitely a pianist worth hearing.

Ozawa's Ravel was hardly reticent. He included three of the French impressionist's lush scores — "Rapsodie espagnole," "Alborada del graciose," and "La Valse." Music to tingle the senses, of perfumed Spanish nights, and heady, pulsating Spanish and Viennese dances, to which the conductor supplied his own lithe choreography.

And music of dazzling orchestral effects conjured up by a master orchestrator. Maybe three of these pieces, back to back, is something of a sensualist trip — and a gruelling test for the players in putting together these intricate scores — but it was fun and often exciting down to the orgiastic coda of "La Valse."

#7
PATRIOT LEDGER (E)
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 71,020

FEB 14 1974 New England Newsclip

In Concert

Cycling Sibelius

By Peter M. Knapp
Patriot Ledger Staff

Colin Davis has been conducting something of his own Sibelius cycle with the Boston Symphony the last two seasons, and ~~Tuesday night~~ was the turn of the Symphony No. 1 in E minor, capping a program which also included music by Beethoven and Haydn.

The First is among the most familiar of the seven Sibelius symphonies, abounding in ripe melody and less possessed by Nordic ciphers than some of Sibelius. One encounters some echoes of Tschaikowsky, too, especially in the second movement. A work that pleases, tingles, exults, yet still disturbs with its fluctuations of moods and underlay of loneliness, mystic grandeur and melancholy which is the essence of much of the Finnish composer.

It's a first encounter with symphonic form, and not entirely worked into the structural niceties, dealing in episodes and moods without the developmental logic of his later symphonies. But still a declaration of importance, power and rugged individualism.

For Sibelius, a bold entry into the symphony — tough, boney, masculine writing with meaty scoring and heady harmonic seasoning. There's nothing puny or precious about his "slow movement," the andante with its melancholy song, but a song which erupts into heated climaxes. And this symphony has that sense of the "big outdoors" and the dark mysteries of nature Sibelius could convey so well. At the end, irresolution — big, broad chords dissolving into two final pizzicato notes.

Davis led a rugged, virile performance, putting a lot of blood and muscle into the music, keeping up the tension. The English conductor, one of the BSO's two principal guest conductors this season, is good at etching long melodic lines and is valued for his command and control. Here, he consistently maintained an agitated momentum, driving to strong climaxes, though perhaps rushing some of the initial statements in the first movement.

His dramatic approach worked less favorably in the opening work on the program, Beethoven's Overture to "Coriolan," which seemed hyper-dramatic, particularly when reinforced by Davis' crouching, hyperbolic gestures. "Coriolan" certainly is strong stuff, but this seemed over the line into "Ach der anguish! Der drama!"

In between came scampering Haydn — the Symphony No. 87 in A, one of the set of six "Paris symphonies" of the mid-1780s. Mature Haydn of the dazzling effects: abrupt changes in dynamics, dizzying modulations (Haydn could change keys more slickly than any locksmith) the constant surprise, like the big pause before the recapitulation of the first movement.

After some initial hard-toned string playing, the performance settled down into artful Haydn, with Davis getting firm rhythms, nice contrasts in dynamics and the Haydnesque staccato-legato juxtaposition, and a good sense of design. I particularly enjoyed Davis' way with the minuet — a healthy, earthy, foot-stomping type — so neatly inflected and unmistakeably a dance.

Tues A.
#4

AFTER XMAS PRICES

Tuesday B

#1 STANDARD TIMES (E)
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
D. 75.000

OCT 18 1973 New England Newsclip

E. J. Dias review

BSO opens with popular works

The opening program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday "B" Series, with Colin Davis, the orchestra's permanent guest conductor on the podium, offered three works that have long been popular with concert-goers. These were Beethoven's "Coriolan" Overture and his "Piano Concerto No. 5 in E Flat" (the "Emperor's"), with Christoph Eschenbach as soloist, and Brahms' "Symphony No. 2 in D."

Davis is a meticulous conductor, concerned always with a careful shaping of the music and with a nice eye for revealing detail. The opening "Coriolan," for example, had both clarity and power, and the "Emperor Concerto" was nothing short of brilliant both in Davis' conception and in Eschenbach's work at the keyboard. Eschenbach, a slim, almost frail-looking man of 33, displays unexpected strength in his playing. In the opening measures, in which the piano rolls up from the bottom E flat and cascades down again in a long arch of sound, his tone quality and articulation were flawless.

And so they remained throughout the performance of a work so organically conceived that an underlying pulse, a throb of movement, beats it in from start to finish. All the contrasts in the work—from the simple, hymnlike, but inordinately beautiful slow movement to the Schumanesque rondo and the fireworks of the closing allegro — were splendidly conveyed in what only can be called a masterful rendition.

As for the Brahms "Symphony No. 2," there is little new that can be said about it. It has always impressed me as the most melodious and, in most respects, the most heartwarming of Brahms' four works in this genre, and to be successful in concert performance, it must be played with warmth and in the appropriately romantic vein. It is an acid test of the sound and integration of an orchestra, and, fortunately, both Maestro Davis and his instrumentalists rose to the occasion in what was a highly satisfactory and pleasurable reading.

#2 STANDARD TIMES (E)
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
D. 75.000

NOV 8 1973 New England Newsclip

E. J. Dias Review

BSO concert is adequate

Seiji Ozawa, who is this season assuming his duties as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was on the podium this week in Symphony Hall to conduct the second program of the Tuesday "B" Series. The lithe and dynamic Ozawa chose three works for his musicians — Rachmaninoff's "Symphony No. 3 in A Minor," Gunther Schuller's "Capriccio Stravagante," and Debussy's "La Mer."

The Rachmaninoff, a welcome selection in this centennial year of the composer's birth, is more pungent harmonically and rhythmically than his first two symphonies or such a tone poem as "The Isle of the Dead." It is, of course, traditional and romantic, still pervaded by a Tchaikovsky flavor, and the usual blend of sentiment and melancholy. It does, however, offer some glorious sound, and Ozawa and his players did full justice to it in a sonorous reading that was pleasant and relaxing.

As for Schuller's "Capriccio Stravagante," it is, according to its composer, a "musical joke," with its playful manipulation of musical materials in a series of brief, contrasting sections. Schuller, who is president of the New England Conservatory of Music, is an eminent musicologist as well as composer, but this work, first played in San Francisco two years ago, perhaps demands too much of the audience. Schuller is parodying and even quoting certain practitioners of 20th Century music, but unless one has a thorough knowledge of such music, he will, I think, miss the fun. True, the piece has a couple of sequences in which the laughs are obvious, but on the whole, despite its clever use of the orchestra, it is not likely to warm the hearts of most audiences.

Debussy's "La Mer" is, of course, a familiar work to veteran Boston Symphony concert-goers, because the late Charles Munch made it his own and featured it on many programs. The great seascape, a gem of musical impressionism with its variety of color and mood, was given an adequate rendition by Ozawa and his instrumentalists, but, somehow or other, it lacked the ineffable magic, the shimmering mysticism that Munch accustomed us to. This is not to say that the work was not well-played—it was. However, the reading was more straightforward, more prosaic than it should be.

#3 ITEM (E)
LYNN, MASS.
D. 34,000

NOV 1 1973 New England Newsclip

The Lively Arts

Tuesday, Nov. 30, at 7:30 p.m. Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster and assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct works of Schumann, Dvorak and Prokofiev.

Mr. Silverstein opens the concert with Schumann's Overture for Byron's "Manfred" op. 115, and follows with Dvorak's Serenade in E for strings, op. 22. Mr. Silverstein closes the concert with Prokofiev's Symphony No. 5, op. 100.

Assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since the beginning of the 1971-72 season and concertmaster since 1962, he joined the orchestra in 1955. He was then, at the age of 22, the youngest member. Born in Detroit, he studied at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia and later with Josef Gingold and Mischa Mischakoff. He was a prize winner in the 1959 Queen Elisabeth of Belgium International Competition and a year later won the Naumberg Foundation Award. Before coming to Boston he played in the orchestras of Houston, Denver and Philadelphia.

* * *

The New England Conservatory Ragtime Ensemble will be in concert at Jordan Hall on Friday, Nov. 2, and Saturday, Nov. 17, at 8:30 p.m.

Lincoln Center in New York will host the Ragtime Ensemble at a Nov. 4 performance in Alice Tully Hall.

The Jordan Hall concerts in Boston are both benefits for the New England Conservatory's fund-raising campaign. Tickets may be obtained at the Jordan Hall box office.

* * *

The final performance of the Boston Children's Theatre production of "The Red Shoes" will be presented at John Hancock Hall, Boston, Saturday at 2 p.m. Future productions will be "Aladdin", "Rumpelstiltskin" and "The Little Princess".

#5 STANDARD TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
S. 63,259

FEB 7 1974 New England Newsclip

A Look at the Arts by Earl J. Dias

Walter Piston, music win dual Boston tribute

It was a genuine pleasure last week to be on hand in Boston's venerable Symphony Hall, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its regular Tuesday "B" Series, paid tribute to composer Walter Piston on the occasion of his 80th birthday. The orchestra, under the direction of Michael Tilson Thomas, played Piston's 1948 work, "Toccata," neoclassical in style, sharp and brilliant, and originally commissioned by the Orchestre National de France.

Piston, white-haired and erect, was present and received a standing ovation at the conclusion of "Toccata." Piston is a man well worth honoring. A native of Rockland, Me., he was graduated from Harvard in 1924, summa cum laude.

After studying with Nadia Boulanger in Paris, he returned to Harvard in 1926 and taught there for the next 34 years in the College of Music. Among the students whom he helped in his long cereer are Leonard Bernstein, Irving Fine, Elliot Carter, Arthur Berger, Daniel Pinkham, and Samuel Adler.

Always maintaining a close connection with the Boston Symphony (the late Serge Koussevitsky commissioned many of Piston's compositions), his debut as a composer came in 1928 with "Symphonic suite." His "Symphony No. 7" and his "Symphony No. 3" both won Pulitzer Prizes. In his music he has always utilized the strict structure of 18th-Century style but has also composed from the Romantic viewpoint and, on occasion, has wandered into the world of dissonant harmonies and linear counterpoint.

His music is always fresh in approach, often experimental, and nearly always successful. He has, in short, been a credit to the American musical scene.

#4 STANDARD TIMES (E)
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
D. 75.000

APR 11 1974 New England Newsclip

E. J. Dias review

Thomas, BSO give top-notch concert

Michael Tilson Thomas, one of the most agile and intense of contemporary young conductors, was on the podium in Symphony Hall for the concluding program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday "B" Series. Maestro Thomas chose a program devoted to only two works — the Brahms Schoenberg "Quartet for Piano and Strings in G Minor, Opus 25" and Richard Strauss' often exciting tone poem, "Also Sprach Zarathustra, Opus 30."

Both works are, of course, notable for their brilliance and variety of orchestration, well-calculated to display the sonorous strength and remarkable integration of sound of the Boston ensemble. For the Brahms "Quartet," Schoenberg fashioned a highly successful orchestral transcription — remarkable in that, despite Schoenberg's interest in atonality, he put this interest behind him for once and gave us instead a piece that is laudably faithful to the spirit and intent of the original. Thus, the transcription, done in 19th-Century romantic style, actually sounds like a Brahm symphony.

It offers many delights — a lovely Intermezzo full of shimmering beauty and a lively and wonderfully rhythmical Gypsy Rondo that makes the listener want to clap his hands and stamp his feet. Although the work runs for nearly an hour, it does not seem that long — a tribute to Thomas and his musicians, who performed it to the hilt.

As for the Strauss "Zarathrusta," it is one of the grandest showpieces in the entire orchestral repertoire, revealing, in all of its aspects, Strauss' marvelous mastery of the modern orchestra.

Many of Strauss' early critics regarded his tone poems as horrendous examples of ugliness and bad taste; Debussy referred to one of the compositions as "an hour in an insane dramatic surge and sweep of the music, the grandeur of the elocution, the skill of thematic development. "Zarathhustra" has all these qualities from the thrilling opening (borrowed for background use by the makers of the film, "2001: Spacd Odyssey,") the mystic slow sections, the pianissimo conclusion. And the Boston Symphony was in top-notch form to make this final concert of the series a richly rewarding experience.

#4 STANDARD TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
S. 63,259

JAN 24 1974 New England Newsclip

E. J. Dias Review

Pleasant BSO concert honors composer Piston

For the fourth concert in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday "B" Series, conductor Michael Tilson Thomas, who likes to experiment in his programming, selected three works notable not for great depth but for genuine listening pleasure. The three works, none of them hackneyed, were Bach's "Suite No. 3 in D," Walter Piston's "Toccata," and Tschaikovsky's "Suite No. 3 in G."

As a sort of lagniappe, Mr. Piston, whose 80th birthday the orchestra was commemorating in its playing of the "Toccata," was on hand to receive a well-deserved standing ovation. Piston, of course, has had a long and distinguished career, which includes 34 years of teaching at Harvard and two Pulitzer Prizes. His "Toccata" is neo-classic in structure, its theme and variations developed skillfully and with admirable spontaneity. And Maestro Thomas and his musicians gave it a stirring rendition.

The Bach Suite, which opened the program, is a thoroughly ingratiating piece of music, with a stately, roccoco overture; two lively gavottes, a delightful Gigue, and a lovely Andante — the famous "Air" (Sometimes called "Air for the G String,") which is a singularly poignant melody. Again Thomas and the orchestra were in good form, with splendid solo work in individual sections and with laudable tonal texture.

As for the Tchaikovsky "Suite," it should be played more often — as a change from the customary symphonies, or "Romeo and Juliet," or the "1812 Overture." Its four movements feature some gorgeous sound and some beautifully melodic inspiration.

Moreover, its Finale — the famous "Theme and Variations," which is frequently played as an individual work — serves to remind us just how expert an orchestrator Tschaikovsky was and how he knew how to utilize every facet of a good orchestra.

The next concert in the Series will be performed on March 5, with Seiji Ozawa on the podium, and will feature works by Bach, Haydn, and Schoenberg.

Tuesday B

p. 42

#1 STANDARD TIMES (E)
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
D. 75,000

OCT 18 1973 New England Newsclip

E. J. Dias review

BSO opens with popular works

The opening program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday "B" Series, with Colin Davis, the orchestra's permanent guest conductor on the podium, offered three works that have long been popular with concert-goers. These were Beethoven's "Coriolan" Overture and his "Piano Concerto No. 5 in E Flat" (the "Emperor's"), with Christoph Eschenbach as soloist, and Brahms' "Symphony No. 2 in D."

Davis is a meticulous conductor, concerned always with a careful shaping of the music and with a nice eye for revealing detail. The opening "Coriolan," for example, had both clarity and power, and the "Emperor Concerto" was nothing short of brilliant both in Davis' conception and in Eschenbach's work at the keyboard. Eschenbach, a slim, almost frail-looking man of 33, displays unexpected strength in his playing. In the opening measures, in which the piano rolls up from the bottom E flat and cascades down again in a long arch of sound, his tone quality and articulation were flawless.

And so they remained throughout the performance of a work so organically conceived that an underlying pulse, a throb of movement, beats it in from start to finish. All the contrasts in the work—from the simple, hymnlike, but inordinately beautiful slow movement to the Schumanesque rondo and the fireworks of the closing allegro — were splendidly conveyed in what only can be called a masterful rendition.

As for the Brahms "Symphony No. 2," there is little new that can be said about it. It has always impressed me as the most melodious and, in most respects, the most heartwarming of Brahms' four works in this genre, and to be successful in concert performance, it must be played with warmth and in the appropriately romantic vein. It is an acid test of the sound and integration of an orchestra, and, fortunately, both Maestro Davis and his instrumentalists rose to the occasion in what was a highly satisfactory and pleasurable reading.

#2 STANDARD TIMES (E)
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
D. 75,000

NOV 8 1973 New England Newsclip

E. J. Dias Review

BSO concert is adequate

Seiji Ozawa, who is this season assuming his duties as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was on the podium this week in Symphony Hall to conduct the second program of the Tuesday "B" Series. The lithe and dynamic Ozawa chose three works for his musicians — Rachmaninoff's "Symphony No. 3 in A Minor," Gunther Schuller's "Capriccio Stravagante," and Debussy's "La Mer."

The Rachmaninoff, a welcome selection in this centennial year of the composer's birth, is more pungent harmonically and rhythmically than his first two symphonies or such a tone poem as "The Isle of the Dead." It is, of course, traditional and romantic, still pervaded by a Tchaikovsky flavor, and the usual blend of sentiment and melancholy. It does, however, offer some glorious sound, and Ozawa and his players did full justice to it in a sonorous reading that was pleasant and relaxing.

As for Schuller's "Capriccio Stravagante," it is, according to its composer, a "musical joke," with its playful manipulation of musical materials in a series of brief, contrasting sections. Schuller, who is president of the New England Conservatory of Music, is an eminent musicologist as well as composer, but this work, first played in San Francisco two years ago, perhaps demands too much of the audience. Schuller is parodying and even quoting certain practitioners of 20th Century music, but unless one has a thorough knowledge of such music, he will, I think, miss the fun. True, the piece has a couple of sequences in which the laughs are obvious, but on the whole, despite its clever use of the orchestra, it is not likely to warm the hearts of most audiences.

Debussy's "La Mer" is, of course, a familiar work to veteran Boston Symphony concert-goers, because the late Charles Munch made it his own and featured it on many programs. The great seascape, a gem of musical impressionism with its variety of color and mood, was given an adequate rendition by Ozawa and his instrumentalists, but, somehow or other, it lacked the ineffable magic, the shimmering mysticism that Munch accustomed us to. This is not to say that the work was not well-played—it was. However, the reading was more straightforward, more prosaic than it should be.

#3 ITEM (E)
LYNN, MASS.
D. 34,000

NOV 1 1973 New England Newsclip

The Lively Arts

Tuesday, Nov. 30, at 7:30 p.m. Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster and assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct works of Schumann, Dvorak and Prokofiev.

Mr. Silverstein opens the concert with Schumann's Overture for Byron's "Manfred" op. 115, and follows with Dvorak's Serenade in E for strings, op. 22. Mr. Silverstein closes the concert with Prokofiev's Symphony No. 5, op. 100.

Assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since the beginning of the 1971-72 season and concertmaster since 1962, he joined the orchestra in 1955. He was then, at the age of 22, the youngest member. Born in Detroit, he studied at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia and later with Josef Gingold and Mischa Mischakoff. He was a prize winner in the 1959 Queen Elisabeth of Belgium International Competition and a year later won the Naumberg Foundation Award. Before coming to Boston he played in the orchestras of Houston, Denver and Philadelphia.

* * *

The New England Conservatory Ragtime Ensemble will be in concert at Jordan Hall on Friday, Nov. 2, and Saturday, Nov. 17, at 8:30 p.m.

Lincoln Center in New York will host the Ragtime Ensemble at a Nov. 4 performance in Alice Tully Hall.

The Jordan Hall concerts in Boston are both benefits for the New England Conservatory's fund-raising campaign. Tickets may be obtained at the Jordan Hall box office.

* * *

The final performance of the Boston Children's Theatre production of "The Red Shoes" will be presented at John Hancock Hall, Boston, Saturday at 2 p.m. Future productions will be "Aladdin", "Rumpelstiltskin" and "The Little Princess".

#5 STANDARD TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
S. 63,259

FEB 2 1974 New England Newsclip

A Look at the Arts by Earl J. Dias

Walter Piston, music win dual Boston tribute

It was a genuine pleasure last week to be on hand in Boston's venerable Symphony Hall, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its regular Tuesday "B" Series, paid tribute to composer Walter Piston on the occasion of his 80th birthday. The orchestra, under the direction of Michael Tilson Thomas, played Piston's 1948 work, "Toccata," neoclassical in style, sharp and brilliant, and originally commissioned by the Orchestre National de France.

Piston, white-haired and erect, was present and received a standing ovation at the conclusion of "Toccata." Piston is a man well worth honoring. A native of Rockland, Me., he was graduated from Harvard in 1924, summa cum laude.

After studying with Nadia Boulanger in Paris, he returned to Harvard in 1926 and taught there for the next 34 years in the College of Music. Among the students whom he helped in his long cereer are Leonard Bernstein, Irving Fine, Elliot Carter, Arthur Berger, Daniel Pinkham, and Samuel Adler.

Always maintaining a close connection with the Boston Symphony (the late Serge Koussevitsky commissioned many of Piston's compositions), his debut as a composer came in 1928 with "Symphonic suite." His "Symphony No. 7" and his "Symphony No. 3" both won Pulitzer Prizes. In his music he has always utilized the strict structure of 18th-Century style but has also composed from the Romantic viewpoint and, on occasion, has wandered into the world of dissonant harmonies and linear counterpoint.

His music is always fresh in approach, often experimental, and nearly always successful. He has, in short, been a credit to the American musical scene.

#4 STANDARD TIMES (E)
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
D. 75,000

APR 11 1974 New England Newsclip

E. J. Dias review

Thomas, BSO give top-notch concert

Michael Tilson Thomas, one of the most agile and intense of contemporary young conductors, was on the podium in Symphony Hall for the concluding program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday "B" Series. Maestro Thomas chose a program devoted to only two works — the Brahms Schoenberg "Quartet for Piano and Strings in G Minor, Opus 25" and Richard Strauss' often exciting tone poem, "Also Sprach Zarathustra, Opus 30."

Both works are, of course, notable for their brilliance and variety of orchestration, well-calculated to display the sonorous strength and remarkable integration of sound of the Boston ensemble. For the Brahms "Quartet," Schoenberg fashioned a highly successful orchestral transcription — remarkable in that, despite Schoenberg's interest in atonality, he put this interest behind him for once and gave us instead a piece that is laudably faithful to the spirit and intent of the original. Thus, the transcription, done in 19th-Century romantic style, actually sounds like a Brahm symphony.

It offers many delights — a lovely Intermezzo full of shimmering beauty and a lively and wonderfully rhythmical Gypsy Rondo that makes the listener want to clap his hands and stamp his feet. Although the work runs for nearly an hour, it does not seem that long — a tribute to Thomas and his musicians, who performed it to the hilt.

As for the Strauss "Zarathrusta," it is one of the grandest showpieces in the entire orchestral repertoire, revealing, in all of its aspects, Strauss' marvelous mastery of the modern orchestra.

Many of Strauss' early critics regarded his tone poems as horrendous examples of ugliness and bad taste; Debussy referred to one of the compositions as "an hour in an insane asylum." But today, we recognize the dramatic surge and sweep of the music, the grandeur of the elocution, the skill of thematic development. "Zarathhustra" has all these qualities from the thrilling opening (borrowed for background use by the makers of the film, "2001: Spacd Odyssey,") the mystic slow sections, the pianissimo conclusion. And the Boston Symphony was in top-notch form to make this final concert of the series a richly rewarding experience.

JAN 24 1974 New England Newsclip

E. J. Dias Review

Pleasant BSO concert honors composer Piston

For the fourth concert in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday "B" Series, conductor Michael Tilson Thomas, who likes to experiment in his programming, selected three works notable not for great depth but for genuine listening pleasure. The three works, none of them hackneyed, were Bach's "Suite No. 3 in D," Walter Piston's "Toccata," and Tschaikovsky's "Suite No. 3 in G."

As a sort of lagniappe, Mr. Piston, whose 80th birthday the orchestra was commemorating in its playing of the "Toccata," was on hand to receive a well-deserved standing ovation. Piston, of course, has had a long and distinguished career, which includes 34 years of teaching at Harvard and two Pulitzer Prizes. His "Toccata" is neo-classic in structure, its theme and variations developed skillfully and with admirable spontaneity. And Maestro Thomas and his musicians gave it a stirring rendition.

The Bach Suite, which opened the program, is a thoroughly ingratiating piece of music, with a stately, roccoco overture; two lively gavottes, a delightful Gigue, and a lovely Andante — the famous "Air" (Sometimes called "Air for the G String,") which is a singularly poignant melody. Again Thomas and the orchestra were in good form, with splendid solo work in individual sections and with laudable tonal texture.

As for the Tchaikovsky "Suite," it should be played more often — as a change from the customary symphonies, or "Romeo and Juliet," or the "1812 Overture." Its four movements feature some gorgeous sound and some beautifully melodic inspiration.

Moreover, its Finale — the famous "Theme and Variations," which is frequently played as an individual work — serves to remind us just how expert an orchestrator Tschaikovsky was and how he knew how to utilize every facet of a good orchestra.

The next concert in the Series will be performed on March 5, with Seiji Ozawa on the podium, and will feature works by Bach, Haydn, and Schoenberg.

GLOBE (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 261,042
APR 12 1974
New England Newsclip

[redacted] Spectrum

Baroque Dance joins BSO for a delightful exercise in the social graces

MICHAEL STEINBERG

We know what 18th Century courantes, gavottes, bourrees and minuets sound like, and it was a delighftul idea that Michael Tilson Thomas had when he got Wendy Hilton and her Baroque Dance Company to show what they look like. Last night's Boston Symphony Spectrum concert began with Bach's C major Suite, and at the end of the Overture, six dancers entered and went through their paces, literally, as the orchestra played the series of dances.

Such dances most often were done by one couple, sometimes two, with everyone else watching: they are, in other words, authentic spectator sport. In the proper 18th Century way, Thomas introduced the dances by beating out the time with a long stick on the floor—you remember the story of how Lully died of gangrene contracted by ramming such a pole through his foot. The dances are a delight to watch—quite showy, they are, for the men who dip and bob and leap and strut in a manner that amusingly suggests courting rituals in the bird world. For the women, whose dresses make them less maneuverable and less visible, it is all rather quieter. It was pleasing to see a social grace and diversion calling for real skill, and to observe the flexibility and freedom with which the steps move across the obvious beat not only charms the eye, but nicely illuminates one's notions of how the music goes.

Wendy Hilton, who is English but now works mostly in this country, is a dancer, choreographer and a scholar of impeccable credentials. She reconstructed the dances from manuals of the period, and with her company, which consists of herself, Juerg Buerth, Eileen Cropley, Nicholas Gunn, Elizabeth Haberer and Haynes Owens, she performed with wit and wonderfully floaty grace.

Thomas then moved suddenly and far to explore that peculiar and never quite satisfactory genre called melodrama, spoken recitation with musical accompaniment. (Another thing is that it has taken on a certain patina of camp.) With Thomas at the piano, Michael Wager spoke "To be or not to be" in German to a fantasy by C.P.E. Bach, Hebbel's ballad of "Schoen Hedwig" in Schumann's naively attractive setting, and a German translation of Tolstoy's "Blind Bard" with tired, self-imitative music by Liszt. For the benefit of non-German speakers, English translations were projected on a screen. Inept miking and a persistent electronic hum went far to spoil the effect.

Luciano Berio's "Recital I (for Cathy)" was also a victim of whatever it was that turned the sound of Cathy Berberian's voice into mud. The piece itself, which you can get on a nice and clear RCA record, is a dramatic scena for singer, pianist (who arrives late) and mostly off-stage orchestra. It pretends to philosophical statements about the hard times of performing musicians, plays the quotation game, provides a singer-actress of Berberian's temperament with some rich opportunities (though her bag of vocal tricks is not, in fact, large), and is a vintage specimen of claptrap.

3
PATRIOT LEDGER (E)
QUINCY, MASS.
D. 71,020
APR 13 1974
New England Newsclip

In Concert

Unspectacular Spectrum

By Peter M. Knapp
Patriot Ledger Staff

The last of this year's three Spectrum concerts took place Thursday night at Symphony Hall, with a predominantly young and under-capacity audience coming to hear Michael Tilson Thomas' efforts to splice together "Three Centuries of Drama in Music."

Thomas has done some innovative and ingenious things with the Spectrum series but this idea seemed to be reaching, and its content was not terribly distinguished unless you happen to be a collector of curios. And one cannot help noticing that audience interest this year in the Spectrum series seems to be waning and there are rumors around that it may be abandoned.

Bright

The program began brightly enough, with members of the Boston Symphony (in their usual formal ~~concert attire~~ — the initial Spectrum idea of informal dress has been dropped) playing J. S. Bach's Suite No. 1 in C while members of the Wendy Hilton Baroque Dance Company expertly performed pertinent and authentic dances of the period. Now this was a happy idea, and visually attractive, too, with the six men and women of the company decked out in handsome period costumes (by Cheryl Lovett), looking for all the world like an animated oil painting.

Bach's suites were based on dance movements, of course (Thomas referred to going back to the music "in its original context of the dance," and how working with the Wendy Hilton dancers had altered his concept of the various movements' rhythm), and the formalism and grace of the dancers added to an uncommonly fine musical performance. The rhythms were bouncy and snappily defined, and there was some marvellous wind playing.

Then the program moved into a series of melodramas, with Thomas at the piano and actor Michael Wager declaiming the words. There were a German version of the soliloquy from Shakespeare's "Hamlet" accompanied by C. P. E. Bach's Fantasy in C minor; Schumann's "Schoen Hedwig," Op. 106, and Franz Liszt's "Der blinde Saenger."

While most melodrama to contemporary tastes comes off as so much camp and corn, there must be somebody who can find amusement or even merit in its extreme romantic manifestations, as in the sentimental Schumann and Liszt pieces, just as some will go along with "The Great Gatsby" fad. (The device of melodrama — using spoken text against a musical background — of course is not limited to the soap-operatic "melodramatic" any more than any theatrical device is confined to its weaker examples.)

Murky

Melodrama in centuries past did enjoy some popularity, but tastes change. This particular trio came off as camp, with some of the words garbled by an unfriendly sound system. To set the stage, Thomas had the hall suitably murked and the piano flanked by two doubtless-plastic potted palms. Ach! Actor Wager kept a straight face and managed the style neatly with good German diction (English subtitles flashed on a screen).

Capping the evening was Luciano Berio's daffy but oddly touching Recital 1 (For Cathy). The Cathy is mezzo-soprano-actress-linguist and altogether virtuoso performer Cathy Berberian. The scenario is far too complex to adequately convey in a few words, but it involves an aging singer reciting her life's frustrations and the domination of her career on the recital stage, finally being trapped in a bag in which she can only oscillate helplessly between two notes (talk about being caught in a repertorial cul de sac!).

A Wonder

There's a chamber orchestra behind a screen making mostly cacophonic noises; an accompanist who shows up late and leaves early; some electronic blats from an electric organ; and a wardrobe mistress who shows up periodically to burden the recitalist with another hunk of costume.

But the show is really Cathy's — stream-of-consciousness monologue with snatches of music from the recitalist's repertoire. There's everything here, from Monteverdi to Verdi, and even a few bars of Dietrich's "Blue Angel" song.

Miss Berberian is a wonder — by turns funny, touching, pathetic. She has an immense range, down to a smoky, sultry basement, and a voice of no little beauty projected by a compelling personality. Despite the absurdity of the situation, I found myself moved by the few serious refrains the piece allows (there is one complete song, by Berio) and astonished by her ability to carry off this tour-de-force.

3
HERALD-AMERICAN (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 424,654
APR 13 1974
New England Newsclip

Dance Enhances BSO

By ELLEN PFEIFER

It's hard to say exactly what Baroque dancing was doing on Michael Tilson Thomas' examination of "Three Centuries of Drama in Music" last night at Symphony Hall. But it was, by far, the most interesting, the most artistically gratifying aspect of the BSO Spectrum program that also included Luciano Berio's bizarre (and ultimately boring) "Recital I (For Cathy)" and three melodramas for speaker and piano by C.P.E. Bach, Schumann, and Liszt.

The dancing, by the Wendy Hilton Baroque Dance Company, accompanied the orchestra's playing of J. S. Bach's Suite No. 1 in C major and, according to Ms. Hilton's notes, acknowledged the pure-instrumental purpose of Bach's collection of dance movements. However, the dances "revealed how truly Bach understood their spirit."

In practice, Bach's music proved eminently danceable and Ms. Hilton's six-dancer company superbly schooled and stylish.

From both a musical and dance point of view, there were lessons to be learned from the choreography derived or inspired by the great 18th Century dance manuals. First, was the very close association between steps and figures and the musical rhetoric, the figures paralleling in mood and gesture what was happening phrase by phrase in the music. Such closeness is often missed altogether in more recent dance idioms.

• Music Review

Second, this dancing was fascinating in the way it so obviously presaged later developments in ballet technique. Social dance of this type — which was designed for courtiers — already required turned-out legs and feet and an "open" and noble presentation of the torsa and arms.

I reminded one of the amusing 18th century prints of dancing lessons in which courtiers attempted to achieve correct turn-out with diabolical machines that forced out toes and knees.

Ms. Hilton's company showed that Barouqe dance was at once elegant, sprightly and accomplished, an activity that would be both demanding and highly satisfying to do and to watch.

Berio's "Recital I", which this reviewer has discussed in a previous record review, proved even less interesting than one might have expected. The recording with Cathy Berberian (who also starred in the piece Thursday night) was pretentious; a tour-de-force for the singer who is required to sing snatches of a vast repertory, speak in any number of languages and accents, and act convincingly; and ultimately trashy.

One thought that the visual element of Ms. Berberian, who is admittedly an electrifying stage presence, would have added an element of amusement, fun, or, at the end, tragedy. But even she was unable to make much out of this pastiche.

There is an element of play for the vocal music buff who likes to identify snatches of familiar operatic or song tunes, but beyond that, the piece is never really funny and certainly doesn't approach the tragic (although it tries). The vitality which marked Berio's other pastiche the Sinfonia, is missing here.

As for the melodramas, they were attempts — amusing but not to be taken very seriously — to provide musical counterpoint for readings of poems and monologues. Only the Liszt setting for 'Der blinde Sanger" approached being interesting and expressive in depicting a blind artist's creative ecstasy.

In both the Berio and the melodramas the performances of Ms. Berberian and reader Michael Wager were turned into sonic mud by amplification of the most unprofessional calibre.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE
MONITOR (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 187,897

APR 15 1974 New England Newsclip

Spectrum

44

Vehicle for the brilliant Cathy Berberian

BSO Spectrum concerts end on a downbeat

By Louis Snyder

When the Boston Symphony introduced its series of Spectrum Concerts three seasons ago, it not only gave the go-ahead to its then associate conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, to experiment with innovative programming, but it reopened a door, largely closed since the days of Serge Koussevitzky, to the world of contemporary compostion. The aim was to woo new audiences, especially the young, and to take the starch, so-called, out of the concertgoing ritual.

Music

Last Thursday evening, after a career marked by ups and downs including a shattering Brahmin cause celebre, there was another Spectrum Concert, led by Mr. Thomas — the third program this season, and generally understood to be the final one in the foreseeable future. Despite Mr. Thomas's provocative ideas and vocal zeal in communicating them to his audiences, Spectrum never quite caught on, even though Thursday's Symphony Hall gathering was a large one.

It just may be that the reasons for Spectrum's demise are contained in this farewell program. Titled rather inaccurately "Three Centuries of Drama in Music," it comprised a Bach suite for dancers, three "melodramas" for speaker and piano, and a stage piece, "Recital I (For Cathy)" by Luciano Berio. None of them could really be considered to have made a permanent dent dramatically in the centuries they apparently represented, and except for the orderly dancing of the Bach, they revealed several kinds of self-indulgence at its most wearing. It was sad to see it happen, but happen it did.

Mr. Thomas's introduction of the Bach Suite No. 1 in C was in the best Spectrum tradition. How many audiences, who listen to suites played by orchestras, pianists et al, recall that these were written for social dancing, just as fox-trots, one-steps, tangos, and maxixes were, for that matter? The Wendy Hilton Baroque Dance Company demonstrated them engagingly, and members of the BSO played the seven sections with crisp accuracy under Mr. Thomas's direction.

The amplification (imperfect) reared its microphonic head, and proceeded to distort the evening's two remaining performances. Neither of them, as it turned out, contended too successfully with this technical albatross, even though incomprehensibility was not the chief fault with what followed.

The three melodramas, declaimed by Michael Wager, with Mr. Thomas at the piano, were essentially parlor pieces, long on text and short of musical value. Curiosities all, they consisted of a setting of Hamlet's "To be or not to be" arranged by Heinrich Wilhelm von Gerstenberg from a C.P.E. Bach Fantasy; Schumann's "Schoen Hedwig" and Liszt's lengthy "Blinde Saenger," which were accompanied by a running translation flashed on a background screen. For all their now campy pretension, they hardly seemed worth the performers' or the listeners' time.

'For Cathy'

The "Recital I (For Cathy)" which Mr. Berio has devised for the diverse and rather specialized talents of singer Cathy Berberian filled the remainder of the evening. A one-woman show for Miss Berberian, it presents the singer in a visibly distraught condition — "a vision of the burden formed by the accumulation of a lifetime's involvement with a musical repertoire," according to program notes.

This "vision" consisted of her being draped with increasingly voluminous additions to her costume by a casual wardrobe mistress (Elizabeth Walsh), and her irritation with a tardy accompanist (Sahan Arzruni), during which Miss Berberian herself kept up a sung and spoken monologue spiced with musical snippets from a huge grab-bag of compositional sources.

Meanwhile, behind the tatty screens that stretched across the hall's stage, members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, presumably conducted by Mr. Thomas, punctuated this flow of utterance with orchestral comments of varying intensity and appropriateness. Once again the quality of amplification detracted from concentration on an already schizophrenic concept.

Miss Berberian's representation of this battered Bernhardt of song was a spectacular tour de force to watch and to hear — one shudders to think of anyone else attempting it, even a giddy Anna Russell. She was rapturously received at the "Concert's" end by audience, Mr. Thomas, and Mr. Berio, who was discovered to be present. But except for its having been recorded, one wonders what future this piece can have except as a vehicle for the brilliant Miss Berberian — a limited legacy from this promising series.

And so, hail and farewell, Spectrum!

Spectrum's Michael Tilson Thomas

Thursday eve.

10 The Boston Globe Saturday, January 19, 1974

THE ARTS

Paganini to Piston with Tilson Thomas and the BSO

MICHAEL STEINBERG

Piston, Chausson, Paganini, and Tchaikovsky were on the program which Michael Tilson Thomas conducted with the Boston Symphony Thursday evening (with repetitions yesterday afternoon and tonight), but, perhaps suprisingly, the 20th-century work was the farthest from being the novelty. Piston's Toccata, composed 1948 for the first American tour of the Orchestre National de Paris under Charles Munch and played now in honor of the composer's 80th birthday tomorrow, had performances by the Czech Philharmonic in 1965 and the Philadelphia Orchestra in 1969. Chausson's "Poeme" and Tchaikovsky's Suite No. 3, on the other hand, have been absent rather longer, and Paganini's Violin Concerto No. 3 in E major was getting its first live hearing in Boston.

When Henryk Szeryng, who was the soloist here, rediscovered and reintroduced the Paganini 3d Concerto a couple of years ago, he gave it its first complete performances since the composer's lifetime. Its vicissitudes between 1833, its last certain performance by Paganini himself, and 1970 are too complicated to go into here, but it is good to have what is arguably Paganini's most interesting concerto restored.

Granted, Paganini had his limitations as a composer. He thought of pleasing melodies in a rather operatic vein and he was ingenious at finding ways of making them exceedingly difficult to play on the violin. The orchestra's share is not wildly interesting, but that has to do not only with the nature of the kind of display piece Paganini wanted to write, but also with his obsession about the guarding of his violinistic secrets: he used to pass out the orchestra parts just before the performance and collect them immediately afterwards, and it all had to be easy enough for all-but-sight-reading by orchestras in Coblenz and Strasbourg and Liverpool, none remotely in a class with the BSO of 1974. (He was quite aware, too, of the publicity value of such hocus-pocus.)

Still, in the 3d Concerto, the tunes are attractive, both when dashing and when tender, and their violinistic exploitation is dazzling. Then, with Szeryng to play it, you see what it is all about. Szeryng, unlike Paganini, does not look like a man possibly in league with the devil: he merely plays that way. Leopold Auer, the teacher of Everybody (Heifetz, Elman, Zimbalist, et al.), used to say that when he had passages in octaves he purposely played them just a little out of tune, otherwise people wouldn't know they were octaves: Szeryng plays his octaves in tune, uncannily so, and to the point where you can hardly tell they are octaves, so that this was the first time the Auer story really was brought home to me.

That is not all he can do. In technique, taste, and breadth of musical interest, he is perhaps the most accomplished in an all-round way of today's big-name players. His performance of the Paganini was from every point of view enchanting, in its brio and grace as much as in its absolutely dazzling instrumental command. The performance of Chausson's lovely "Poeme" disappointed, though. With his cleanly beautiful tone, discreet vibrato, and elegant style, Szeryng ought to be its ideal interpreter. Perhaps on other days he is, but this Thursday the performance was oddly discontinuous and tensionless, Thomas's conducting, which was admirably alert in the Paganini, being extremely vague and unsupportive.

A few details of woodwind intonation and some rather loud "pianissimi" aside, I can hardly imagine a better performance of the Tchaikovsky 3d Suite than the one with which Thomas and the BSO ended the concert. It is wonderful music in Tchaikovsky's most balletic manner, fascinatingly inventive in melody and scoring, piquant, full of character, wistful at first, brilliantly festive at the end. Thomas knew just how to play it and when to play with it, knew how to hold vigor and elegance and humor in perfect balance, and the orchestral response was for the most part handsomely virtuosic.

Piston's bright showpiece got a good performance which I found just a touch heavy, but it was a nice occasion for the audience to stand and cheer the much-loved composer.

M. TILSON THOMAS
. . . admirably alert

Thurs. Romantic

BOSTON HERALD AMERICAN Sat Jan 19, 1974

Grand Night at Symphony

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

• Concert Review

The first of the season's Boston Symphony romantic concerts Thursday night at Symphony Hall was about virtuosity — of both the solo and ensemble kind. Conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas, it featured music by Paganini, certainly the most dazzling of violinists and of writers for the violin; and by Tchaikovsky, arguable one of Paganini's counterparts in orchestral composition.

In addition, there were works by Walter Piston (Toccata) and Chausson ("Poeme") designed respectively to show off brilliant ensemble and solo playing.

PAGANINI'S Violin Concerto No. 3, played in this Boston premiere by Henryk Szeryng, is a recently "discovered" work. The program notes attribute its suppression to Paganini's jealous zeal in keeping his technical inventions secret; thus, he did not publish his manuscripts. Probably equally believable is that the violinist, well-known for his avarice, wanted too large a royalty (he was turned down by publishers on several occasions for such reasons).

To the twentieth century listener, the concerto is like a fast-talking traveling salesman with flashing smile and gold tooth prominently displayed. He tries to sell you a dubious bill of goods and you buy because the show is so dazzling.

IT'S A PIECE of brazen show-offery, Rossinian in tone, but uniquely Paganini in the bravura effects created for the soloist. There are high passages in double stops, extensive harmonics, staccato and pizzicato passages; all the devices which made Paganini's playing so stunning to his contemporary listeners.

For the orchestra, there isn't much to do — the composer's thorough study of orchestration is not employed here to the soloist's advantage.

It's a lot of fun (the BSO string players seemed to enjoy it particularyl), although definitely not for a steady diet. That Szeryng plays it at all is testimony to his technical skills — however.

I don't find him a very interesting player nor does he seem quite slick enough. His intonation, for example, is not always perfect and the tone occasionally gets glassy. But, I'm quibbling.

In the Chausson "Poeme," which requires more in the way of sentiment, Szeryng proved less satisfactory. He and Thomas chose tempi that were too slow and an approach that just didn't work as a musical totality.

Tchaikovsky's Suite No. 3, like the Piston Toccata, offers splendid opportunity for lustrous playing and great panache, particularly in the former's exuberant variation movement. Thomas and the orchestra provided just that.

ARTUR RUBINSTEIN, concert pianist, will give a Symphony Hall recital at 8:30 p.m. Jan. 25.

New York

NEW YORK, N. Y.
VILLAGE VOICE
W. 116,500

OCT 18 1973

The forces of darkness

Since Seiji Ozawa, the Boston Symphony, Edith Mathis, Stuart Burrows, Donald McIntyre, Thomas Paul, and Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" are all so well known and so reliable, it is difficult to find anything fresh to say about what I heard at Carnegie Hall on Friday night. I can, however, say quite a bit about what I saw. Concert hall lighting is admittedly a peripheral issue, but when it interferes with the effect of a performance as much as it did on this occasion, then it is high time to bring up the subject.

The brightest spot on the Carnegie Hall stage that night was the bald head of a chorus member, who must have been standing directly under some light. The violinists and cellists sitting at the outside of the stage were barely visible, since the stage lighting did not extend that far. The soloists could be seen, but their faces were always covered in dark shadows since all the light came from overhead. The shadows were actually rather effective for the character of Mephistopheles, though they did not do much for Faust or Marguerite.

"Damnation of Faust" at Carnegie Hall; Japanese children using the Suzuki violin method (Johnson)
The New York City Opera company in "Anna Bolena" (Kerner)
Vijaya Prabhakar, Sharda Sahai, and Krishna Sanyal at Wesleyan University; Vasant Rai at Carnegie Recital Hall (Kaplin)

The general effect was a yellow-white dinginess. Such dinginess, in fact, that I find it difficult to understand why the performers all bothered to dress up in tails and all. Apparently they had some notion about wanting to create a good appearance. But what the audience actually saw was a grotesque visual accident which seemed insensitive to the music, insulting to the performers, and unfair to the ticket holders, who wanted to see, as well as hear, the Boston Symphony.

There is no particular reason why I should pick on this concert, since this general approach to lighting has persisted at symphony concerts for as long as I can remember. It didn't used to bother me, but now I find it more and more aggravating. I suppose that is mostly because I have been to so many concerts of new music where the lighting was prepared as carefully as the programs, the publicity, and all the other peripheral matters, and I have found that it makes an enormous difference. It is really much easier to focus on a performer when he can be seen easily, as well as heard.

I'm not asking for a light show, of course. All I want is something to help me fix my attention on the conductor and soloists, and a little front light so I can get a clear view of Joseph Silverstein and Jules Eskin when I feel like it, and maybe a few gels just to take the glare off of the bald heads and soften the general color a bit. It would also be nice if I could have seen some of the wind players, who were totally hidden behind the soloists and strings. Doriot Anthony Dwyer, for example, is one of my very favorite flutists, and I felt cheated not to be able to see him (or is it her?) during some of those gorgeous flute solos.

Concerts of traditional music are presented primarily for aural reasons, and all we really want from the lighting is good visibility and a neutral effect. But one does not always achieve these things simply by turning on whatever all-purpose lighting happens to be handy. Often, as in this concert, the handy standard lighting does not provide a neutral effect at all, but a grossly distorted one.

FORTUNATELY the lighting was no problem when I returned to Carnegie Hall on Sunday to hear a smaller group—the 10 Japanese children who are now touring around the country demonstrating the results of the Suzuki violin method. I was a little disappointed in their playing at first. I had heard so much hooey about the wonders of the Suzuki method that I thought these kids might really have the instrument down. But that would be asking for a miracle.

No miracles. These kids slip out of tune and lose bow control once in a while just like all student violinists, and they have a whole lot to learn about phrasing. It is clear, though, that they are doing extremely well for their ages, and that they are the products of intelligent and concerned teaching. In a way that's more reassuring than a miracle would have been.

Perhaps the most touching moment was when a tiny four-year-old girl managed to make it all the way through her little solo, Dvorak's "Humoresque." Like most students of the Suzuki method, she had started playing when she was three, playing by ear at first, and learning to read music later on.

A couple of hundred local children joined the Japanese visitors in the last few numbers. It is difficult to tell how they were doing individually, but everybody seemed to keep his bow headed in the right direction, and the total sound was quite impressive. If this keeps up, college teachers may soon be able to stop lamenting the shortage of string players and look forward to a bumper crop.

—Tom Johnson

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
846,132

OCT 12 1973

New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Is Heard in 'Faust'

By ALLEN HUGHES

The first of the major Berlioz offerings to be presented here this season was the Boston Symphony Orchestra's performance of "La Damnation de Faust," given Wednesday night at Carnegie Hall under the direction of Seiji Ozawa. (The New York Philharmonic has announced this same work for next month, and the Metropolitan Opera will introduce its production of Berlioz's "Les Troyens" on Oct. 22.)

"La Damnation de Faust," a big, sprawling concert piece with operatic tendencies, is, in general, the sort of thing that Mr. Ozawa does best, and this performance profited especially from his ability to stir up thundering climaxes of sound and propensities for dramatic contrasts.

•

The work showed signs of careful preparation, and all involved responded well to Mr. Ozawa's conducting (which he did from memory). The four principal solo singers were Edith Mathis, Stuart Burrows, Donald McIntyre and Thomas Paul, and all were good choices from the standpoint of role interpretation.

Mr. Burrows was an excellent Faust, who disappointed only when he moved into falsetto for the highest reaches of the love duet in Part III.

Mr. McIntyre, a New Zealand-born baritone whose career so far has been chiefly in England, projected the malevolence of Mephistopheles splendidly despite the pitch ambiguity of a lot of his singing. His vocal production is the kind that can make intonation an iffy matter at times, and Wednesday night was one of those times. This was most damaging to the great Serenade in Part III, but it also affected dramatic outbursts when they were loud.

There was some unsteadiness in Miss Mathis's singing at the outset, but she got into her stride to make a searing impression in her delivery of her soliloquy in Part IV. Mr. Paul sang Brander's song sturdily.

•

The Tanglewood Festival Chorus (prepared by John Oliver) did well with all aspects of the big choral parts of the work, and the Boston Boy Choir contributed pleasing tone to the conclusion of it.

It was, then, a worthy presentation, if not the most exciting imaginable, of an enigmatic composition that poses many performance problems. It will be repeated tonight.

DAILY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
D. 2,129,901 SUN. 2,948,786

OCT 12 1973

Boston Symphony 'Faust'

#6

By RON EYER

In a sudden switch that caught many concertgoers unaw res, the Boston Symphony moved its Wednesday night performance from Avery Fisher (Philharmonic) Hall to Carnegie Hall because of the continuing strike of the New York Philharmonic orchestra.

The program was a major presentation of Berlioz' "La Damnation de Faust" under the direction of Seiji Ozawa which a lot of people didn't want to miss, so despite a good deal of confusion over tickets and seat locations, the auditorium was full.

The Berlioz version of the Faust legend always has been the subject of a good deal of controversy. It is not an opera in the traditional sense as is the Gounod version. He called it a "legende dramatique," in four lengthy parts that take almost three hours to perform, even with cuts, and it has a Handelian quality as suggestive of oratorio as of opera.

At the same time, however, it has great dramatic intensity. Berlioz was an even greater innovator in orchestral effects than Richard Wagner. Even today, some of his instrumental combinations and dynamic explosions have an originality that can shock a jaded modern ear. It has all the apparatus of opera—impassioned solos, duets, ensemble numbers and electrifying choruses, yet it remains somehow cold, remote and impersonal. This accounts, no doubt, for its original failure and its continued lack of popularity.

The Bostonians' performance, however, must be given very high marks—the highest, probably, going to Ozawa. The youthful Oriental conductor has taken on, consciously or unconsciously, many of the characteristics of the young Leonard Bernstein. Except that he doesn't leap two feet off the podium in climatic moments, his performance is choreographic. He pleads, cajoles, prays and imperiously commands his musical forces. But they clearly respect him, for he conducted the whole long score from memory and never missed a cue.

Responding to Ozawa's energetic direction were the two leading singers, Stuart Burrows as Faust and Donald McIntyre as Mephistopheles. They, along with Thomas Paul as Brander, carried the entire vocal burden of the first half, assisted, of course, by the Tanglewood Festival Chorus and the Boston Boy Choir who also made first-class contributions.

Edith Mathis' opportunity, as Marguerite, came in the second half, and while she has a lovely voice that adequately filled the demands of the role, her importance in performance never equaled that of either Burrows or McIntyre.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 846.132 S. 1.407,549

OCT 15 1973

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS LIGETI WORK

The introduction to New York of Gyorgy Ligeti's "Melodien" and a remarkably good performance of Beethoven's "Emperor" Piano Concerto, with Christoph Eschenbach as soloist, distinguished the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert conducted by Seiji Ozawa at Carnegie Hall on Saturday night.

The Ligeti piece, which dates from 1971, is in effect a composite of countless melodic fragments that jostle along together in a friendly way for some 12 minutes. The result is distinctly modern music that is easy to listen to and that leaves one with a cheerful feeling. It has no great message and no big climax. It simply exists for a while and then stops. It is music that has been very carefully made and expertly orchestrated, and it was performed handsomely.

The concert began with the "Emperor" Concerto, which Mr. Eschenbach played boldly and brilliantly. One of the many fine things he accomplished was the achievement of big sonorites without loss of clarity of tone.

Thus, the bright, clear sound that he drew from the piano remained consistent, even though he put it to a wide variety of expressive uses. Mr. Ozawa helped in all of this, of course, and the total result was first rate.

ALLEN HUGHES.

DAILY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
D. 2,129,901 SUN. 2,948,786

DEC 14 1973

Versatile Bostonians

#6

Virtuosity and versatility, collective and individual were the gifts of the visiting Boston Symphony Orchestra at Avery Fisher Hall Wednesday night.

The Bostonians, led by Michael Tilson Thomas, offered Bach's Suite No. 3, which began majestically and ended cheerfully; the first New York performance of Walter Piston's Concerto for Flute and Orchestra, which gave the orchestra's principal flutist, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, a chance to show off her virtuosity; closing with Richard Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra," which gave the orchestra a chance to show off its collective virtuosity.

Thomas conducted the Bach as straightforward Baroque, which is unusual, for many musicians play Bach as a romantic show piece, with many pianissimi leading to impressive crescendi.

The feature of the evening was the Piston concerto. Ms. Dwyer, who is a great-grandniece of Susan B. Anthony, the suffragist leader, displayed her virtuosity with ease. The piece itself, which was played as one movement in three sections, two slow and the last fairly fast, had its lyric moments. Except for the flute parts, which were interesting for the way that Ms. Dwyer solved their difficulties, the concerto was generally a bore, however. It might have been better as a chamber piece.

The Strauss is a virtuoso piece for orchestra. In it we hear Strauss the hero, Strauss the lover, Strauss the master orchestrater, Strauss the philosopher.

—Daniel Goldberg

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 244,000

OCT 22 1973

BOSTON SYMPHONY—At Carnegie Hall. What a pleasure, to come back to this remarkable place after several months! The atmosphere, the presence of sound, was thrilling from the first bars of Beethoven's Fifth Piano Concerto, the "Emperor." Would that this first Saturday night concert by the Bostonians had lived up to it! Their new music director, Seiji Ozawa, has already forged a magnificent instrument in terms of pure orchestral virtuosity, sleek tone, silken sonorities. Yet it is all execution with no personality, and even the sound becomes monochromatic in its slickness. Ozawa proved no help to pianist Christoph Eschenbach, who seemed to be playing more for effect than anything else. The flowing legato, full range of dynamics, and clean articulation are there, but a gross insincerity comes across, mating occasional glory with sheer aggression. Ozawa's failure to distinguish between the grand traditional line and a modern, analytical one was true in Brahms's First Symphony, too, where the darkly burnished strings held promise of a major performance. Yet it never materialized, because there was no consistent view. Gyorgy Ligeti's "Melodien" received its first N.Y. performance and, though strikingly played, revealed nothing new by bringing Berg and the last several decades into the '70s. The colors, texture are dazzling, but so what?

—R.J.

Thurs. Romantic

BOSTON HERALD AMERICAN Sat Jan 19, 1974

Grand Night at Symphony

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

• Concert Review

The first of the season's Boston Symphony romantic concerts Thursday night at Symphony Hall was about virtuosity — of both the solo and ensemble kind. Conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas, it featured music by Paganini, certainly the most dazzling of violinists and of writers for the violin; and by Tchaikovsky, arguable one of Paganini's counterparts in orchestral composition.

In addition, there were works by Walter Piston (Toccata) and Chausson ("Poeme") designed respectively to show off brilliant ensemble and solo playing.

PAGANINI'S Violin Concerto No. 3, played in this Boston premiere by Henryk Szeryng, is a recently "discovered" work. The program notes attribute its suppression to Paganini's jealous zeal in keeping his technical inventions secret; thus, he did not publish his manuscripts. Probably equally believable is that the violinist, well-known for his avarice, wanted too large a royalty (he was turned down by publishers on several occasions for such reasons).

To the twentieth century listener, the concerto is like a fast-talking traveling salesman with flashing smile and gold tooth prominently displayed. He tries to sell you a dubious bill of goods and you buy because the show is so dazzling.

IT'S A PIECE of brazen show-offery, Rossinian in tone, but uniquely Paganini in the bravura effects created for the soloist. There are high passages in double stops, extensive harmonics, staccato and pizzicato passages; all the devices which made Paganini's playing so stunning to his contemporary listeners.

For the orchestra, there isn't much to do — the composer's thorough study of orchestration is not employed here to the soloist's advantage.

It's a lot of fun (the BSO string players seemed to enjoy it particularyl), although definitely not for a steady diet. That Szeryng plays it at all is testimony to his technical skills — however.

I don't find him a very interesting player nor does he seem quite slick enough. His intonation, for example, is not always perfect and the tone occasionally gets glassy. But, I'm quibbling.

In the Chausson "Poeme," which requires more in the way of sentiment, Szeryng proved less satisfactory. He and Thomas chose tempi that were too slow and an approach that just didn't work as a musical totality.

Tchaikovsky's Suite No. 3, like the Piston Toccata, offers splendid opportunity for lustrous playing and great panache, particularly in the former's exuberant variation movement. Thomas and the orchestra provided just that.

ARTUR RUBINSTEIN, concert pianist, will give a Symphony Hall recital at 8:30 p. m. Jan. 25.

New York

NEW YORK, N. Y.
VILLAGE VOICE
W. 116,500

OCT 18 1973

The forces of darkness

music

"Damnation of Faust" at Carnegie Hall; Japanese children using the Suzuki violin method (Johnson)
The New York City Opera company in "Anna Bolena" (Kerner)
Vijaya Prabhakar, Sharda Sahai, and Krishna Sanyal at Wesleyan University; Vasant Rai at Carnegie Recital Hall (Kaplin)

Since Seiji Ozawa, the Boston Symphony, Edith Mathis, Stuart Burrows, Donald McIntyre, Thomas Paul, and Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" are all so well known and so reliable, it is difficult to find anything fresh to say about what I heard at Carnegie Hall on Friday night. I can, however, say quite a bit about what I saw. Concert hall lighting is admittedly a peripheral issue, but when it interferes with the effect of a performance as much as it did on this occasion, then it is high time to bring up the subject.

The brightest spot on the Carnegie Hall stage that night was the bald head of a chorus member, who must have been standing directly under some light. The violinists and cellists sitting at the outside of the stage were barely visible, since the stage lighting did not extend that far. The soloists could be seen, but their faces were always covered in dark shadows since all the light came from overhead. The shadows were actually rather effective for the character of Mephistopheles, though they did not do much for Faust or Marguerite.

The general effect was a yellow-white dinginess. Such dinginess, in fact, that I find it difficult to understand why the performers all bothered to dress up in tails and all. Apparently they had some notion about wanting to create a good appearance. But what the audience actually saw was a grotesque visual accident which seemed insensitive to the music, insulting to the performers, and unfair to the ticket holders, who wanted to see, as well as hear, the Boston Symphony.

There is no particular reason why I should pick on this concert, since this general approach to lighting has persisted at symphony concerts for as long as I can remember. It didn't used to bother me, but now I find it more and more aggravating. I suppose that is mostly because I have been to so many concerts of new music where the lighting was prepared as carefully as the programs, the publicity, and all the other peripheral matters, and I have found that it makes an enormous difference. It is really much easier to focus on a performer when he can be seen easily, as well as heard.

I'm not asking for a light show, of course. All I want is something to help me fix my attention on the conductor and soloists, and a little front light so I can get a clear view of Joseph Silverstein and Jules Eskin when I feel like it, and maybe a few gels just to take the glare off of the bald heads and soften the general color a bit. It would also be nice if I could have seen some of the wind players, who were totally hidden behind the soloists and strings. Doriot Anthony Dwyer, for example, is one of my very favorite flutists, and I felt cheated not to be able to see him (or is it her?) during some of those gorgeous flute solos.

Concerts of traditional music are presented primarily for aural reasons, and all we really want from the lighting is good visibility and a neutral effect. But one does not always achieve these things simply by turning on whatever all-purpose lighting happens to be handy. Often, as in this concert, the handy standard lighting does not provide a neutral effect at all, but a grossly distorted one.

FORTUNATELY the lighting was no problem when I returned to Carnegie Hall on Sunday to hear a smaller group—the 10 Japanese children who are now touring around the country demonstrating the results of the Suzuki violin method. I was a little disappointed in their playing at first. I had heard so much hooey about the wonders of the Suzuki method that I thought these kids might really have the instrument down. But that would be asking for a miracle.

No miracles. These kids slip out of tune and lose bow control once in a while just like all student violinists, and they have a whole lot to learn about phrasing. It is clear, though, that they are doing extremely well for their ages, and that they are the products of intelligent and concerned teaching. In a way that's more reassuring than a miracle would have been.

Perhaps the most touching moment was when a tiny four-year-old girl managed to make it all the way through her little solo, Dvorak's "Humoresque." Like most students of the Suzuki method, she had started playing when she was three, playing by ear at first, and learning to read music later on.

A couple of hundred local children joined the Japanese visitors in the last few numbers. It is difficult to tell how they were doing individually, but everybody seemed to keep his bow headed in the right direction, and the total sound was quite impressive. If this keeps up, college teachers may soon be able to stop lamenting the shortage of string players and look forward to a bumper crop.

—Tom Johnson

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
846,132

OCT 12 1973

New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Is Heard in 'Faust'

By ALLEN HUGHES

The first of the major Berlioz offerings to be presented here this season was the Boston Symphony Orchestra's performance of "La Damnation de Faust," given Wednesday night at Carnegie Hall under the direction of Seiji Ozawa. (The New York Philharmonic has announced this same work for next month, and the Metropolitan Opera will introduce its production of Berlioz's "Les Troyens" on Oct. 22.)

"La Damnation de Faust," a big, sprawling concert piece with operatic tendencies, is, in general, the sort of thing that Mr. Ozawa does best, and this performance profited especially from his ability to stir up thundering climaxes of sound and propensities for dramatic contrasts.

•

The work showed signs of careful preparation, and all involved responded well to Mr. Ozawa's conducting (which he did from memory). The four principal solo singers were Edith Mathis, Stuart Burrows, Donald McIntyre and Thomas Paul, and all were good choices from the standpoint of role interpretation.

Mr. Burrows was an excellent Faust, who disappointed only when he moved into falsetto for the highest reaches of the love duet in Part III.

Mr. McIntyre, a New Zealand-born baritone whose career so far has been chiefly in England, projected the malevolence of Mephistopheles splendidly despite the pitch ambiguity of a lot of his singing. His vocal production is the kind that can make intonation an iffy matter at times, and Wednesday night was one of those times. This was most damaging to the great Serenade in Part III, but it also affected dramatic outbursts when they were loud.

There was some unsteadiness in Miss Mathis's singing at the outset, but she got into her stride to make a searing impression in her delivery of her soliloquy in Part IV. Mr. Paul sang Brander's song sturdily.

•

The Tanglewood Festival Chorus (prepared by John Oliver) did well with all aspects of the big choral parts of the work, and the Boston Boy Choir contributed pleasing tone to the conclusion of it.

It was, then, a worthy presentation, if not the most exciting imaginable, of an enigmatic composition that poses many performance problems. It will be repeated tonight.

DAILY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
D. 2,129,901 SUN. 2,948,786

OCT 12 1973

Boston Symphony 'Faust'

#6

By RON EYER

In a sudden switch that caught many concertgoers unawares, the Boston Symphony moved its Wednesday night performance from Avery Fisher (Philharmonic) Hall to Carnegie Hall because of the continuing strike of the New York Philharmonic orchestra.

The program was a major presentation of Berlioz' "La Damnation de Faust" under the direction of Seiji Ozawa which a lot of people didn't want to miss, so despite a good deal of confusion over tickets and seat locations, the auditorium was full.

The Berlioz version of the Faust legend always has been the subject of a good deal of controversy. It is not an opera in the traditional sense as is the Gounod version. He called it a "legende dramatique," in four lengthy parts that take almost three hours to perform, even with cuts, and it has a Handelian quality as suggestive of oratorio as of opera.

At the same time, however, it has great dramatic intensity. Berlioz was an even greater innovator in orchestral effects than Richard Wagner. Even today, some of his instrumental combinations and dynamic explosions have an originality that can shock a jaded modern ear. It has all the apparatus of opera—impassioned solos, duets, ensemble numbers and electrifying choruses, yet it remains somehow cold, remote and impersonal. This accounts, no doubt, for its original failure and its continued lack of popularity.

The Bostonians' performance, however, must be given very high marks—the highest, probably, going to Ozawa. The youthful Oriental conductor has taken on, consciously or unconsciously, many of the characteristics of the young Leonard Bernstein. Except that he doesn't leap two feet off the podium in climatic moments, his performance is choreographic. He pleads, cajoles, prays and imperiously commands his musical forces. But they clearly respect him, for he conducted the whole long score from memory and never missed a cue.

Responding to Ozawa's energetic direction were the two leading singers, Stuart Burrows as Faust and Donald McIntyre as Mephistopheles. They, along with Thomas Paul as Brander, carried the entire vocal burden of the first half, assisted, of course, by the Tanglewood Festival Chorus and the Boston Boy Choir who also made first-class contributions.

Edith Mathis' opportunity, as Marguerite, came in the second half, and while she has a lovely voice that adequately filled the demands of the role, her importance in performance never equaled that of either Burrows or McIntyre.

DAILY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
D. 2,129,901 SUN. 2,948,786

DEC 14 1973

Versatile Bostonians

Virtuosity and versatility, collective and individual were the gifts of the visiting Boston Symphony Orchestra at Avery Fisher Hall Wednesday night.

The Bostonians, led by Michael Tilson Thomas, offered Bach's Suite No. 3, which began majestically and ended cheerfully; the first New York performance of Walter Piston's Concerto for Flute and Orchestra, which gave the orchestra's principal flutist, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, a chance to show off her virtuosity; closing with Richard Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra," which gave the orchestra a chance to show off its collective virtuosity.

Thomas conducted the Bach as straightforward Baroque, which is unusual, for many musicians play Bach as a romantic show piece, with many pianissimi leading to impressive crescendi.

The feature of the evening was the Piston concerto. Ms. Dwyer, who is a great-grandniece of Susan B. Anthony, the suffragist leader, displayed her virtuosity with ease. The piece itself, which was played as one movement in three sections, two slow and the last fairly fast, had its lyric moments. Except for the flute parts, which were interesting for the way that Ms. Dwyer solved their difficulties, the concerto was generally a bore, however. It might have been better as a chamber piece.

The Strauss is a virtuoso piece for orchestra. In it we hear Strauss the hero, Strauss the lover, Strauss the master orchestrater, Strauss the philosopher.

—Daniel Goldberg

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 244,000

OCT 22 1973

BOSTON SYMPHONY—At Carnegie Hall. What a pleasure, to come back to this remarkable place after several months! The atmosphere, the presence of sound, was thrilling from the first bars of Beethoven's Fifth Piano Concerto, the "Emperor." Would that this first Saturday night concert by the Bostonians had lived up to it! Their new music director, Seiji Ozawa, has already forged a magnificent instrument in terms of pure orchestral virtuosity, sleek tone, silken sonorities. Yet it is all execution with no personality, and even the sound becomes monochromatic in its slickness. Ozawa proved no help to pianist Christoph Eschenbach, who seemed to be playing more for effect than anything else. The flowing legato, full range of dynamics, and clean articulation are there, but a gross insincerity comes across (matching occasional glory with sheer aggression). Ozawa's failure to distinguish between the grand traditional line and a modern, analytical one was true in Brahms's First Symphony, too, where the darkly burnished strings held promise of a major performance. Yet it never materialized, because there was no consistent view. Gyorgy Ligeti's "Melodien" received its first N.Y. performance and, though strikingly played, revealed nothing new by bringing Berg and the last several decades into the '70s. The colors, texture are dazzling, but so what?

—R.J.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 846,132 S. 1,407,519

OCT 15 1973

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS LIGETI WORK

The introduction to New York of Gyorgy Ligeti's "Melodien" and a remarkably good performance of Beethoven's "Emperor" Piano Concerto, with Christoph Eschenbach as soloist, distinguished the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert conducted by Seiji Ozawa at Carnegie Hall on Saturday night.

The Ligeti piece, which dates from 1971, is in effect a composite of countless melodic fragments that jostle along together in a friendly way for some 12 minutes. The result is distinctly modern music that is easy to listen to and that leaves one with a cheerful feeling. It has no great message and no big climax. It simply exists for a while and then stops. It is music that has been very carefully made and expertly orchestrated, and it was performed handsomely.

The concert began with the "Emperor" Concerto, which Mr. Eschenbach played boldly and brilliantly. One of the many fine things he accomplished was the achievement of big sonorites without loss of clarity of tone.

Thus, the bright, clear sound that he drew from the piano remained consistent, even though he put it to a wide variety of expressive uses. Mr. Ozawa helped in all of this, of course, and the total result was first rate.

ALLEN HUGHES.

New York Post
D. 623,245 SAT. 354,797
OCT 11 1973

Boston Symphony Gives 'Damnation of Faust'

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Now music director of the Boston Symphony, Seiji Ozawa chose to begin his stewardship here in grandiose fashion by performing Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" in Carnegie Hall last night. In the course of the two-and-a-quarter-hour work, he clearly defined his conductorial style as rhythm-based, energetic, and brilliant.

For the Berlioz, this meant much orchestral splendor, precision, and vitality but less romantic fervor and less subtlety than the music demanded. Created in the white heat of inspiration, this choral and orchestral fantasy calls for considerable resourcefulness in interpretation. The performance had more black-and-white textures than color and sounded more earthbound than impassioned.

Occasionally the eloquence and the grandeur broke through. Toward the end of Part III and in the Romance of Part IV, the music took flight. Otherwise the impression was a faithful rendition without benefit of communicative insight. The lushness that belongs to Berlioz's urgent romanticism had been distilled. Noticeably in the earlier parts, had the music been allowed to breathe through better punctuated phrasing, it would have flowed more flexibly.

To hear the famous "Dance of the Sylphs" and the "Minuet of the Will-o'-the Wisps" sound heavy instead of magical suggests the problem. On the other hand the "Ride to the Abyss" was appropriately frenzied and the Pandemonium of Hell brilliantly executed.

The Soloists

The capable soloists included Edith Mathis as Marguerite, Stuart Borrows as Faust, Donald McIntyre as Mephistopheles, and Thomas Paul as Brander. Of these Mr McIntyre injected more personality into his role than the others. Mr. Burrows fell into the conventional tenor interpretation except when singing with Miss Mathis. She sang in sweet innocence on first appearance, then gave dimension to both her voice and meaning in the Romance. Mr. Paul's brief parts were creditable.

The Tanglewood Festival Chorus reflected excellent training by John Oliver. The youthful tinge in the voices contributed a requisite freshness to the performance. The Boston Boy Choir sang in the final chorus.

Coming one night after a performance of Gounod's "Faust", the Berlioz showed how pale the opera can be in comparison. The fiery Berlioz composed with more substance and character, creating a work worthy of its source. There have been more outstanding performances though one as good as this serves to remind the listener of Berlioz's achievement.

Originally scheduled for Avery Fisher Hall, the performance took place in Carnegie with a minimum of inconvenience because the orchestra's management made the transition smoothly, even to having regular Carnegie Hall programs printed. Fortunately Carnegie Hall was available as it will be for tomorrow's repeat performance.

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
846,132
DEC 17 1973
New England Newsclip

Music

'Zarathustra' Enlivens Bostonians' Program

By RAYMOND ERICSON

There was a new work in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program in Avery Fisher Hall on Wednesday night, but it was an old one—one that even has a dubious musical reputation—that gave the evening its vitality. This was Richard Strauss's vast and murky tone poem "Also sprach Zarathustra." It is, of course, a piece that gives an orchestra a chance to demonstrate its virtuosity, and the Bostonians seemed to revel in the opportunities for technical display. The results were as viscerally stimulating as could be wished.

The performance was under the direction of Michael Tilson Thomas. His reading was not so original and provocative as Pierre Boulez's had been with the New York Philharmonic this season. It was for the most part, quite orthodox. But it had the kind of tension that bridges the gaps in this sectional work and gives it the strength of a taut wire.

•

The program opened with Bach's Suite No. 3 in D, rather routinely performed by a reduced orchestra that included a harpsichord. The only surprise was the relatively fast tempo assigned to the famous air. Mr. Thomas possibly was afraid of its sounding too sentimental at a slower pace, but it still sounded seductive, if somewhat less gracious than usual.

Walter Piston's Flute Concerto, composed in 1971, was played here for the first time, with the orchestra's principal flutist, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, as soloist. It is a characteristic work by the American composer, who was 77 when he wrote it. There are a few effective passages, one for flute and harp, a cadenza for the soloist and a final section with some bounce. Despite Mrs. Dwyer's adept performance, however, the work was generally dry and featureless.

Thomas Leads Bostonians in Brahms-Schoenberg

Michael Tilson Thomas came up with an attractive program idea for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert he conducted at Carnegei Hall on Saturday. It consisted of Arnold Schoenberg's orchestral arrangement of Brahms's Piano Quartet in G minor and Brahms's Piano Concerto No. 2.

This meant that one could hear a Brahms work as remade by another great composer and contrast that with a Brahms work as it was composed. One of the interesting things about the transcription is that it grows less Brahmsian as it goes along. It is as though Schoenberg grew weary of maintaining the Brahms flavor before he finished the task, and decided to brighten things a bit. This transcription is not often played, and the reason undoubtedly is that, despite its virtues, as a whole simply does not ring true as a symphony, which is what Schoenberg tried to make of it.

After this excursion, the B-flat Concerto sounded especially good because it was authentic. Malcolm Frager was the soloist, and his performance was noteworthy for the variety of touch, color and mood he projected.

Instead of leaning into the bigness and grandeur of the music, he took advantage of opportunities to lighten and humanize it when possible. He had plenty of power when it was needed, but he saved it for those moments when nothing else would do.

Mr. Thomas's conducting was impressive in both works, and the orchestra's response was positive.

ALLEN HUGHES

three of the coloristic rhapsodies that Mr. Kostelanetz does so well. Also from Spain was Joaquin Rodrigo's delectable Guitar Concerto (subtitled "Aranjuez" after the summer palace of the 16th-century Spanish kings), with Angel Romero as soloist.

After intermission came Fauré's distinctly minor, but charming incidental music for "The Merchant of Venice," Sibelius's "The Swan of Tuonela," with the gorgeous solo played by the Philharmonic's resident English horn virtuoso, Thomas Stacy, and a suite from Glazunov's ballet "The Seasons."

The Rodrigo was a special treat. Quite popular on records these days, the concerto doesn't turn up too often in concert, and certainly not in so dashing an interpretation as the one by Mr. Romero.

Although the guitarist has appeared here several times with his father and two elder brothers (as the Four Romeros), this was his solo debut, and the young man made the most of it, winning the audience completely, as much with his personal charm as with his deft and masterly playing.

ROBERT SHERMAN

Joachim Gives Recital Of Works for Cello

It was an interesting program that the cellist Heinrich Joachim chose for his Carnegie Recital Hall concert Saturday afternoon, although not a particularly gracious one. After a pleasant little sonata by an early 17th-century Italian composer named Carlo Tessarini, Mr. Joachim offered two long and sometim

Miss Val-Schmidt, a member of the Metropolitan Opera Studio, sang a Mozart aria and songs by Wolf, Sciammarella and Thomson. She was accompanied by David Morgan.

Mr. Henry, who was accompanied by Daniel Epstein, performed sonatas by Pergolesi and Debussy, the Finale from Stravinsky's Suite Italienne, Vieuxtemps's Romance No. 2 and Bach's Chaconne in D minor.

Miss Val-Schmidt's voice was of pleasing quality, though it had a light tremor in it, and her singing of Wolf's songs was quite good in all respects. Her performances were consistently musical and intelligent, and her choice of materials encouraging. Oddly enough, her enunciation of English was a bit stilted.

Mr. Henry, who has a master's degree from Juilliard, seemed to be a capable violinist in general, but it was unwise of him to play the Bach Chaconne. This is a hazardous work for almost any violinist, and in this case it exposed soft spots in technique and intonation that need not have been uncovered.

ALLEN HUGHES

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
846,132
MAR 25 1974
New England Newsclip

BOSTONIANS SUPERB IN BRUCKNER'S 7TH

Bruckner's Seventh Symphony was the sole item on the Boston Symphony orchestra's program Saturday night at Carnegie Hall, and it is possible that some listener's may have felt short-changed with a concert lasting just over an hour. William Steinberg, the conductor, evidently holds the view that this Bruckner work contains enough musical meat for an audience to chew over in one evening, and he's right.

At any rate, this symphony has long been a specialty of Mr. Steinberg's, and he gave a sensible, well-proportioned reading of the score. Each massive, sonorous block fit smoothly into place without the gaping seams that betray a less-experienced Bruckner conductor. It was all a bit objective perhaps, but a marvel of constructional logic.

Minor ensemble flaws disturbed the flow now and then, but on the whole the Bostonians played superbly. The brass in particular came forth with plump, organlike majesty, and the sheen on the strings was often breathtaking. This was a superior performance, in short, and one to please the most fastidious Brucknerian.

PETER G. DAVIS

DAILY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
D. 2,129,901 SUN. 2,948,786
DEC 15 1973

Spectrum Stirs 'Em Up

By DANIEL GOLDBERG

Bravo, Michael Tilson Thomas! Bravo, Arnold Schoenberg! Bravo, Johannes Brahms! Bravo, Boston Symphony Orchestra! And thank you all for a wonderful musical experience Thursday night at Carnegie Hall.

The occasion was another of Thomas' Spectrum concerts, this time with the Bostonians. These concerts are a kind of advance music appreciation courses, with occasional jokes and bits of musical history. Thursday night's theme was "transcriptions."

The first half of the program was pleasant and interesting. None of the pieces had been played in New York before.

The first piece was an orchestral arrangement, by Lou Harrison, of "Suite for Toy Piano" by John Cage, the world's undisputed champion in the put-on. Harrison's transcription itself might have been a put-on. No one is saying.

Rose Taylor of California then sang Monteverdi's "Lamento d'Arianna" as arranged by Carl Orff from an enlargement by Monteverdi.

The first half of the program ended with Ravel's orchestration of pieces from Shumann's "Carnaval," a piano suite. The transcription did not quite come off as an orchestral piece imitating a piano, but it was acceptable as a ballet suite, which seems to have been Ravel's intention.

Then came the Brahms-Schoenberg work!

To illustrate the original, Thomas at the piano, and three string players performed a small part of the Brahms, and then the orchestra played that part as arranged by Schoenberg, the father of atonality and generally considered the founder of what many people consider that abomination—modern music.

Well, Schoenberg arranged the quarter as if it were Brahms' Fifth Symphony. The orchestration was brilliant. The conducting was lively, energetic, polished. What used to be a dull chamber work (Schoenberg said it was always badly played) became incandescent. The listeners barely restrained themselves from applauding after every movement.

This rarely heard piece should be heard more often. Much more often.

BALDWIN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 3,000
NOV 22 1973

MUSIC NOTES

Under extremely trying conditions the Boston Symphony and their exciting Music Director Seiji Ozawa gave their second concerts in New York this season at Hunter College last Wednesday and Friday evenings.

Because of the Philharmonic strike at Lincoln Center, the Boston Symphony was forced to perform in the Assembly Hall at Hunter, which is a fate no small band, much less one of the nation's major orchestras, should suffer. The place is horrendous, shabby, acoustically monstrous and virtually uninhabitable for audience as well as performers.

Yet, on a makeshift, shoddy podium, with his musicians cramped onto the ugly stage, Mr. Ozawa transported us from our unpleasant surroundings with his inspired direction.

One of the music world's fastest rising stars, Ozawa is a joy to behold, virtually a show all by himself. With his great mane of black hair and the incredibly graceful, lithe body and movements of a dancer, he all but caresses the orchestra as he conducts, pulling and coaxing the beautiful sounds from his musicians.

The well-balanced program for these concerts included Rachmaninoff's Symphony No. 3 in A Minor, Op. 44; a light amusing piece by Schuller entitled 'Capriccio stravagante" and Debussy's beautiful La Mer. Hopefully, by the time of their next concert in New York, the Boston Symphony will be housed in a more suitable place. They are well worth a trip into town.

New York Post
D. 623,245 SAT. 354,797
FEB 21 1974

DAILY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
D. 2,129,901 SUN. 2,948,786
NOV 16 1973

Boston's Symphony Shines Here

No. 6 By RON EYER

Those attending the Boston Symphony's first concert of its New York season cheerfully took pot luck on seating at the Hunter College assembly hall Wednesday night when the concert was shifted from Avery Fisher Hall because of the strike of New York Philharmonic musicians.

There were no special provisions for the press, and I simply slipped into a seat in the last row of the orchestra. It was an interesting experience. I [illegible] recall having heard an orchestra the size of the Boston in this auditorium before, and the experience was not entirely an unpleasant one.

The acoustics of the [illegible] a bit dry since it was not built for orchestral concerts. Also, the big orchestra was spread a bit thin across the wide, rather shallow stage. The sound, however, was remarkably good — better and more intimate in many respects than in Fisher Hall.

Even the Boston's rather petite Japanese conductor, Seiji Ozawa, seemed bigger than life, and, thankfully, he did not seem inclined to use some of the Leonard Bernstein-type podium choreography he has indulged in in recent years.

Though Ozawa's program held Rachmaninoff's not too frequently performed Third Symphony as well as Debussy's "La Mer," interest centered on the first New York performance of Günther Schüller's "Capriccio stravagante" of recent vintage.

Schuller calls the work a "fun piece" not to be taken any more seriously than Mozart's "Musical Joke" or that other "Capriccio stravagante" by 17-century Carlo Farina to which Schuller pays due respect.

New York Post
D. 623,245 SAT. 354,797
OCT 11 1973

Boston Symphony Gives 'Damnation of Faust'

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Now music director of the Boston Symphony, Seiji Ozawa chose to begin his stewardship here in grandiose fashion by performing Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" in Carnegie Hall last night. In the course of the two-and-a-quarter-hour work, he clearly defined his conductorial style as rhythm-based, energetic, and brilliant.

For the Berlioz, this meant much orchestral splendor, precision, and vitality but less romantic fervor and less subtlety than the music demanded. Created in the white heat of inspiration, this choral and orchestral fantasy calls for considerable resourcefulness in interpretation. The performance had more black-and-white textures than color and sounded more earthbound than impassioned.

Occasionally the eloquence and the grandeur broke through. Toward the end of Part III and in the Romance of Part IV, the music took flight. Otherwise the impression was a faithful rendition without benefit of communicative insight. The lushness that belongs to Berlioz's urgent romanticism had been distilled. Noticeably in the earlier parts, had the music been allowed to breathe through better punctuated phrasing, it would have flowed more flexibly.

To hear the famous "Dance of the Sylphs" and the "Minuet of the Will-o'-the Wisps" sound heavy instead of magical suggests the problem. On the other hand the "Ride to the Abyss" was appropriately frenzied and the Pandemonium of Hell brilliantly executed.

The Soloists

The capable soloists included Edith Mathis as Marguerite, Stuart Borrows as Faust, Donald McIntyre as Mephistopheles, and Thomas Paul as Brander. Of these Mr McIntyre injected more personality into his role than the others. Mr. Burrows fell into the conventional tenor interpretation except when singing with Miss Mathis. She sang in sweet innocence on first appearance, then gave dimension to both her voice and meaning in the Romance. Mr. Paul's brief parts were creditable.

The Tanglewood Festival Chorus reflected excellent training by John Oliver. The youthful tinge in the voices contributed a requisite freshness to the performance. The Boston Boy Choir sang in the final chorus.

Coming one night after a performance of Gounod's "Faust", the Berlioz showed how pale the opera can be in comparison. The fiery Berlioz composed with more substance and character, creating a work worthy of its source. There have been more outstanding performances though one as good as this serves to remind the listener of Berlioz's achievement.

Originally scheduled for Avery Fisher Hall, the performance took place in Carnegie with a minimum of inconvenience because the orchestra's management made the transition smoothly, even to having regular Carnegie Hall programs printed. Fortunately Carnegie Hall was available as it will be for tomorrow's repeat performance.

DAILY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
D. 2,129,901 SUN. 2,948,786
DEC 15 1973

Music

'Zarathustra' Enlivens Bostonians' Program

By RAYMOND ERICSON

There was a new work in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program in Avery Fisher Hall on Wednesday night, but it was an old one—one that even has a dubious musical reputation—that gave the evening its vitality. This was Richard Strauss's vast and murky tone poem "Also sprach Zarathustra." It is, of course, a piece that gives an orchestra a chance to demonstrate its virtuosity, and the Bostonians seemed to revel in the opportunities for technical display. The results were as viscerally stimulating as could be wished.

The performance was under the direction of Michael Tilson Thomas. His reading was not so original and provocative as Pierre Boulez's had been with the New York Philharmonic this season. It was for the most part, quite orthodox. But it had the kind of tension that bridges the gaps in this sectional work and gives it the strength of a taut wire.

•

The program opened with Bach's Suite No. 3 in D, rather routinely performed by a reduced orchestra that included a harpsichord. The only surprise was the relatively fast tempo assigned to the famous air. Mr. Thomas possibly was afraid of its sounding too sentimental at a slower pace, but it still sounded seductive, if somewhat less gracious than usual.

Walter Piston's Flute Concerto, composed in 1971, was played here for the first time, with the orchestra's principal flutist, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, as soloist. It is a characteristic work by the American composer, who was 77 when he wrote it. There are a few effective passages, one for flute and harp, a cadenza for the soloist and a final section with some bounce. Despite Mrs. Dwyer's adept performance, however, the work was generally dry and featureless.

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
846 132
DEC 17 1973
New England Newsclip

Thomas Leads Bostonians in Brahms-Schoenberg

Michael Tilson Thomas came up with an attractive program idea for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert he conducted at Carnegei Hall on Saturday. It consisted of Arnold Schoenberg's orchestral arrangement of Brahms's Piano Quartet in G minor and Brahms's Piano Concerto No. 2.

This meant that one could hear a Brahms work as remade by another great composer and contrast that with a Brahms work as it was composed. One of the interesting things about the transcription is that it grows less Brahmsian as it goes along. It is as though Schoenberg grew weary of maintaining the Brahms flavor before he finished the task, and decided to brighten things a bit. This transcription is not often played, and the reason undoubtedly is that, despite its virtues, as a whole simply does not ring true as a symphony, which is what Schoenberg tried to make of it.

After this excursion, the B-flat Concerto sounded especially good because it was authentic. Malcolm Frager was the soloist, and his performance was noteworthy for the variety of touch, color and mood he projected.

Instead of leaning into the bigness and grandeur of the music, he took advantage of opportunities to lighten and humanize it when possible. He had plenty of power when it was needed, but he saved it for those moments when nothing else would do.

Mr. Thomas's conducting was impressive in both works, and the orchestra's response was positive.

ALLEN HUGHES

Guitar[illegible] three of the coloristic rhapsodies that Mr. Kostelanetz does so well. Also from Spain was Joaquin Rodrigo's delectable Guitar Concerto (subtitled "Aranjuez" after the summer palace of the 16th-century Spanish kings), with Angel Romero as soloist.

After intermission came Fauré's distinctly minor, but charming incidental music for "The Merchant of Venice," Sibelius's "The Swan of Tuonela," with the gorgeous solo played by the Philharmonic's resident English horn virtuoso, Thomas Stacy, and a suite from Glazunov's ballet "The Seasons."

The Rodrigo was a special treat. Quite popular on records these days, the concerto doesn't turn up too often in concert, and certainly not in so dashing an interpretation as the one by Mr. Romero.

Although the guitarist has appeared here several times with his father and two elder brothers (as the Four Romeros), this was his solo debut, and the young man made the most of it, winning the audience completely, as much with his personal charm as with his deft and masterly playing.

ROBERT SHERMAN

Joachim Gives Recital Of Works for Cello

It was an interesting program that the cellist Heinrich Joachim chose for his Carnegie Recital Hall concert Saturday afternoon, although not a particularly gracious one. After a pleasant little sonata by an early 17th-century Italian composer named Carlo Tessarini, Mr. Joachim offered two long and sometim[illegible]

Miss Val-Schmidt, a member of the Metropolitan Opera Studio, sang a Mozart aria and songs by Wolf, Sciammarella and Thomson. She was accompanied by David Morgan.

Mr. Henry, who was accompanied by Daniel Epstein, performed sonatas by Pergolesi and Debussy, the Finale from Stravinsky's Suite Italienne, Vieuxtemps's Romance No. 2 and Bach's Chaconne in D minor.

Miss Val-Schmidt's voice was of pleasing quality, though it had a light tremor in it, and her singing of Wolf's songs was quite good in all respects. Her performances were consistently musical and intelligent, and her choice of materials encouraging. Oddly enough, her enunciation of English was a bit stilted.

Mr. Henry, who has a master's degree from Juilliard, seemed to be a capable violinist in general, but it was unwise of him to play the Bach Chaconne. This is a hazardous work for almost any violinist, and in this case it exposed soft spots in technique and intonation that need not have been uncovered.

ALLEN HUGHES

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.
[illegible]
[illegible] 25 1974
New England Newsclip

BOSTONIANS SUPERB IN BRUCKNER'S 7TH

Bruckner's Seventh Symphony was the sole item on the Boston Symphony orchestra's program Saturday night at Carnegie Hall, and it is possible that some listener's may have felt short-changed with a concert lasting just over an hour. William Steinberg, the conductor, evidently holds the view that this Bruckner work contains enough musical meat for an audience to chew over in one evening, and he's right.

At any rate, this symphony has long been a specialty of Mr. Steinberg's, and he gave a sensible, well-proportioned reading of the score. Each massive, sonorous block fit smoothly into place without the gaping seams that betray a less-experienced Bruckner conductor. It was all a bit objective perhaps, but a marvel of constructional logic.

Minor ensemble flaws disturbed the flow now and then, but on the whole the Bostonians played superbly. The brass in particular came forth with plump, organlike majesty, and the sheen on the strings was often breathtaking. This was a superior performance, in short, and one to please the most fastidious Brucknerian.

PETER G. DAVIS

Spectrum Stirs 'Em Up

By DANIEL GOLDBERG

Bravo, Michael Tilson Thomas! Bravo, Arnold Schoenberg! Bravo, Johannes Brahms! Bravo, Boston Symphony Orchestra! And thank you all for a wonderful musical experience Thursday night at Carnegie Hall.

The occasion was another of Thomas' Spectrum concerts, this time with the Bostonians. These concerts are a kind of advance music appreciation courses, with occasional jokes and bits of musical history. Thursday night's theme was "transcriptions."

The first half of the program was pleasant and interesting. None of the pieces had been played in New York before.

The first piece was an orchestral arrangement, by Lou Harrison, of "Suite for Toy Piano" by John Cage, the world's undisputed champion in the put-on. Harrison's transcription itself might have been a put-on. No one is saying.

Rose Taylor of California then sang Monteverdi's "Lamento d'Arianna" as arranged by Carl Orff from an enlargement by Monteverdi.

The first half of the program ended with Ravel's orchestration of pieces from Shumann's "Carnaval," a piano suite. The transcription did not quite come off as an orchestral piece imitating a piano, but it was acceptable as a ballet suite, which seems to have been Ravel's intention.

Then came the Brahms-Schoenberg work!

To illustrate the original, Thomas at the piano, and three string players performed a small part of the Brahms, and then the orchestra played that part as arranged by Schoenberg, the father of atonality and generally considered the founder of what many people consider that abomination—modern music.

Well, Schoenberg arranged the quarter as if it were Brahms' Fifth Symphony. The orchestration was brilliant. The conducting was lively, energetic, polished. What used to be a dull chamber work (Schoenberg said it was always badly played) became incandescent. The listeners barely restrained themselves from applauding after every movement.

This rarely heard piece should be heard more often. Much more often.

DAILY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
D. 2,129,901 SUN. 2,948,786
NOV 16 1973

Boston's Symphony Shines Here

By RON EYER

Those attending the Boston Symphony's first concert of its New York season cheerfully took pot luck on seating at the Hunter College assembly hall Wednesday night when the concert was shifted from Avery Fisher Hall because of the strike of New York Philharmonic musicians

There were no special provisions for the press, and I simply slipped into a seat in the last row of the orchestra. It was an interesting experience. I cannot recall having heard an orchestra the size of the Boston in this auditorium before, and the experience was not entirely an unpleasant one.

The acoustics of the hall are a bit dry since it was not built for orchestral concerts. Also, the big orchestra was spread a bit thin across the wide, rather shallow stage. The sound, however, was remarkably good — better and more intimate in many respects than in Fisher Hall.

Even the Boston's rather petite Japanese conductor, Seiji Ozawa, seemed bigger than life, and, thankfully, he did not seem inclined to use some of the Leonard Bernstein-type podium choreography he has indulged in in recent years.

Though Ozawa's program held Rachmaninoff's not too frequently performed Third Symphony as well as Debussy's "La Mer," interest centered on the first New York performance of Gunther Schuller's "Capriccio stravagante" of recent vintage.

Schuller calls the work a "fun piece" not to be taken any more seriously than Mozart's "Musical Joke" or that other "Capriccio stravagante" by 17-century Carlo Farina to which Schuller pays due respect.

BALDWIN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 3.000
NOV 22 1973

MUSIC NOTES

Under extremely trying conditions the Boston Symphony and their exciting Music Director Seiji Ozawa gave their second concerts in New York this season at Hunter College last Wednesday and Friday evenings.

Because of the Philharmonic strike at Lincoln Center, the Boston Symphony was forced to perform in the Assembly Hall at Hunter, which is a fate no small band, much less one of the nation's major orchestras, should suffer. The place is horrendous, shabby, acoustically monstrous and virtually uninhabitable for audience as well as performers.

Yet, on a makeshift, shoddy podium, with his musicians cramped onto the ugly stage, Mr. Ozawa transported us from our unpleasant surroundings with his inspired direction.

One of the music world's fastest rising stars, Ozawa is a joy to behold, virtually a show all by himself. With his great mane of black hair and the incredibly graceful, lithe body and movements of a dancer, he all but caresses the orchestra as he conducts, pulling and coaxing the beautiful sounds from his musicians.

The well-balanced program for these concerts included Rachmaninoff's Symphony No. 3 in A Minor, Op. 44; a light amusing piece by Schuller entitled 'Capriccio stravagante' and Debussy's beautiful La Mer. Hopefully, by the time of their next concert in New York, the Boston Symphony will be housed in a more suitable place. They are well worth a trip into town.

New York Post
D. 623,245 SAT. 354,797
FEB 21 1974

New York

New York Post
D. 623,245 SAT. 354,797

DEC 17 1973

Michael Tilson Thomas Leads Boston Symphony

By ROBERT KIMBALL

Michael Tilson Thomas and the Boston Symphony Orchestra concluded a series of four successive New York concerts in as many nights on Saturday evening at Carnegie Hall. Thomas and the Boston had played at Avery Fisher Hall on Wednesday and Friday, and at Carnegie Hall Thursday and Saturday. The young and exuberant Thomas displayed fine musicianship, excellent conducting, sensitivity in accompanying soloists, considerable audacity in fashioning his programs, and a deep concern for presenting audiences with seldom heard music.

The first concert on Saturday night opened with Arnold Schoenberg's orchestral transcription of Brahms' "G-minor Piano Quartet, opus 25."

Schoenberg's transcription is a model of its kind in its strict fidelity to the style and principles of Brahms. It deserves to be heard more frequently and to be recorded. Saturday night's performance was more relaxed, more cohesive and more confident than the more frenetic, but less carefully prepared effort at Thursday's Spectrum concert.

If any work could be considered Brahms' "Fifth Symphony" it is his "Piano Concerto No. 2 in B flat, Op. 83," which the noted critic of Brahms' day, Hanslick, called a "symphony with piano obligato." The Boston Symphony played it beautifully and provided excellent support for piano soloist Malcolm Frager, but Frager seemed miscast for his role seemed miscast for his role in this olympian work. His generally light, lyrical reading almost totally side-stepped the concerto's many fiendishly difficult passages. A highly accomplished pianist, Frager seemed reluctant to come to grips with the drama that is the very essence of this work.

On Thursday evening Thomas conducted the Boston Symphony in the second of Carnegie Hall's three Spectrum Concerts of 1973-74. The purpose of the Spectrum series is to present programs that offer maximum contrast among the works of a given program.

Thursday's concert, which focused on transcriptions for orchestra, revealed many of the strengths and weaknesses of the Spectrum series. By and large, the first half of the concert was something of a bust. The principal reason might be the lack of preparation evident throughout as well as the apparent disinterest of the Boston orchestra in what Thomas is trying to do in these concerts.

Lou Harrison's arrangement for John Cage's "Suite for Toy Piano" was a pleasant disfiguration of Cage's work. One of Claudio Monteverdi's own transcriptions of the "Lament" from his opera "Arianna," charmingly sung by members of the Westminister Choir, was more effective than Carl Orff's 1929 arrangement (adaptation would be a better word) of the work, with the attractive mezzo-soprano Rose Taylor as soloist. It would be impossible to assess fairly Ravel's orchestrated sections of Schumann's piano piece "Carnaval" by Thursday's ragged, lackluster performance.

Thomas was the master of ceremonies at the Spectrum concert as well as its conductor, and since the talk is as important as the music in fulfilling the potential of these concerts, it is important to speak of Thomas' total presentation. In general, his remarks were informative, but they seemed to have been hastily prepared or even improvised on the spot. His vocal delivery was too often hasty and inaudible and, in his tendeney to speed up as he strung his phrases together, he swallowed the ends of many of his sentences.

Since these concerts are an excellent idea for breaking down the artifical barriers between audiences and orchestras, Thomas has everything to gain by enhancing his verbal presentation in any possible way.

On both Wednesday and Friday Thomas led the Boston Symphony at Avery Fisher Hall in a program that comprised Bach's "Suite No. 3 in D," Walter Piston's Flute Concerto with the Boston's principal flutist, Doriot Anthony Dwyer as soloist, and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Also Sprach Zarathustra."

The performance of these works which I heard on Friday was very, very impressive. Overcoming the acoustics at Avery Fisher, which everyone knows are not nearly as good as Carnegie's, the orchestra warmed to its work as it had not in the Spectrum concert the previous night.

The Bach Suite was brightly-paced and exceptionally well-played, especially by the Boston's great trumpeters in an altogether unhackneyed performance. The Piston work, like the Cage/Harrison, Monteverdi/Orff and Schumann/Ravel Spectrum works, was receiving its NY premiere. It was brilliantly played by the marvelous Dwyer, the first woman appointed a principal player with a major orchestra in this country. It proved to be a lovely, understated work in a single movement of three sections.

The rendition of Strauss "Zarathustra" proved to be the block-buster of the entire week, an absolutely spine-tingling performance I shall cherish always.

DAILY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
D. 2,129,901 SUN. 2,948,786

FEB 22 1974

The Audience Leaves Early

By RON EYER

The didn't [illegible] didn't have the cou[illegible] up and throw th[illegible]s. They [illegible] slunk out like furtive urchins with a clandestine, but urgent, appointment at the toilet.

That may have been what made conductor Colin Davis so contemptuous of the small [illegible] that fled in the middle of the first New York performance of Sir Michael Tippett's Third Symphony with the Boston Symphony at Avery Fisher Hall Wednesday night.

The first half of the venerable British composer's work was pretty long—about 30 minutes. Then the stampede for the exits erupted, and, gripping the railing of his podium, Davis watched them go—every last one of them—shaking his head in disbelief as they went. When the last of them were hout of the hall, he seemed on the point of addressing a few well-chosen words to the ramaining faithful. Instead, he held up a [illegible] and turned back to his orchestra and his soloist, soprano Heather Harper, to commence on the second part.

It was like watching an old newsreel. Not since Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" or Honegger's locomotive "Pacific 231" has a Philistone reaction been so unanimous here. And the music in question didn't deserve it.

Tippett's symphony may not be a great work. It has a fuzzy ideological association with Schiller's Ninth Symphony, and the soloist, intoning a blues line, sings about love and compassion in vaguely socialistic terms.

HARRIETT JOHNSON

Colin Davis Leads Tippett

Colin Davis, British guest conductor of the Boston Symphony last night in Avery Fisher Hall, not only confronted the orchestra but at one point the audience as well. Apparently the contrast between the romance of Robert Schumann's Piano Concerto in A Minor, performed with great esprit by Michael Roll, and the turmoil of Part I of Sir Michael Tippett's Symphony No. 3, was too much for some of the audience. More than a few walked out as Davis paused between Parts I and II, each of which took approximately a half hour.

Hearing the rumpus, Davis turned around. His eyes and manner were as powerful as his baton had been previously. He was probably doubly annoyed because of the insult to an eminent and beautiful soprano, Heather Harper, waiting to sing Tippett's own text for Part II.

He opened his arms in a gesture of annoyance and the rest of the listeners applauded him roundly. They were annoyed too and at the end of the Tippett, which was having its N. Y. premiere, there was a prolonged demonstration of approval, for all concerned including the 69-year-old youthful-looking composer who is here from England for the first performance of the piece in this country.

Text of His Own

Using a bitter text of his own in Part I, his point of attack is Schiller's "Ode to Joy" used in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, an apostrophe to the brotherhood and equity of man.

Hearing the Tippett symphony is a cutting, often agonizing experience. It makes its incision and then tears at the wound. The text follows the skepticism of Voltaire and Renan to Wilfred Owen and the disillusion of the present with regard to absolute values. He asks the age-old questions for which there are no answers. Davis points out that these reflect Blake's convictions too, more beautifully articulated than Schiller's.

Miss Harper sang: "The Goddess Joy shall make us one . . . and was my sister charred to cinders in the oven? . . ." So it went. The text was long. Miss Harper using a slight amplification, (mistakenly, I believe but insisted upon for expressive reasons by the composer), performed with exquisite ease no matter how seemingly unyielding the skips. She made everything, including the wide, awkward jumps to high notes, effortless.

Part I consists of what Tippett calls "Arrest and Movement" and he considers them metaphorical "Indicating a compression of energy and an explosion of energy: both positive." All didn't sound so positive. There is rough power in the music, a war of nerves, then relief. There are great clusters of sound, some overpowering, some atmospheric, using ingenious combinations: the harp in octaves, for example, combined with other instruments.

Maralin Niska is the Composer in "Ariadne auf Naxos," which will be presented by New York City Opera Feb. 28 at the N.Y. State Theater.

With a score so explicitly and elaborately written for an extensive percussion section, the writing looks like a work of art in itself. The music alternates between layers of violence which then become catalysts for quiet. The bells, drums in great variety, plus piano and harp become an orchestra in themselves.

Part II, "Lento," has a stealthy, often ominous quiet. The violas lament what is the tragic essence of life in some of the most poignant music. In the text he defies the concept of God but at the end suggests that we will remake our dreams and have compassion in love.

Roll in Concerto

Roll is an arresting personality with penetrating, dark eyes and thick curly hair. Only 27-years-old, he arrived for his local debut with a long list of credits including winning the Leeds International Competition at the age of 17.

He has the ability to produce a beautiful sound at the same time that he shows a profound feeling for melody. He was essentially a romanticist in the Schumann, as he should have been, performing with much freedom and convincingly so, though he played the cadezna so fast it was blurred. Beginning with the dramatic downward thrust of the Schumann first statement he made us realize that here was somebody. He won an ovation from the audience.

New York

New York Post
D. 623,245 SAT. 354,797

DEC 17 1973

Michael Tilson Thomas Leads Boston Symphony

By ROBERT KIMBALL

Michael Tilson Thomas and the Boston Symphony Orchestra concluded a series of four successive New York concerts in as many nights on Saturday evening at Carnegie Hall. Thomas and the Boston had played at Avery Fisher Hall on Wednesday and Friday, and at Carnegie Hall Thursday and Saturday. The young and exuberant Thomas displayed fine musicianship, excellent conducting, sensitivity in accompanying soloists, considerable audacity in fashioning his programs, and a deep concern for presenting audiences with seldom heard music.

The first concert on Saturday night opened with Arnold Schoenberg's orchestral transcription of Brahms' "G-minor Piano Quartet, opus 25."

Schoenberg's transcription is a model of its kind in its strict fidelity to the style and principles of Brahms. It deserves to be heard more frequently and to be recorded. Saturday night's performance was more relaxed, more cohesive and more confident than the more frenetic, but less carefully prepared effort at Thursday's Spectrum concert.

If any work could be considered Brahms' "Fifth Symphony" it is his "Piano Concerto No. 2 in B flat, Op. 83," which the noted critic of Brahms' day, Hanslick, called a "symphony with piano obligato." The Boston Symphony played it beautifully and provided excellent support for piano soloist Malcolm Frager, but Frager seemed miscast for his role seemed miscast for his role in this olympian work. His generally light, lyrical reading almost totally side-stepped the concerto's many fiendishly difficult passages. A highly accomplished pianist, Frager seemed reluctant to come to grips with the drama that is the very essence of this work.

On Thursday evening Thomas conducted the Boston Symphony in the second of Carnegie Hall's three Spectrum Concerts of 1973-74. The purpose of the Spectrum series is to present programs that offer maximum contrast among the works of a given program.

Thursday's concert, which focused on transcriptions for orchestra, revealed many of the strengths and weaknesses of the Spectrum series. By and large, the first half of the concert was something of a bust. The principal reason might be the lack of preparation evident throughout as well as the apparent disinterest of the Boston orchestra in what Thomas is trying to do in these concerts.

Lou Harrison's arrangement for John Cage's "Suite for Toy Piano" was a pleasant disfiguration of Cage's work. One of Claudio Monteverdi's own transcriptions of the "Lament" from his opera "Arianna," charmingly sung by members of the Westminister Choir, was more effective than Carl Orff's 1929 arrangement (adaptation would be a better word) of the work, with the attractive mezzo-soprano Rose Taylor as soloist. It would be impossible to assess fairly Ravel's orchestrated sections of Schumann's piano piece "Carnaval" by Thursday's ragged, lackluster performance.

Thomas was the master of ceremonies at the Spectrum concert as well as its conductor and since the talk is as important as the music in fulfilling the potential of these concerts, it is important to speak of Thomas' total presentation. In general, his remarks were informative, but they seemed to have been hastily prepared or even improvised on the spot. His vocal delivery was too often hasty and inaudible and, in his tendency to speed up as he strung his phrases together, he swallowed the ends of many of his sentences.

Since these concerts are an excellent idea for breaking down the artifical barriers between audiences and orchestras, Thomas has everything to gain by enhancing his verbal presentation in any possible way.

On both Wednesday and Friday Thomas led the Boston Symphony at Avery Fisher Hall in a program that comprised Bach's "Suite No. 3 in D," Walter Piston's Flute Concerto with the Boston's principal flutist, Doriot Anthony Dwyer as soloist, and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Also Sprach Zarathustra."

The performance of these works which I heard on Friday was very, very impressive. Overcoming the acoustics at Avery Fisher, which everyone knows are not nearly as good as Carnegie's, the orchestra warmed to its work as it had not in the Spectrum concert the previous night.

The Bach Suite was brightly-paced and exceptionally well-played, especially by the Boston's great trumpeters in an altogether unhackneyed performance. The Piston work, like the Cage/Harrison, Monteverdi/Orff and Schumann/Ravel Spectrum works, was receiving its NY premiere. It was brilliantly played by the marvelous Dwyer, the first woman appointed a principal player with a major orchestra in this country. It proved to be a lovely, understated work in a single movement of three sections.

The rendition of Strauss "Zarathustra" proved to be the block-buster of the entire week, an absolutely spine-tingling performance I shall cherish always.

DAILY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
D. 2,129,901 SUN. 2,948,786

FEB 22 1974

The Audience Leaves Early

By RON EYER

They didn't boo. They didn't have the courage to stand up and throw things. They just slunk out like furtive urchins with a clandestine, but urgent, appointment at the toilet.

That may have been what made conductor Colin Davis so contemptuous of the small army that fled in the middle of his first New York performance of Sir Michael Tippett's Third Symphony with the Boston Symphony at Avery Fisher Hall Wednesday night.

The first half of the venerable British composer's work was pretty long—about 30 minutes. Then the stampede for the exits erupted, and, gripping the railing of his podium, Davis watched them go—every last one of them—shaking his head in disbelief as they went. When the last of them were hout of the hall, he seemed on the point of addressing a few well-chosen words to the ramaining faithful. Instead, he held up a forefinger and turned back to his orchestra and his soloist, soprano Heather Harper, to commence on the second part.

It was like watching an old newsreel. Not since Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" or Honegger's locomotive "Pacific 231" has a Philistone reaction been so unanimous heckouts. And the music in question didn't deserve it.

Tippett's symphony may not be a great work. It has a fuzzy ideological association with Schiller's Ninth Symphony, and the soloist, intoning a blues line, sings about love and compassion in vaguely socialistic terms.

HARRIETT JOHNSON

Colin Davis Leads Tippett

Colin Davis, British guest conductor of the Boston Symphony last night in Avery Fisher Hall, not only confronted the orchestra but at one point the audience as well. Apparently the contrast between the romance of Robert Schumann's Piano Concerto in A Minor, performed with great esprit by Michael Roll, and the turmoil of Part I of Sir Michael Tippett's Symphony No. 3, was too much for some of the audience. More than a few walked out as Davis paused between Parts I and II, each of which took approximately a half hour.

Hearing the rumpus, Davis turned around. His eyes and manner were as powerful as his baton had been previously. He was probably doubly annoyed because of the insult to an eminent and beautiful soprano, Heather Harper, waiting to sing Tippett's own text for Part II.

He opened his arms in a gesture of annoyance and the rest of the listeners applauded him roundly. They were annoyed too and at the end of the Tippett, which was having its N. Y. premiere, there was a prolonged demonstration of approval, for all concerned including the 69-year-old youthful-looking composer who is here from England for the first performance of the piece in this country.

Text of His Own

Using a bitter text of his own in Part I, his point of attack is Schiller's "Ode to Joy" used in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, an apostrophe to the brotherhood and equity of man.

Hearing the Tippett symphony is a cutting, often agonizing experience. It makes its incision and then tears at the wound. The text follows the skepticism of Voltaire and Renan to Wilfred Owen and the disillusion of the present with regard to absolute values. He asks the age-old questions for which there are no answers. Davis points out that these reflect Blake's convictions too, more beautifully articulated than Schiller's.

Miss Harper sang: "The Goddess Joy shall make us one . . . and was my sister charred to cinders in the oven? . . ." So it went. The text was long. Miss Harper using a slight amplification, (mistakenly, I believe but insisted upon for expressive reasons by the composer), performed with exquisite ease no matter how seemingly unyielding the skips. She made everything, including the wide, awkward jumps to high notes, effortless.

Part I consists of what Tippett calls "Arrest and Movement" and he considers them metaphorical "Indicating a compression of energy and an explosion of energy: both positive." All didn't sound so positive. There is rough power in the music, a war of nerves, then relief. There are great clusters of sound, some overpowering, some atmospheric, using ingenious combinations: the harp in octaves, for example, combined with other instruments.

Maralin Niska is the Composer in "Ariadne auf Naxos," which will be presented by New York City Opera Feb. 28 at the N.Y. State Theater.

With a score so explicitly and elaborately written for an extensive percussion section, the writing looks like a work of art in itself. The music alternates between layers of violence which then become catalysts for quiet. The bells, drums in great variety, plus piano and harp become an orchestra in themselves.

Part II, "Lento," has a stealthy, often ominous quiet. The violas lament what is the tragic essence of life in some of the most poignant music. In the text he defies the concept of God but at the end suggests that we will remake our dreams and have compassion in love.

Roll in Concerto

Roll is an arresting personality with penetrating, dark eyes and thick curly hair. Only 27-years-old, he arrived for his local debut with a long list of credits including winning the Leeds International Competition at the age of 17.

He has the ability to produce a beautiful sound at the same time that he shows a profound feeling for melody. He was essentially a romanticist in the Schumann, as he should have been, performing with much freedom and convincingly so, though he played the cadezna so fast it was blurred. Beginning with the dramatic downward thrust of the Schumann first statement he made us realize that here was somebody. He won an ovation from the audience.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 846.132 S. 1,407,549
MAR 22 1974

Music: Ozawa 'Firebird'

By DONAL HENAHAN

Any good conductor knows what a major orchestra can do and how to get it to perform up to the top level of its ability. A few superior conductors are somehow able to seduce an orchestra into playing better than it knows it can, and knows what to do when such transcendental accidents take place. Seiji Ozawa, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's music director, had his musicians operating beyond even their own lofty levels at Avery Fisher Hall on Wednesday night, to the benefit of Mozart's Piano Concerto in A (K. 488) and Stravinsky's "Firebird."

•

The Stravinsky, presented in its original 1910 version rather than in the more familiar suites that the composer drew from the score in 1911, 1919 and 1945, was not inflated into a noisy orchestral showpiece. That often happens with the sumptuously scored 1911 suite in particular. Rather, Mr. Ozawa drew the 45-minute ballet score out in a long, unbroken dramatic line, stressing its gentle poetry as well as the brilliance of the Kaschchei episodes.

At times, the complete score is much looser in structure than we learned to expect from later Stravinsky. But it is always instructive to hear a composer's first thoughts on a famous subject, and the Bostonians spelled out those thoughts gloriously.

•

In the Mozart concerto, Maurizio Pollini gave a sparklingly clear and graceful account of the solo part, and Mr. Ozawa had pianist and orchestra breathing in blissful unison. Mr. Pollini's command of the notes themselves was flawless, but his powerful virtuoso technique rarely obtruded.

Sometimes he could skim over significant passages a bit too glibly, as in the first-movement cadenza (Mozart's own), where he made too little of the sense of the music and too much of his fluid negotiation of scales and arpeggios. However, the Adagio, taken at an ideally expansive tempo, was played magically as the pianist and Mr. Ozawa merged their personalities in a deeply moving collaboration. It was a moment when Mozart's impulse to break out of his own courtly tradition could be felt with painful force, and yet the mold did not crack for a moment.

New York Post
D. 623,245 SAT. 354,797
MAR 21 1974

Words & Music

HARRIETT JOHNSON

Ozawa Leads Pollini in Mozart

Seiji Ozawa arrived with the Boston Symphony last night in Avery Fisher Hall for a program that had only two works and stepped suddenly from the classicism of Mozart to the fantasy of Stravinsky. Maurizio Pollini, 31-year-old Italian pianist, who won first prize in the Warsaw Competition when he was 18, performed the Piano Concerto in A Major, K. 488, before the intermission. The complete ballet music of Stravinsky's "The Firebird" became the second half of the program.

Pollini played the Concerto with clarity and without pretension. He took the word "classic" seriously and performed the work with innate musicality and with a firm sense of its structure together with accompanying details. Yet there wasn't music personal profile or emotional subjectivity. It was an admirable interpretation but not a moving one. The "Adagio" had a feeling of melancholy and the final "Allegro assai" was a model of precision while the music flowed naturally. Ozawa's orchestra, somewhat reduced, was often a little overpowering in relation to Pollini. Born in 1935

The young Japanese music director, born in 1935, showed in many ways extraordinary control of his forces during the concerto and the "Firebird." He led both works from memory.

It is unusual to have the complete "Firebird" performed and it was absorbing to hear the continuity and contrasts of the story as revealed in the musical structure (and minus the visual ballet.) Stravinsky's instrumental imagination is striking and the ear is fascinated listening to the work as pure music apart from its relation to the fairy tale of the enchanted princess.

There were many sections added from the usual versions of "Suites" heard, including a great deal of music preceding the "Dance of the Firebird;" also music that precedes the "Round of the Princesses" such as the capture of the Firebird, her supplications and the first appearances of the Princesses.

Ozawa extracted a vital sense of drama from the music and brought to it an immense range of color and virtuosity. The sensuous folk-like "Round of the Princesses" was sensitively performed. There is also a beautiful folk-like theme that appears early in the score in the flute and horn and is repeated later during the procession of Kashchei's retinue. This section then goes on to a brilliant development and climax.

The Firebird's "Lullaby" was haunting and the punctuation of the drama by the percussion between the sections of lyricism used the instruments in an original manner. In its way, the score made history in 1910. The use of the contra bassoon, for example, is highly imaginative.

The audience gave Ozawa and the Bostonians an ovation at the conclusion.

ART AUCTION

Providence

JOURNAL (M)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
D. 67,117
DEC 7 1973
New England Newsclip

Flutist and pianist perform with Boston Symphony

By EDWIN SAFFORD

Just in case you did not know, Walter Piston's intellectual, musical and no doubt physical arteries are as open as Doriot Anthony Dwyer's flute was last night in a performance of his concerto for her instrument and orchestra. It was played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Michael Tilson Thomas in Veterans auditorium.

Thomas had one of his usual interesting programs. The opening work was Bach's Suite No. 3 and for a close the estimable Malcolm Frager was on hand for the Brahms second piano concerto. While there were certain small signs that this was a preparatory concert for the weekend's performances in Symphony Hall they were quickly forgotten.

Piston's concerto was composed just two years ago. Since the composer will be 80 in January you can figure out the rest.

In his full maturity he was not relying on even his own thematic formulas. The one-movement score bent dissonance with the best of them. It was not as brash as music by younger whippersnappers yet far from reactionary in its open scoring, an admirable piece from one of our steadiest.

Dwyer, who played the premiere in 1972 under Thomas, obviously was at home with it. Her playing in the pastoral middle part and in the dancing last, with its demanding cadenza, was tremendous. Is it permissible to mention the flutings of a mockingbird?

Frager and Thomas had a most satisfactory Brahms between them. For his part the conductor was not the kind to impose himself on the work but rather gave the music its led while holding onto the shape.

We have been impressed by Frager before here. Last night he did not leave every question posed by the concerto answered conclusively. Some muddiness in declamatory sections was evident.

All the same he brought lyricism to movements other than the andante which had Martin Hoherman's cello part rather matter of fact at the outset. And instead of fighting the tempo, Frager took time to be reflective between the big statements, arching dynamics and producing crystaline passage work.

In all he produced a balanced effect with the orchestra. With the Bach suite and Thomas conducting an ensemble of strings, oboes, trumpets and timpani in a squeaky-clean performance that contained both a good concertino and a few unexpected but delightful ornamentations, the evening passed along pleasurably. Further, Walter Piston was there to acknowledge the pleasure.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 846.132 S. 1,407,549
FEB 22 1974

Bostonians Play Tippett Symphony

By RAYMOND ERICSON

It was a British evening that the Boston Symphony Orchestra offered in Avery Fisher Hall on Wednesday night. Colin Davis, the British musician who is one of the Bostonians' principal guest conductors, was on the podium. In the Schumann Piano Concerto the soloist was Michael Roll, also British, and the other work in the program was the Third Symphony of Sir Michael Tippett, in which the soloist was the Belfast-born soprano Heather Harper.

The symphony, which was first performed in 1972 under Mr. Davis's direction and was new here, is one of the more impressive large-scale works to have emerged in recent years. The over-all structure is fairly simple: a first movement in which an aggressive, clangorous section is followed by a slow, quiet, static meditation, and a second movement that comments on Beethoven's "Ode to Joy."

Here a shrilling introduction is interrupted by a quotation from that work, leading into a soprano solo in stylized slow and fast blues. The composer's own text rejects the optimism of Schiller's poem but says finally that "though the dream crack, we shall remake it."

•

The music itself is intricate and highly detailed. It is effective at any given moment in its brilliant scoring and in its eloquent clashes and contrasts of texture. But the mixture of elements in the second movement doesn't jell, at least for this listener. The blues idiom is so strong that, unless it is made more abstract than in this case, it throws the work's style out of focus.

Perhaps the symphony is too long. Sir Michael is at heart a lyric rhapsodist, and each movement is drawn out to 28 minutes. For all the reservations, however, the work has the power and originality of statement to make it stay in the mind.

•

It was played superbly, despite its difficulty, and Miss Harper, the original soloist, sang magnificently. If some in the audience walked out after the first movement—with Mr. Davis staring in glum irritation—the rest stayed to applaud and cheer the composer.

The 27-year-old Mr. Roll, making his first appearances here, came to prominence by winning the first Leeds International Piano Competition 10 years ago. He started the Schumann concerto interestingly enough with highly inflected playing. As the work progressed, however, the strong rubatos came to seem like a restless mannerism. The performance was perfectly respectable, but it lacked the warmth so essential to Schumann's music.

a pleasing concert.

What, in the long run, was necessary to enjoy the evening was not a complete knowledge of orchestration but simply an ability to listen, quietly, for two hours.

—Randy Szyba

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 846,132 S. 1,407,549
MAR 22 1974

Music: Ozawa 'Firebird'

By DONAL HENAHAN

Any good conductor knows what a major orchestra can do and how to get it to perform up to the top level of its ability. A few superior conductors are somehow able to seduce an orchestra into playing better than it knows it can, and knows what to do when such transcendental accidents take place. Seiji Ozawa, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's music director, had his musicians operating beyond even their own lofty levels at Avery Fisher Hall on Wednesday night, to the benefit of Mozart's Piano Concerto in A (K. 488) and Stravinsky's "Firebird."

•

The Stravinsky, presented in its original 1910 version rather than in the more familiar suites that the composer drew from the score in 1911, 1919 and 1945, was not inflated into a noisy orchestral showpiece. That often happens with the sumptuously scored 1911 suite in particular. Rather, Mr. Ozawa drew the 45-minute ballet score out in a long, unbroken dramatic line, stressing its gentle poetry as well as the brilliance of the Kaschchei episodes.

At times, the complete score is much looser in structure than we learned to expect from later Stravinsky. But it is always instructive to hear a composer's first thoughts on a famous subject, and the Bostonians spelled out those thoughts gloriously.

•

In the Mozart concerto, Maurizio Pollini gave a sparklingly clear and graceful account of the solo part, and Mr. Ozawa had pianist and orchestra breathing in blissful unison. Mr. Pollini's command of the notes themselves was flawless, but his powerful virtuoso technique rarely obtruded.

Sometimes he could skim over significant passages a bit too glibly, as in the first-movement cadenza (Mozart's own), where he made too little of the sense of the music and too much of his fluid negotiation of scales and arpeggios. However, the Adagio, taken at an ideally expansive tempo, was played magically as the pianist and Mr. Ozawa merged their personalities in a deeply moving collaboration. It was a moment when Mozart's impulse to break out of his own courtly tradition could be felt with painful force, and yet the mold did not crack for a moment.

New York Post
D. 623,245 SAT. 354,797
MAR 21 1974

Words & Music

HARRIETT JOHNSON

Ozawa Leads Pollini in Mozart

Seiji Ozawa arrived with the Boston Symphony last night in Avery Fisher Hall for a program that had only two works and stepped suddenly from the classicism of Mozart to the fantasy of Stravinsky. Maurizio Pollini, 31-year-old Italian pianist, who won first prize in the Warsaw Competition when he was 18, performed the Piano Concerto in A Major, K. 488, before the intermission. The complete ballet music of Stravinsky's "The Firebird" became the second half of the program.

Pollini played the Concerto with clarity and without pretension. He took the word "classic" seriously and performed the work with innate musicality and with a firm sense of its structure together with accompanying details. Yet there wasn't music personal profile or emotional subjectivity. It was an admirable interpretation but not a moving one. The "Adagio" had a feeling of melancholy and the final "Allegro assai" was a model of precision while the music flowed naturally. Ozawa's orchestra, somewhat reduced, was often a little overpowering in relation to Pollini.

Born in 1935

The young Japanese music director, born in 1935, showed in many ways extraordinary control of his forces during the concerto and the "Firebird." He led both works from memory.

It is unusual to have the complete "Firebird" performed and it was absorbing to hear the continuity and contrasts of the story as revealed in the musical structure (and minus the visual ballet.) Stravinsky's instrumental imagination is striking and the ear is fascinated listening to the work as pure music apart from its relation to the fairy tale of the enchanted princess.

There were many sections added from the usual versions of "Suites" heard, including a great deal of music preceding the "Dance of the Firebird;" also music that precedes the "Round of the Princesses" such as the capture of the Firebird, her supplications and the first appearances of the Princesses.

Ozawa extracted a vital sense of drama from the music and brought to it an immense range of color and virtuosity. The sensuous folk-like "Round of the Princesses" was sensitively performed. There is also a beautiful folk-like theme that appears early in the score in the flute and horn and is repeated later during the procession of Kashchei's retinue. This section then goes on to a brilliant development and climax.

The Firebird's "Lullaby" was haunting and the punctuation of the drama by the percussion between the sections of lyricism used the instruments in an original manner. In its way, the score made history in 1910. The use of the contra bassoon, for example, is highly imaginative.

The audience gave Ozawa and the Bostonians an ovation at the conclusion.

ART AUCTION

Providence

JOURNAL (M)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
D. 67,117
DEC 7 1973
New England Newsclip

Flutist and pianist perform with Boston Symphony

By EDWIN SAFFORD

Just in case you did not know, Walter Piston's intellectual, musical and no doubt physical arteries are as open as Doriot Anthony Dwyer's flute was last night in a performance of his concerto for her instrument and orchestra. It was played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Michael Tilson Thomas in Veterans auditorium.

Thomas had one of his usual interesting programs. The opening work was Bach's Suite No. 3 and for a close the estimable Malcolm Frager was on hand for the Brahms second piano concerto. While there were certain small signs that this was a preparatory concert for the weekend's performances in Symphony Hall they were quickly forgotten.

Piston's concerto was composed just two years ago. Since the composer will be 80 in January you can figure out the rest.

In his full maturity he was not relying on even his own thematic formulas. The one-movement score bent dissonance with the best of them. It was not as brash as music by younger whippersnappers yet far from reactionary in its open scoring, an admirable piece from one of our steadiest.

Dwyer, who played the premiere in 1972 under Thomas, obviously was at home with it. Her playing in the pastoral middle part and in the dancing last, with its demanding cadenza, was tremendous. Is it permissible to mention the flutings of a mockingbird?

Frager and Thomas had a most satisfactory Brahms between them. For his part the conductor was not the kind to impose himself on the work but rather gave the music its led while holding onto the shape.

We have been impressed by Frager before here. Last night he did not leave every question posed by the concerto answered conclusively. Some muddiness in declamatory sections was evident.

All the same he brought lyricism to movements other than the andante which had Martin Hoherman's cello part rather matter of fact at the outset. And instead of fighting it Frager took time to be reflective between the big statements, arching dynamics and producing crystaline passage work.

In all he produced a balanced effect with the orchestra. With the Bach suite and Thomas conducting an ensemble of strings, oboes, trumpets and timpani in a squeaky-clean performance that contained both a good concertino and a few unexpected but delightful ornamentations, the evening passed along pleasurably. Further, Walter Piston was there to acknowledge the pleasure.

TIMES (E)
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
D. 30,000
DEC 7 1973
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Warms On A December Night

There are reasons to attend a symphony orchestra concert, no matter how small one's knowledge of the music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, for one reason.

Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas for another.

And pianist Malcolm Frager.

And Brahms and Bach and, simply, beautiful music.

A receptive, pleased audience at Veterans Memorial Auditorium was treated to all Thursday evening in the second of three Boston Symphony concerts in Providence.

Although the sound is of major concern, sight provides an equal amount of enjoyment in the case of the Boston Symphony and Michael Tilson Thomas.

Perfection is a very strong word, but it most closely describes the experience Thursday night (except for an unfortunate incident involving a few clumsy late-comers who chose to tramp down the aisles between movements of the first piece and elicit stares of disbelief and maybe shock on the part of the orchestra and conductor) from the outset of the first piece, Bach's Suite No. 3 in D.

The light happy movements, the unerring mastery of the orchestra and the involved graceful movements of Michael Tilson Thomas, a sprinkling of oboes, bassoons and trumpets produced a reflective, calm mood, despite the thankfully short audience interruption.

The second piece played by the orchestra, Concerto for flute and orchestra with soloist Doriot Anothony Dwyer, was the first Providence performance of the contemporary score.

A difficult, less melodic piece compared to the Bach suite, at times almost a clash between the flute and orchestra, was performed with precision.

Brahms Piano Concerto No. 2 in B flat, with guest pianist Frager climaxed an evening of beautiful sounds.

The gentle concerto and the at times brisk, at times soft and always forceful performance by Frager sent the audience warmed somewhat into the cold evening.

The breath vapor rising in the fluorescent glow outside the auditorium doors was the end result of excited chatter about a pleasing concert.

What, in the long run, was necessary to enjoy the evening was not a complete knowledge of orchestration but simply an ability to listen, quietly, for two hours.

—Randy Szyba

49

Chamber players

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 24,500
FEB 21 1974
New England Newsclip

BSO Chamber Players in Cambridge Performance

There is a special quality to chamber music which often makes it a superior musical experience. The music must stand on its own terms for no orchestral opulence can cover up for inherent weakness. Good Chamber Music, played well, comes close to a matchless aesthetic encounter.

Sunday afternoon's concert by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players in Sander Theater, Cambridge, was a reasonably satisfying one, even if it did not attain the heights of similar occasions. The program was well balanced with three works representative of eighteenth and nineteenth century Germanic music and one of mid-twentieth century America. The playing of the Orchestra's first-chair occupants was deft and intelligent, and the full house responded with favor.

Yet somehow that final touch of elegance, that extra margin that can lift chamber music to a higher plane, was manifestly lacking. Whether the earlier works had been neglected in rehearsal for the benefit of the contemporary is not known. But it seemed clear the Seymour Shifrin's Serenade (written in 1954) received more tender care than music by Beethoven, Mozart and Spohr.

Not to say that the Shifrin work didn't deserve special attention. It is a striking three-movement piece which builds to a powerful end. Shifrin who teaches at Brandeis wrote the serenade for a combination of viola, Oboe, Clarinet, horn and piano. Its first movement carries on in the mood established by the serialists but leads to a more melodically disposed largo in which a strong opening theme stated by the piano moves around skilfully among the other instruments. The finale is a whirlwind of vigor and intense statement, and was sheer pleasure to hear as performed by Bernard Fine, Ralph Gomberg, Harold Wright and Charles, Kavaloski, with assisting pianist Gilbert Kalish. This is music that calls for repeated hearing because the first impression is so attractive. With familiarity, I suspect the attraction grows.

The program began with Beethoven's Variations for piano, violin and cello on Muller's song "Ich bin der Schneider Kakadu". These variations from Beethoven's late period—it is opus 121a; the Ninth Symphony is opus 125—contain the buoyancy and drive of the master's middle and late compositions and even cast a gleam toward some of the rhythmic vitality of the Choral Symphony. They were effectively played by Joseph Silverstein, Jules Eskin and Mr. Kalish.

As a closer Mr. Kavaloski was replaced by Bassoonist Sherman Walt who joined the other performers of the Shfrin Serenade in the playing of Mozart's Quintet for piano and winds, K. 452. Good Mozart—is there anything but good Mozart?—well played.

Also heard on the program was Spohr's Nonet in F. for strings and winds played by nine of the Boston Symphony's section leaders. One could not tell from this particular work that in their own day there were those who thought Spohr a finer composer than Beethoven. All told, it was a pleasant affair of good musicians enjoying themselves and entertaining their listeners on an afternoon off from orchestral obligations. It is an idea that can stand frequent repetition.

H.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 107,097
FEB 25 1974
New England Newsclip

BSO Chamber Players perform in a different context

Cambridge, Mass

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Chamber Players, first chair instrumentalists of the BSO, gave the second in their series of concerts at Sanders Theater.

Music

The program was devoted to four works by Beethoven, Spohr, Seymour Shifrin, and Mozart. Of the four the Spohr was the most satisfactory from both performance and musical standpoints. It is a Nonet for strings and winds, rich in graceful melody and affords opportunities for each instrumentalist, within the ensemble, to show off his clean playing. The Nonet was marked on all counts by fluid phrasing and wonderful dynamic control.

The most interesting work was Shifrin's 1954 "Serenade." Written for viola, horn, piano, clarinet, and oboe, it is a virtuoso showpiece with a last movement presto molto of insistent excitement. During the adagio there are some hauntingly lyric moments, beautifully conveyed by the five players.

Gilbert Kalish, assisting artist, was kept busy all afternoon, contributing sensitive yet forceful work in the Mozart, the Beethoven and, particularly, the Shifrin.

The Mozart quintet which closed the program was, predictably, well performed, especially in the larghetto, which was played leisuredly but with great warmth.

It is good to hear these musicians outside of the orchestra context. They work well together. It provides them with more exposed playing opportunities and it also offers the public an opportunity to hear chamber music that might otherwise remain unperformed, or performed by a less seasoned and professional ensemble.

T. E. Jr.

HERALD-AMERICAN (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 424,654
OCT 31 1973
New England Newsclip

BSO Groups Are Excellent

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

The first thing one perceives about Charles Wuorinen's Bassoon Variations accompanied by Harp and Timpani, which was given its first performance Sunday afternoon by the BSO Chamber Players, is the spare, nearly Oriental, color and sense of motionlessness.

It begins with the bassoon intoning long-held notes with the harp adding isolated, static little figures and the timpani providing punctuation. The texture, then, is ultra-simple, and quite attractive from a sonic standpoint. As the piece continues, there is a section of virtuoso passagework for the bassoonist framed by duets for harp and timpani and the whole ends in a return to the music of the opening. It is short, modestly engaging and comes to the end just slightly after the musical ideas seem to run out of generative steam. Sherman Walt, bassoon; Ann Hobson, harp; and Everett Firth, timpani made up the excellent ensemble.

• Music Review

Following the Wuorinen was an 80th Birthday Celebration performance of Walter Piston's Quintet for Wind Instruments (1956), a very classically-oriented work with one of those busy, bustling, wry sorts of first movement, and a whole that is marked by highly disciplined craftsmanship. In particular, the Scherzando is a gem of witty discourse, and the quintet (Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Ralph Gomberg, Harold Wright, Sherman Walt, and Charles Kavaloski) played it with a great sense of fun.

Completing the program was a lovely bit of fluff—Saint-Saehs' Fantaisie for violin and harp—played with great sensitivity by Joseph Silverstein. Also, the Brahms Piano Quartet in G-minor which the first chair string players and pianist Gilbert Kalish performed with fine ensemble but with a spirit that was slightly overdeliberate.

GLOBE (E)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 195,032
OCT 29 1973
New England Newsclip

Chamber players perform Bassoon variations

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

Prefacing the premiere of Charles Wuorinen's Bassoon variations accompanied by harp and timpani with the Saint-Saens Fantasy for violin and harp (Boston Symphony Chamber Players, Sunday in Sanders Theater) was a nice idea, not only because the Fantasy has a certain lavender elegance and was charmingly performed by Joseph Silverstein and Ann Hobson, but because it is such a neat exemplar of the burbling, sweeping Romantic Harp before its deglamorization by Mahler. Wuorinen's is very much The New Harp, playing mostly single notes, and occasional chords only as a sort of auxiliary percussion.

Defeat: I couldn't really hear how, or even that the Variations are variations, though a sense of tight cousinship of all the material comes across clearly. It is a brief piece, maybe 12 minutes, nonviolent, austere, moving much of the time in steady note-values. As promised in the title, the bassoon carries most of the burden of discourse, enjoying the advantage of being able to sing sustained lines. What harp and timpani play has considerable character, but, except once when they have a variation (?) of their own, their reticence in dynamics and the staccato character of their utterances makes them accompanists and punctuators.

An interesting piece to hear, it must be enormously difficult to play, given the athletic, vigorously declamatory bassooon part and the constant challenge to the kettledrum to play in unison and in tune with the harp. In so far as I could tell without a score. the performance by Sherman Walt, Ann Hobson, and Everett Firth was effective. though for me the spectacular in-tuneness and delicacy of tone of Firth's drumming stole the show.

The BSO's last brush with Wuorinen was the unhappy, under-rehearsed, resentfully undertaken premiere of his Concerto for amplified violin and orchestra (Tanglewood, August 1971). With Paul Zukofsky soloist again, Michael Tilson Thomas, who conducted the premiere, performed it with his own orchestra, the Buffalo Philharmonic, last April. last Wednesday, they took it to Carnegie Hall, and justice was done to this powerful, abrasive, densely composed work.

TIMES (E)
BEVERLY, MASS.
D. 9,514
OCT 24 1973
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Chamber Players to start season

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony Chamber Players begin their fifth season of Sanders Theatre concerts, Sunday afternoon, October 28 at 4 o'clock. The program, the first of three Sunday afternoon concerts sponsored jointly by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Harvard University Department of Music, features the world premiere performance of Charles Wuorinen's Bassoon variations accompanied by harp and timpani (1972), and Walter Piston's Quintet for wind instruments (1956).

The Wuorinen, a single-movement work of eleven minutes duration, treats the three instruments as equals, while unconventionally placing the bassoon in the musical foreground. The Piston, originally written for the wind principals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is being performed in celebration of the distinguished American composer's forthcoming 80th birthday this January. Saint-Saens' Fantasy for violin and harp, op 124 (1907) and Brahm's G-minor piano quartet, op. 25 complete the program, the latter with Gilbert Kalish, guest pianist.

Subscriptions for the three-concert series, priced at $5, $8 and $11 are on sale at the Symphony Hall Box Office, 266-1492, and at the Harvard Coop, as are single tickets, priced at $2, $3 and $4. In addition, both series and single tickets will be on sale at Sanders Theatre beginning at 1 o'clock the day of the concert. The second and final concerts of the Sanders Theatre Series take place Sundays at 4 o'clock February 17 and March 24.

Since their information nine years ago under the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a distinct performing ensemble, the Boston Symphony Chamber Players have given some 200 concerts. Comprising twelve members — the Orchestra's string, woodwind and brass principals and the solo timpanist — the ensemble has toured Europe twice, the Soviet Union once, and presented concerts in the Virgin Islands, Washington, D.C., and in sixteen states, having made a transcontinental U.S. tour in 1966. Last spring, the Chamber Players made a highly-acclaimed tour of Texas, presenting both concerts and workshop-clinics, a combination which will be repeated during this spring's tour of the Midwest and Florida. In addition to some 35,000 concertgoers who attended the Chamber Players performances last season, countless additional chamber music devotees heard their numerous recordings on the RCA Victor and Deutsche Grammophon labels.

TELEGRAM (M)
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 60,219
FEB 11 1974
New England Newsclip

600 at Chamber Music Concert

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Atwood Hall was the scene of a superlative chamber music performance last night at the fourth event in Clark University's Fine Arts series by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. The audience numbered about 600.

A "ne plus ultra" standard was likely assured since the 12 players are first chair occupants of the Boston Symphony.

They were Joseph Silverstein, violin; Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, cello; Henry Portnoi, bass; Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Harold Wright, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon.

Also, Charles Kavaloski, horn; Armando Ghitalla, trumpet; William Gibson, trombone; Everett Firth, timpani.

The program progressed from a string trio by Beethoven to Piston's Quintet for Woodwinds and a nine-member ensemble in a concert suite based on Stravinsky's stage work, "L'Histoire du Soldat."

As members of what may be the nation's busiest orchestra, the Chamber Players (no matter what the combinations) have a deeply ingrained sense of collaboration and dedication to metier.

This was no "get-together" of minds for the practical purpose of playing an engagement.

Historical item was Piston's Quintet, commemorating the composer's 80th birthday last month.

It could be taken for granted that the reed playing was top-level. The composer is an intimate of the Boston Symphony. His work of 1956 was a better effort and time has already proved him to be among America's significant composers.

The Quintet is remarkably well-constructed. Each of the four movements has a completeness of purpose and contributes to the united tapestry.

In this performance, it's pointless to isolate individuals as ring-leaders for praise. It was a compilation of universal skills, just as vibrant in the tender slow movement as the three vivacious sequences.

Beethoven's Trio for violin, viola and cello, Opus 9, No. 1 is an early work (1798) but received the impression of completeness and not a score reduced by one part from a quartet.

Here was thematic playing down to the smallest detail. Brief transient solos of the opening adagio were respected with restrained backgrounds. Technique was quite spotless. Pronunciations of phrases were duplicated in accents, punctuations and variances of volume.

Beauty of tone in the slow movement was invested in melodic simplicity, pliant dialogue, and rich tone. The scherzo and finale (the latter played at what was probably a world speed record) were completely controlled.

Technical matters didn't even seem worthy of consideration.

At least half the fun is missed by omitting dance and sardonic spoken narrative from the original version of Stravinsky's "The Soldier's Tale."

Without them the Faustian theme is present only in dim suggestion. Therefore, one had no recourse but to settle for an abstract interpretation.

Descriptive titles helped the imagination — "Soldier's March," "Royal March," Tango, waltz, ragtime, and "Devil's Triumphal March."

The sketchy scenes were drawn together with enough compactness that the playing itself filled listening enticement to the brim.

While the work needed shock-absorbers when it was premiered in 1918, it now creates no strain. On the contrary, last night's ear-bent interest was on bright tonal coloration, rhythmic horseplay, and instrumental jeering that provided fun, despite the lack of explanation.

Final program on this series will be given Friday, March 22 by pianist Philippe Entremont. The originally scheduled date was April.

PROGRAM

String Trio in G major, Opus 9, No. 1 — Beethoven
Quintet for Woodwinds (1956) — Piston
L'Histoire du Soldat, Concert Suite — Stravinsky

CHICAGO DAILY NEWS
D. 448,314 SUN. 474,253
MAY 1 1974

p. 50

Boston chamber group lacks spark and spirit

By Karen Monson

5454

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players, who came to the Auditorium Theater Tuesday evening, are the cream of Boston's symphonic chowder.

These dozen first-chair instrumentalists can take appreciable credit for their orchestra's greatness.

But as chamber musicians, they're short on flavor.

Technically, the Bostonians collaborate properly, proficiently, often stylishly. Yet they lack the spark, the spirit, the individual and communal inensity that gives chamber music its special character.

THE LAPSES can be explained in part by the very nature of this 10-year-old ensemble. The players' first allegiance is obviously to their orchestra.

But chamber music, like a jealous lover, doesn't like to play second fiddle. The world's great small ensembles spend endless hours coddling their exclusive and demanding art.

It's a sometime troublesome, but nevertheless empirically proved law of music-making that the best chamber music players are not likely to be found sitting in the middle of an orchestra.

Phyllis Curtain

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players have these strikes against them. They also have one very significant plus: the variety of instrumentation needed to put together fascinating programs.

TUESDAY'S concert opened with one of Haydn's "London" Trios, ended with Beethoven's Op. 20 Septet, and filled the sandwich with two novel 20th-Century works.

Both new pieces featured guest soprano Phyllis Curtain, a singer who uses brains as well as vocal cords and guest pianist Ryan Edwards, one of the abler accompanists of the day.

In Shostakovich's 1967 "Romances" for voice, violin, cello and piano, the soprano forced herself into stridency, and seemed not to capitalize on the subtleties of Block's Russian texts.

But "Ariel," which Ned Rorem wrote in 1971 as a gift for this singer, emerged with the ideal mixture of bile and sentiment.

These settings for voice, clarinet and piano of five poems by Sylvia Plath grow more remarkable as they progress to the famous "Lady Lazarus." ("Dying is an art, like everything else. I do it exceptionally well.")

Rorem set it, and Miss Curtain sang it, exceptionally well.

ENTERPRISE (SW)
FALMOUTH, MASS.
W. 7,849
APR 30 1974
New England Newsclip

COMING TO FALMOUTH — The Boston Symphony Chamber Players, ranked among the world's finest, come to Cape Cod for the fifth consecutive year for performances in West Yarmouth May 10 and in St. Barnabas parish hall, Falmouth, on May 11. And again this year, these 12 principals of the Boston Symphony, augmented by Gilbert Kalish, pianist, will appear under auspices of the Cape Cod Conservatory of Music and Arts. Their program includes works by Mozart, Beethoven, Poulenc and Shifrin. Under the leadership of Joseph Silverstein, distinguished concertmaster of the Boston Symphony and widely known concert violinist, the group includes Burton Fine, violist; Jules Eskin, cello; Henry Portnoi, bass; Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Harold Wright, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; Charles Kavaloski, horn; Armando Ghitalla, trumpet; William Gibson, trombone; and Everett Firth, tympani. Each is eminent as a soloist, and has recorded extensively alone and in concert, in addition to appearances with the Chamber Players throughout this country and overseas.

TELEGRAM (M)
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 60,219
1974 New England Newsclip

600 at Chamber Music Concert

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Atwood Hall was the scene of a superlative chamber music performance last night at the fourth event in Clark University's Fine Arts series by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. The audience numbered about 600.

A "ne plus ultra" standard was likely assured since the 12 players are first chair occupants of the Boston Symphony.

They were Joseph Silverstein, violin; Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, cello; Henry Portnoi, bass; Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Harold Wright, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon.

Also, Charles Kavaloski, horn; Armando Ghitalla, trumpet; William Gibson, trombone; Everett Firth, timpani.

The program progressed from a string trio by Beethoven to Piston's Quintet for Woodwinds and a nine-member ensemble in a concert suite based on Stravinsky's stage work, "L'Histoire du Soldat."

As members of what may be the nation's busiest orchestra, the Chamber Players (no matter what the combinations) have a deeply ingrained sense of collaboration and dedication to metier.

This was no "get-together" of minds for the practical purpose of playing an engagement.

Historical item was Piston's Quintet, commemorating the composer's 80th birthday last month.

It could be taken for granted that the reed playing was top-level. The composer is an intimate of the Boston Symphony. His work of 1956 was a better effort and time has already proved him to be among America's significant composers.

The Quintet is remarkably well-constructed. Each of the four movements has a completeness of purpose and contributes to the united tapestry.

In this performance, it's pointless to isolate individuals as ring-leaders for praise. It was a compilation of universal skills, just as vibrant in the tender slow movement as the three vivacious sequences.

Beethoven's Trio for violin, viola and cello, Opus 9, No. 1 is an early work (1798) but received the impression of completeness and not a score reduced by one part from a quartet.

Here was thematic playing down to the smallest detail. Brief transient solos of the opening adagio were respected with restrained backgrounds. Technique was quite spotless. Pronunciations of phrases were duplicated in accents, punctuations and variances of volume.

Beauty of tone in the slow movement was invested in melodic simplicity, pliant dialogue, and rich tone. The scherzo and finale (the latter played at what was probably a world speed record) were completely controlled.

Technical matters didn't even seem worthy of consideration.

At least half the fun is missed by omitting dance and sardonic spoken narrative from the original version of Stravinsky's "The Soldier's Tale."

Without them the Faustian theme is present only in dim suggestion. Therefore, one had no recourse but to settle for an abstract interpretation.

Descriptive titles helped the imagination — "Soldier's March," "Royal March," Tango, waltz, ragtime, and "Devil's Triumphal March."

The sketchy scenes were drawn together with enough compactness that the playing itself filled listening enticement to the brim.

While the work needed shock-absorbers when it was premiered in 1918, it now creates no strain. On the contrary, last night's ear-bent interest was on bright tonal coloration, rhythmic horseplay, and instrumental jeering that provided fun, despite the lack of explanation.

Final program on this series will be given Friday, March 22 by pianist Philippe Entremont. The originally scheduled date was April.

PROGRAM

String Trio in G major, Opus 9, No. 1 — Beethoven
Quintet for Woodwinds (1956) — Piston
L'Histoire du Soldat, Concert Suite — Stravinsky

CHICAGO DAILY NEWS
D. 448,314 SUN. 474,253
MAY 1 1974

Boston chamber group lacks spark and spirit

By Karen Monson

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players, who came to the Auditorium Theater Tuesday evening, are the cream of Boston's symphonic chowder.

These dozen first-chair instrumentalists can take appreciable credit for their orchestra's greatness.

But as chamber musicians, they're short on flavor.

Technically, the Bostonians collaborate properly, proficiently, often stylishly. Yet they lack the spark, the spirit, the individual and communal intensity that gives chamber music its special character.

Phyllis Curtain

THE LAPSES can be explained in part by the very nature of this 10-year-old ensemble. The players' first allegiance is obviously to their orchestra.

But chamber music, like a jealous lover, doesn't like to play second fiddle. The world's great small ensembles spend endless hours coddling their exclusive and demanding art.

It's a sometime troublesome, but nevertheless empirically proved law of music-making that the best chamber music players are not likely to be found sitting in the middle of an orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players have these strikes against them. They also have one very significant plus: the variety of instrumentation needed to put together fascinating programs.

TUESDAY'S concert opened with one of Haydn's "London" Trios, ended with Beethoven's Op. 20 Septet, and filled the sandwich with two novel 20th-Century works.

Both new pieces featured guest soprano Phyllis Curtain, a singer who uses brains as well as vocal cords and guest pianist Ryan Edwards, one of the abler accompanists of the day.

In Shostakovich's 1967 "Romances" for voice, violin, cello and piano, the soprano forced herself into stridency, and seemed not to capitalize on the subtleties of Block's Russian texts.

But "Ariel," which Ned Rorem wrote in 1971 as a gift for this singer, emerged with the ideal mixture of bile and sentiment.

These settings for voice, clarinet and piano of five poems by Sylvia Plath grow more remarkable as they progress to the famous "Lady Lazarus." ("Dying is an art, like everything else. I do it exceptionally well.")

Rorem set it, and Miss Curtain sang it, exceptionally well.

ENTERPRISE (S-M)
FALMOUTH, MASS.
1974 New England Newsclip

COMING TO FALMOUTH — The Boston Symphony Chamber Players, ranked among the world's finest, come to Cape Cod for the fifth consecutive year for performances in West Yarmouth May 10 and in St. Barnabas parish hall, Falmouth, on May 11. And again this year, these 12 principals of the Boston Symphony, augmented by Gilbert Kalish, pianist, will appear under auspices of the Cape Cod Conservatory of Music and Arts. Their program includes works by Mozart, Beethoven, Poulenc and Shifrin. Under the leadership of Joseph Silverstein, distinguished concertmaster of the Boston Symphony and widely known concert violinist, the group includes Burton Fine, violist; Jules Eskin, cello; Henry Portnoi, bass; Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Harold Wright, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; Charles Kavaloski, horn; Armando Ghitalla, trumpet; William Gibson, trombone; and Everett Firth, tympani. Each is eminent as a soloist, and has recorded extensively alone and in concert, in addition to appearances with the Chamber Players throughout this country and overseas.

p. 51

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
S. 109,936

JAN 27 1974 New England Newsclip

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players.

Chamber Group Will Play at Clark

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

A musical event of major interest will be the concert by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players on Clark University's Fine Arts series in Atwood Hall, at 8:15 p.m., Sunday, Feb. 10.

The 12-member group's last area appearance was in May, 1972, at Weston Auditorium, Fitchburg State College, in a benefit concert to send a young music student to study for the summer at the Berkshire Center, Tanglewood.

All are first-desk players with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

They are Joseph Silverstein, violin (concert master of the Boston Symphony); Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, cello; Henry Portnoi, string bass; Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe.

Also, Harold Wright, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; Charles Kavalovski, horn; Armando Ghitalle, trumpet; William Gibson, trombone; and Everett First, timpani.

Their Clark program is Beethoven's String Trio in G major, Opus 9, No. 1; Walter Piston's Quintet for Woodwinds (1956); and Stravinsky's concert suite, "L'Histoire du Soldat."

Composer's Birthday

The Piston Suite is being played to commemorate the composer's 80th birthday last month.

Music
Raymond Morin

Boston Symphony's Chamber Players are more flexible than a single ensemble with a fixed number of performers. They take advantage of their special situation to draw upon the wide variety of instrumental combinations available among the orchestra's principal players.

Their concerts are arranged as time permits within the Boston Symphony's yearly schedule. The group has toured the United States, and in 1967 traveled to England, the Soviet Union and West Germany under the auspices of the United States Department of State's Cultural Presentations Office.

In addition to public concerts, the Chamber Players frequently conduct master classes or clinics at universities where they appear. Such will not be the case at Clark.

The Clark Series is attended by a substantial number of season ticket holders.

Individual tickets will be available from 1 to 4 p.m., Friday, Feb. 8 in the Clark University mailrooms in Estabrook Hall.

They are priced at $4 for adults; $3 for all outside students; and $2 for Clark undergraduates only.

If any tickets remain, they will be on sale at the box-office the night of the concert, but not after 8:15 p.m.

AN IMPORTANT ADDITION has been made to the music department at Dartmouth College, Hanover, N.H.

The two-year-old Concord String Quartet will begin a three-year residency at Dartmouth, beginning in July. Members are Mark Sokol, Andrew Jennings, John Kochanowski and Norman Fischer.

They will spend 20 out of 40 weeks teaching weeks of the academic year at Dartmouth. These include five weeks during the summer of 1974 and the entire summer terms in 1975 and 1976.

During these "in-residence" periods, the quartet's services will include the teaching of courses, lectures, demonstrations, instrumental lessons to Dartmouth students, and participation in the Hopkins Center's "interaction" program for the schools of New Hampshire and Vermont.

The year of its founding, the Concord Quartet received the Naumberg Chamber Music Award and a commissioning award from the Fromm Foundation at Harvard. It performed 120 concerts in its first season.

THE RHODE ISLAND international grand pianist competition attracted 22 candidates of which eight will compete as finalists at the University of Kingston, Feb. 20-23.

Sponsor is the Rhode Island Arts Council.

Finalists are students or alumni of the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia, Juilliard School, Peabody Conservatory, Temple University College of Music in Philadelphia, and National Conservatory in Mexico City.

First prize winner will receive $4,000 and an appearance with the Warsaw Philharmonic in Providence, Feb. 24 and 25. Other prizes range from $2,000 to $250.

THE RECENTLY ANNOUNCED appointment of Carolyn Plummer as violin instructor at Worcester Community School of the Performing Arts has been cancelled. She will accept a position with the Houston Symphony.

Her replacement is Freeddy Ortiz of Bolivia, who has performed with the Costa Rica and Bolivian Symphonies, and is presently a member of the Apple Hill Center chamber ensemble in New Hampshire.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169

NOV 22 1973

Boston Symphony Players at Albany

5754

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players, composed of principal players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will perform works including Beethoven's " Sonata for horn and piano, Opus 17" at Albany State University Dec.2 at 3 p.m.

Other selections scheduled for the concert, to be held in the o Main Theater f the Performing Arts Center, will include Piston's "Quintet for wind instruments," Saint-Saens' "Caprice on Danish and Russian airs, Opus 79" and the well known "Quintet in E flat for piano and winds, K.452" of Mozart.

The Walter Piston selection is being performed specially in celebration of the composer's 80th birthday in January.

The 12-member ensemble has given over 200 concerts throughout Europe and the USSR as well as the U.S. Now recording for Deutsche Grammophon, their first RCA recording won a Grammy Award.

The ensemble's wind players will be performing in the Albany concert. The players include Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Harold Wright, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; Charles Kavaloski, fech horn; and guest artists Gilbert Kalish,piano.

The con cert is being sponsored by usicouncil and funded by the Student Association of the university.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
W. 24,500

MAR 28 1974 New England Newsclip

BSO Chamber Players Perform Riesman Work

Michael Riesman is a tall, lean young man with hair reaching down to his shoulders in good Elizabethean style, but the music he writes comes right out of the mid-twentieth century. In Sanders Theater last Sunday afternoon he conducted Boston Symphony Chamber Players in his Chamber Concerto (1969), a three-part work for eleven instrumentalists.

The three parts, played without pause, are marked slow but uneasy; fast and furious, with a breathing space in the middle; and cool. The first portion, a somber mood piece, is seemingly descendent from the pointillism of Webern and his followers. Then comes a rousing, exciting middle episode full of stark Sravinskian rhythms and violent instrumental onslaught, but very much original in conception. Finally, the cool element reflects touches of jazz and closes on a quiet set of tones left suspended in mid-air as it were.

Essentially this is vigorous music of scant emotional appeal, yet easy to listen to and not without an attraction of its own. The composer conducted it with precise, angular beat accenting the dominance of his concerto's rhythmic structure. It was a pleasant diversion between Mozart's Trio in B-flat for violin, cello, and piano, K. 502 and the Beethoven Septet in E-flat, though it might have benefited from a doubling of the strings.

The principal musical pleasure of the afternoon was clearly the Mozart Trio stunningly performed by Joseph Silverstein and Jules Eskin with guest artist Robert Levin. In every way this was superb music making. Levin is a buoyant pianist who makes a specialty of Mozart. His playing carried the performance along with zest and charm in the lively outer movements, and poignance and profundity in the middle larghetto. Though he dominated the playing, it was nevertheless excellent ensemble work at all times, setting a standard not easy to match.

For some reason, the E-flat Septet is not one of Beethoven's more commanding works. A product of his early period — it was written between the opus 18 quartets and the first symphony — it still hasn't broken away from the influences of Haydn and Mozart and though its scherzo in some ways anticipates Mendelssohn, it is not very compelling music. Beethoven could have done better, and did. The performance was excellent, laying bare some of the music's shortcomings. Could Beethoven have been guilty of a potboiler? This comes uncomfortably close.

ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL
D. 17,500

APR 23 1974

Boston Symphony Sets Cornell Performance

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Seiji Ozawa, will perform works of Haydn and Mahler in the final concert of this year's Bailey Hall Concert Series at 8:15 p.m. Friday at Cornell Univerity.

Featured soloist on the program will be Ralph Gomberg, obe; Sherman Walt, bassoon; Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Jules Eskin, cello.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, considered one of the world's primary symphonic ensembles, performs 210 concerts a year and has sold more than 35 million records worldwide since 1917.

Ozawa became the orchestra's 15th music director in the fall of 1973. He is music director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra as well the Boston Symphony. Born in Hoten, Manchuria, 38 years ago, he is a former music director of the Toronto Symphony and the Japan Philharmonic and was assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic.

He has appeared as guest conductor of principal orchestras throughout the world, including the London and Vienna Symphonies, the Concertgebouw, the Berlin Philharmonic, L'Orchestre de Paris, and the Orchestras of Cleveland, Pittsburgh and Philadelphia.

SEIJI OZAWA

Tickets are available at the Lincoln Hall ticket office or at the door.

Free campus bus service to and from the concert will begin at 7:30 p.m. from Parking Lot B and the Dairy Bar.

p.51

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
S. 109,936

JAN 27 1974

New England Newsclip

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players.

Chamber Group Will Play at Clark

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

A musical event of major interest will be the concert by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players on Clark University's Fine Arts series in Atwood Hall, at 8:15 p.m., Sunday, Feb. 10.

The 12-member group's last area appearance was in May, 1972, at Weston Auditorium, Fitchburg State College, in a benefit concert to send a young music student to study for the summer at the Berkshire Center, Tanglewood.

All are first-desk players with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

They are Joseph Silverstein, violin (concert master of the Boston Symphony); Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, cello; Henry Portnoi, string bass; Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe.

Also, Harold Wright, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; Charles Kavalovski, horn; Armando Ghitalle, trumpet; William Gibson, trombone; and Everett First, timpani.

Their Clark program is Beethoven's String Trio in G major, Opus 9, No. 1; Walter Piston's Quintet for Woodwinds (1956); and Stravinsky's concert suite, "L'Histoire du Soldat."

Composer's Birthday

The Piston Suite is being played to commemorate the composer's 80th birthday last month.

Music
Raymond Morin

Boston Symphony's Chamber Players are more flexible than a single ensemble with a fixed number of performers. They take advantage of their special situation to draw upon the wide variety of instrumental combinations available among the orchestra's principal players.

Their concerts are arranged as time permits within the Boston Symphony's yearly schedule. The group has toured the United States, and in 1967 traveled to England, the Soviet Union and West Germany under the auspices of the United States Department of State's Cultural Presentations Office.

In addition to public concerts, the Chamber Players frequently conduct master classes or clinics at universities where they appear. Such will not be the case at Clark.

The Clark Series is attended by a substantial number of season ticket holders.

Individual tickets will be available from 1 to 4 p.m., Friday, Feb. 8 in the Clark University mailrooms in Estabrook Hall.

They are priced at $4 for adults; $3 for all outside students; and $2 for Clark undergraduates only.

If any tickets remain, they will be on sale at the box-office the night of the concert, but not after 8:15 p.m.

AN IMPORTANT ADDITION has been made to the music department at Dartmouth College, Hanover, N.H.

The two-year-old Concord String Quartet will begin a three-year residency at Dartmouth, beginning in July. Members are Mark Sokol, Andrew Jennings, John Kochanowski and Norman Fischer.

They will spend 20 out of 40 weeks teaching weeks of the academic year at Dartmouth. These include five weeks during the summer of 1974 and the entire summer terms in 1975 and 1976.

During these "in-residence" periods, the quartet's services will include the teaching of courses, lectures, demonstrations, instrumental lessons to Dartmouth students, and participation in the Hopkins Center's "interaction" program for the schools of New Hampshire and Vermont.

The year of its founding, the Concord Quartet received the Naumberg Chamber Music Award and a commissioning award from the Fromm Foundation at Harvard. It performed 120 concerts in its first season.

THE RHODE ISLAND international grand pianist competition attracted 22 candidates of which eight will compete as finalists at the University of Kingston, Feb. 20-23.

Sponsor is the Rhode Island Arts Council.

Finalists are students or alumni of the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia, Juilliard School, Peabody Conservatory, Temple University College of Music in Philadelphia, and National Conservatory in Mexico City.

First prize winner will receive $4,000 and an appearance with the Warsaw Philharmonic in Providence, Feb. 24 and 25. Other prizes range from $2,000 to $250.

THE RECENTLY ANNOUNCED appointment of Carolyn Plummer as violin instructor at Worcester Community School of the Performing Arts has been cancelled. She will accept a position with the Houston Symphony.

Her replacement is Freeddy Ortiz of Bolivia, who has performed with the Costa Rica and Bolivian Symphonies, and is presently a member of the Apple Hill Center chamber ensemble in New Hampshire.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169

NOV 22 1973

Boston Symphony Players at Albany

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players, composed of principal players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will perform works including Beethoven's " Sonata for horn and piano, Opus 17" at Albany State University Dec.2 at 3 p.m.

Other selections scheduled for the concert, to be held in the o Main Theater f the Performing Arts Center, will include Piston's "Quintet for wind instruments," Saint-Saens' "Caprice on Danish and Russian airs, Opus 79" and the well known "Quintet in E flat for piano and winds, K.452" of Mozart.

The Walter Piston selection is being performed specially in celebration of the composer's 80th birthday in January.

The 12-member ensemble has given over 200 concerts throughout Europe and the USSR as well as the U.S. Now recording for Deutsche Grammophon, their first RCA recording won a Grammy Award.

The ensemble's wind players will be performing in the Albany concert. The players include Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Harold Wright, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; Clharles Kavaloski, fech horn; and guest artists Gilbert Kalish,piano.

The con cert is being sponsored by usicouncil and funded by the Student Association of the university.

BOSTON ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.

MAR 28 1974

New England Newsclip

BSO Chamber Players Perform Riesman Work

Michael Riesman is a tall, lean young man with hair reaching down to his shoulders in good Elizabethean style, but the music he writes comes right out of the mid-twentieth century. In Sanders Theater last Sunday afternoon he conducted Boston Symphony Chamber Players in his Chamber Concerto (1969), a three-part work for eleven instrumentalists.

The three parts, played without pause, are marked slow but uneasy; fast and furious, with a breathing space in the middle; and cool. The first portion, a somber mood piece, is seemingly descendent from the pointillism of Webern and his followers. Then comes a rousing, exciting middle episode full of stark Sravinskian rhythms and violent instrumental onslaught, but very much original in conception. Finally, the cool element reflects touches of jazz and closes on a quiet set of tones left suspended in mid-air as it were.

Essentially this is vigorous music of scant emotional appeal, yet easy to listen to and not without an attraction of its own. The composer conducted it with precise, angular beat accenting the dominance of his concerto's rhythmic structure. It was a pleasant diversion between Mozart's Trio in B-flat for violin, cello, and piano, K. 502 and the Beethoven Septet in E-flat, though it might have benefited from a doubling of the strings.

The principal musical pleasure of the afternoon was clearly the Mozart Trio stunningly performed by Joseph Silverstein and Jules Eskin with guest artist Robert Levin. In every way this was superb music making. Levin is a buoyant pianist who makes a specialty of Mozart. His playing carried the performance along with zest and charm in the lively outer movements, and poignance and profundity in the middle larghetto. Though he dominated the playing, it was nevertheless excellent ensemble work at all times, setting a standard not easy to match.

For some reason, the E-flat Septet is not one of Beethoven's more commanding works. A product of his early period — it was written between the opus 18 quartets and the first symphony — it still hasn't broken away from the influences of Haydn and Mozart and though its scherzo in some ways anticipates Mendelssohn, it is not very compelling music. Beethoven could have done better, and did. The performance was excellent, laying bare some of the music's shortcomings. Could Beethoven have been guilty of a potboiler? This comes uncomfortably close.

ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL
D. 27,555

APR 23 1974

Boston Symphony Sets Cornell Performance

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Seiji Ozawa, will perform works of Haydn and Mahler in the final concert of this year's Bailey Hall Concert Series at 8:15 p.m. Friday at Cornell Univerity.

Featured soloist on the program will be Ralph Gomberg, obe; Sherman Walt, bassoon; Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Jules Eskin, cello.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, considered one of the world's primary symphonic ensembles, performs 210 concerts a year and has sold more than 35 million records worldwide since 1917.

Ozawa became the orchestra's 15th music director in the fall of 1973. He is music director of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra as well the Boston Symphony. Born in Hoten, Manchuria, 38 years ago, he is a former music director of the Toronto Symphony and the Japan Philharmonic and was assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic.

He has appeared as guest conductor of principal orchestras throughout the world, including the London and Vienna Symphonies, the Concertgebouw, the Berlin Philharmonic, L'Orchestre de Paris, and the Orchestras of Cleveland, Pittsburgh and Philadelphia.

SEIJI OZAWA

Tickets are available at the Lincoln Hall ticket office or at the door.

Free campus bus service to and from the concert will begin at 7:30 p.m. from Parking Lot B and the Dairy Bar.

P.52

THE POST-STANDARD
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
D. 92,652

APR 26 1974

Orchestra, Conductor Show Their Greatness

By HARWOOD SIMMONS

The venerable and great Boston Symphony, conducted by the youthful and equally great Seiji Ozawa, presented by Famous Artists Series last night in Loew's State Theater.

Gustav Mahler devotees were rewarded by a meticulous and emotionally packed interpretation of his First Symphony (the "Titan").

Occupying the major part of the program, this intensely personal and programmatically complex work offered Ozawa abundant opportunity to inject an equally personal rational. The result was a puzzling but at the same time enlightening explication of Mahler and his fundamentally serie outpourings—the epitome of everything we mean by romanticism in music.

The First Symphony is deeply concerned with man's soul in its relation to the world of nature. To express all that in music without words is a large order but Mahler comes about as near to success as anyone.

Ozawa never allowed details to obscure broader outlines. His feeling for superlatives matched those of Mahler both on the side of tenderness and emotional outbursts.

His conducting technique was rather florid but never flamboyant. Tempos were firm but not rigid. He was authoritative but not domineering. In short, he was in complete command at every turn without in any way suppressing the wonderfully sympathetic and flexible artistry of the orchestra personnel.

Demonstrations of remarkable solo ability occurred throughout the Mahler in the many importane passages assigned to single instruments; but the greatest solo work took place in the concert's opener, "Sinfonia Concertante in B-flat for Oboe, Bassoon, Violin & Cello," Op. 84, by Haydn.

In the concerto grosso tradition, a quartet of soloists was pitted against, and mingled with, a classic orchestra of strings, flute, two oboes, bassoon, two horns, two trumpets and timpani.

The 1792 masterpiece, written at the peak of Haydn's career, combines his marvelous gifts as a chamber music composer with his equally splendid powers as a symphonist.

It was an apt program choice, especially since the Boston Symphony's featured artists are among the most widely known members of the orchestra, i.e. concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, first cellist Jules Eskin, principal oboeist Ralph Gomberg and principal bassoonist Sherman Walt.

They participated in a perfectly balanced and stunning interpretation under Ozawa's deft guidance.

From Haydn to Mahler was quite an emotional jump but the evening's two offerings, in the hands of a superb conductor, made ideal listening.

Rochester Times-Union
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
D. 145,808

APR 29 1974

Full House for a Great Orchestra

Boston Symphony Stirs Excitement

By GEORGE H. KIMBALL

It is possible in 1974 for a symphony orchestra concert to attract a capacity audience to the 3,000-seat Eastman Theater, but apparently only for such as the Boston Symphony. It happened Saturday night.

The Boston, with its new (this season) music director, Seiji Ozawa, conducting, presented a program that was scarcely adventurous but apparently just what the listeners wanted. The first two works were concert tarities — Haydn's Symphony No. 1 in D and Arnold Schoenberg's "Transfigured Night," Opus 4.

The remaining work was an old concert standby, fortunately not played here recently — Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 in B minor, Opus 74, the 'Pathetique."

Throughout the evening it was apparent that the Boston remains one of the great symphony orchestras; whether it rates as highly as it did in its heyday under Serge Koussevitzky is another matter. (More on Koussevitzky later in this report.)

The Haydn Symphony No. 1, for all its built-in charm and the efficiency with which it was performed, emerged a rather chily item, thawing just perceptibly in the middle (Andante) movement.

But warmth, even hot-blooded passion was soon to be produced in Schoenberg's "Verklarte Nacht," a string sextet arranged by the composer for string orchestra. Ozawa and the Boston Symphony proved that they possess not only the combination to its formidable technical problems but the key to its emotional content as well.

Based on a poem about sin forgiven through true love, the music is romantic, pretwelve-tone Schoenberg, strong in a Wagnerian kind of emotional expression and full of sonorous beauty, fully summoning the allure of string-ensemble timbres.

One of the main technical problems for the players is keeping the high notes, particularly in the violins, in tune. The Boston strings managed this admirably; the one or two observable slip-ups merely served to reassure one that these musicians are humans, not machines.

Another outpouring of romantic sentiment, this time steeped in tragedy, was the "Pathetique." And here again Ozawa was the master of demonstrative but controlled emotion.

Some observers have opined that the Tchaikovsky Sixth is essentially two expressive movements separated by two inconsequential ones. Ozawa made one aware of the error of that surmise, for both of the inner movements came alive with pertinently contrasted feeling, the Allegro con grazia projected restlessness and melancholy beneath its surface pleasantries, the march-like Allegro molto vivace developing an ominously frantic pace that led most appropriately into the anguished sobs and sighs of the finale.

IF THE BOSTON orchestra fell short of its Koussevitzky days (1924-1949), then Harold Meek had to be right. The former Boston Symphony French hornist under the maestro asserted that Koussevitzky was "a great interpretive artist the like of which we haven't seen since," one who "made the orchestra greater than the sum of its parts."

Meek was one of a panel of distinguished musicians gathered in Kilbourn Hall Saturday afternoon in an Eastman School of Music event honoring the memory of Koussevitzky in his 100th anniversary year. (He was born July 26, 1874, died in 1951.)

Led by Howard Hanson, noted composer and, for 40 years, director of Eastman School, the panel also included Samuel Adler of the school composition department, Richard Bales, director of the National Gallery Orchestra; Richard Burgin, Koussevitzky's concertmaster; Henry Freeman, former principal bassist in the Boston and father of present Eastman School director Robert Freeman; Fernand Gillet, former Boston first oboist; and Willis Page, Jacksonville (Fla.) Symphony conductor and a former double bass player in the Boston.

All had known Koussevitzky and each reminisced on his experiences with the maestro.

In the audience was Mrs. Olga Koussevitzky, widow of the great conductor.

Preceding the panel, Eastman's Musica Novan Ensemble, conducted by Sydney Hodkinson, performed two works commissioned by the Koussevitzky Foundation (Wallingford Riegger's Concerto for piano and woodwind quintet and George Crumb's "Madrigals" Book I) and a chamber orchestra work, Aaron Copland's "Music for the Theatre" which Koussevitzky had premiered. Mezzo-soprano Jan DeGaetani was the soloist in the Crumb work.

Chamber Orchestra Features Two Soloists

The Rochester Chamber Orchestra, David Fetler conducting, presented its final concert of the season yesterday afternoon in Nazareth College Arts Center.

A featured soloist was Ronald Leonard, who displayed towering cello virtuoso capability, as well as biting verve, in Hindemith's concerto "Kammermusik No. 3," then both lyrical charm and more musical fireworks in Weber's Adagio and Rondo.

Another soloist was the orchestra's first flutist, John Thomas, in Vivaldi's Piccolo Concerto in C, a delightful showcase for the artist's considerable dexterity. He encored with his own Satie-like "A Walk with Christie." Leonard's encore was an unaccompanied Bach Bouree.—G.H.K.

The Herald Statesman
YONKERS, N.Y.
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
D. 49,614

MAR 17 1974

Boston Symphony a success

By LOU CEVETILLO
WRN Music Writer

WHITE PLAINS—

Iona College's Institute for the Arts, New Rochelle's provider of top-rate musical entertainment for Westchester, went north Tuesday evening and presented the Boston Symphony at the County Center. This was an experimental venture according to Bro. Darby Ruane, institute director. His ultimate plan is to sponsor a series of "Great Orchestras Concerts" featuring such outstanding symphonies as the Leningrad, Paris, Cleveland and Chicago orchestras.

If Tuesday evening is any indication of the potential response to such offerings, Bro. Ruane and the institute have another hit series on their hands.

THE BOSTON Symphony, under the energetic baton of Seiji Ozawa, gave fine readings of a somewhat disappointing program. It is rare that Westchester is visited by such a fine symphony orchestra, known for its full blown orchestral gems. Tuesday Ozawa offered the audience a limited version of his mighty sound by scheduling two classical chamber works that utilized only a partial orchestra.

The program opened with Haydn's Sinfonia Concertante in B flat for Oboe, Bassoon, Violin and Cello Op. 84. This three-movement work, although a masterpiece of Haydn's late London years, is nothing more than a showcase for four of the first chairs of an orchestra. Ralph Gomberg, oboe, Sherman Walt, bassoon, Jules Eskin, cello and Joseph Silverstein, violin and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, all gave polished performances with special kudos going to Eskin's cello for resonant beauty.

Unfortunately, Ozawa does not have the stylistic grasp of this idiom as he does in the later periods of musical development. His conducting of the Haydn work was more studied than inspirational, leaving the listener untouched by the proceedings.

Mozart's Piano Concerto in A Major K. 488, featuring the keyboard genius of Maurizio Pollini, fared much better in its overall effect. The second movement, "Adagio," of this three-movement work offered the best of Pollini with its liquid rushing of continuous sound. His playing was sensitive with the ominous air or mounting pathos.

POLLINI'S Mozart is not the frothy frivolity of so many interpreters. He creates an air of musical sincerity that touches the core of the listeners' consciousness.

Neither work, however, made the grade in the large recesses of the County Center. Most of the subtle intricacies were lost in the vastness of this hall.

Ozawa and the orchestra redeemed themselves with a superlative performance of Maurice Ravel's "Rapsodie espagnole." This largely impressionistic piece is a showy canvas of some of the most colorful orchestra effects offered by Ravel. The fourth movement, "Feria," incited the audience with its Spanish rhythms no less than a well executed "Veronica" in the bullring. Ravel's "Alborada del gracio- pressionistic view of a Vien- pressionistic view of a Viennese dance hall, continued to thrill the audience with its dramatic effects.

THE POST-STANDARD
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
D. 92,652
APR 26 1974

Orchestra, Conductor Show Their Greatness

By HARWOOD SIMMONS

The venerable and great Boston Symphony, conducted by the youthful and equally great Seiji Ozawa, was presented by Famous Artists Series last night in Loew's State Theater.

Gustav Mahler devotees were rewarded by a meticulous and emotionally packed interpretation of his First Symphony (the "Titan").

Occupying the major part of the program, this intensely personal and programmatically complex work offered Ozawa abundant opportunity to inject an equally personal rational. The result was a puzzling but at the same time enlightening explication of Mahler and his fundamentally serie outpourings—the epitome of everything we mean by romanticism in music.

The First Symphony is deeply concerned with man's soul in its relation to the world of nature. To express all that in music without words is a large order but Mahler comes about as near to success as anyone.

Ozawa never allowed details to obscure broader outlines. His feeling for superlatives matched those of Mahler both on the side of tenderness and emotional outbursts.

His conducting technique was rather florid but never flamboyant. Tempos were firm but not rigid. He was authoritative but not domineering. In short, he was in complete command at every turn without in any way suppressing the wonderfully sympathetic and flexible artistry of the orchestra personnel.

Demonstrations of remarkable solo ability occurred throughout the Mahler in the many importane passages assigned to single instruments; but the greatest solo work took place in the concert's opener, "Sinfonia Concertante in B-flat for Oboe, Bassoon, Violin & Cello," Op. 84, by Haydn.

In the concerto grosso tradition, a quartet of soloists was pitted against, and mingled with, a classic orchestra of strings, flute, two oboes, bassoon, two horns, two trumpets and timpani.

The 1792 masterpiece, written at the peak of Haydn's career, combines his marvelous gifts as a chamber music composer with his equally splendid powers as a symphonist.

It was an apt program choice, especially since the Boston Symphony's featured artists are among the most widely known members of the orchestra, i.e. concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, first cellist Jules Eskin, principal oboeist Ralph Gomberg and principal bassoonist Sherman Walt.

They participated in a perfectly balanced and stunning interpretation under Ozawa's deft guidance.

From Haydn to Mahler was quite an emotional jump but the evening's two offerings, in the hands of a superb conductor, made ideal listening.

Rochester Times-Union
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
D. 145,808
APR 29 1974

Full House for a Great Orchestra

Boston Symphony Stirs Excitement

By GEORGE H. KIMBALL

It is possible in 1974 for a symphony orchestra concert to attract a capacity audience to the 3,000-seat Eastman Theater, but apparently only for such as the Boston Symphony. It happened Saturday night.

The Boston, with its new (this season) music director, Seiji Ozawa, conducting, presented a program that was scarcely adventurous but apparently just what the listeners wanted. The first two works were concert tarities — Haydn's Symphony No. 1 in D and Arnold Schoenberg's "Transfigured Night," Opus 4.

The remaining work was an old concert standby, fortunately not played here recently — Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 in B minor, Opus 74, the 'Pathetique."

Throughout the evening it was apparent that the Boston remains one of the great symphony orchestras; whether it rates as highly as it did in its heyday under Serge Koussevitzky is another matter. (More on Koussevitzky later in this report.)

The Haydn Symphony No. 1, for all its built-in charm and the efficiency with which it was performed, emerged a rather chily item, thawing just perceptibly in the middle (Andante) movement.

But warmth, even hot-blooded passion was soon to be produced in Schoenberg's "Verklarte Nacht," a string sextet arranged by the composer for string orchestra. Ozawa and the Boston Symphony proved that they possess not only the combination to its formidable technical problems but the key to its emotional content as well.

Based on a poem about sin forgiven through true love, the music is romantic, pretwelve-tone Schoenberg, strong in a Wagnerian kind of emotional expression and full of sonorous beauty, fully summoning the allure of string-ensemble timbres.

One of the main technical problems for the players is keeping the high notes, particularly in the violins, in tune. The Boston strings managed this admirably; the one or two observable slip-ups merely served to reassure one that these musicians are humans, not machines.

Another outpouring of romantic sentiment, this time steeped in tragedy, was the "Pathetique." And here again Ozawa was the master of demonstrative but controlled emotion.

Some observers have opined that the Tchaikovsky Sixth is essentially two expressive movements separated by two inconsequential ones. Ozawa made one aware of the error of that surmise, for both of the inner movements came alive with pertinently contrasted feeling, the Allegro con grazia projected restlessness and melancholy beneath its surface pleasantries, the march-like Allegro molto vivace developing an ominously frantic pace that led most appropriately into the anguished sobs and sighs of the finale.

IF THE BOSTON orchestra felt short of its Koussevitzky days (1924-1949), then Harold Meek had to be right. The former Boston Symphony French hornist under the maestro asserted that Koussevitzky was "a great interpretive artist the like of which we haven't seen since," one who "made the orchestra greater than the sum of its parts."

Meek was one of a panel of distinguished musicians gathered in Kilbourn Hall Saturday afternoon in an Eastman School of Music event honoring the memory of Koussevitzky in his 100th anniversary year. (He was born July 26, 1874, died in 1951.)

Led by Howard Hanson, noted composer and, for 40 years, director of Eastman School, the panel also included Samuel Adler of the school composition department, Richard Bales, director of the National Gallery Orchestra; Richard Burgin, Koussevitzky's concertmaster; Henry Freeman, former principal bassist in the Boston and father of present Eastman School director Robert Freeman; Fernand Gillet, former Boston first oboist; and Willis Page, Jacksonville (Fla.) Symphony conductor and a former double bass player in the Boston.

All had known Koussevitzky and each reminisced on his experiences with the maestro. In the audience was Mrs. Olga Koussevitzky, widow of the great conductor.

Preceding the panel, Eastman's Musica Novan Ensemble, conducted by Sydney Hodkinson, performed two works commissioned by the Koussevitzky Foundation (Wallingford Riegger's Concerto for piano and woodwind quintet and George Crumb's "Madrigals" Book I) and a chamber orchestra work, Aaron Copland's "Music for the Theatre" which Koussevitzky had premiered. Mezzo-soprano Jan DeGaetani was the soloist in the Crumb work.

Chamber Orchestra Features Two Soloists

The Rochester Chamber Orchestra, David Fetler conducting, presented its final concert of the season yesterday afternoon in Nazareth College Arts Center.

A featured soloist was Ronald Leonard, who displayed towering cello virtuoso capability, as well as biting verve, in Hindemith's concerto "Kammermusik No. 3," then both lyrical charm and more musical fireworks in Weber's Adagio and Rondo.

Another soloist was the orchestra's first flutist, John Thomas, in Vivaldi's Piccolo Concerto in C, a delightful showcase for the artist's considerable dexterity. He encored with his own Satie-like "A Walk with Christie." Leonard's encore was an unaccompanied Bach Bouree.—G.H.K.

The Herald Statesman
YONKERS, N.Y.
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
D. 49,614
MAR 17 1974

Boston Symphony a success

By LOU CEVETILLO
WRN Music Writer

WHITE PLAINS—

Iona College's Institute for the Arts, New Rochelle's provider of top-rate musical entertainment for Westchester, went north Tuesday evening and presented the Boston Symphony at the County Center. This was an experimental venture according to Bro. Darby Ruane, institute director. His ultimate plan is to sponsor a series of "Great Orchestras Concerts" featuring such outstanding symphonies as the Leningrad, Paris, Cleveland and Chicago orchestras.

If Tuesday evening is any indication of the potential response to such offerings, Bro. Ruane and the institute have another hit series on their hands.

THE BOSTON Symphony, under the energetic baton of Seiji Ozawa, gave fine readings of a somewhat disappointing program. It is rare that Westchester is visited by such a fine symphony orchestra, known for its full blown orchestral gems. Tuesday Ozawa offered the audience a limited version of his mighty sound by scheduling two classical chamber works that utilized only a partial orchestra.

The program opened with Haydn's Sinfonia Concertante in B flat for Oboe, Bassoon, Violin and Cello Op. 84. This three-movement work, although a masterpiece of Haydn's late London years, is nothing more than a showcase for four of the first chairs of an orchestra. Ralph Gomberg, oboe, Sherman Walt, bassoon, Jules Eskin, cello and Joseph Silverstein, violin and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, all gave polished performances with special kudos going to Eskin's cello for resonant beauty.

Unfortunately, Ozawa does not have the stylistic grasp of this idiom as he does in the later periods of musical development. His conducting of the Haydn work was more studied than inspirational, leaving the listener untouched by the proceedings.

Mozart's Piano Concerto in A Major K. 488, featuring the keyboard genius of Maurizio Pollini, fared much better in its overall effect. The second movement, "Adagio," of this three-movement work offered the best of Pollini with its liquid rushing of continuous sound. His playing was sensitive with the ominous air or mounting pathos.

POLLINI'S Mozart is not the frothy frivolity of so many interpreters. He creates an air of musical sincerity that touches the core of the listeners' consciousness.

Neither work, however, made the grade in the large recesses of the County Center. Most of the subtle intricacies were lost in the vastness of this hall.

Ozawa and the orchestra redeemed themselves with a superlative performance of Maurice Ravel's "Rapsodie espagnole." This largely impressionistic piece is a showy canvas of some of the most colorful orchestra effects offered by Ravel. The fourth movement, "Feria," incited the audience with its Spanish rhythms no less than a well executed "Veronica" in the bullring. Ravel's "Alborada del gracio- pressionistic view of a Vien- pressionistic view of a Viennese dance hall, continued to thrill the audience with its dramatic effects.

p.53

ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL
D. 17,500

APR 27 1974

Music

Boston Symphony
Bailey Hall

Friday night the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented a program slightly abridged from the announced one. It is rare enough that an orchestra of this caliber comes to Ithaca, and it is a shame that the Schoonberg piece was not performed. The crowd was almost widlly appreciative at the end of the concert and there were many cries for en encore, but Seiji Ozawa did not expand on the program.

The first piece was a Sinfonia Concertanta in B flat for oboe, bassoon, violin, and cello (Op. 84), by Haydn, with Ralph Gomberg, oboe, Sherman Walt, bassoon, Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Jules Eskin, cello. These four instruments play roughly the role of the solo instruments in a concerto. Haydn sometimes contrasted one of the instruments, sometimes some combination or all of the, with the orchestra.

The orchestra's rendition was very sharp and bright; the string tone and attack were clear and precise. Ozawa kept the rhythms crisp and regular, except for some effective, short ritardandos. He allowed himself more scope in his interpretation of the dynnamics — all the time, however, keeping very successful control over the balance between the soloists and the ensemble.

The solos and concertino sectons are graceful and ingenious. This form lacks the dramatic appeal of a concerto with a single soloist standing over and against the orchestra; and, on the other hand, is committed to a more diffuse dialogue between the concertino and the orchestra than are symphonies of the classical period. Nevertheless, witth the sensitive playing of the soloists — especially Silverstein, who was given the most material to deal with — and with the alert interpretation of Ozawa, who kept tight rein on the piece's movement without demanding more drama from it than it could sustain, it was a very satisfying performance.

The second piece presented was Mahler's Symphony No. 1 in D, including the original "Blumine" second movement, which was included in the original versions but suppressed later on. This movement turned out to be a gently ironic, seductively beautiful Andante. Mahler used many classical techniques and styles, but used them with complete self-awarness — and besides, was capable of writing very lovely obsolete music.

Different shades of irony pervade the piece and its great range of effects and textures. This irony ranges from the horn fanfares over ethereal harmonics in the first movement, to the sardonic fourth movement — a funeral march based on "Free Jacques. alternting with an "affirmation of life." section consisting of tawdry folk dances. Neither of these is as appealing as are the corresponding sentimental parts in the first two movements; and they also lack for the most part the good natured energy of the third movement, which is what lends it much of its appeal.

After this low point, the fifth movement steps in to apotheosize things; and although parts of the first movement crop up and re trated with even more irony than at their first appearance, the piece ends with a much less irony, and some powerful and original effects. Much of the music in this piece makes its point through allusion — to verious styles and techniques — but the closing bars, especially, of the final movement are clearly intended to stand on their own.

Ozawa was placed in the position of having to render ironic passages ina genuine manner; and it is to his credit that he read the moods and styles as they shifted and turned, with considerable sympathy and always let the material speak for itself. The orchestra's tone was not as sharp as during the Haydn; but it was a much bigger ensemble and inevitably would suffer in this direction by comparison, and the evening ended with a triumphant close — the brass choirs played brilliantly and rendering finale left nothing to be desired.

HENRY HIGULRA

The Observer-Dispatch
UTICA, N. Y.
D. 45,005 SUN. 58,143

APR 25 1974

Concert Creates Ozawa Fans

By JONAS KOVER

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Stanley Theater last night must have left a great many Seiji Ozawa fans in its wake.

The excitement of the 39-year-old conductor and the precision of the orchestra made the Great Artist Series program one of the best that has come to this area in a long time.

Ozawa, a lithe Oriental with a gaunt face, has that rare combination of musical feeling and podium dramatics which extracts strong essence from the orchestra.

Presenting a more of less standard concert program, a light Haydn symphony for an opener, followed by the heavier tones of Shoenberg's Verklarte Nacht and ending with the emotional Pathetique Symphony by Tchaikovsky, Ozawa overwhelmed the full house with interpretations that were far from standard.

Dressed in a white turtleneck and tails and with dark shoulder length hair, he led the orchestra with a regal aura, sometimes gracefully dancing or swaying to the music and at other times commanding with sharp, incisive gestures.

The orchestral sound was magnificent, with every nuance and timbre floating beautifully through the hall. The pert and pretty Haydn Symphony No. 1 introduced the audience to the orchestra, but it was only a shadow of what was to come.

While Ozawa displayed his fantastic abilities from the beginning, it was not until the final movements of the Pathetique that he let his full magic out through wand and being, transforming into a musical image that will long be remembered.

HIS DEFT HANDLING of Verklarte Nacht, a sextet arranged for stringed orchestra, brought out the romantic tones of despair, lonliness, fear and love in a vibrant massing of strings with startling fluidity and sureness. The orchestra played with enchanting passion, movement and strength.

Not only did Ozawa exert his influence over the orchestra, but, by the end of Verklarte Nacht, he had the audience holding its applause until he put down his baton, intently waiting for the last notes to dissipate.

The Pathetique began with less of an Ozawa presence than was felt before, but then the orchestra entered the shattering allegro molto vivace movement, surprising all with its rich, exciting textures given a fresh and lusty coat by Ozawa, who abruptly cut the short burst of applause to enter the passionate, melancholy finale, squeezing out the lamenting sounds almost as if he was enduring the agony.

And then the concert, which couldn't have been a more fitting dedication to the memory of Roland E. Chesley, was over. The audience gave conductor and orchestra a standing ovation, still basking in the warmth of the beautiful music.

MANAGER AND CONDUCTOR — Thomas Perry, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as he paused with conductor Seiji Ozawa at the Stanley Theater last night.

UTICA DAILY PRESS
UTICA, N. Y.
D. 28,782

APR 25 1974

SEIJI OZAWA

Photo by Steve Roach

Ozawa Delights Capacity Crowd

By JONAS KOVER

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in a shower of Ozawa power, overwhelmed the capacity Great Artist Series audience last night at the Stanley Theater with a display of superb and dramatic music.

Led by the spectacular and startling Seiji Ozawa, the orchestra played Haydn's Symphony No. 1 in D Major; "Verklarte Nacht" by Schoenberg and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique," Symphony No. 6.

Ozawa, with his thick shoulder length hair, and white turtleneck under his tails, has the capacity to extract every nuance from the music, and does so in an intense theatrical style which is magnificent to watch.

Opening with the lyrical, peppy, pretty Haydn symphony, the orchestra proved its exceptional musical ability on this h'or d'oerve before the entrees to follow.

"Verklarte Nacht" followed in its massive string dimensions with Ozawa exacting superb flowing transitions with the grace of a dancer. The amazing cohesion between the conductor and his orchestra was most evident in this dramatic piece full of gothic moments and strong, demanding sound.

The "Pathetique" finale was the most forceful and abundant work in the concert with a marvelous allegro molto vivace section full of fury and fresh, fiery overtones.

If one thought Ozawa was powerful before, it was here that he reached an emotional peak and was seen in full conducting glory. The adagio lamentoso finale found Ozawa pulling from himself and the orchestra a sadness like a tragic caravan crawling across the Russian Steppes. It was beautiful.

The performance was marvelous, and the audience showed its appreciation with a standing ovation.

P.53

ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL
D. 17,030

APR 27 1974

Music

Boston Symphony
Bailey Hall

Friday night the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented a program slightly abridged from the announced one. It is rare enough that an orchestra of this caliber comes to Ithaca, and it is a shame that the Schoonberg piece was not performed. The crowd was almost widlly appreciative at the end of the concert and there were many cries for en encore, but Seiji Ozawa did not expand on the program.

The first piece was a Sinfonia Concertanta in B flat for oboe, bassoon, violin, and cello (Op. 84), by Haydn, with Ralph Gomberg, oboe, Sherman Walt, bassoon, Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Jules Eskin, cello. These four instruments play roughly the role of the solo instruments in a concerto. Haydn sometimes contrasted one of the instruments, sometimes some combination or all of the, with the orchestra.

The orchestra's rendition was very sharp and bright; the string tone and attack were clear and precise. Ozawa kept the rhythms crisp and regular, except for some effective, short ritardandos. He allowed himself more scope in his interpretation of the dynnamics — all the time, however, keeping very successful control over the balance between the soloists and the ensemble.

The solos and concertino sectons are graceful and ingenious. This form lacks the dramatic appeal of a concerto with a single soloist standing over and against the orchestra; and, on the other hand, is committed to a more diffuse dialogue between the concertino and the orchestra than are symphonies of the classical period. Nevertheless, witth the sensitive playing of the soloists + especially Silverstein, who was given the most material to deal with — and with the alert interpretation of Ozawa, who kept tight rein on the piece's movement without demanding more drama from it than it could sustain, it was a very satisfying performance.

The second piece presented was Mahler's Symphony No. 1 in D, including the original "Blumine" second movement, which was included in the original versions but suppressed later on. This movement turned out to be a gently ironic, seductively beautiful Andante. Mahler used many classical techniques and styles, but used them with complete self-awarness — and besides, was capable of writing very lovely obsolete music.

Different shades of irony pervade the piece and its great range of effects and textures. This irony ranges from the horn fanfares over ethereal harmonics in the first movement, to the sardonic fourth movement — a funeral march based on "Free Jacques. alternting with an "affirmation of life." section consisting of tawdry folk dances. Neither of these is as appealing as are the corresponding sentimental parts in the first two movements; and they also lack for the most part the good natured energy of the third movement, which is what lends it much of its appeal.

After this low point, the fifth movement steps in to apotheosize things; and although parts of the first movement crop up and re trated with even more irony than at their first appearance, the piece ends with a much less irony, and some powerful and original effects. Much of the music in this piece makes its point through allusion — to verious styles and techniques — but the closing bars, especially, of the final movement are clearly intended to stand on their own.

Ozawa was placed in the position of having to render ironic passages ina genuine manner; and it is to his credit that he read the moods and styles as they shifted and turned, with considerable sympathy and always let the material speak for itself. The orchestra's tone was not as sharp as during the Haydn; but it was a much bigger ensemble and inevitably would suffer in this direction by comparison, and the evening ended with a triumphant close — the brass choirs played brilliantly and rendering finale left nothing to be desired.

HENRY HIGULRA

The Observer-Dispatch
UTICA, N. Y.
D. 45,005 SUN. 57,143

APR 25 1974

Concert Creates Ozawa Fans

By JONAS KOVER

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Stanley Theater last night must have left a great many Seiji Ozawa fans in its wake.

The excitement of the 39-year-old conductor and the precision of the orchestra made the Great Artist Series program one of the best that has come to this area in a long time.

Ozawa, a lithe Oriental with a gaunt face, has that rare combination of musical feeling and podium dramatics which extracts strong essence from the orchestra.

Presenting a more of less standard concert program, a light Haydn symphony for an opener, followed by the heavier tones of Shoenberg's Verklarte Nacht and ending with the emotional Pathetique Symphony by Tchaikovsky, Ozawa overwhelmed the full house with interpretations that were far from standard.

Dressed in a white turtleneck and tails and with dark shoulder length hair, he led the orchestra with a regal aura, sometimes gracefully dancing or swaying to the music and at other times commanding with sharp, incisive gestures.

The orchestral sound was magnificent, with every nuance and timbre floating beautifully through the hall. The pert and pretty Haydn Symphony No. 1 introduced the audience to the orchestra, but it was only a shadow of what was to come.

While Ozawa displayed his fantastic abilities from the beginning, it was not until the final movements of the Pathetique that he let his full magic out through wand and being, transforming into a musical image that will long be remembered.

HIS DEFT HANDLING of Verklarte Nacht, a sextet arranged for stringed orchestra, brought out the romantic tones of despair, lonliness, fear and love in a vibrant massing of strings with startling fluidity and sureness. The orchestra played with enchanting passion, movement and strength.

Not only did Ozawa exert his influence over the orchestra, but, by the end of Verklarte Nacht, he had the audience holding its applause until he put down his baton, intently waiting for the last notes to dissipate.

The Pathetique began with less of an Ozawa presence than was felt before, but then the orchestra entered the shattering allegro molto vivace movement, surprising all with its rich, exciting textures given a fresh and lusty coat by Ozawa, who abruptly cut the short burst of applause to enter the passionate, melancholy finale, squeezing out the lamenting sounds almost as if he was enduring the agony.

And then the concert, which couldn't have been a more fitting dedication to the memory of Roland E. Chesley, was over. The audience gave conductor and orchestra a standing ovation, still basking in the warmth of the beautiful music.

MANAGER AND CONDUCTOR — Thomas Perry, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as he paused with conductor Seiji Ozawa at the Stanley Theater last night.

UTICA DAILY PRESS
UTICA, N. Y.
D. 26,762

APR 25 1974

SEIJI OZAWA

Photo by Steve Roach

Ozawa Delights Capacity Crowd

By JONAS KOVER

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in a shower of Ozawa power, overwhelmed the capacity Great Artist Series audience last night at the Stanley Theater with a display of superb and dramatic music.

Led by the spectacular and startling Seiji Ozawa, the orchestra played Haydn's Symphony No. 1 in D Major; "Verklarte Nacht" by Schoenberg and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique," Symphony No. 6.

Ozawa, with his thick shoulder length hair, and white turtleneck under his tails, has the capacity to extract every nuance from the music, and does so in an intense theatrical style which is magnificent to watch.

Opening with the lyrical, peppy, pretty Haydn symphony, the orchestra proved its exceptional musical ability on this h'or d'oerve before the entrees to follow.

"Verklarte Nacht" followed in its massive string dimensions with Ozawa exacting superb flowing transitions with the grace of a dancer. The amazing cohesion between the conductor and his orchestra was most evident in this dramatic piece full of gothic moments and strong, demanding sound.

The "Pathetique" finale was the most forceful and abundant work in the concert with a marvelous allegro molto vivace section full of fury and fresh, fiery overtones.

If one thought Ozawa was powerful before, it was here that he reached an emotional peak and was seen in full conducting glory. The adagio lamentoso finale found Ozawa pulling from himself and the orchestra a sadness like a tragic caravan crawling across the Russian Steppes. It was beautiful.

The performance was marvelous, and the audience showed its appreciation with a standing ovation.

Democrat and Chronicle
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
D. 144,697 SUN. 221,661
APR 29 1974

54

nicle People

ROCHESTER, N.Y., MONDAY, APRIL 29, 1974

Television	5C
Theaters	4C
Deaths	5C
Want Ads	6-14C
Comics	15C

C

Turn before cutting, Back A Read

'Salute to Serge'

Koussevitsky music legend

By MICHAEL WALSH
D&C Staff Writer

The paths of the Eastman School of Music and the Boston Symphony Orchestra have crossed many times in the past, and they crossed again Saturday afternoon in Kilbourn Hall and Saturday night in the Eastman Theatre in a couple of ways.

The occasions were two: a special "Salute to Serge Koussevitsky," the late conductor of the Boston Symphony, and the performance of the BSO in the Eastman Theatre under conductor Seiji Ozawa, reviewed elsewhere on this page.

The Eastman School rounded up a panel of speakers in Kilbourn Hall, each to speak briefly about his relationship with Dr. Koussevitsky and to reminisce a little about the legendary Russian-born conductor who did so much to further the cause of American music during his long tenure as conductor of one of the country's finest orchestras. This year is the 100th anniversary of his birth. He died in 1951.

Dr. Howard Hanson chaired the panel, which also consisted of Sam Adler, head of the Eastman composition department; Richard Bales, Eastman graduate, now conductor of the National Gallery of Art orchestra in Washington, D.C.; Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the Boston orchestra under Koussevitsky; Henry Freeman, Eastman graduate, former principal bass of the BSO, father of Eastman school director Robert Freeman; Willis Page, a bassist in Boston under Koussevitsky, former conductor at the Eastman School and now the conductor of an orchestra in Florida; Fernand Gillet, former first oboe in Boston; and Harold Meek, former first horn in Boston. Koussevitsky's widow was in the audience.

Hanson, in his opening remarks, called the salute "a nostalgic time for me," asserting his "deep affection" for the late maestro. "Koussevitsky paid me the greatest compliment of my life," Hanson told the assemblage, "He said, 'American music began when you went to Rochester and I came to Boston." Koussevitsky performed many of Hanson's works with Boston.

Hanson called Koussevitsky "a superb artist, one of the world's greatest conductors. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has never regained the magnificence of its (days under Koussevitsky)." Older members of the audience could judge for themselves later that day.

Other members of the panel spoke of Koussevitsky's demanding standards at rehearsal. "For him, every rehearsal was a concert," said Willis Page. "Every single note we played as if we were playing solos. There was never one minute of boredom.

"No matter what the composition was, it was the greatest piece in the world when Koussevitsky was conducting it. Dr. Koussevitsky had more definitive performances of works than any other conductor before or since," said Page.

Richard Bales, who studied conducting with Koussevitsky at Tanglewood, Mass., in 1940, recalled how the maestro told him, "You must hypnotize the orchestra," when conducting.

"I don't know what he would have thought of today," Bales mused. "It's very different. It's great in some ways and frightening in others.

"But whatever happens, the role of Koussevitsky must not be forgotten."

Fernand Gillet, the renowned oboist, talked about Koussevitsky before he came to America. Gillet played with him in Paris, after the conductor had left Russia, and told an anecdote concerning Koussevitsky and the great French composer Maurice Ravel.

"One day we were rehearsing the 'Mother Goose' of Ravel and Ravel was in the audience. When we finished, Koussevitsky turned to him and asked him what he thought.

" 'It sounds very well, but it's not what I have written', Revel told him.

Please turn page

Boston Symphony's concert is success

By MICHAEL WALSH
D&C Staff Writer

In Review

The Boston Symphony came to town Saturday night with a well balanced, interesting program and, thanks to wise pacing by conductor Seiji Ozawa, the concert was a success.

In a program of Haydn's First Symphony, Arnold Schoenberg's "Verklaerte Nacht" and the Tchaikovsky Sixth Symphony, Ozawa resisted the temptation to turn his string players loose in the Schoenberg romantic tone poem, with the result that they had plenty left for the Tchaikovsky, enough to end the concert in stunning fashion.

Ozawa led off with a brisk, crisp rendition of the First Symphony of Franz Joseph Haydn. He handled the textures of the work admirably and the Boston players provided him with the kind of playing necessary to bring off his view of the piece.

The Schoenberg was the big work on the first half of the program, and Ozawa carried it off very successfully. He kept an intimate feel to the piece, which, after all, was written for string sextet, not a mammoth string orchestra. Ozawa remembered that, and did not try to make it sound much bigger than it is.

Those knee-jerkers for whom the very name of Schoenberg is as the red flag to the bull need not have any fears of "Verklaerte Nacht," written in 1899. It is in a super-Romantic (some would say decadent) tonal idiom that was soon to pass into a tonality and serialism, largely through the work of the same composer.

Audiences today have an instinctive fear of Schoenberg and the other "radicals," but by sneaking a piece like this onto his program, Ozawa probably helps

Please turn page

Serge Koussevitsky—tribute to maestro

54

Concert here is success

From 1C

the cause of other works of Schoenberg, Berg and Webern and increases their chances to make it into the standard repertoire some day. From Wagner to Webern is not such a very great distance.

Ozawa finished the evening with a slam-bang performance of the Tchaikovsky's Sixth, the "Pathetique." The virtuosity of the orchestra and Ozawa's fiery podium mannerisms seduced the audience into applauding after the first movement, after the third movement and of course after the last movement.

In truth, it was a fine performance, despite instrumental lapses here and there and an astoundingly flat brass chord during the course of the symphony.

The success of this concert — I mean the financial success, since the Eastman Theatre was packed — gives rise to some speculation: Obviously, there is an audience for fine concert music, because here they were — dowagers in mink stoles, young people, snazzily bedecked businessmen, ladies in plunging backless dresses. Will the Rochester Philharmonic be able to reach these people next season and get them downtown again? Or are Rochesterians only impressed by a big name orchestra, and hang the music?

One final remark: the doors along the right side of the Theatre, those that lead into the Eastman School of Music main hall, were locked with chains from the school side, both at intermission and apparently at the conclusion of the concert as well. Trying to squeeze 3,000 people out the remaining doors would be a tricky business in case of emergency.

Koussevitsky Music legend

Please turn page

" 'No, you're right', Koussevitsky said. 'It is better'."

Harold Meek summed up the general feeling about Koussevitsky in this way:

"He was a great, great interpretive artist — and I say this unequivocally — the likes of which we haven't seen since. He made the orchestra greater than the sum of its parts."

HITLER

From 1C

sniffing the breeze for enemies, and abruptly left the room.

During World War II many German homes had a "Feuhrer shrine" complete with candles and a picture of Hitler. Stories appeared in the German press about how Allied bombs had wrecked a house but left the wall bearing Hitler's picture still standing.

And in 1944, Nazi cabinet minister Robert Leya actually called for Hitler to be "raised to our altars" as a god.

Yes, however you interpret the words, Hitler was a black magician.

Older child biggest heartbreak they might apply to the older adoptive child, Dr. Simeonsson spoke of a child's withdrawal, "when a previous life environment has been very limited, where no one cared, there was no punishment, no praise — nothing there."

From 1C

He said that in some children it becomes evident that the only way to get attention is to be bad.

"We have to watch for these behaviors of the past and sometimes rearrange them, substituting a positive consequence."

Dr. Koret said that something else comes into dealing with an older child, as opposed to a baby.

"The older child doesn't need you to feed him, but what he looks for is a kind of acceptance. He may achieve in many areas—physical, social, academic—and parents need to tune in for a good relationship . . . show pride in his achievement.

"A child must eventually be able to match the aspiration of the parents. If not, there is conflict."

Get s opera new c
this T

An RG&E demonstrati care of your on loading the dishwas will be held
Service Aud
7:30 PM.

There will lot on Lawn
demonstrati come, conta
and make y

RG

Read

CARPETING
FURNITURE CLEANED
1/2 OFF

BUY A PEPS
TAKE HOME
D RUNN

Pops Xmas

HERALD-AMERICAN (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 424,654
DEC 24 1973
New England Newsclip

Pops Party Brings 'Joy to the World'

By ELLEN PFEIFER
Music Critic

• Concert Review

There may not have been much comfort or joy in the nations suffering from oil embargoes, nor much peace on earth, goodwill to men around the conference tables in Geneva, nor even a very optimistic faith in heaven's all-gracious king, but at the first Pops Christmas Party, Friday night in Symphony Hall, the packed audience seemed happy to put all of that out of its mind for two hours and to sing the old carols (albeit in silver-foil and velvet ribbon arrangements), drink Pops punch, cheer with their children the appearance of Santa Claus, and to believe completely all the Christmas sentiments.

Symphony Hall had been transformed from its usual winter sedateness into a modified setting with Pops tables replacing half of the orchestra seats, paper garlands (colored and spangled to resemble evergreens) replacing the usual springtime trellis-work, and banks of poinsettias substituting for the more traditional mums.

There were the familiar star-burst lights and the usual (however, compressed and emphasizing bottled cheer) menu of refreshments.

Arthur Fiedler, now 79, was there too, looking more sober and remote than one remembers seeing him before, but, nevertheless, the object of adulation by this crowd. Sitting very close and to one side of the stage, we were impressed at how uncommunicative this conductor is as far as facial expression goes. That is, until a brass player botched his "neighing horse" solo at the end of Leroy Anderson's "Sleigh-ride" and Fiedler winked and stuck out his tongue at the "offender."

Also present was the Tanglewood Festival Chorus — in a considerably more unbuttoned mood than one usually gets to see during more serious occasions. It sang lustily and who was to care if that meant a somewhat less refined quality than we are accustomed to?

But for spirited singing, one really had to wait until it was the audience's turn — in a sing-along of Hayman arrangements of favorite carols. These, plus the arrangements by Bennett which the chorus performed, represented the carol triumphal, what with lavish orchestral parts and all sorts of interpolated high notes and swelling crescendos.

Still, it was a lot of fun. And as the reporter next to me said (there's nothing like a couple of news people for being hard-bitten and jaded), "What with all the horrible things coming over the wires today, this concert certainly is enlightening."

HERALD-AMERICAN (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
D. 424,654
DEC 17 1973
New England Newsclip

ARTHUR FIEDLER discusses the arrangements for the upcoming Pops Christmas Party at Symphony Hall with a special guest. The party will take place Friday, Dec. 21 at 7:30 p. m. and Saturday, Dec. 22 at 3:30 and 7:30 p. m.

The News American
BALTIMORE, MD.
D. 200,782 SUN. 323,624
DEC 21 1973

On the Air

Aldine Bird

Fiedler Directs Boston Pops In Christmas Extravaganza

Energy crisis or no energy crisis, it's going to be a very warm Christmas so far as Arthur Fiedler is concerned. The famed and popular director of the Boston "Pops" orchestra and his musicians are going all-out Sunday at 7 p.m. on WBFF-Ch. 45 to bring music lovers a special Christmas treat.

BIRD

So, gather around and deck the halls with holly, mistletoe and ivy, if you wish, but sit back and enjoy a rare program of Yuletide music and even Santa Claus.

The conductor will open the program with a swirling medley of traditional carols, sung by the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, to include "First Noel," "O Little Town of Bethlehem," "I Saw Three Ships" and "Deck the Halls."

The Pops orchestra takes off on a musical sleigh ride to end all sleigh rides, and you know what tune they are going to be doing. Sure, "Sleigh Ride" for one, both versions of Leopold Mozart and Leroy Anderson.

The program will include Irving Berlin's immortal "White Christmas," as well as a visit from "Rudolph the Red-Nosed Reindeer," and, of course, all the boys will have to tell you "We Wish You a Merry Christmass in the form of a sing-along.

At the conclusion, what else? Santa Claus comes on stage to visit Arthur, the orchestra breaks into "Santa Claus is Coming to Town," and they present the maestro with a special Christmas gift . . .

Some of the familiar Yule songs you'll be hearing include "Moods of Christmas," "First Noel," "O Little Town of Bethlehem," "I Saw Three Ships," 'Deck the Halls," "Sleigh Ride," also "A Sleigh Ride, Old and New," and natch, "Silent Night."

No one knows what will be the outcome of the energy crisis but at least the Automobile Club of Maryland and WJZ-TV are trying to do something about it, so far as transportation to and from work or other places is concerned.

A "Commuter-Computer Car-Pool Club" has been organized designed to ease the pressing energy crisis and environmental problems and residents who live and work in the Metropolitan area are urged to send for their "commuter forms" at once Radio Station WFBR also has joined in the movement.

The computer will analyze and match all the potential commuters' applications for ride at the auto club.

Incidentally, Hank Grant of the Hollywood Daily Reporter tells me the sad news that Mary Tyler Moore and her hubby, Grant Tinker , a film producer, have parted company at their Malibu home. It had been rumored for some time that such a seperation was spending and he made it definite by moving out, a la Mandel.

She's such a doll . . .

Just received a telegram from ABC-TV in New York:

"Food inspectors have been forced to pass along contaminated chickens by threats and physical beatings. The food you eat is being genetically altered in tax-supported laboratories all over the U. S. When they're through with it, the food has to be injected with extract so that it tastes the way it is supposed to. Some food additives cause in children.

"These are some of the findings to be revealed in 'ABC News Closeup on Foods: Green Grow the Profits,' which will be aired Friday night, Dec. 21, from 10 to 11 p.m., (WJZ locally)."

What next?

Fort Lauderdale News
FORT LAUDERDALE, FLA.
D. 83,276
DEC 21 1973

Arthur Fiedler Show Set For Sunday Slot

When Arthur Fiedler conducts there's no such thing as an "Energy Crisis."

Gather 'round and deck the halls—Arthur Fiedler's Christmas At The Pops brings you the wonderful world of Christmas music Sunday at 7 p.m. on Channel 2.

The show opens with a medley of carols—sung by the Tanglewood Festival Chorus—"First Noel," "O Little Town of Bethlehem," "I Saw Three Ships," and "Deck the Halls." The Pops Orchestra takes off on a musical sleigh ride, playing both Leopold Mozart's "Sleigh Ride," as well as Leroy Anderson's version.

And what Christmas would be complete without Irving Berlin's "White Christmas," or a visit from "Rudolph the Red Nosed Reindeer?" And then in a "We Wish You a Merry Christmas Sing-a-long" the whole audience gets a chance to sing their favorite Christmas carols with the Tanglewood Chorus.

PRESS
WATERTOWN, MASS.
W. 5,097
DEC 20 1973
New England Newsclip

ARTHUR FIEDLER

Yule Favorites

When Arthur Fiedler conducts there's no such thing as an "Energy Crisis". It's going to be a warm Christmas after all, because Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra are back for a special Christmas present for you.

Gather round and deck the halls — with boughs of holly, mistletoe and Arthur Fiedler. "Christmas at Pops" brings you the wonderful world of Christmas music Sunday, Dec. 23, at 10 pm on Channel 2. The program will be repeated on Channel 2 on Monday, Dec. 24, at 7 p.m. and Christmas Day at 7 p.m.

"Christmas at Pops" opens with a swirling medley of traditional carols — sung by the Tanglewood Festival Chorus — "First Noel," "O Little Town of Bethlehem," "I Saw Three Ships," and "Deck the Halls." The Pops Orchestra takes off on a musical sleigh ride to end all sleigh rides — playing both Leopold Mozart's "Sleigh Ride," as well as Leroy Anderson's version.

And what Christmas would be complete without Irving Berlin's "White Christmas," or a visit from "Rudolph the Red [illegible]." And then in a "[illegible] a Merry Christmas [illegible] Long" — the whole audience gets a chance to sing their favorite Christmas carols with the Tanglewood Chorus. A good time for the whole family to sing-a-long, too.

And then — Santa, himself, visits Arthur — on stage. The Orchestra aings into "Santa Claus is Comin to Town" and Arthur Fiedler gets a special Christmas present.

DALTON, GA.
CITIZEN-NEWS
D. 11,000
DEC 21 1973

'Christmas at Pops' With Arthur Fiedler

When Arthur Fiedler conducts, there is no such thing as an energy crisis. It's going to be a warm Christmas after all, because Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra are back for a special Christmas present for you.

Gather round and deck the halls — with boughs of holly, mistletoe, and Arthur Fiedler. "Christmas At Pops" brings you the wonderful world of Christmas music Monday, Dec. 24 at 10 p.m. on UHF Channel 18, Chatsworth.

"Christmas At Pops" opens with a swirling medley of traditional carols, sung by the Tanglewood Festival Chorus. "First Noel," "Oh Little Town of Bethlehem," "I Saw Three Ships," and "Deck The Halls."

The Pops Orchestra takes off on a musical sleigh ride to end all sleigh rides — playing both Leopold Mozart's "Sleigh Ride" as well as LeRoy Anderson's version.

And what Christmas would be complete without Irving Berlin's "White Christmas" or a visit from "Rudolph The Red-nosed Reindeer"? And then in a "We Wish You A Merry Christmas" sing-a-long, the whole audience gets a chance to sing their favorite Christmas carols with the Tanglewood Chorus. A good time for the whole family to sing a-long, too.

Join Arthur Fiedler for "Christmas At Pops." Deck the Halls. Enjoy.

"Christmas At Pops" is being broadcast over the Georgia ETV Network, which is owned and operated by the State Department of Education.

Pops Xmas

56

SUNDAY HERALD
NORWALK, CONN.
S. 30,354

DEC 23 1973

New England Newsclip

HAPPY FIEDLER — Santa Claus stands with Arthur Fiedler at the podium of the Boston Pops Saturday, after presenting the conductor with a Santa hat following a carol concert in Symphony Hall, Boston.

SARASOTA, FLA.
HERALD TRIBUNE
D. 31,000 S. 35,000

DEC 23 1973

Fiedler, Pops' Christmas Gift

When Arthur Fiedler conducts, there is no such thing as an energy crisis. It's going to be a warm Christmas after all, because Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra are back for a special Christmas present for you.

Gather round and deck the halls — with boughs of holly, mistletoe, and Arthur Fiedler. "Christmas At Pops" opens with a swirling medley of traditional carols, sung by the Tanglewood Festival Chorus. "First Noel", "Oh Little Town of Bethleham", "I Saw Three Ships", and "Deck The Halls".

The Pops Orchestra takes off on a musical sleigh ride to end all sleigh rides — playing both Leopold Mozart's "Sleigh Ride" as well as Leroy Anderson's version.

SNYDER, TEXAS
NEWS
D. 6,500

DEC 23 1973

Christmas At Pops A Joyous Treasure

Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra are back with a Christmas special to delight the entire family.

CHRISTMAS AT POPS brings you a joyous Christmas treasure chest of favorite carols and traditional tunes Sunday, December 23, at 6 p.m., repeated Monday, Dec. 24, at 8 p.m. on KERA (PBS).

The Tanglewood Festival Chorus opens the program with a swirling medley of traditional carols including "Silent Night," "O Come All Ye Faithful" and "O Little Town of Bethlehem." Then, the Pops Orchestra takes off on a musical sleigh ride to end all sleigh rides—playing both Leopold Mozart's "Sleigh Ride" as well as Leroy Anderson's version.

And what Christmas would be complete without Irving Berlin's "White Christmas," or a visit from "Rudolph The Red Nosed Reindeer"? And then the whole audience (and viewers, of course) are invited to join with the Tanglewood Chorus in singing their favorite Christmas carols in the "We Wish You A Merry Christmas Sing-A-Long."

A visit from Santa Claus on stage winds up the festivities as the Orchestra zings into "Santa Claus Is Coming To Town."

Deck the halls. And sing-along.

CHRISTMAS AT POPS, made possible by a grant from the Martin Marietta Corporation, is a production of WGBH, Boston and transmitted nationally by the Public Broadcasting Service. Producer: Bill Cosel.

NEWS (E)
NEWPORT, R. I.
D. 15,337

DEC 27 1973

New England Newsclip

CONDUCTOR RECOVERS

BOSTON (AP) — Boston Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler is in good condition and should be "up and around within a few days," according to a spokesman for New England Medical Hospital.

Fiedler was admitted to the hospital the day before Christmas for treatment of pneumonia, the spokesman said.

SANTA MONICA, CALIF.
OUTLOOK
D. 36,000

DEC 27 1973

Conductor Winning Bout With Pneumonia

BOSTON (UPI) — Boston Pops Conductor Arthur Fiedler, admitted to the New England Medical Hospital on Christmas Eve with pneumonia, was listed in "good" condition today.

A hospital spokesman said Fiedler, 79, entered the hospital with "a high temperature and pneumonia" the day before Christmas. "His condition is now good and he is on antibiotics," he said.

At one point, Fiedler's temperature reached 104 degrees.

SOUTH MIDDLESEX
NEWS (E)
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
D. 32,500

DEC 27 1973

New England Newsclip

Arthur Fiedler hospitalized

BOSTON (UPI) — Boston Pops Conductor Arthur Fiedler, admitted to the New England Medical Hospital on Christmas Eve with pneumonia, was listed in "good" condition today.

A hospital spokesman said Fiedler, 79, entered the hospital with "a high temperature and pneumonia" the day before Christmas. "His condition is now good and he is on antibiotics," he said.

At one point, Fiedler's temperature reached 104 degrees.

TIMES REPORTER
SPRINGFIELD, VT.
D. 6,500

DEC 27 1973

New England Newsclip

Fiedler hospitalized; condition reported good

BOSTON (AP) — Boston Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler is in good condition and should be "up and around within a few days," according to a spokesman for New England Medical Hospital.

Fiedler was admitted to the hospital the day before Christmas for treatment of pneumonia, the spokesman said.

NEWS (E)
SALEM, MASS.
D. 29,244

DEC 27 1973

New England Newsclip

Arthur Fiedler hospitalized

BOSTON (AP) — Boston Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler is in good condition and should be "up and around within a few days," according to a spokesman for New England Medical Hospital.

Fiedler was admitted to the hospital the day before Christmas for treatment of pneumonia, the spokesman said.

Fiedler illness

ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH
D. 326,376 SUN. 541,868

DEC 27 1973

Boston Pops conductor ARTHUR FIEDLER, admitted to the New England Medical Hospital on Christmas Eve with pneumonia, was listed in good condition today. A hospital spokesman said that Fiedler, 79, entered the hospital with "a high temperature that reached 104 degrees." The illness will prevent Fiedler from making a special appearance in Denver and will also prevent him from performing in Houston, Tex., on New Year's Eve.

Pops Xmas

56

SUNDAY HERALD
NORWALK, CONN.
S. 30,354

DEC 23 1973

New England Newsclip

HAPPY FIEDLER — Santa Claus stands with Arthur Fiedler at the podium of the Boston Pops Saturday, after presenting the conductor with a Santa hat following a carol concert in Symphony Hall, Boston.

SARASOTA, FLA.
HERALD TRIBUNE
D. 31,000 S. 35,000

DEC 23 1973

Fiedler, Pops' Christmas Gift

When Arthur Fiedler conducts, there is no such thing as an energy crisis. It's going to be a warm Christmas after all, because Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra are back for a special Christmas present for you.

Gather round and deck the halls — with boughs of holly, mistletoe, and Arthur Fiedler. "Christmas At Pops" opens with a swirling medley of traditional carols, sung by the Tanglewood Festival Chorus. "First Noel", "Oh Little Town of Bethleham", "I Saw Three Ships", and "Deck The Halls".

The Pops Orchestra takes off on a musical sleigh ride to end all sleigh rides — playing both Leopold Mozart's "Sleigh Ride" as well as Leroy Anderson's version.

SNYDER, TEXAS
NEWS
D. 6,500

DEC 23 1973

Christmas At Pops A Joyous Treasure

Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra are back with a Christmas special to delight the entire family.

CHRISTMAS AT POPS brings you a joyous Christmas treasure chest of favorite carols and traditional tunes Sunday, December 23, at 6 p.m., repeated Monday, Dec. 24, at 8 p.m. on KERA (PBS).

The Tanglewood Festival Chorus opens the program with a swirling medley of traditional carols including "Silent Night," "O Come All Ye Faithful" and "O Little Town of Bethlehem." Then, the Pops Orchestra takes off on a musical sleigh ride to end all sleigh rides—playing both Leopold Mozart's "Sleigh Ride" as well as Leroy Anderson's version.

And what Christmas would be complete without Irving Berlin's "White Christmas," or a visit from "Rudolph The Red Nosed Reindeer"? And then the whole audience (and viewers, of course) are invited to join with the Tanglewood Chorus in singing their favorite Christmas carols in the "We Wish You A Merry Christmas Sing-A-Long."

A visit from Santa Claus on stage winds up the festivities as the Orchestra zings into "Santa Claus Is Coming To Town."

Deck the halls. And sing-along.

CHRISTMAS AT POPS, made possible by a grant from the Martin Marietta Corporation, is a production of WGBH, Boston and transmitted nationally by the Public Broadcasting Service. Producer: Bill Cosel.

NEWS (E)
NEWPORT, R. I.
D. 15,337

DEC 27 1973

New England Newsclip

CONDUCTOR RECOVERS

BOSTON (AP) — Boston Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler is in good condition and should be "up and around within a few days," according to a spokesman for New England Medical Hospital.

Fiedler was admitted to the hospital the day before Christmas for treatment of pneumonia, the spokesman said.

SANTA MONICA, CALIF.
OUTLOOK
D. 36,000

DEC 27 1973

Conductor Winning Bout With Pneumonia

BOSTON (UPI) — Boston Pops Conductor Arthur Fiedler, admitted to the New England Medical Hospital on Christmas Eve with pneumonia, was listed in "good" condition today.

A hospital spokesman said Fiedler, 79, entered the hospital with "a high temperature and pneumonia" the day before Christmas. "His condition is now good and he is on antibiotics," he said.

At one point, Fiedler's temperature reached 104 degrees.

SOUTH MIDDLESEX
NEWS (E)
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
D. 32,500

DEC 27 1973

New England Newsclip

Arthur Fiedler hospitalized

BOSTON (UPI) — Boston Pops Conductor Arthur Fiedler, admitted to the New England Medical Hospital on Christmas Eve with pneumonia, was listed in "good" condition today.

A hospital spokesman said Fiedler, 79, entered the hospital with "a high temperature and pneumonia" the day before Christmas. "His condition is now good and he is on antibiotics," he said.

At one point, Fiedler's temperature reached 104 degrees.

TIMES REPORTER
SPRINGFIELD, VT.
D. 6,500

DEC 27 1973

New England Newsclip

Fiedler hospitalized; condition reported good

BOSTON (AP) — Boston Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler is in good condition and should be "up and around within a few days," according to a spokesman for New England Medical Hospital.

Fiedler was admitted to the hospital the day before Christmas for treatment of pneumonia, the spokesman said.

NEWS (E)
SALEM, MASS.
D. 29,244

DEC 27 1973

New England Newsclip

Arthur Fiedler hospitalized

BOSTON (AP) — Boston Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler is in good condition and should be "up and around within a few days," according to a spokesman for New England Medical Hospital.

Fiedler was admitted to the hospital the day before Christmas for treatment of pneumonia, the spokesman said.

Fiedler illness

ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH
D. 326,376 SUN. 541,868

DEC 27 1973

Boston Pops conductor ARTHUR FIEDLER, admitted to the New England Medical Hospital on Christmas Eve with pneumonia, was listed in good condition today. A hospital spokesman said that Fiedler, 79, entered the hospital with "a high temperature that reached 104 degrees." The illness will prevent Fiedler from making a special appearance in Denver and will also prevent him from performing in Houston, Tex., on New Year's Eve.

END OF VOLUME

END OF REEL

PLEASE REWIND